Over the years Minneapolis has produced some great bands. Sussman Lawrence, the Suburbs & The Replacements to name a few. So step aside Prince, The Wallets are totally nude.

James Ross

Gotta Love Grace

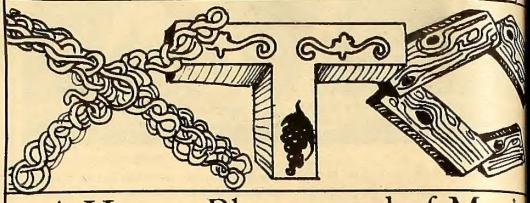
Let's face it. Grace Jones is too cool. She's still the best pretentious and danceable ear-biting diva in the world. Her latest album Inside Story has signs of sell-out from the word go. But it gets much, much better. The opening cut, "I'm not perfect (but I'm perfect for you)" is reminiscent of Tina Turner's recent power disco sell-out, as is the second cut, "Hollywood Liar." Uh-oh, I thought, if Grace sells out, who'll be left? She comes right back, however, with the beautiful "Chan Goes to Shanghai" with cool, chiming guitars and an intense, danceable rhythm typical of Grace's earlier stuff. This trend continues, for the most part, through the rest of the album.

I'll admit it. Inside Story is not as good as her earlier work which included reggae greats Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare, which combined Grace's smooth New York-Chanteuse voice to make classics like "My Jamaican Guy" and "Pull Up to the Bumper." However, it is as good as the comparable (in both sound and quality) to her hit "Slave to the Rhythm." Perhaps we could do without some of the synths and drum machines, but she makes up for this icki-ness with a slick, gorgeous production (by Nile Rodgers and Gracie) with great use of horns, and acoustic piano that jumps out at you from the depths of her complex rhythms.

By the most primitive and important criterion, fun, this album is hot, for every tune is danceable, cool, and innately Grace (except those first two tunes).

Grace is too cool.

Marty Broan



A Happy Playground of Music

I am a big fan of XTC and would quite honestly admit that I would like any album they chose to put out. This, however, is not true of many of you out there. Some of you haven't even heard of XTC. Some of you have heard them, but don't make a practice of listening to them. Some of you even think you don't like them. I can understand this. I, myself, was a reluctant listener when I first heard them. it was only after weeks of constant exposure to English Settlement that I gave in. You non-believers have it lucky. It won't take you weeks to like XTC's newest, Skylarking. Minutes, maybe. An hour, tops.

Skylarking is the first we've heard from XTC in a few years. There is an entirely different mood found here, one that was touched on in Mummer, but was never fully developed. The dark, muddled side of XTC's music is absent from this album, and what comes through is a joyful, chil like infatuation with life. Songs li "Summer's Cauldron," "Ballet for a Ra Day," and "Season Cycle" are rich wi images of a new, fertile world—trees drunk with nectar, rain is multicolore people are drowning in sensory overloa

I don't know what happened in t interim between The Big Express and th album to change this band's outlook on li Perhaps some of the credit can be given Todd Rungren, who produced Skylarki This is the clearest album we've heard f from XTC—there is more direction to t music, more cohesiveness to the sound th before got lost in itself.

Skylarking is a frolic, a playground music. I find that I want to listen to it ov and over again. It has an innoce happiness that I haven't heard in a lo time.

Jody Reed

ANNIVERSARY SALE
1st Anniversary at our Southgate store!

Perms • Perms • Perms
Any Perm
$18.95
*complete *includes shampoo, cut and style
(Save up to $24.00!)
(Reg. $19.95 - $42.95)
20% Off All Other Services
(with ad)
Expires 2/28/87
coupon

NO APPOINTMENT NECESSARY
GREAT EXPECTATIONS
PRECISION HAIRCUTTERS
6 Southgate Road (Southgate Mall) 520-9957
Mon. -Fri. 8-7
Sat. 8-5
Sun. 11-5

Family Hair Care with the Personal Touch

	Regular Price	Your Price
Shampoo, Cut & Blow Dry....	10.95	8.75
Shampoo & Cut.....	6.95	5.55
Just-A-Cut.....	5.95	4.75
Colorings.....(from)	24.95	19.95

SATURDAY 7 & 9

THE ROCKY HORROR PICTURE SHOW

a different set of jaws.

FILMS INCORPORATED

OLIN

Chillin' and Illin' on the Music Scene: The Tulio Tapes

This jammin' world keeps on jammin' but so often the modern music scene is going in so many different styles and directions that it seems to take ridiculous amounts of time and money just to know the names of all the bands your friends back home talk about every time you're home. Yet music is an ever increasingly important part of this world. With the onslaught of MTV, movie soundtracks, stereo television hook-ups etc., music has saturated the media world. The Anti-Apartheid movement has been empowered by protest songs and Nigerian singer Fela Kuti still plans to become president of his country. Music is in many ways a reflection of the most important part of life: change. Yet Colorado College can be one of the trickier places to keep up with what's hot, especially concerning new music (besides bootlegs of the latest Dead shows of course). That is why this column exists. Its primary function in one word is support. In a few more words: tips, reviews, concert dates, encouragement, harassment, gossip, local demo and sample tapes and whatever else you think is important. Enough intro, onward to music.

The Cure's "Head on the Door" has been out for awhile now but is still worth mentioning. If you liked "Japanese Whispers" you'll love their latest jaunt into the nightmare zone of the New Wave. Robert Smith's unique mix of pop and psychosis makes the album a balanced mix of disturbing cuts such as "The Blood" and the extremely catchy "In Between Days." In the same musical vein is Love and Rockets second album "Express." Love and Rockets consists of three ex-Bauhaus members. While not exactly "cheery," Love and Rockets have proven to be far more optimistic than the black on black morbidity of Bauhaus. The stand-out single on "Express" is easily their cover of "Ball of Confusion." A very listenable, smooth, funk/funk dance cut. But maybe you're not so into this "New Wave Stuff." Maybe you're lookin' desperately for some fresh "def jams." Have no fear, the Beastie Boys are here.

Their names been circling the campus for few have been exposed to their chillin' and illin'. You may not love their latest album "Licensed to Ill," but if it doesn't bring even a quick grin to your face, you've either got terminal herpes or have been listening to far too much Jazz and are taking life too seriously in general. Of course Rolling Stone declares that "To much of white America rap means mayhem and bloodletting" but that wouldn't apply to CC would it? To set things straight this couldn't be called "good" music in any technical sense. But rap has always been minimalistic and its a lot of fun to learn the raps and shout em' out at Frat parties and Bemis/Taylor. But don't take my word for it, head down to Budget records and ask to check it out.

While you're there check out "I Against I," the latest by one of Americas most original bands; The Bad Brains. In their first album "Rock for Light" there existed a clear division between their reggae and hardcore songs. In "I Against I" the band has fused the two together to produce a more psychedelic sound. The rythym is heavy, the singing bizarre and inspired, the guitar riffs full of sharp breaks and fast runs, and the album worth listening to.

Well now you might be figuring some of this sounds pretty good but it's a shame one can't afford to buy records these days. Wrong, a Domino's pizza with a few toppings costs about as much as a new record and has far more calories. Don't eat your music. A cheap alternative is used record stores. The copy of the Cure record I reviewed had a $2.50 price tag from Recycled. The Sound Shop on Tejon sells high-bias ninety minute tapes for under two dollars. Of course there's always the Columbia Record Club: eleven bogus records for only one cent! If you've already spent your rent money on Iron Maiden tickets, you can still get the best new cuts for two dollars. I've got about twenty tapes full of cuts off the albums reviewed plus Run D.M.C., Albert Collins, Georgia Sattelites, P.I.L., New Order, Billy Bragg, Shriekback and more. All you have to do is stop by the Student Center. If they're all gone drop off your name, phone number and address and I'll try to get one to you. The next insert of "This Jammin World" will have more concert dates, K.R.C.C., and whatever you think I should write about. The Quote Of The Week is from P.J. O'Rouke, "Only two parts of life are really fun; making things and breaking them. Build it and blast it, this is the big fun, the very thing the Universe is based on." Rock on.

Tulio Browning

WHAT'S ON YOUR TURNTABLE?

Dana Veeder Junior English
Buddy Holly, "Legend"

Rachel Pollack Freshman Drama
Pink Floyd, "Dark Side of the Moon"

John Korhumel Sophomore Undecided
Ludwig von Beethoven, The Ninth Symphony

Mary Bevington Freshman Drama
REM, "Reckoning"

Dean Winters Senior English
Beastie Boys, "Licensed to Ill"

Emily Smith Freshman Undecided
The Bangles, "A Different Light"

ARTS CALENDAR

ALL INCLUSIVE! SOMETHING NEW TO DO EVERY DAY OF THE MONTH!!

JAN 23

Famed violinist Ida Kavafaian to play at CC. Part of the Great Performers series of the Leisure Program, 8:15 at Packard Hall Tickets $6 at the Student Center.

JAN 23-24

A sampler of American musical theater, a Theater Workshop Production. Tickets at Student Center, free w/CC ID.

JAN 28

Preview, Open Dress Rehearsal

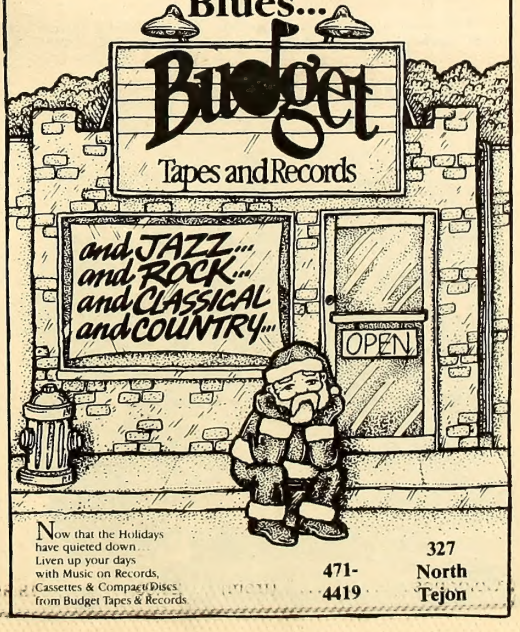
JAN 31

DaVinci Quartet Performance at the Pikes Peak East Library and Information Center (ELIC), 5550 N. Union. Concert at 8:00.

Feb 5-7, 10-14

The Sam Beckett Play, "Happy Days" in the Dwire Auditorium on the campus of UCCS. Performances are at 8:00. $7, $6 for students.

We got the Post-Holiday Blues...



Now that the Holidays have quieted down Liven up your days with Music on Records, Cassettes & Compact Discs from Budget Tapes & Records

471-4419

327 North Tejon

Today & Saturday
Last Day of Sale
25% Off Everything
50% Off Christmas Items

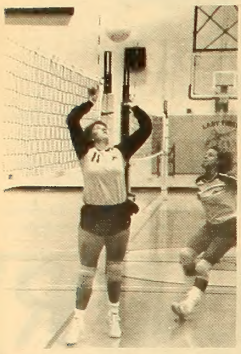
Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm Sat. 11-5 pm

THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE

Downtown on Platte Between Tejon & Cascade

phone: 635-2118

Nine Tigers Fall All-Americans



ALL-REGIONAL

MEN'S SOCCER:
Andy Dorsey
Greg Kazemi

WOMEN'S SOCCER:
Janire Szpara
Karen Willoughby
Shelly Seporovich
Michelle Bulger
Kerri Tashiro
Keri Schloredt
Maryclarie Robinson
Libbey Sheldon
Jennifer Murphree
Margot Stolte
Cheryl Bartles

WOMEN'S VOLLEYBALL:
Elissa Breitbard

ACADEMIC ALL-REGIONAL

WOMEN'S SOCCER:
Anna Shortt
Jennifer Murphree
Libbey Sheldon
Margot Stolte
Jenny Hickman

CC All Americans (clockwise from upper left): Amy Smith, Greg Kazemi, Scott Kang, Janine Szpara, Karen Willoughby, Cathy Costello, Shelly Separovich.

Count them, Nine CCers received American honors for outstand performances in their respective sp this fall. The women's soccer team h the list with five players gaining season All-America recogniti Goalkeeper Janine Szpara made the Balance sponsored NSCAA Division team two years running. Szpara started the U.S. women's National team summer and has been called
"arguably the best keeper in the natio
Need I say more! Frosh defender S
Separovich and sophomore attacker K
Willoughby were chosen to the NS
Division I 3rd Team. "Silent but dea
Separovich, called by coach D Pubulvech the "most complete smartest sweeperback in the country known for her deft ball control heading ability. Willoughby, the south kid from Georgia, possesses outstan quickness and enjoys tumbling on soccer field. And yes, the women's so team does bring their books on road tr
Academic All-America honors were Russian Studies major Anna Shortt
Art Major Jennifer Murphree. B sophomore starters, defender Shortt attacker Murphree played key roles in soccer team's unbelievable 2nd p finish.

From CC's 8th ranked volleyball te junior Amy Smith and Frosh C
Costello made the Russel sponsored C
Division III 2nd team. Smith, an inst
and highly competitive setter, Costello, termed by her coach as having
"potential to become the best m blocker in the country," blended the r amount of chemistry between themse and their team to lead the volleyballers the NCAA playoffs.

Two male athletes, Greg Kazemi
Scott Kang, also received All-Am honors.

Senior standout Kazemi became first male soccer player ever to receiv
All-America award. He was selecte
New Balance's Division III 3rd team midfielder.

Junior long distance phenomenon, qualified for his All-America standin placing 16th at the Division III nati meet. Known for his strong finishes, ran a personal best of 24:29 over kilometer distance.

Congrats to each of these nine athl their teammates, and of course, coaches! Do it again in '87 CCers!!

Karen Willou

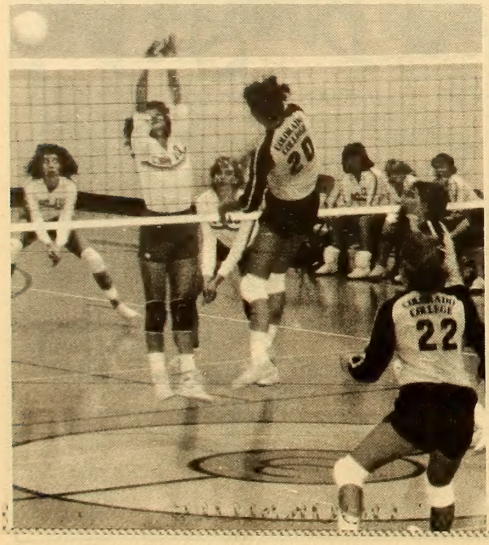

PHOTO BY JERRY WANG

Scott Schneider (#12) politely introduces a BC Eagle to CC's fans.

Icers Really Slide

There were no happy holidays for the olorado College hockey team over ristmas break. The Tigers played all t the country - the east and west coasts d at home in Colorado but went 0-4 over ation. Last weekend, however, things proved slightly as the icers split with o Hockey East opponents. They minated the University of New mpshire 7-2, Friday night, then pped a close 9-7 contest to Boston lege Saturday night at the Broadmoor rld Arena.

Senior and leading scorer Rick Boh led way Friday with his second hat trick of season plus an assist for a four point ht. Scott Schneider and Doug Clarke two assists and a goal each while Gord laker chipped in two goals for the win. The University of New Hampshire lit the scoreboard in the first thirty seconds the Tigers came roaring back scoring goals in the first period to insure the tory.

Derek Pizzey was in the nets for the gers and stopped 23 UNH shots.

Saturday night the situation was ersed as the Tigers watched the Boston lege Eagles score five goals in the first riod. Schneider kept CC in the game h 2 goals in the first period and ntinued strong play throughout the ght. The senior center posted a hat trick d an assist for the night, totaling seven nts for the weekend.

Pizzey started the game between the es but was replaced by Matt Gilbreth o blocked 25 Eagle attempts in the ond and third periods. Pizzey had 14 es before being pulled.

At the end of the first twenty minutes was down by a three goal margin, 5-2. he Eagles and the Tigers traded goals in second period twice, Schneider topped off his hat trick with an unassisted goal while Tim Budy pounced on the rebound of a Tom Pederson shot and put it away in the upper left corner. Schneider won the face off to spark that goal.

B.C. padded their lead with a goal in the first five minutes to make the score 8-4.

The Tigers came alive though and kept the game close. CC's Cal Brown took control for goal number five. The freshman walked in from the blue line and slipped the puck in while drawing a B.C. penalty. CC was unable to capitalize on this power play but came through on the next one with a picture perfect power play goal. The Tigers set up and moved the puck around, utilizing all five men. Tim Budy finished the play scoring his second of the night, pulling the Tigers within two points.

The crowd started going wild as the improved hustle of the Tigers almost created an upset in the last ten minutes. Amid the thunderous cheering, Rick Boh and Doug Clarke connected, narrowing the margin to one with 4:30 left. Boh won the face off in the Eagles zone, getting the puck back to Clarke at the top of the circle. Clarke one timed it past B.C.'s goalie to make the score 8-7.

With 2:36 left in the game CC had another man advantage situation. Gilbrett was pulled in favor of a sixth skater but B.C. cleared the puck hitting the post of CC's empty net. CC was unable to get back in time and the Eagles took their time with number nine, an empty net goal.

CC's record dropped to 9-16-1 overall and 7-15-1 in the Western Collegiate Hockey Association. There are big hopes for improvement this weekend when the Tigers travel to Michigan to play the cellar-dwellers, Michigan Tech.

KATHLEEN MAHONEY

Hoopin' Dudes

Two months into their schedule, the CC men's basketball team remains exactly what they were at the start of the NCAA season: an enigma. After showing that they can indeed put together two halves of quality basketball and defeat a decent opponent, the Tigers have suffered back to back losses despite leading both games at the half.

Wednesday night the Tigers took on Incarnate Word College in San Antonio, Texas, and suffered their second defeat in as many games. True to form, CC led by two at halftime, yet suffered when big man Dave Rakel fouled out in the second period. Incarnate Word beat the Tigers on the boards, collecting 34 rebounds to CC's 28 and pulled out the victory 92-87. In the losing cause, Rob Bogue connected for 25 points including three from long range.

Seven days earlier the Tigers played host to tiny Ripon College of Wisconsin. In the first half the Redmen, who incidentally qualified for the NCAA tournament last season, were seeing stripes as the Bengals built up a convincing ten point advantage. Yet the Tigers left their first period intensity in the locker room and a rejuvenated Ripon squad proceeded to burn CC from inside and outside. With the help of several crucial turnovers, bad shot selection and some stupid fouls, the Tigers were outclassed in the second half by even the Ripon cheerleaders as CC fell 74-66.

Yet on January 3rd the Tigers rallied to an impressive 74-68 victory over visiting Judson College. In the win, CC managed to shoot far better than average as a team hitting at a 47% clip in addition to connecting on an incredible 55% from three-point territory. In the victory Rob Bogue led all scorers with 23 points and Dave "Dr." Schroeder hauled down nine rebounds while scoring 12 points.

The Tigers, 4-10 thus far, have had a season of precious highs and blatant lows. One of the bright spots for the Tigers has been the play of senior guard Rob Bogue who ranks among the top scorers in NCAA Division III with a 22 point per game average. The consistency of junior forward Dave Schroeder, averaging 6.5 rebounds and 11.6 points per game and junior guard Rob Hemminger, the team's runaway assist leader, have also been plusses. Yet as a team the Tigers are shooting a woeful 39% from the field and are being consistently out-rebounded by opponents. CC has a chance to turn things around this weekend as they compete in the Trinity University Invitational. The Tiger's next home game is January 23 at 7:30 as they take on Regis.

David Evans

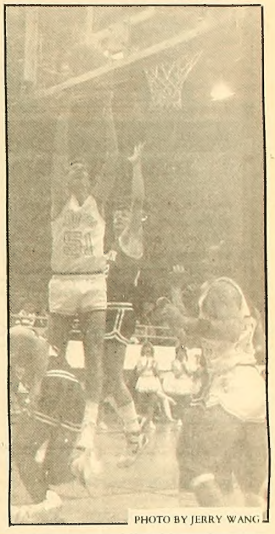

PHOTO BY JERRY WANG

1987

JANUARY

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
				1	2	3
4	5	6	7	8	9	10
11	12	13	14	15	16	17
18	19	20	21	22	23	24
25	26	27	28	29	30	31

FEBRUARY

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
1	2	3	4	5	6	7
8	9	10	11	12	13	14
15	16	17	18	19	20	21
22	23	24	25	26	27	28

MARCH

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
1	2	3	4	5	6	7
8	9	10	11	12	13	14
15	16	17	18	19	20	21
22	23	24	25	26	27	28
29	30	31

APRIL

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
			1	2	3	4
5	6	7	8	9	10	11
12	13	14	15	16	17	18
19	20	21	22	23	24	25
26	27	28	29	30

MAY

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
					1	2
3	4	5	6	7	8	9
10	11	12	13	14	15	16
17	18	19	20	21	22	23
24	25	26	27	28	29	30
31

JUNE

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
	1	2	3	4	5	6
7	8	9	10	11	12	13
14	15	16	17	18	19	20
21	22	23	24	25	26	27
28	29	30

JULY

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
			1	2	3	4
5	6	7	8	9	10	11
12	13	14	15	16	17	18
19	20	21	22	23	24	25
26	27	28	29	30	31

AUGUST

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
						1
2	3	4	5	6	7	8
9	10	11	12	13	14	15
16	17	18	19	20	21	22
23	24	25	26	27	28	29
30	31

SEPTEMBER

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
		1	2	3	4	5
6	7	8	9	10	11	12
13	14	15	16	17	18	19
20	21	22	23	24	25	26
27	28	29	30

OCTOBER

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
				1	2	3
4	5	6	7	8	9	10
11	12	13	14	15	16	17
18	19	20	21	22	23	24
25	26	27	28	29	30	31

NOVEMBER

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
1	2	3	4	5	6	7
8	9	10	11	12	13	14
15	16	17	18	19	20	21
22	23	24	25	26	27	28
29	30

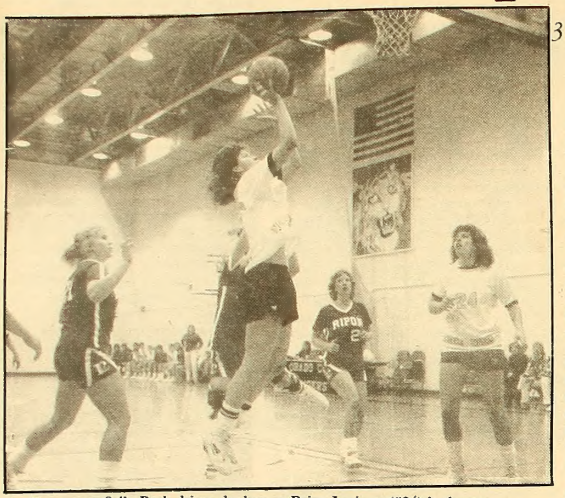
DECEMBER

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
		1	2	3	4	5
6	7	8	9	10	11	12
13	14	15	16	17	18	19
20	21	22	23	24	25	26
27	28	29	30	31

Colorado College Bookstore

Women's Hoopsters on a Roll

3 Game Streak Matches Last Season's Win To



Leading scorer Sally Bush drives the lane as Paige Lorimer (#24) looks on.

By Dean Campbell

Last year, any mention of the CC women's basketball team elicited groans of utter disgust and images of abject futility. The Tigers shot anemically, couldn't rebound, and generally stumbled their way to a pathetic 3-23 record. While there was little good to be said about the 1985-86 season, at least things couldn't get much worse.

The 1986-87 squad is an entirely different story. Bolstered by the addition of three freshmen 5'11" or taller (last year's tallest Tiger stood only 5'9"), and enriched by an extra year of experience, CC has already doubled last year's win total after only thirteen contests. After compiling a 3-6 record, the Tigers won three of their next four games. CC sandwiched wins over Claremont and Cal State-San Bernadino around a loss to Luther (Iowa) College during a holiday road trip to California, and returned home to post a win over Ripon (Wisconsin) College January 7th.

On January 13th in Golden, CC earned an impressive victory against Division II opponent Colorado School of Mines to even their season record at 7-7. Despite trailing 44-24 at halftime, the Tigers gutted out a 60-58 win, limiting the Orediggers to only 14 second half points on 21.7% (5 for 23) shooting from the field. Led by Sally Bush's 22 points and 2 steals, and Brenda Hull's 12 points and 3 steals, the Tigers have now won three consecutive games for the first time in Head Coach Beth Branson's brief coaching career.

Coach Branson cites experience heighth as the two most important fa in this season's success. Senior g Kitzie Pettersen has provided needed leadership, scoring and control of CC's fast break offense. 5'11" freshman center Sally Bush both consistent scoring and st rebounding. With added height an effective fast break, the Tigers are cre more layups and other high percen shots to significantly improve last y shooting statistics.

Branson also notes continued high spirit levels in this year's improve Although always a spirited group season's team was unable to conver spirit into victories. Says Beth, "we we could play basketball, we just d know how to win." She points t California road trip victories as evi that this is no longer the case.

Although the Tigers appear wel their way to reaching their preseason of a .500 season, they are by no m home free. Still lurking on the remai schedule are Division II teams Air F Academy, Regis College, Universit Northern Colorado and Adams S College.

CC's next game will be tonight a against NAIA opponent Chad (Nebraska) State College at El Pa Sports Center. Do yourself a favor come cheer a much improved Tiger on to a chance at a winning record.

Dean's Drivel

Perhaps being born in Denver was something of a curse. It's a great city, mind you, with nice people, good weather, and a convenient location to pursue various outdoor activities, but its image is tarnished by a certain orange plague of ignorant loyalty that infests nearly all its inhabitants: Love for the Broncos. It seems that when I was born this innately blind deification of the men in orange and blue somehow eluded me, and I was condemned to a life of emptiness and misguided loyalties (my favorite color as a child being purple, I opted instead for those northern nordic knights, the Minnesota Vikings). Not that I hated the Broncos; in fact, I rather enjoyed the harmlessly bad Bronco teams of the Lou Saban and John Ralston eras that would always finish somewhere at or below .500 and rarely ever challenge any good teams. Bronco teams that were led by such immortally mediocre players as John Hufnagel, Mike Haffner and Billy van Heusen were OK with me, pleasantly hard working and harmlessly unskilled. But then came the nightmare of 1977. Led by an overachieving defense, and, at best, a mediocre offense, the Broncos stormed to the AFC West Division title and the home field advantage in the playoffs with a 12-2 record. After a convincing first-round playoff victory over Pittsburgh (a great day to go skiing; ask anyone who went last Sunday), the cursed Raiders came to town. I was sure that the Broncos would play hard and tough, but, although they had already beaten the Raiders twice that year (30-7 in Oakland), their offensive inadequacies would eventually, and rightfully, undo them. But, after an early bomb from the most pathetic looking quarterback to ever play in the NFL, Craig Morton (that year, the Broncos undoubtedly had the worse trio of quarterbacks in the history of the NFL: Morton, Norris Weese, and Craig Penrose), to wide receiver Haven Moses, and a phantom touchdown by another eminently mediocre player, Rob Lytle, my worst fears had come true. The Broncos were in the Super Bowl. The absurd media blitz that now accompanies every Bronco game and extends throughout the off-season began immediately, but it was far more intense than anything I'd ever seen. Orange everything oozed from the woodwork: orange toilet seats, orange underwear, orange cars, orange beer, the list is endless. Everyone was convinced that the Giants 24, Denver Broncos 10 of after a season blessed by an inordinate number of lucky bounces and incredible plays, that the Broncos were finally a great team. Luckily, for my personal sanity that is, the Broncos lost the Super bowl (27-10 to Dallas), but the damage was done. For the rest of my days I would be plagued by hordes of uneducated fans that would annoyingly and consistently insist that the Broncos were far better than they ever were.

The purpose of this rambling discourse is a concession to all those Broncos fans that I have distasted for all these years: The Broncos actually deserve to be in Super Bowl XXI. After the Broncos had lost pathetically in their final two road games of the regular season (37-10 to Kansas City and 41-16 to Seattle), and had beaten New England, 22-17, in the AFC Divisional Playoff, I cringed as the Jets neared victory in Cleveland, and the Broncos similarly neared an entirely undeserved but equally certain victory at home in the AFC Championship Game. Fortunately, the Jets faltered, and the Broncos would have to earn the right to get to the Super Bowl away from home. And, after characteristically cheesing 10 points out of two first half Cleveland turnovers, the Broncos led 13-10 in the second half. But the Browns stormed back, and when Brian Brennan singed Dennis Smith for a long touchdown pass, I was sure the Broncos were dead. To my utter amazement, however, the Broncos churned out their only consistent drive of the game, and guttily tied the game, sending it into overtime. When the Broncos defense held, and their only other good drive of the game got them into Rich Karlis' field goal range, they had won the game. It was, as I sit here on the verge of retching for saying so, truly a great performance.

This whole spiel is rendered moot now that the Broncos must face the Giants. The Giants are a mauling machine, and their physical brutality is too much for the scrappy Broncos. Unless the Broncos can contain Phil Simms and score some defensive points, they'll be in serious trouble. Elway's confidence is growing with each game, however, and Denver's defense can keep the Broncos in any game. I think it will be closer than the oddsmakers predict, but I think the Giants will prevail. Super Bowl XXI: New York

JOSE' MULDOON'S

START THE WEEK OFF RIGHT!

EVERY SUNDAY IN JANUARY
10:30AM-4PM

2 FOR 1 SUNDAY BRUNCH
And 5pm-10pm
FAMILY FIESTA PLATTER
Serves 4 or more "family style" includes salad bar & Mexican Specialties
$6.95 per person/ $2.95 kids under 12

EVERY MONDAY FOR DINNER
5pm-10pm
2 FOR 1 MEXICAN DINNER except Fajitas; each dinner includes salad bar

Not valid with other discounts or promotions.
On two for one; you buy one, we'll buy the other of equal or lesser value

222 N. Tejon ● downtown ● 636-2311

Sport

Shorts

EN'S CLUB HOCKEY—The Tigers rt the second semester season with a ne against the powerful Air Force ademy Junior Varsity. The game will be the Academy with the faceoff at 1:00 nday afternoon.

The men had a strong first half of the ar posting a 4-1 record with their only ss coming at the hands of the Falcons.

OMEN'S SWIMMING—The lorado College women's swim team ned in a solid performance at the sixth nual CC Invitational Relays meet last ekend, earning its best finish ever at the en-team event.

The Tigers wound up second to six-time ending champion Air Force, beating rthern Colorado for the first time in the ee's history. The Falcons won the team le with 354 points, followed by CC with then UNC with 276.

The Tigers were led by their 300-yard easststroke relay team of Trish Franciosi, sson Wolfinger, and Cynthia Surrett, o took first place. Diver Beth Olsen, a gning national champion in the one and ee meters, captured second place in both se events to aid the CC cause.

This weekend the women host UNC at 00 today then travel to the Air Force ademy Saturday for a 1:00 meet with the kons.

OMEN'S CLUB HOCKEY—It was a ugh road trip for the Tigers last ekend. The women headed for the ountains and were shelled by the Vail eakaways, 9-1. Junior Dana Britenstein ovided the only mark in the record books CC with her first goal of the year. risten Thompson got the assist.

This weekend the team plays the nver Bandits at Honnen Ice Palace. The ck will drop at 11:15. The Tigers are oking to improve their 1-5 record. With w names on the roster this semester, ings are looking up for the struggling uad. Greatly adding to the team's depth is semester are returning players junior ght winger Susan Deeds and sophomore fenseman Christina Chamberlain, plus e acquisition of summer start Martha eeds from the Andover Juniors.

Cycling: CC's fledgling cycling team ill host the RMCCC (Rocky Mountain ollegiate Cycling Conference) winter rganizational meeting on Sunday, Jan. 25, the campus' Gates Common Room. The eeting is scheduled from 2 to 4 p.m., cording to Coach Sandy Kinnee, who ids that the Tigers' club team also will st a RMCCC criterium event sometime is year. Conference members include the Air Force Academy, the University of enver, the University of Colorado, Mesa, yoming, Northern Colorado, Colorado ate, and the Colorado School of Mines.

ORC

The Outdoor Recreation Committee

Ok, so you're in Colorado, home of National Parks, hot springs, sand dunes horses, rivers, caves, prairies, skiing wilderness, wildlife, and almost all of the 14,000 ft. mountains in the lower 48. Within reach during a block break are the Grand Canyon, Indian reservations, the Colorado river, and even the West Coast during spring break. Hot poop. Colorado Springs is a great city, but it's not all Colorado College and the Block plan has to offer. How many of these places and things have you experienced? What did you do last block break? One great way to find out about these places, get there cheap, get equipment, and experience, and to find other psyched people is to check out ORC. ORC is a student-run group that subsidizes, organizes, and leads trips all over, supplies outdoor equipment cheap, and teaches about the outdoors. If all you need is equipment or information to go on your own, check out the ORC room, open Mon., Wed., and Fri. from 1 to 4 pm., which rents skis, packs, tents, sleeping bags, pads, stoves, snowshoes, fishing rods, bike helmets, you name it, to anyone from CC at any time during the year, for less than anywhere else in town. Reserve your equipment for block breaks. If you want to meet great people and/or need transportation, and have someone experienced show you the ropes, ORC trips are the way to go.

5th Block break, Snowshoeing in Rocky Mountain N.P.

6th Block break, x-Country skiing between huts outside of Aspen Colorado National Monument backpacking.

Spring Break, Grand Canyon hiking, Outward Bound River Trip.

8th Block break, Horseback in the Wet Mountains, Outward Bound leadership training.

If you're interested in any of these call (635-4367 Doug). Or drop in on one of our meetings (First three Mon. of every block at 12pm in Cossitt C.), to talk to the leaders of any trip or to get more involved.

Swimmers Surge

The CC men's swim team started off their dual meet season with an impressive 106 to 102 victory over Metro State the weekend before break. The victory was a very promising start for the Tigers since earlier in the season Metro had defeated the strong C.U. team. Not only was this an impressive start for the team but it also showed the incredible depth that the Tigers have this year.

Leading the way for the Tigers were the divers with Craig Clear taking first in both the one meter and three meter diving and Tom Smith getting just edged out for second in the three meter. Also Tom Hackett took first in the 500 free with a 5.18.5 and Tyler MIngst (freshcat) obeyed orders from the Big Cats and took a first in the 1000 with a 11.29.5.

Other strong performances were turned in by Captains Kevin Diffee in the 200 breast and 200 I.M. and Robb Griggs in sprint freestyle events. Captain Dave Surbeck, with his new freestyle stroke, and Brandon Sheafor both had impressive swims in the freestyle events.

Even with these top finishes, Coach Lear thought the difference in the two teams was found in the Tigers' depth. Unexpectedly, the freshmen provided this depth with Jay Leviny, Wolfman Gottschalk, Rodney McCauley, Dirt Dykes and John Dorsh bringing in the much needed seconds and thirds. Coach Lear feels that with this year's team spirit and team effort the outlook for the rest of the season is great.

The Tigers next meet is the ISL relays on the 17th of this month at Boulder. The next home meet is on the 24th against C.U.

Doug Hodge

Skiers Soar

Downhillers Open Season

The Colorado College alpine ski team opened its season last Friday at Steamboat, Colorado. In a race hosted by Colorado Mt. College and attended by 10 teams from the Rocky Mountain Conference of the National Collegiate Ski Association, CC had some solid performances on the slopes.

The first event was Friday's giant slalom on a chilly and rock hard Mt. Werner. The winning team is decided on the basis of the combined times of a team's top three finishers. In the case of the women racers, league newcomer and former NCAA squad, Western State, took top honors paced by the one-two finishes of Heather Carish and Lisa Dalmar. CC finished in a strong third with some consistent skiing from Michele Fisher, Julie Miller and Kim Kepner. While the CC women were making some nice turns, the men were more erratic and looked at times like they hadn't quite gotten their skiing legs back.

Perennial powerhouse BYU skied to first place behind Steve Jones and his first place finish. CC ended up in fifth atop the skis of Jim Grossman (15th), who after a mediocre first run came back to turn in a very strong second, Clay Colvig (18th) and Peter Hudson (23rd).

The slalom took place on Saturday on Steamboat's Howelson Hill, one of the more difficult venues for that event. The Hill took its toll, as the race had a high number of DNF's or non-finishers. First place for the women went to BYU, while the CC women conquered the steep, icy hill to snatch 2nd place. Great efforts by Julie Miller (7th), Kim Kepner (11th) and Millie Gwiazdon (18th) paved the way for this fine team effort.

The men did not fare as well in the slalom turning in only one solid finish. While many were straddling gates or sliding on Howelson's bullet-proof ice, Pete Hudson turned in two solid runs to finish the day in 8th place. Due to the high casualty rate the men's team was able to manage a fourth place in the slalom.

The race was a good warm-up for the rest of the season and the CC squad was content to treat it as such. This weekend's race will be held at Crested Butte, and is a qualifying race for the national meet held at that same ski area. The Skiing Tigers will continue to improve and are encouraged with the potential they saw in Steamboat.

Charley Schwartz

Last weekend the cross-country ski team headed for the hills and took on 300 other "nordies" in their first race. After months of grueling dryland training and a few ski excursions on the football field, the team finally got a chance to test if all their hard work paid off, in the five and seven kilometer races in Frisco. Even though they had perfect weather, the altitude (9500 feet) affected even the best of the skiers who had only been training in the 6000 foot heights of Colorado Springs. Only four of the skiers on the team actually raced, and although none of them placed, they all put forth a good effort. "We have to remember this is only our first race and that we will keep improving," one of the members of the team said. Doug Corkren led the team in the seven kilometer race, but felt he could have done better if he had known the course beforehand. A few weeks earlier Doug raced in Breckenridge and placed first in his age group. Dewayne Niebauer and Brian Hoskins had never raced before, and both finished the seven kilometer race tired but happy with their times. Laurie Stone, also a first time racer, was glad that the women only had to race five kilometers. She was also happy with hher time, but hopes to improve it in the next race.

Skier Doug Corkren hops happily uphill.

This weekend the skiers take on the five other schools in their league (CSU, BYU, Western State, Mines, and Utah State) in Crested Butte. If nerves were jittery last time, and let me tell you, they were, just wait until this race which is twice as long as the course in Frisco! Despite last week's results, the team is looking forward to Crested Butte and to showing the competition what this first year team has in store for them!

Laurie Stone

C.C. Students

Burrito Sale!

All super & regular Burritos are on sale!

Expires Feb. 15, 1987

Buy One, Get One FREE!

TACO JOHN'S®

705 N. Nevada and all other Colorado Springs locations

It's Tacorrific!

ANNOUNCEMENTS

German Semester Abroad: The application deadline for the German 1987 Fall Semester in Luneburg is February 2. Application and deposit should be turned in to Professor Wishard, AH 359.

The German adjunct courses, GR 104 (intermediate) and GR 206 (advanced), will meet every Tuesday, 3:30-5:00 p.m. (104) and 6:30-8:00 p.m. (206). The instructor is Brigitte Laviolette. Contact the German Department for more information.

Rewarding summer for sophomore and older college students counseling in the Colorado Rockies. Backpacking, horseback riding, waterfront, natural science and many outdoor programs. Write: Sanborn Western Camps, Florissant, CO 80816.

The workshop is designed to help students and parents complete the Financial Aid Form (FAF). Those attending the session should bring an FAF (obtainable at the Financial Aid Office or from high school counselors), the parents' 1986 or 1985 federal tax forms and a pencil or pen.

For more information or to make reservations, call the CC Financial Aid Office at 473-2233, ext. 651.

Financial Aid officers from the College will conduct a financial aid workshop at 7:30 p.m., Thursday, January 29, in Armstrong Hall. The workshop is free and open to all CC students, college-bound students from the community and their parents.

A MEETING ON THE MCAT WILL BE HELD: When: Thursday, January 15, 1987 at 3:30 P.M. Where: OLIN HALL, Room 100. All premedical students who plan to take the MCAT on April 25 or September 19, 1987 should attend this meeting.

Southwest writer Tony Hillerman to speak on The Mystery Novel at 8:00 p.m. tonight in Olin Hall.

FOR SALE: The perfect block break ski car! 1974 SAAB LE, runs well, great for bad weather driving. Asking $1800, will negotiate. Call 548-8049 after 6 p.m.

Monday, Jan. 19th 7:00p.m., Gay Rap Group "Straight Night." Come talk about issues of sexuality and lifestyle. All welcome. Dern House.

ANYONE WHO INVESTED in or participated last spring in preparation for The Grounds coffeehouse and would like a refund or to help decide what to do with the rest of the money, please call Jim at 632-9910.

83 Honda Accord LX, like new. Loaded A/C PS AM-FM cassette stereo. New Michelins. 633-3842.

Apartment to share - beautiful space 1300 blk. Nevada, $150.00/mo. Ask for Will 635-4279 or 475-7843.

YUGOSLAVIA SEMESTER:

The Administrative Director of the ACM Semester in Zagreb, Yugoslavia will be on campus next Friday, January 23. She is Ms. Ellen Bursac, an American by birth, graduate of Macalester College, now living permanently in Zagreb. She has been associated with the ACM program there for the past seven years. At 3:30 p.m. in Palmer Hall 17, Ellen will discuss the program and show slides of life in Zagreb. CC students who have participated in the program will also be present. This will be a good chance for any students who think they might be interested in Zagreb next fall (any major, applications due to Prof. Finley before spring break) or later to learn more.

WE NEED EXPERIENCED PHOTOGRAPHERS!
WILL PAY!
CALL HEIDI DOWD X282 or
DEBBIE DUMAS X278

Tim Fitzgerald, former C.C. student and Watson Fellow, shares his experience as a reporter in South Africa. Loomis Lounge, Thursday, Jan. 22nd, 7 to 9 pm. Sponsored by Political Science Advisory Committee.

JANUARY 19TH — Martin Luther King Memorial Service - Shove Chapel, 6:00 p.m. Candlelight March from Acacia Park at 5:00 p.m.

JANUARY 20TH and 22nd — MEDITATION — SHOVE CHAPEL 8:00-8:30 a.m. Music, silence, mystical and/or other writings (enter by northeast door).

JANUARY 29th- Shove Chapel - 4:00 p.m. Extra curricular studies in the letter to the Ephesians and some of the religious poetry of T.S. Eliot.

JANUARY 22nd — 12:00 noon, Shove Council meeting, Shove Chapel Lounge. Guest speaker Walt Reiner, from the Chicago Urban Studies program, will give a talk on Freedom, Gender and Values.

JANUARY 23rd — 12:05 p.m., All College Worship Service. Speaker: Kenneth Burton.

The Romance Languages Department is now taking applications for the program in Perpignan, 1987-88. Please pick up applications from the Humanities Secretarial Office, AH 120, or Prof. Sarah Simmons's door, AH 317.

THANK YOU!! I would like to extend a warm thank you to all of you who made this CCCA voter turnout a record one. We appreciate your interest and participation. A special heartfelt thank you to all who voted for me.

Sindi Medar-Gould

Enjoy writing? Enjoy working with people? Be a Writing Center tutor! Now hiring for the 1987-88 academic year - call Robin at the Writing Center, x742, for details. Deadline: end of 5th block.

The Puzzle

ACROSS

1 That woman
4 A state: abbr.
6 Cognizant of 11 Part of saddle
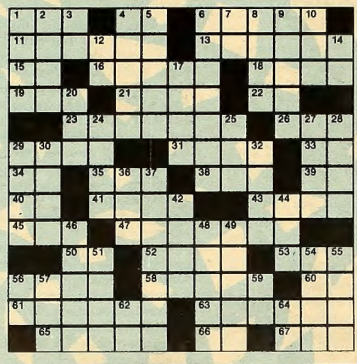
13 Strike out
15 Running
16 Remain erect
18 Freshwater duck
19 Beverage
21 Pitcher
22 Hypothetical force
23 Irons
26 Pigpen
29 Detest
31 Former Russian ruler
33 Faeroe Islands whirlwind
34 Half an em
35 Mature
38 Pigpen
39 A state: abbr.
40 For instance
41 Wan
43 Aroma
45 Moccasin
47 Having notched edge
50 Sun god
52 Contended
53 Pale
56 Armadillo
58 Tremulous
60 Maiden loved by Zeus
61 Loss
63 God of manly youth
65 Vapid
66 Symbol for yttrium
67 Inquire

DOWN

1 Blemish
2 Sharpen
3 Printer's measure
4 Mediterranean vessel
5 Talons
6 Lecture
7 Pronoun
8 Choir voice
9 Musical instruments
10 Greek letter
12 Manuscript: abbr.
14 Spanish article
17 Bird's home
20 Likely
24 Harvest
25 Follows Fri.
27 Country of Africa
28 Period of time
29 Pile
30 Pilaster
32 Hindu peasant
36 Aeriform fluid
37 Raise
42 Goddess of discord
44 Condensed moisture
46 Vessel
48 Remunerate
49 Clever
51 Region
54 Is ill
55 Cozy corner
56 Paid notice
57 Footlike part
59 Japanese drama
62 Indian mulberry
64 Note of scale



Are you people oriented?

Would you like to spend the summer in Southern Wyoming, working on a guest ranch?

A representative of the A Bar A Guest Ranch will be on campus interviewing on February 10. Contact Nancy Nish in the Career Office if you would like to set up an appointment. Or, call Bob Howe (307) 327-5454 for more information.

the HI-FI shop
"Music for your home."
We Transform Records into Music

Forget The Jargon, Listen To The Music

maxell XLII 90 $1.89 each
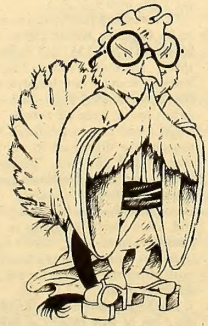
*Limit 5 per customer.

2026 N. Academy Blvd. (303) 574-7747

YAKITORI

Most Pieces of Sushi $1.00 a piece*
*Some are not as much.

In Store Only



Yaki-Doodle

Downtown
16 E. Bijou
578-0915

M-Thurs 11am-3pm 5-9pm
Fri & Sat 11am-3pm 5-10pm

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 23 January 1987 Volume 21, No. 2

Worner Center—What's In Store?

A Tour Through The Construction Site

Its gonna be worth the wait," assured vid Ives, Assistant Dean of Students. On dnesday, January 21, David Ives guided dents and faculty through the imaginary lls of the Worner Center. After ending the tour myself, I too believe that ning-up with tractors crawling around mpus is a small price to pay for the tures that lie ahead for next year.

The sights of the construction in the rner Center are exciting. Framed uncases and supporting beams give the mensions that each room will have. vid Ives' in-depth description of the hole project seemed to fill the empty oms with activity.

While walking to the main doors on the rth side of the building, one may notice kard Hall by looking through the large ss windows that will surround the rner Center. As we open up the door we ll find a large lounge perfect for meeting ur friends. This atrium also includes a eplace for those cold winter nights. ering off to the left on our way to the ain desk we can see promotional tables r those groups with current activities. ssing the main desk there is an art llery which is badly needed at C.C. Here e will be able to see the latest fine art om students as well as professionals. rther to our left is the Great Space, the me currently given to the combination e dining, theatre, dance and band room hich will be able to hold about 200 ople comfortably seated. Coming back t of this room heading towards the ountains we pass by a meeting room that ill be the classiest thing on campus.

"I'd like to walk by the lounge nd see students getting to know ne another, debating issues."

We have now worked ourselves into the stall Dining area where eating can be ade fun. Depending on the type of yment plan our dining service will run next year, we will have our choice of ting in three or four dining areas. We rrently pay for the "all you can eat" plan. this were to continue on to next year we ould have three main areas for dining, hich includes a deck for fifty people erlooking Honen Ice Palace which gives e most spectacular view of Pikes Peak on mpus. The other possible payment plan r next year's food service would be the diminishing balance" plan. On this plan udents would pay around $700 board to e school. Students would then be charged r each food item that they took, ubtracting the appropriate amount from eir balance. This plan would cut back on asted food and would be a definite plus r those students who are not heavy aters. Another plus to this plan is the udents would gain access to a ground vel patio for dining because the space ould not have to be monitored by SAGA.

Continued Page 8

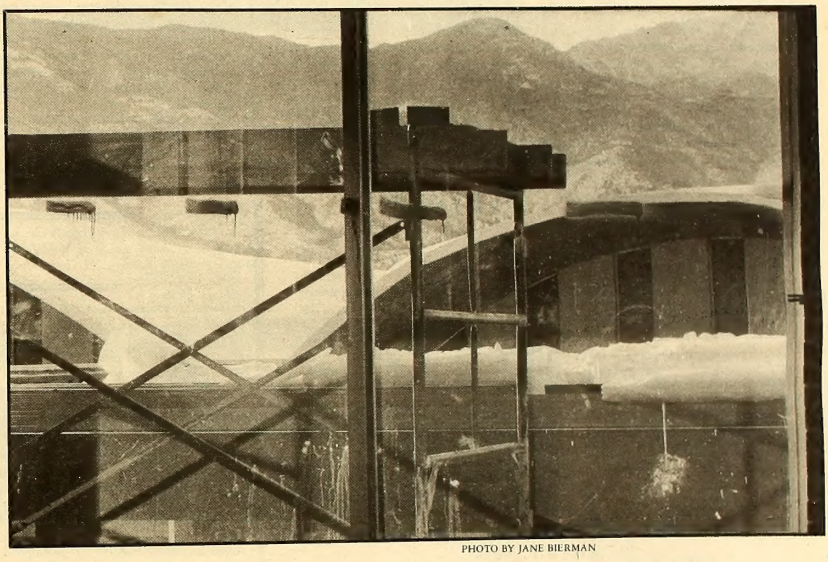


PHOTO BY JANE BIERMAN

CC Scores Cool Half-Million

A highly coveted $500,000 challenge grant has been awarded to Colorado College's Southwest Studies Program, from the National Endowment for the Humanities. The grant will enable the college to establish the Hulbert Center for Southwestern Studies, which will be named in honor of Professor Archer Hulbert, who taught at CC in the 1920s.

The college is one of 41 U.S. institutions to receive an NEH challenge grant. The grant must be matched three-to-one by the recipient. Colorado College must raise $1.5 million, over the next three years, to match the grant — and thus create a total endowment of $2 million for the Southwest Studies Program.

The two main components of the Hulbert Center will be the establishment of an Endowed Chair and a program for Teacher-Scholars. The holder of the Endowed Chair will be a recognized scholar in the humanities, someone who has already received considerable recognition for his or her work on the Southwest. The appointment will be for one semester's residence during which the holder will teach one course in his or her specialty, visit other classes to lecture or to participate in class discussion, and give lectures for the College as well as other community and regional groups. The Hulbert Center Endowed Chair will participate in both the internal and external operations of the Center as well as conduct personal research to share with other faculty and students.

Teacher-Scholar Fellows will be eligible for time periods to be released from regular teaching commitments. Individual blocks of release time will be awarded each year to encourage Fellows chosen from the faculty to pursue research and scholarship on the humanities of the American Southwest. They will be allotted private research facilities and have access to the secretarial and research assistance of the Hulbert Center staff. The hope is that faculty who have enriched their knowledge under release time will benefit both their students and their colleagues upon their return to teaching.

Students will benefit from another aspect of the new program. At least once each month the holder of the Endowed Chair will conduct a Fellows seminar, supervising and critiquing the presentation of selected faculty and student papers and creative projects. Each year the Southwest Studies will bestow an award on the best faculty and student papers at the spring Honors Convocation.

Ellsworth stresses that students will profit from improved undergraduate education, better informed professors, and exposure to renowned experts on the Southwest.

Nan Ellsworth, Editor of La Tertulia, emphasizes how unusual NEH grants of this kind are for Liberal Arts colleges that stress undergraduate education. Often, schools with prestigious graduate programs are more likely candidates. Ellsworth stresses that students will profit from improved undergraduate education, better informed professors, and exposure to renowned experts on the Southwest.

Another component of the grant will fund the renovation of the present home of Southwest Studies, Dern House. The Spanish-styled Dern House was built in the 1920s and left to the College in the 1940s. The wood trim fireplace, French doors and paned windows will remain intact while space will be rearranged to better suit its present use. Offices and classrooms will be separated, some small rooms opened into larger more usable space and other rooms realigned to allow additional offices for the Endowed Chair and Teacher-Scholar Fellows. The entire house will be made more energy efficient and the landscaping will incorporate native Southwestern plants and trees.

NAN ELLSWORTH & JOE BARBER

What's News?

Martin Luther King's birthday this week inspired everything from inspirational celebrations to bitter protests. Perhaps the most relevant aspect of the holiday is that it forces us to confront the issues of racism and segregation that King battled. The time is ripe for introspection, that is if we think that there is any problem to muse upon.

To start the new year off, William F. Buckley Jr. in his January 1st column shared his thoughts about racism in our country. He described what we could learn from the incident in the Queens neighborhood Howard Beach in New York when three young black males wandering through the neighborhood after their car had broken down, were chased by a white gang and one was tragically struck and killed by a motorist as he raced across a highway. What we can learn, Buckley asserts, is that race prejudice is not on the rise in the U.S. How does he qualify such a statement? "Simple," he answers, "by the ratings of Bill Cosby's television show and the sale of his books. A nation simply does not idolize members of a race that nation despises." [sic]

Should we accept Buckley's comfortable hypothesis that racism is not a significant problem or does such a posture merely soothe our national conscience? Does The Cosby Show or any other television show portray an accurate picture of what it is like to be a black American?

At a prayer service dedicated to Martin Luther King in Shove Chapel on Sunday, January 18th, Steven Handen, who works at the Bijou community which aids the poor of Colorado Springs, spoke about the impact that King had on his life. Handen reinvoked some key King phrases to describe the inspiration of the black Civil Rights leader. One was the "degenerating sense of nobodyness" that for King described the experience of being black. Have we ever considered what it feels like to be a dehumanized nobody?

Is Buckley accurate in saying that racism is not on the rise in America? How then can we account for Ku Klux Klan and White Supremecist demonstrations in Chicago suburbs to mark the King holiday? And how do we explain the trend in several states to refuse to celebrate Martin Luther King's birthday? Does the icy bitterness that erupted over honoring a black with a national holiday indicate an undercurrent of racial turmoil still very much alive in our society?

NEWS EDITORS

Questioning the Issues

News Briefs

London Summer Institute

Professors George Butte and Joan Stone will conduct the Writing Institute in London this summer, scheduled for June 22 to August 14. Focusing on drama, the three unit course will stress critical expository writing. The course is designed for students without an extensive background in writing about the theater. It seeks to take advantage of the broad scope of theatrical productions in London. The professors plan to introduce students to a wide range of events, including musicals, classical productions, the avante garde and London's fringe theater, equivalent to off, off Broadway in the U.S.

Tuition for the institute will b $1,470 plus approximately $700 for board and $325 for a program fee. Air fare is not included in tuition or program fees. Interested students should apply to the Dean of Summer Session. A $400 deposit for the program is due April 10th.

Colorado Division of Wildlife Director to Speak

James Ruch, director of the Colorado Division of Wildlife, will discuss "Fish, Wildlife, and the Development of Natural Resources—The Future of the Southwest" at a luncheon address Tuesday, February 3, at the Satellite Hotel in Colorado Springs.

The 1 p.m. speech itself is free and open to the public. Reservations for the $7.50 noon luncheon, however, must be made by Jan. 30, by calling 473-2233, extension 647.

A 1956 graduate of Colorado College, Ruch (pronounced ROOSH), 51, has been director of the State Division of Wildlife since April, 1984. His visit is sponsored by the Southwest Studies Program at Colorado College, and by The Aficionados, a volunteer support group for that program.

The Satellite Hotel, 411 Lakewood Circle, is at the southwest corner of the intersection of South Academy Boulevard and Airport Road.

A Look at the Iran-Contra Scandal

News Analysis

In the past few weeks Congressional committees have probed deeper and deeper into the scandal involving arms sales to Iran and use of profits from the sales to aid the U.S. supported, Nicaraguan rebels known as "contras." The affair has become what many political experts had predicted and Republicans had feared. Congress has opened a can of worms, as the scandal continues to grow, involving not only the President and the National Security Council, but now, high officials in the Central Intelligence Agency, lower officials in the Pentagon, plus a various assortment of retired military and intelligence officers. Also, accusations have arisen that intelligence officials have been lying to Congressional committees, and were told to do so by Administration officials, and that American pilots flying arms to the Contras were, at the same time, running drugs to the United States for the Nicaraguan rebels. The affair has seemingly turned what was once the "Reagan Revolution" into the "Reagan Nightmare."

The scandal has also aroused many questions involving the limitations of the American intelligence community, and of the integrity of President Reagan's foreign policy. The Reagan Administration deliberately violated its own policy against selling arms to Iran, in the hopes of furthering our relations with the Iranian government and of securing the release of American hostages in Lebanon. The Administration also violated several Congressional acts governing covert intelligence operations.

The policy has subsequently failed, creating a large political stumbling block, that has hurt the President's domestic image, his prestige, and his ability to deal effectively with Congress. The affair may also hurt Reagan's foreign agenda, especially the "Reagan Doctrine," the Administration's policy of rolling back Marxist movements in the Third World. It will remain to be seen if Congress will have the stomach to support further revolutionary movements in Afghanistan, Angola, and, of course, in Nicaragua. In trying to further the cause of the Contras, Colonel Oliver North, the National Security Council aid in charge of the whole operation, may have delt the Contras a lethal blow. It is unlikely that Congress will approve any more funding for them in the near future.

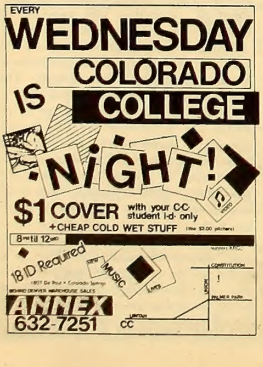
The time of the Reagan policy initiatives has come to an end, due to the questions raised by the Iran/Contra affair. For the Democratic Congress, in light of these events, Mr. Reagan will have to change his approach, and his agenda. We have already seen a change in Reagan's agenda and approach to Congress with the budget. In it the President was conciliatory on military spending and social programs, taking the Democratic attitude into consideration. Most likely there will be no new Reagan domestic or foreign policy initiatives in the next two years. The Administration will shift to a defensive position, trying to protect the gains they have made and cut their losses. The Administration will also try to keep the ideological goals of fighting the spread of communism alive, and try to remain on the high ground with the Soviet Union.

How the affair will effect, if at all, the future of the Republican party in the Reagan, 1988 Presidential elections, will be increasingly important to Republican leaders, and to Presidential hopefuls such as Vice-President George Bush. Foreign policy issues can play a large part in effecting the attitudes of American voters, as the Vietnam war did in 1964 and 1968, and in 1979-80, when the hostage crisis in Iran troubled President Carter in the 1980 elections. However, this affair does have the emotional appeal of Vietnam, or Carter was hurt equally, if not more so, by an ailing economy. However, it may affect the prospects of George Bush, who will have to answer for the affair due to his close association with President Reagan and the arms deal to Iran. If the economy remains smooth through the election, then the public's attention may be turned to the issue of foreign policy, and the Republicans will have to cover their tracks.

At a time when President Reagan had restored public confidence in the Presidency, the Iran/Contra affair has once again raised questions concerning the office of the President. Congress and the public must wonder who Reagan trusts to run our country, and how much power he delegates to his aids and advisors. The role of the National Security council is being severely scrutinized, as well as Congressional rules governing intelligence operations and how much the President must tell the legislature about covert intelligence missions.

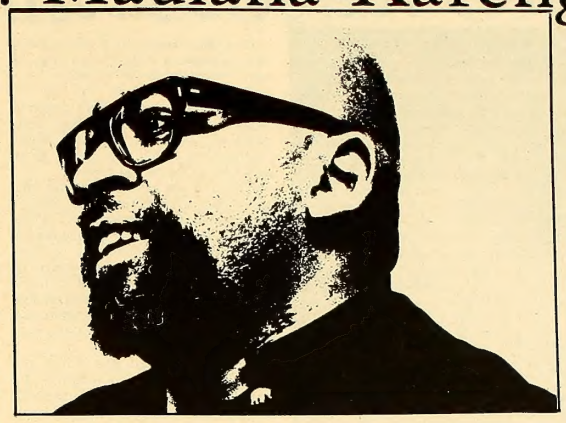
Mr. Reagan has shown us four easy ways to ruin a presidency. Number one, let yourself unaware of facts and events. Reagan may survive this crisis by the sheer weight of his knowledge, or lack thereof, about events concerning the arms sales to the aid to the Contras, but it was his ignorance of the details that caused the whole affair. Second, delegate authority. Mr. Reagan, who is notorious for delegating authority, gave full power to men, who were not qualified to handle a delicate policy such as we undertook in Iran. Third, have a monomaniacal obsession, such as Reagan has with Nicaragua. Reagan's obsession with overthrowing the government of Nicaragua led him and his aids to seek alternative means to support the Contras. Finally, when the policy explodes in your face, just say "no!" It was Reagan's repeated denial of any wrong doing that led to the intense media coverage of the affair and the subsequent determination of Congress to find out the truth.

MICHAEL S. MEH



Hair Designers for Men & Women
RAPUNZEL
Style cuts, Cellophanes,
Perms & Color.
Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.
Stop in or make your appointment:
827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

Dr. Maulana Karenga



The Lecture

In observance of Martin Luther King 's birthday on Monday, the Black Student ion sponsored a lecture by Dr. Maulana enga.

Karenga, who is the Executive Director the Institute of Pan-African Studies and ecturer-consultant for Black and Ethnic udies, spoke on King's social and storical relevance and followed his eech with a question and answer period ith members of the audience.

Karenga's speech traced three major ints tying King's legacy to the nation. rst, Karenga placed King in context, serting that he evolved out of "an storical tradition of Black struggle ainst oppression" on both political and ligious levels. Furthermore, he pointed ut that King lived in a time of great social irring and upheaval during which he hared the historical stage" with many her important figures, and ultimately erged as the symbolic leader for the any movements taking place.

Secondly, Karenga analysed King's hilosophical importance by looking at his cial practice and social theory. He mmed up this philosophy into some of e major issues which King championed. gnificant among these issues is the idea using religion as an instrument of social hange. Karenga described King's efforts fight what he perceived to be an unjust gal system by demonstrating how the ws failed to conform with religious moral andards. Another major idea in King's hilosophy that Karenga discussed was the sue of civil disobedience and non-olence. According to Karenga, King pported civil disobedience not only as a ght but as a responsibility of citizens hen they are subjected to unjust laws. He also discussed King's ideal of a "beloved community," a society without racial distinctions or boundaries.

Lastly, Karenga discussed King's practical and theoretical contributions. These included King's legal and moral victories in the civil rights movement, the boost that this movement gave to other minority groups, and also in his unification of the Black people.

Karenga's speech was followed by a question and answer period which touched on issues ranging from religion to a discussion of reviving the black power movement to distinguishing between racial prejudice as an attitude and racism which Karenga defined as a political practice.

The Black Student Union also hosted a workshop conducted by Karenga on Monday afternoon as well as a procession and memorial service for King on Sunday night.

PROMITA CHATTEZI

The Workshop

On the 19th of January, Cossit "C" played host to a workshop given by Dr. Maulana Karenga, Director of the Institute of Panafrican Studies. An established author and writer, Karenga drew on his many experiences in both the civil rights and black power movements, and his long history as a community organizer, to discuss "Organizing in Black and Brown Communities."

Karenga placed emphasis on the importance of a coherent ideology within movements and stressed the need for an overall concept and direction in order to both secure a movement's aims and ensure its existence. He cited the national divestment campaign as an example of an organization that failed to extend beyond its initial aims.

Karenga also placed emphasis on the role of leadership. While respecting the need for collective decisionmaking, he called collective leadership "collective chaos" and spoke about leadership as a source of "insight initiative and innovation." Attacking "detached, directional, or manipulative" leadership, he spoke of the duty to raise conscience and to "teach people their own possibilities."

The informal workshop soon developed into a discussion group, which covered topics as diverse as Afro-American nationalism and the definition of the term "third world." Karenga spoke concerning the dual need for internal organizing within communities and the need for a common ground on which ethnic groups could stand together, stressing "the need for each group to maintain its own integration and self conception."

He reminded his audience that black struggles are often more than black problems. Instead they are human struggles, that affect many social problems, not those strictly related to race or ethnicity.

A.D. LERMER

LATE NIGHT SPECIAL!

One 12" two topping pizza for only $4.99 plus tax! (After 9 pm)

Now from Domino's Pizza, it's the late night special. Any night of the week beginning at 9pm, you can get a 12", 2-topping pizza for only $4.99! (tax not included) Just $4.99 for a fresh, custom-made, 2-topping pizza delivered hot to your door in 30 minutes or less—guaranteed! So when you get the late night hungries—no problem! Just call Domino's Pizza. One call does it all to make your late night special! Offer expires February 28, 1987.

We accept checks.
Prices do not include tax.
Our drivers carry less than $20.00.

All Pizzas Include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.

Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95

Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers,
Extra Cheese (1 item)
Double Cheese (2 items)
Thick Crust, Extra Sauce
Each item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19

$3

If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes, present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off that order—right then.

For safety reasons, if roads are icy, snowpacked, or flooded, please add 15 minutes to our guarantee. One coupon per pizza. 30 minute guarantee good with any offer.

Fast, Free Delivery™
Good at listed locations.

DOMINO'S PIZZA®

Coke Classic® 12 oz. cans

Coca-Cola Classic

©1986 Domino's Pizza, Inc.

$4.99

Order a 12" two-topping pizza for only $4.99 from 9 pm until closing, any night of the week!

Offer expires February 28, 1987.
No coupon necessary.

Fast, Free Delivery™
Good at listed locations.

DOMINO'S PIZZA®

TWO 12" PIZZAS FOR $9.14
ONE TOPPING

(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.

One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!

For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same!) and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings

Two 12" pizzas for the price of one 16" pizza!

Superb Cheese	$7.95
1 topping	$9.14
2 toppings	$10.33
3 toppings	$11.52
4 toppings	$12.71
5 toppings	$13.90
6 toppings	$15.09

Twice the pizza for one low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minutes or less. GUARANTEED!

Offer may expire anytime

635-1511

Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.

Limited delivery area.

NEWS

Mysteries in the Southwest

PHOTO BY JANE BIERMAN

Novelist Tony Hillerman.

On Friday, January 16, 8 p.m., devoted fans gathered in Packard auditorium to hear award winning novelist Tony Hillerman speak about the mystery writing process. Hillerman's mystery novels, eight of which have been published, are noted for their unique Southwestern flavor. The novels focus especially on the Navajo culture.

Hillerman is a native Oklahoman who now resides in Albuquerque, New Mexico, with his wife and six children. In 1985 he resigned as Chairman of the journalism department at the University of New Mexico to devote more time to writing novels. Skin Walkers is Hillerman's latest mystery and is particularly exciting because his two recurring heroes, Joe Leaphorn and Jim Cree, appear together for the first time.

Hillerman discussed why writers are hesitant to have their books made into T.V. serials. The author recounted his personal dealings with Hollywood bigwigs. "Many people see the Navajo culture as strange and exotic," said Hillerman. To Hillerman, more strange and exotic was his experience with an NBC producer in the Beverly Hills Hilton. The producer insisted on setting a Navajo story in an Indian Pueblo. "No one will know that Navajos don't live in Pueblos," argued the producer. Hollywood also wanted to purge his story of all anthropology and to make the T.V. series appealing to "a young urban base." Fortunately, Mr. Hillerman's work was never sacrificed to the constraints of twenty-six thirty minute segments interspersed with commercials for dog food.

Hillerman then spoke about his personal approach to writing. He starts with basic ideas and a setting, but he never knows exactly where he will end up. On a good day he will work two or three hours in the morning. If he encounters a mental block he will play a game of two deck solitaire or watch General Hospital. Hillerman said, "It's not an official way to write but it's the only way I've been able to do it." Hillerman's novels are available in the Colorado College bookstore.

Ginny Bunker

Revolution and Technolog

Walt Reiner spoke about the fa "revolutions" in our global technol systems in Gates Common R Wednesday, January 21st. Reiner is a se leader in the Associated Colleges o Midwest Urban Studies Program Chicago.

Beginning a series of three lectur possibilities for the revolution, Re explained that we do not live in the sy of social institutions of Marx's time. M advocated for the destruction of boundaries via communism, but R points out that boundaries of class and gender are unpopular in to society. Therefore, we cannot revolution only by working to erad these boundaries. Reiner describe society as a global technological sy Since the system is new and vast, we d perceive it as a whole, and we hav point of reference within it. We ca question the system as a whole and caught up in its commitment to gro and effeciency. Growth and effic directly causes growth of a proletariat, a class of people who uprooted from home, family, and trad and who make no real decisions. Cert the underclass of welfare depe families are proletariat, but young professionals fit the description, too. means us. Reiner believes, as Marx di revolution involves liberation o proletariat, but he says liberation Marx's means is outdated.

A group of interested students po up their ears and questioned R about the nature of technology and need for us to question it. They had t appetites whetted for more tal revolution, which took place Thursday Friday.

Dixie Goodenough

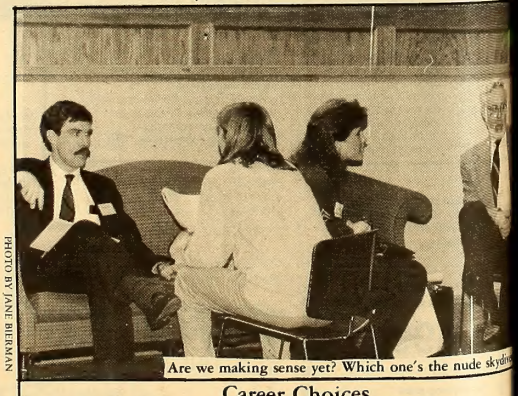

PHOTO BY JANE BIERMAN

Are we making sense yet? Which one's the nude skydiv

Career Choices

"Start Making Sense" was the theme of the 1987 Career Symposium held Januar 21 in Gates Common Room, Palmer Hall. Students were given the opportunity investigate major areas of study, career options, and work opportunities fro Colorado College graduates currently employed in the "real" world. Graduates wi various majors represented diverse career backgrounds. Among the 38 alumni, wh were grouped into three areas including Sciences, Humanities, and Social Scienc and Business, were a Pediatric Neurosurgeon, Litigation Attorney, Transpla Coordinator, Freelance Writer, and an Actuary.

The annual Career Symposium is one of many programs sponsored by the Caree Center. Workshops on Choosing a Major, Resume Writing, Interview Techniqu and Placement Orientation are held monthly. There are also on-campus intervie coming up this spring. Interested students may begin to sign-up for February January 27. To get interview practice, consider a "mock" interview. Mock Intervie Day will be held on February 3 with representatives in Investment-Marketing Retail and Private School Teaching. For more information please stop by th Career Center or call us at Ext. 426.

7th
ANNIVERSARY
Sale!
20% OFF
ALL MERCHANDISE
JAN. 17th THRU 24th
FINE VINTAGE CLOTHING & JEWELRY
FOR MEN & WOMEN
HOURS
10 to 6:30 SATURDAY
11 to 6:30 MON-FRI
12 to 5:00 SUNDAY
THROUGH • THE
LOOKING • GLASS
10 Ruxton Ave. Manitou Springs
685-1666

Campus Groups Organize

Association of Students Interested in Asia

This semester A.S.I.A. (The Association of Students Interested in Asia), in conjunction with the East Asian Theme House, will be coordinating a number of events. One highlight will be the celebration of Chinese New Year. During the week of Feb. 15-21 there will be a number of events ranging from a speech on Christianity in China given by the Episcopal Church's head of Asian missions, to the grand finale, a Chinese New Year party complete with a lion dance on Saturday, Feb. 21.

A.S.I.A. will also be showing films. On the 25th of January The Seven Samurai, and its Western equivalent The Magnificent Seven will be shown at Packard Hall from 7:00-11:00 p.m. Akira Kurosawa's epic film Ran is also in the works. The East Asian Political Union will be sponsoring lectures on Asian economics and other areas of Asian development. One highlight of this is a much hoped for presentation by Colorado's Governor Elect, Roy Romer on his recent business trip to Japan. Any student interested in A.S.I.A. is invited to attend any one of the two monthly meetings which are held at 6:30 in the East Asian Theme House on the first and third Wednesdays of the block.

K.E.E.P.

The purpose of K.E.E.P. is not only to help elderly people who might have felt repeatedly rejected, but also it is to learn from the experience that corresponds to aging. Through this "adopt-a-grandparent" type program, student volunteers will be able to communicate with people in the Colorado Springs community, while possibly filling a void within themselves of a missing grandparent or older person to talk with.

The program is run in conjunction with the Second Horizon Senior Citizen Center at the Acacia Hotel, located at Tejon and Platte. The location is close enough for CC students to visit on a regular basis without any difficulty. K.E.E.P. requires that the student spend a minimum of 1½ hours per week visiting their elderly person. It is up to the student to initiate contact.

Students interested in K.E.E.P. should call Anita Walls at 475-0639.

Colorado College Choir

The Colorado College Choir, directed by Don Jenkins, offers all students an opportunity to sing. Participation is not restricted and no audition is required. Interested students should attend rehearsals on Mondays and Wednesdays from 4:15 to 5:15 p.m. in Olin 1. Members must join by the first week of Block 6 in order to participate this semester.

Nuclear Action Coalition

Nuclear Action Coalition (NAC) was originally started to promote campus awareness concerning disarmament, arms control and other related issues. Last semester we showed videos, brought in a speaker from "Beyond War," conducted a vigil outside the Child Law building and sponsored a Dance for Peace which was conducted at 60 campuses across the nation.

Nuclear Awareness is a topic which pertains to all of us and one which we can no longer afford to remain passive about. The first step toward a solution is knowledge, and that is what NAC hopes to address in the new semester. Speakers and videos are being planned, and we hope those of you who are interested will continue to back NAC. Thanks to all those who pledged their support during the fall semester and may this semester be even better.

"...for it isn't enough to talk about peace. One must believe in it. And it isn't enough to believe in it. One must work for it."

—Eleanor Roosevelt, 1951

Volunteer Action

Volunteer Action provides Colorado College students with an opportunity to do community work. The college students are bit brothers and sisters to elementary school students. Participants take the children on field trips to the Fine Arts Center and the Zoo, as well as hold ice cream socials and organize sporting events. The extra attention given to the children allows them to grow and learn outside of the classroom and family setting, while the Colorado College students provide a safe and fun environment. The program also exposes the children to CC's atmosphere and ideals. Anyone interested in becoming a big brother or sister should contact Cheryl Hintergardt at ext. 786 for details about getting involved.

ENACT

ENACT is the campus environmental organization. It brings environmentally oriented speakers to campus, and is involved in other projects such as a proposal to re-landscape Dern House with native, drought-resistant plants.

It also runs a recycling program. Newspapers, cardboard, mixed paper, and aluminum cans (no glass, temporarily) can be left at any of the recycling sheds on campus: Bemis Shed (in front of Bemis), Mathias Shed (west of the Mathias basketball court); or Slocum Shed (northeast side of Slocum). ENACT meets Wednesdays at 7 p.m. in the ENACT office, near Mathias Desk. Recycling is done on Fridays—meet at Mathias Shed at 12:30 and spend an enjoyable afternoon recycling. If interested, please attend the weekly meeting.

Latin American Awareness

The aim of this organization is to expand student understanding of the Latin American region. Anybody interested in any aspect of Latin America—from its history and politics to its art, literature, jungles and mountains, is urged to come and share ideas, questions, and experiences. The group has organized a variety of programs this year, such as the performance of Sabia (a Latin American influenced music group based in Los Angeles) and a talk about the situation of women in Peru. On Tuesday, February 3, political science professor Damian Fernandez will speak about his impressions of modern Cuba. We are working on a Latin American Film Series to begin sixth block. Meetings are the first three Tuesdays of each block, at 7:00 in the Spanish House lounge (on Wood Ave.) Call 635-2312 for more information.

International Student Organization

The International Student Organization brings together International Students with other CC students. The club seeks to heighten awareness for international issues. All students are encouraged to attend meetings the first three Mondays of each block at 12:15 p.m. in the Political Science Seminar Room in Palmer Hall. Please contact sponsor, Tiggy Shields, at ext. 609 for further information.

Class 87

The officers of the Senior Class are elected during the late spring preceeding senior year. These officers include a President, Vice-President, Secretary and Treasurer, as well as a group of Class Agents. During senior year it is the responsibility of this group, in conjunction with the Tutt Alumni House staff, the Deans' office and President Riley, to coordinate senior class functions. These functions include the traditional Senior Dinner Dance. The committee also makes recommendations to President Riley for the Commencement speaker. Its projects encourage the promotion of class unity and the establishment of a fundraising network to fulfill current and future fundraising goals. After graduation, the Class Agents will serve as liasons between the class and the college, and will help to coordinate reunions and other special events. Being a senior class representative is a great way to take an active and creative part in senior year. For more information call Jill Brasesco or Anita Walls.

CCCA Committee Update

Budget (meets 1st and 3rd Mondays at 12:00 at the Student Center), prepared recommendations for budget allotments.

Student Concerns (meets 1st and 3rd Tuesdays at 12:00), working responses, and Worner Center future plans.

Residential Life (meets 2nd Monday at 12:00), studying results of 1st semester housing survey.

Constitution (meets when necessary), preparing recommendations for amendments to the CCCA constitution to make the Elections Committee an Elections/Publicity Committee.

Meetings open to all students

Fraternities Announce New Members

Fraternity rush was very successful this year. All houses reported record numbers of rushees, and the Interfraternity Council is glad to report that there were no violations.

The Kappa Sigma Fraternity issued 43 bids, the Phi Delts 58, and the Fijis invited 51 rushees to become Phi Gams. Beta Theta Pi and Sigma Chi reported giving 55 and 54 bids respectfully. For the remainder of Block 5 there should be no perspective pledges at any fraternity party. One final reminder: perspective pledges have until the end of Block 5 to sign up at the house they received a bid from and wish to join.

Continued on pages 6 and 7

the Stagecoach Inn
702 Manitou Ave.
On Fountain Creek in Manitou Springs
Sunday - Thursday
Char-Broiled Rib Steak
or Grilled Salmon Steak
$11.95
regularly $14.95
Early Bird Special
Order before 6pm
(before 5pm Sunday)
Complete Dinner
$7.95
Lunch from 11:30 and Dinner from 5 Monday through Saturday
Champagne Brunch from 10:30 and Dinner from 4 Sunday
Reservations 685-9335
Banquet Facilities
On All Occasions

Josh & John's
DELIVERS
ICE CREAM
Beginning Feb. 6th
632-0299 • Downtown • 11 am-MIDNIGHT

Campus Groups Slate

Colorado College Community Against Apartheid

The Colorado College Community Against Apartheid is committed to the elimination of the legislated racism which prevails in South Africa. In order to achieve this goal CCCAA believes that institutions such as Colorado College must withdraw their investments in companies which operate in South Africa.

To date CCCAA has been involved in many actions; marches on local businesses, rallies, films and speakers, culminating in the construction of a shanty town and the occupation of President Gresham Riley's office which precipitated an unprecedented meeting with the full board of trustees.

In preparation for the March board of trustees meeting, members of CCCAA have formulated a strategy which will be carried out during the next couple of months. This strategy's primary goal is to convince the board to divest while raising campus consciousness on the issue. This strategy is not set in stone. CCCAA would welcome new ideas and needs your support.

Contacts: Matt Case 520-1580 and Tom or Ian at 475-9180.

Theatre Workshop

Theatre Workshop gives an opportunity for creative, imaginative and energetic students, with or without experience, to work in any aspect of theatre production. Students run the organization and have a chance to act, direct, write, stage manage, work on lights, sets, props, costumes, and make-up. TW produces 4-7 shows a year dependent on the number of proposals and the budget. Each year a Playwrighting Contest is held. The winner may see their work produced. TW tries to produce experimental work in unordinary spaces i.e. Cossitt Ampitheatre, Armstrong Great hall, and Shove Chapel. TW and Dance Workshop are producing A Sampler of American Musical Theatre in Armstrong Theatre January 22, 23, and 24. This is the most ambitious student project in recent years, involving over 100 students. The schedule for the rest of the year is undecided. Please join us with any ideas or just your enthusiasm. General Membership meetings are the first Wednesday of every block at 6:30 p.m. in Cossitt "C." Contact co-chairs Kira Lillard (ext. 214) or Nina Essman (ext. 325) with any questions.

Seekers

"The Seekers" is a group comprised of college students from area campuses, who meet together twice weekly to explore the claims of Jesus Christ and His church. Although it is affiliated with the First Presbyterian Church downtown, students from all denominations actively participate. Through discussion, Bible study and fellowship Seekers maintains an atmosphere of questioning and discovery (nothing will be shoved down anybody's throat). The group is student-run, though Rev. Steve Harrington and CC alumna Linda Smith assist the ministry full-time.

Seekers meets upstairs in the Norton Office building, 129 Nevada, downtown. The Sunday morning meeting is from 9:30-10:30 and the Wednesday evening meeting is from 5:45-7:00. In addition to these, numerous small-group Bible studies meet throughout the week on campus.

The group has explored the social implications of faith on such projects as a month-long earthquake recovery project in Mexico City, frequent trips to Denver's ghetto's, and weekly service to the Colorado Springs area. For more information call David Casson, x267.

Circle K

Circle K - If roller skating w underprivileged children, cross cou skiing retreats, and fundraising hospitals is of interest to you - join C K! Circle K is CC's community ser organization. We work along w Kiwanis International in doing things the community. Here is our activ calender;

Block 6, 1st week - Sunny Rest Ho delivery of valentines. 2nd week - Prep for Retreat-bring xcountry skiis and s (we will be at the Circle K cabin in mountains). 3rd week - Retreat-Friday Saturday.

Circle K meets every Thursday at 5:3 Loomis Lounge for no longer than minutes. Give us a try. We can help help whatever organization you want.

President; Maro Zagoras Slocum x313.

Photo of the Week

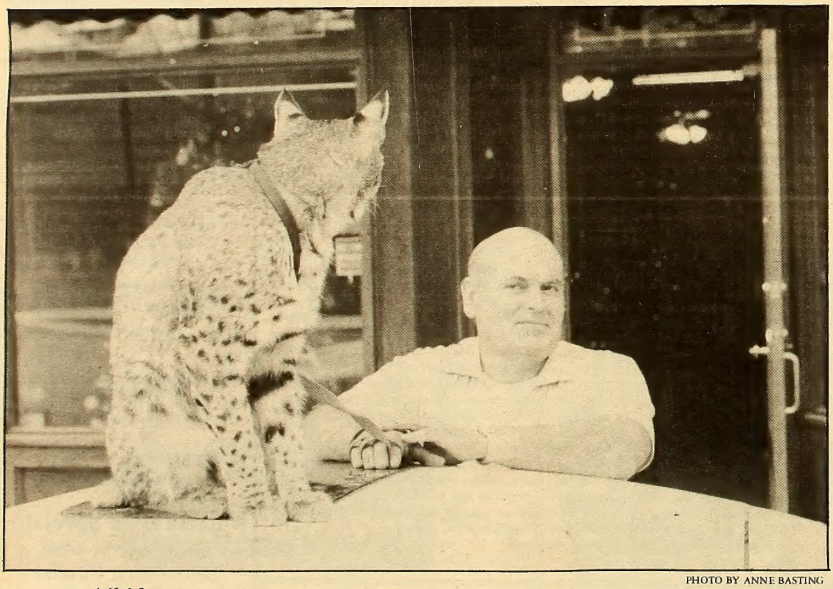

PHOTO BY ANNE BASTING

Aikido

Aikido is a Japanese martial art that is defensive and non-violent. The art teaches students to fall correctly and to harmonize with aggression without harming the agressor. Aikido also teaches what is inherent in its very name: the harmony of body and spirit.

The Aikido Club meets three times a week in Boettcher Basement; Sunday and Tuesday at 7 p.m., and Thursday at 4 p.m. This semester, we are planning numerous visits from ranking black belts, including our annual visit from 6th Dan Hiroshi Ikeda in February. Beginners are always welcome, and adjunct credit may also be available. For information, contact Ray Clark x330.

MEChA

Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlan (MECHA) was established by Colorado College Chicago students. MECHA's key goal for this academic year is to educate the CC and Colorado Springs communities about Chicano heritage and promote increased understanding of Chicano culture.

MECHA is currently involved in the Eighth Annual National Chicano Student Conference which will be held in Boulder the first week of April and club members are working on Chicano Culture Week. We are opposing the English Only Bill that is currently being considered by the legislature. Meetings are the first and third Wednesdays of each block at 6:30 p.m. at the PACC House, 223 E. Yampa.

Feminist Collective

Feminist Collegtive is an organization open to both men and women which examines sexism as it affects both sexes. Members attempt to examine issues that affect men and women and their relationships with one another. The group hopes to promote more honest communication and interaction without the burden of having to adhere to gender based roles. Anyone is welcome to attend meetings and events. The group is open to a broad variety of issues as it perceives feminism as a broad and rich topic for discussion.

Please contact Val Feder at 630-1617 for further information.

Black Student Union

The Black Student Union is organization not only for Black stude but for all students interested in Bl issues. This year BSU will strive emphasize diversity on campus, and programs will be designed to inform well as entertain. Members of BSU working for close cooperation with oth minority organizations in order eradicate the problems of isolation, a hope to involve other stude organizations in BSU events.

February is Black History Month, the Black Student Union hopes the ent campus will join in celebrating the Bl race. Special programs, tentative at t stage, will reflect diverse aspects of Bl culture and tradition. BSU looks forwar sharing that culture and tradition not o with the entire campus, but also with t Colorado Springs community. Some of t things on the agenda are: a retrospectiv Black music and film, a show celebrati Black womanhood, and an African dinn

As the Union celebrates, members a mindful of those less fortunate th ourselves; therefore, one of these eve will serve as a fundraiser for exiled So African students and other politic refugees now in camps in Tanzania. T other area of focus will be Nation Literacy Year, and what CC students can to encourage those whose desire is to le to read and write in order to better w for want of a better word, we call th "living" conditions. The Black Stude Union, located at 223 E. Yampa, is not j a place where people of like interests m congregate to relax and find mo support. It is also where those with a soc conscience may volunteer time and ener to help those, who, for one reason another, are unable to help themselves

Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowsh

Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship is non-denominational group of student committed to promoting spiritual growth informal fellowship, Christian ministr and the open discussion of topics related the Christian faith. In addition to week discussions and speakers, Inter-Varsi sponsors a number of activities throughou the year, including conferences, month social events and community servic projects. All students are welcom regardless of religious or philosophic backround. Large groups meet o Wednesdays at 7:00 p.m. in Palmer L Smaller discussion groups also me weekly. Please contact Todd Breyfogle ext. 287 for further information.

Semester Activities

Outdoor Recreation Club

Ok, so you're in Colorado, home of ational Parks, hot springs, sand dunes, ses, rivers, caves, prairies, skiing, in the er 48. Within reach during a block eak are the Grand Canyon, Indian servations, the Colorado river, and even West Coast during spring break. Hot op, Colorado Springs is a great city, but not all Colorado College and the Block n has to offer. How many of these ces and things have you experienced? hat did you do last block break? One eat way to find out about these places, get ere cheap, get equipment, and perience, and to find other psyched ople is to check out ORC. ORC is a dent-run group that subsidizes, ganizes, and leads trips all over, supplies tdoor equipment cheap, and teaches out the outdoors. If all you need is uipment or information to go on your n, check out the ORC room, open Mon., ed., and Fri. from 1 to 4 p.m., which rents ts, packs, tents, sleeping bags, pads, oves, snowshoes, fishing rods, bike lmets, you name it, to anyone from CC at y time during the year, for less than ywhere else in town. Reserve your uipment for block breaks. If you want to eet great people and/or need nsportation, and have someone perienced show you the ropes, ORC trips e the way to go.

6th Block Break: X-country skiing tween huts outside of Aspen Colorado tional Monument backpacking

Spring Break: Grand Canyon hiking, tward Bound River Trip

8th Block Break: Horseback in the Wet ountains. Outward Bound leadership aining.

If you're interested in any of these call 35-4367, Doug). Or drop in on one of our eetings (First three Mon. of every block t 12 p.m. in Cossitt C.), to talk to the aders of any trip or to get more involved.

Inter-Fraternity Council

The Interfraternity Council's goal for e second semester is to improve inter-use relations and increase Greek system alogue and understanding with the olorado College faculty and staff. The reek system newsletter is in process and ill be presented to the faculty and staff rly sixth block. It is a compilation of ticles by each Greek house telling about e house and its service projects and goals r 1986/87. The newsletter has in the past en primarily focused at the student body, t this year its sole audience and culation will be the faculty and staff. It is oped that this form of dialogue will be panded and improved each year so that utual understanding and communication tween the Greeks and the ministration can be obtained.

The Interfraternity Council and the anhelenic Council began the process of nging the MDA Dance-A-Thon to olorado College this year. The date has en tentatively scheduled for 11 April, d further information will follow. IFC d PANHEL are also organizing some n fundraisers for the Special Olympics is semester.

Greek Week this year will be shortened a Greek Weekend in the hope that more rticipation and better activities can be anged. The date of this event has not en set, but there will be widespread blicity for Greek Weekend when the tails are finalized.

IFC and PANHEL are planning "Just reek" activities for this semester. These ill include sports and other activities for aternity and Sorority members. It is oped that these activities will increase ter-house relations and provide an portunity to meet new friends.

Student Alumni Association

The purpose of the Student/Alumni Association is to stimulate the interest and participation of all students in the life of the College, to provide opportunities to meet Colorado College alumni, and to learn about the ongoing relationship that alumni have with the College. Members work with the Admissions and Alumni offices to serve as hosts at college and alumni events. Student Alumni Association sponsors an all-campus variety show, legacy luncheon, survival packets, and is also very involved in New Student Week, Homecoming, the National Alumni Council Forum, and events with the Colorado College Alumni Club. The Student/Alumni Association is an active, growing group which meets the second Tuesday of each block at 4 p.m. at Tutt Alumni House, and welcomes new members.

BACCHUS

BACCHUS, named after the Greek and Roman god of wine, is one of many student organizations on campus. The name is an acronym for Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students. Our group recognizes and accepts the use of alcohol as part of campus life. We believe that as young adults, college students are capable of acting responsibly when making decisons concerning alcohol.

This organization is not anti-drinking. We believe that by providing alcohol education programs, students can learn about the effects of alcohol and make their own decisions based on those facts. Additionally, BACCHUS sponsors numerous all-campus events, both with and without alcohol, to give students an option. Once again, personal choice is the key. The recent Colorado College Alcohol Awareness Week was one such program.

Our plans for the semester include several projects. We are designing a BACCHUS bar that will be available to all organizations on campus including fraternities and sororities. This bar will provide alternative beverages (cola, lemonade, mocktails, etc.) and food (sandwiches and other items) for any party. We hope that this will provide another option for students attending parties on campus.

We also are planning an all-campus spring festival. This all day event will consist of live bands, food from local restaurants, alcoholic and non-alcoholic drinks, and carnival booths and rides. We'll really need help getting this program together so anyone who would like to help is more than welcome.

BACCHUS is a group for the student body and we always welcome new members.

If you are interested in BACCHUS, please contact Doug Gertner at x228 or Adam Burke at x243.

Investor's Club

The Colorado College Investment Club, a newly formed association for those interested in learning about the intricacies of the securities market, we recently sponsored speakers from New York City who discussed the field of investment banking. Members of the club are currently compiling a hypothetical investment portfolio utilizing different personal and group methods.

Beyond the speakers and individual research, the Investment Club is continuing to educate its members through group discussion. The club will host more quality speakers including William Thayer Tutt on February 3rd at 12 noon in Cossit C and Madelon DeVoe Talley, a Woodrow Wilson Fellow. Investments Club meets on the first three Wednesdays of each block at 6:30 p.m. in Armstrong 234.

Dance Workshop

Many exciting and innovative things are happening this year in Dance Workshop. More than half of our budget has been divided among 3 special student projects. We have supported Harold Vanderpool's experimental piece. He is working on new dimensions and perspectives in dance. This will be performed in May. Second the musical, A Sampler of American Musical Theatre, is sponsored in part by Dance Workshop. It is especially exciting for us since it has provided many of our members opportunities to dance and choreograph. Recently we sponsored the beginnings of a dance company at CC. They plan to tour to other schools in Colorado.

Various workshops including JAZZ, dance injury prevention, mime, and rythm are on our calender. We are pleased to announce Cleo Parker Robinson Dance Ensemble is coming Block 7 to give a jazz workshop. We would like to see how many students are interested in this form of dance to decide if we want to work on getting jazz classes offered at CC.

A spring concert is in the process of being planned so all interested in choreography, performing or the technical aspect are welcome, regardless of experience. Also keep your eyes open for auditions for the spring department concert which will be performed in March. Please bring your ideas and desires about workshops, attending performances, DW concert to our meetings every first and third Tuesday of the block, at 6:00 p.m. in Plamer 122.

Blue Key

Blue Key is a national honor fraternity that seeks to reward leadership and to promote an atmosphere of academic excellence at Colorado College. Its programs are designed to encourage interaction between students, faculty and administration, as well as to promote community spirit. These programs include the Welcomer/Welcomee program for incoming freshmen, summer starts and transfer students, the Blue Key Trivia Bowl and Honors Convocation. Members are admitted through an application process in late winter or early spring. Applications are evaluated in terms of academic achievement and demonstrated or potential leadership aptitude. Applications for membership will be available in the near future. Any questions concerning Blue Key may be directed to Jill Brasesco, 576-1592 or to the Blue Key box in Rastall Student Center.

Chaverim

Chaverim—meaning "friends," is the Jewish student organization on campus. It's our intention to promote an understanding of the Jewish heritage and culture. So far this year the club has built a Sukkah, representing the harvest celebration, held a Hannukah party, and organized the attendance of synogauge services. In the future Chaverim plans on selling "bagel bags," promoting holocaust awareness and ceremonies. It welcomes all membership and hopes to make a great contribution to the CC community.

DON'T BE A DUMB BUNNY....
BOOK YOUR SPRING BREAK
RESERVATIONS NOW....

Taylor Travel

"Your Campus Travel Agency"
818 N. Tejon 636-3871

FEATURES

Worner Center Continued...

Continued from page 1

Nonetheless, the two major dining areas have divider type walls in them to give more privacy and a restaraunt look. All in all, the food distribution area and seating area look to be larger and nicer than the current set-up. If you don't care for SAGA food, you can always walk down the hall to Benjamen's. This will be the new Hub which will include seating for 200 people, a stage for performances, an outdoor patio, a pool table, alcoholic beverages, and all your old favorites. By the way, there won't be a "Benny's" type 3.2 bar at the new center as in the past. With Benjamin's, the dining area, and the Great Space optional for serving alcoholic beverages, there really isn't a need to dedicate space to a 3.2 bar.

Benjamen's will be the new Hub w hich will include seating for 200 people, a stage for performances, an outdoor patio, a pool table, alcoholic beverages, and all your old favorites.

Continuing on the tour down to the garden level, our first stop is at the bookstore. A much larger area for shopping and storage will make things convenient. Across the hall and to the right will be the return of the Student Store, where students can sell or buy anything from ski boots to sweatshirts. Walking by the three story high open atrium we find the "unfinished basement" which will serve for storage until it is put to better use. The entrance next to this leads us into the WES room where movies can be seen by eighty people. The room is designed to accomodate fine seating for formal films and lounge type seating for flicks such as "Bulldozers From Hell."

Accomodating up to eighty people, the WES room is designed for viewing formal films and flicks such as "Bulldozers From Hell."

Just outside of the WES room we see mailboxes and a post office center. Starting next year, all students on campus regardless of sex, race or age will receive all mail and packages at the Worner Center. Why not keep the same system? After studying other campus' which have the central mail system it was found that a central system created a social atmosphere at the mail boxes. Another reason for the change is that it will force students to go to the center where many new events will be taking place. Everyone should get exp to the ongoing activities.

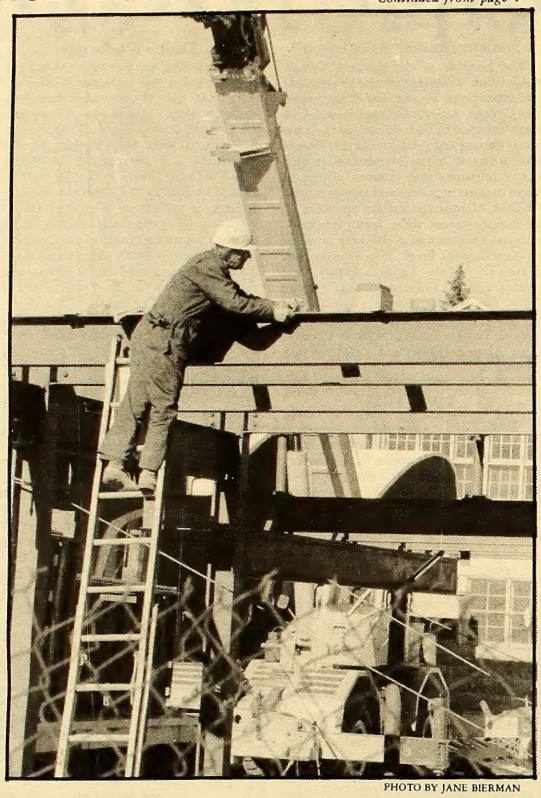

PHOTO BY JANE BIERMAN

To the right and down the hall is a se of rooms which will play host to s students interested in arts and cr Improved space will make crafting easier and there will even be an area showing-off all the great pieces. (J space on the garden level will be used storage and deliver services.

Now ler's take that long walk all the up to the top level. Wait! What's this elevator? Sure is. As the doors to elevator reopen on the top level we face open-air atrium. On our left is a few off for David Ives and his many secretaries the opposite side of the open atrium th are several offices, one for each stu organization. To the right of these off there is a copy room where posters other advertisement can be made by student organizations. Next to this there the CCCA office which is the nerve ce for the student organizations. Down hall there is more lounge space and pla of meeting rooms.

Looking out a window on this le towards the ice rink, one can see a mall setting of trees, benches and great light ideal for nocturnal loitering. In addi there will be a locker room, possibly intramural athletes. All levels will inc bulletin boards for up-to-the- information, display cases and bathroo

How much is student social life going cost C.C.? The cost for the build including landscaping reaches $7 mil Fortuantely, the El Pomar foundation donated about $5 million for the build

The goal of the Worner Ce according to David Ives is to make pe ask "What's going on in Worner?" He he'd like to see the lounge used as a cas living room where students could get "I'd like to walk by the lounge and students getting to know one anoth debating issues," Ives added. The fun begin on July 1, 1987 when the dining and bookstore open (subject to weath On August 1, 1987, the remainder of building will be opened starting off wi two week fiesta and a lifetime-full activities for C.C. students.

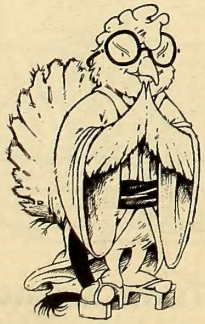
JIM SCHUST

YAKITORI

Most Pieces of Sushi $1.00 a piece*

*Some are not as much.

In Store Only



Yaki-Doodle

Downtown
16 E. Bijou
578-0915

M-Thurs 11am-3pm 5-9pm
Fri & Sat 11am-3pm 5-10pm

Blechh
What is that thing?
It Looks Like a Line to me!
I think it's Scary!
I might be able to Work within it!
Scary Music Plays in the Background
Another unsuspecting Group is clobbered By The Dead Line
Ahh!
Snarf
Snarf

In Search of the CC Image

"They act as if they own the whole town" said one waitress from a restaurant frequently visited by Colorado College students. "Definitely," another waitress agreed adding that "Every place they go they act as if everyone should know that they are Colorado College students and treat them accordingly. It is quite irritating especially when you are in a subservient position already."

The previous comments were two of many made in a random poll taken of downtown shoppers and business people in Colorado Springs. Those polled were asked to comment on their perceptions of students at Colorado College. Although the amount of people questioned was relatively small, their opinions varied greatly.

Those who owned or worked in restaurants or other service occupations generally tended to agree with the waitress' comments already mentioned. Adjectives describing the student body as being arrogant, hauty, and impolite kept on popping up in people's answers. It is interesting to note however, that those people and businesses wished to remain anonymous for they feared that voicing such negative opinions might harm the patronage they receive from the CC student body. Said one waiter, "All I know is that the students tend to tip great - which is all I really care about!"

"All I know is that the students tend to tip great—which is all I really care about!"

Among those passing by on the street, comments and opinions tended to be less harsh. One businessman whose business is located on Cascade mentioned that, "The only problem I have with the kids is on week-days around nine in the morning and five at night. The students blindly walk out on Cascade - and not always in the crosswalks either. It is quite bothersome to stop three or four times in a two block stretch just because the students won't wait for cars to pass by or use the pedestrian crossings." Another lady added later, "It would not be so bad if the students could just wave or smile sometimes to thank you for stopping."

A jogger who was temporarily interrupted at a stoplight, replied, "CC students are too yuppie orientated—like that—" he said while pointing to a blue SAAB with a Colorado College sticker on the rear window that conviently was parked nearby. Turning his head as he jogged away, he continued, "They should concentrate on more important things in life." (Unfortunately, I couldn't keep up with him to find out what those "more important" things were.)

A well-dressed woman, in her late twenties (who I later found out has resided on the West side of Colorado Springs for four years) had no answer at all when polled. This had to do with the fact that she thought CC either meant a community college or, with further thought, University of Colorado at Colorado Springs. When informed that CC referred to Colorado College, she sheepishly replied "Oh . . . is that in Colorado Springs too?" This comment in and of itself says something not only about the student body, but the college in general. (Which for reasons that do not pertain to this article, I will refrain from discussing.)

"CC students are too yuppie orientated. They should concentrate on more important things in life."

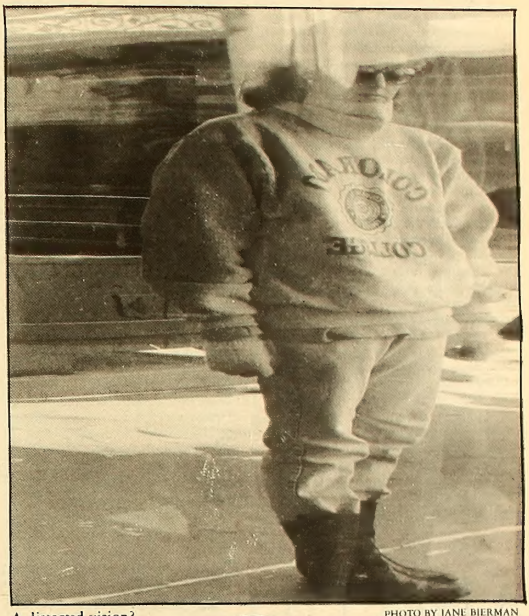
High school students, in Acacia Park viewed the CC student body favorably. Said Josh Raemisch, a Palmer High School student, "They all seem pretty cool. They really know how to throw great parties." Junior Andrea Albright and friends mentioned that they really liked the fraternity parties and that everyone wore really 'in' clothes and hairstyles. One of Andrea's friends (who wanted to remain anonymous because she sometimes dates a CC student) said that although she likes most of the students she has met she thinks that "a majority of Colorado College students are too materialistic and stuck-up." Another friend added, "One would expect the girls to be that way - but the guys are just as bad-even worse." Taking the question a little bit more seriously, Brian Ganster, a senior planning to attend University of California at Berkeley, expressed that "The shantytown was a good gesture on the part of the student body. It showed that they were aware and wanted to make a contribution." Many of those polled agreed with Brian and thought that the students' attempt to get the college to divest reflected positively on the student body.

Continuing this thought, was Sarah, a woman in her mid thirties who calls herself a 'regular' at Poor Richard's. Frequently finding herself engaged in conversations with Colorado College students she comments that, "The kids I have run into from CC have much intelligence and insight and care deeply for events, people and the world in general. I wish that there were more people like them."

"I wish that there were more people like them."

Ending on a positive note, this poll, although limited in it's participation, gives one something to think about. Whether one chooses to take these comments seriously or not, it is beneficial for CC students to be aware of how randomly chosen Colorado Springs residents view the Colorado College student body. It is reassuring to know however, that nearly everyone polled emphasized that "I do know some students at CC on a personal level, and know that not everyone is the way I have generally assumed them to be."

ANNE E. MANHART



A distorted vision? PHOTO BY JANE BIERMAN

FRESH
OLD CHICAGO
PASTA & PIZZA

WATCH THE SUPERBOWL WITH YOUR FRIENDS

OPEN AT NOON
• 4 T.V.'S •
RECEPTION GUARANTEED
• EXPANDED SEATING •

JOHN ELWAY LOOK-A-LIKE CONTEST —
WIN BRONCO JACKET
Enter to win - prize awarded at Kickoff!

2 FOR 1 PIZZA TO GO 2pm-9pm
Super bowl Sunday - you buy one; we'll buy the other of equal or less value - MIX OR MATCH!

IF BRONCOS WIN — RECEIVE A COUPON FOR A FREE PASTA BAR DINNER VALID ANYNIGHT IN FEB!
(except Monday)

118 N. Tejon • downtown
634-8812

New Prof. to Concentrate on Chicano Lit

Colorado College is currently interviewing four candidates, one of whom will be selected to fulfill the position of Assistant Professor in Chicano Literature to begin in the academic year of 1987-88. Courses in Chicano literature have always been a part of the CC curriculum, however, few have been offered in recent years. The Romance Language Dept. has expressed the desire to "regenerate" existing courses and stimulate interest in this field. The new faculty member will conduct courses in Chicano Literature as well as Spanish language courses, at all levels, inclusive of the Senior Seminar for Majors.

Chicano Literature ranges from socio-political texts to auto-biographical essays. The literature reveals the nature of a culture with its own traditions, struggles and accomplishments. As one of the candidates said in her presentation, "every work has an implied audience." Some of the literature appeals to revolutionnaries and to those who seek to establish social or political justice and equality in this country. Some texts speak specifically to women and feminist concerns. Some of the literature addresses the Chicanos who live on the "frontera," who experience conflict between their Mexican heritage and their adopted American life. Some of the literature attracts a wider audience, speaking of personal struggles experienced by the individual, on a universal level, regardless of ethnic background.

Much of Chicano literature is generated by writers from the Southwest. Some of the texts are exclusively in Spanish, but many are a melange of Spanish and English. Thus, a certain proficiency in Spanish is required in order to take a course in Chicano Literature. (SP 306 is generally required for most Literature courses in Spanish, although the prerequisite may vary depending on the particular course).

Chicano Literature is just one of many courses offered within the humanities division of the Southwest Studies Program. Southwest Studies is an interdisciplinary program which allows students to choose among a wide variety of courses pertaining to the Southwest. Some of the courses focus on environmental, geological and ecological patterns in the Southwest, while others deal with social and cultural issues. Courses in art and music of the Southwest are also available. The inclusion of Chicano Literature in next year's curriculum assures a complete selection for those pursuing a major in Southwest Studies.

A grant recently denoted to the Southwest Studies Dept. makes possible the position of Associate Professor in Chicano Literature. the grant will also allow the new professor to have the same privileges as other faculty members who are given a "development" block for research or continuing education in their field.

Colorado College is aware of its role in the Southwest community and wants to communicate this consciousness to its student body. The Romance Language Department welcomes "new voices" from the Chicano community and hopes that students will become more aware of cultural differences of Chicanos, while simultaneously integrating Chicano students into the CC community. "Both faculty and administration are honest in their desire to help minorities on the CC campus," reports Marcelle Rabbin, speaking in behalf of the Romance Language Dept.

The new faculty member will also have the opportunity to teach in CC's Mexico program in Guanajuato. Students who returned this semester from Mexico speak enthusiastically about the program. The Spanish Department expects a fairly good size group to participate in next fall's program and encourages anybody who has questions about Guanajuato to contact Marie Daniels or Kevin O'Conner.

The hiring of new faculty requires careful consideration of each candidate by both the faculty of the Romance Language Dept. and the administration. Four candidates are presently being evaluated: 2 men and 2 women, all with doctorates a all well qualified for the position. E candidate prepares an oral presentat addressed towards the faculty of Department, members of the Execu Committee of Humanities and interested students or majors within Department. The presentations com each candidate's unique vision of Chica literature and culture, from which faculty and administration have some b to make their final decision, to determined Wednesday, January 28, last day of Block 5.

Students are encouraged to offer th opinions about the candidates al listening to the presentations. Tam Espinosa, President of MECHA has al arranged informal gatherings whe students can meet with the visitin candidates and direct questions towa them.

Marcelle Rabbin emphasizes th "commitment from the Dept. and t administration is not enough commitment from the students is al necessary." Rabbin encourages the C community to further our knowledge o the Chicano community and to "look a other visions of the world in order to hel our own intellectual development."

MARY BUTCHE

A Nice Place to Visit, But . . .

For your reading enjoyment we offer this new sometimes-weekly column: "A Nice Place to Visit, But . . ." We hope, through this column, to promote an understanding of the numerous, widely divergent metropolitan areas which CC students call home. Maybe this will aid you all in the ultimate decision of where to settle down once your highly productive lives as students are over. Or maybe not. At any rate, we welcome any and (as you can probably tell) all contributions. If you feel your town is "the place to be," tell us about it in writing. You'll be glad you did.

This week . . .The Windy City.

— Feature Ed.

Chi-Town: Cows, Conflict and Culture

How about those Bears?! Well, how about them? Last year at this time they were on their way to Superbowl success, and the city of Chicago was "on cloud nine." The Bears win signified not only a ranking as the World Champions, but the ranking of Chicago as a winning city.

But somehow the thought of Chicago as a winner does not ring right in the ears of many. For the "Windy City" is known as almost anything but a winning city. I once saw a t-shirt at a Cubs game that said "I believe in the Easter Bunny, I believe in Santa Claus, and I believe in Chicago athletic teams." Which, I personally feel, sums up Chicago pretty well.

Speaking of nuts, who in their right mind would go to any game in Chicago knowing full well that the team will lose; which, in most cases, is the outcome. Well, a Chicagoan would. I have been to see the Cubs, Bears, Sox, and Bulls, and every fan is the same: they are diehard believers. Why? Because the fan can identify with the underdog. And, Chicago is the underdog. So, when the underdog wins something like the Superbowl, he is not going to be bashful.

As a result, during the course of 1986, while the Bears were out endorsing cars, tacos, toilet paper, and opening up restaurants and bars, they forgot how to play the game of football. So what was left for the 1986 season was a bunch of very fit testimonials.

But Chicago is perpetually being formed by failure. It all started in 1871 when Mrs. O'Leary's cow kicked over the oil lamp, thus, leveling Chicago in its entirety. What Mrs. O'Leary did not realize was, at the expense of a few lives, that this bovine tragedy was the best thing that could have happened to Chicago. This city that was constructed of wooden buildings and mud roads with wooden slats for sidewalks would soon be the hub of American Architecture.

". . . Chicago is perpetually being formed by failure."

Out of this major tragedy came some of the most important contributions to the history of architecture including the Chicago School, which was responsible for such developments as the skyscraper a the prairie home. In addition, Chicago one of the most perfectly planned g pattern cities. Whereas other big cit turn their backs to the shoreline, Chicag buildings face Lake Michigan.

Yet another great American institut was formed in Chicago out of bad times the musical form know as the Blues. T long-standing conflict of racial dissensi has made Chicago one of the country most segregated cities as well as one of t most publicized political systems.

"What would Chicago be witho a dilemma?"

The riots of August 1968 brought th problem to a head. Chicago's projects ar one of our country's greate embarrassments. While the planner original intent was to provide a livin situation for blacks that would be complet with schools, stores, medical facilities, a new housing, they now stand a overcrowded and unsafe structures for a concerned. A failed Utopia one could sa But things may change with the ever s trendy solution of gentrification, which ha made such areas as these, into havens o the young and wealthy.

Ah, but what would Chicago be witho a dilemna. If it was not for the impotent athletic teams, controversial politics, housing problems, and racial conflicts, then it would not be the city we dearly refer to as "Chi-town." And what about the weather? It builds character.

JENNIFER MINDEL

ernandez Promotes Understanding

rof. Explains Latin American Culture

Ignorance is the worst counsel," onishes political science Professor mian Fernandez to twenty-five entive students on the first day of his parative Politics of Latin America s. "I believe the ultimate goal of any cation is to learn about people and why act the way they do. In this class I hope will learn at least one thing about the blems facing Latin American ntries—that there are no easy utions.

In this class I hope you will learn least one thing about the blems facing Latin American ntries — that there are no easy utions."

After his first semester teaching at CC, nandez has gained the reputation as a n American specialist among students. rtainly his enthusiasm for intensive s lectures and willingness to work with ividuals has influenced students' tions. As senior political science major r Loach offers: "He's an energetic ocate of informed criticism with a great d for close professor/student relations." ernandez's zeal abounds. His detailed lyses of political problems wander the kboard in creative scripture. Such bbling helps create the sense of umentation that one encounters in n American politics. However, nandez's lectures do clarify political uations and help point students toward itic questions.

Nicknamed the "shoeless one" due to stocking-footed lectures, Fernandez pects students to match his hard work h their own serious effort. "He's the best professor I've ever had," declares student. One doesn't enter a nandez class in order to relax. In the cal block his students may expect two ers, a mid-term and final exam and an report. Such a heavy load may ourage some potential students but for se who want to dive into the chaos of n American politics for three and one weeks and perhaps emerge with a re understanding of regional problems, nandez's classes provide the means.

While Fernandez suggests the best way learn about the people and politics of n America is to travel within its ntries and study the culture, he admits h a smile, "that my classes probably a close second" to the first-hand erience. "Only, here we study olution at a considerable distance," he ds.

Fernandez was born in Pinar del Rio, the ital of Cuba's western province which erates the Gulf of Mexico from the ibbean Sea. When he was five his ily fled Cuba to Miami to escape the wing oppression of Castro's revolution. Originally my father supported Castro. was involved in Castro's overthrow of tista. But with Castro's failure to return he 1940 Constitution and the spreading repression at the local level, he became enchanted." Fernandez's father owned food warehouse in Pinar del Rio. ough contacts he was able to ferry his ily north to Miami on a Red Cross boat. that time the Red Cross traded medicine supplies to Cuba in exchange for oners caught in the Bay of Pigs fiasco. ewhow the elder Fernandez obtained ace on one of the last boats to leave ana.

After the Fernandez family spent one in Miami they moved to Puerto Rico re Damian's father found work selling and his mother began teaching

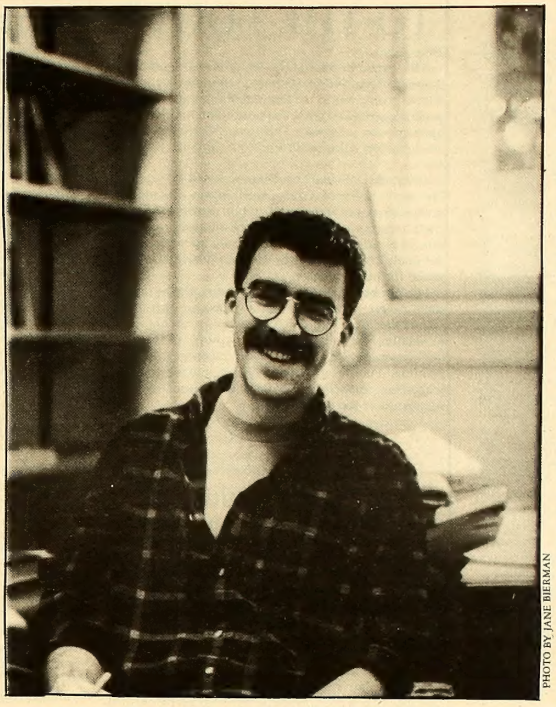


PHOTO BY JANE BIERMAN

Damian Fernandez: The best Cuban export since Havana Cigars.

Spanish in a Mennonite school. Here Damian began his formal education. Later he earned a scholarship to a Jesuit high school. Upon graduation he entered Princeton where he majored in International Relations and Latin American Studies. While Fernandez admits the Princeton social life seemed alien because of his background, academically it offered him the opportunity to concentrate on language, history and political science. During his undergraduate years Fernandez travelled to Brazil, Cuba, France, and Spain on grants.

"Originally my father supported Castro. He was involved in Castro's overthrow of Baptista. But with Castro's failure to return to the 1940 Constitution and the spreading of repression at the local level, he became disenchanted."

After graduating from Princeton, Fernandez spent some time in Mexico but returned to the United States for his master's degree in Latin American Studies at the University of Florida. He then won an Inter-American Foundation grant which he used to study political conditions in Peru.

At this time Fernandez didn't intend to pursue a teaching career. "I thought I wanted to write political literature but decided to teach for a year," he remembers. So he travelled back to the U.S. to teach at Phillip's Academy at Andover. Here he taught two Latin American Studies courses. He also worked at nearby Merrimack College and through a recommendation from the Merrimack president obtained a position at the St. Thomas University in Florida as Assistant Dean of Bilingual Studies.

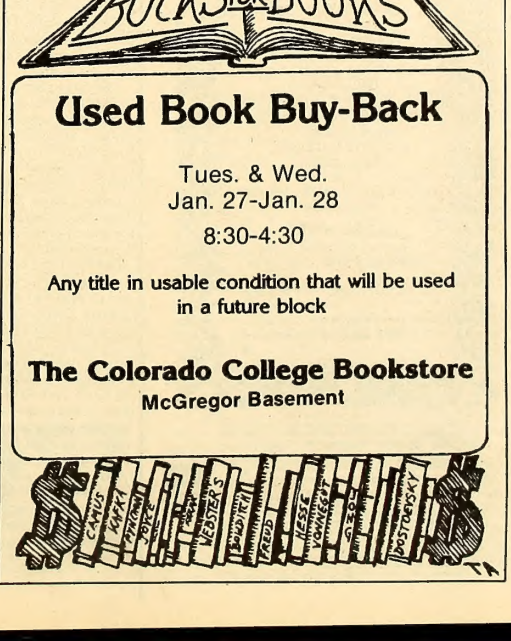
"This was a very big challenge for me," Fernandez says. "I was in charge of 500 students in the bilingual program." After a year he decided to go back to school for his Ph.D. He entered the University of Miami where he obtained a fellowship while retaining his part-time job at St. Thomas. By 1984 Fernandez had passed his Ph.D. exams. He wrote his dissertation and took a job as a research associate at the U of Miami. With this position he travelled extensively through Latin America, concentrating especially on labor unions and their affect on politics.

In 1985 Fernandez applied for a teaching position at CC. He was interviewed January 6, 1986. "The interview process was very long and difficult," he remembers. "I was impressed by how much care the administration took in the selection process. I was also impressed by the members of the Political Science Department."

So far Fernandez has enjoyed his move to CC. "The atmosphere here encourages learning," he says. "Faculty and students are extremely fortunate. At some schools there's the constant pressure to publish or perish. Here professors are encouraged to teach, to work with the students. And the students benefit. The access to professors is excellent, a real open-door policy." Close cooperation with students, however, does present some problems, Fernandez believes. Professors find it difficult to research and still remain available to students' needs.

The rewards outweigh the problems, however, Fernandez feels. Students need to be able to explore Latin American culture, learn what Latin Americans think and feel. "The United States plays such an important role in Latin America. We must understand the situation before we can help ease regional conflicts. Also, Hispanics play an increasingly important role in our own country. It's important to learn their perspectives."

ALEC REKOW



Editor's Note-

Ronald Reagan, on whether he would be visiting the Vietnam War Memorial: "I can't tell unless somebody tells me, I never know where I'm going." —New Republic, Dec., 1986

This is our President? On the shoulders of this man, our fate rests. Missed opportunities, bungled attempts are all that remain from a hodge podge foreign policy which accomplished nothing, it has only succeeded in promoting what it professes to deny. Reagan's inability to lead shows through in all areas of his administration's foreign policy.

Arms Control. Don't scoff, arms control is the big issue. Since the bomb was first dropped, it has driven our foreign policy. In fact, it has taken it over. Rather than engage in constructive policy reform, our President has approached arms control unprepared and misinformed. His administration has yet to discover a policy consensus which is fundamental to negotiation for arms reduction. Where did the President come up with his sweeping proposals to willingly trade away all ballistic missiles? This stands far to the left of the freeze movement, itself on the fringe of the arms control community. On the other hand, his insistence on the militarization of space remains extreme, contradicting his own statements at its proposal. The President's inability to form a coherent foreign policy is easily seen in contradictions such as these and many others. The Reagan doctrine, of justified intervention when the U.S. has a strategic interest and a moral right, has no barriers, it only serves as a rationalization for a militaristic expansionistic foreign policy. It allows him to call the contras "freedom fighters"; to support death squads in El Salvador; to interpret the ABM treaty to allow Star Wars; to violate the Salt II treaty; to declare "It was not my intention to do business with Khomeini, to trade weapons for hostages, nor to undercut our policy on anti-terrorism"... I won't even begin to talk about his trillion dollar budget while he talks of a balanced budget amendment. Remember, figures can lie, and liars can figure.

—M.M.

THE COLORADO COLLEGE

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETER LOACH, News Editors
DAVE EVANS & ANNE MANHART, Features Editors
MUNIR MEGHJEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
•
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETER SCOTT, Graphics & Layout Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
•
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
•
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Carter Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 extension 673. The Catalyst is printed bi-monthly from September to May, except during holiday periods.

Carter Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its education programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local laws.

Editorials appearing in the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 400 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Rastall Center, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

A work of considerable length may be submitted as a guest commentary. Persons interested in submitting commentary should contact the Catalyst at 632-7899 or 473-2233 ext. 673.

The Catalyst reserves the right to edit or cut letters to the editor and guest commentaries.

BUY WAR BONDS

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editor,

This time I'm pissed. The Jan. 17 Catalyst published another photo of mine without granting proper credit. The first time was in the Dec. 6, 1985 edition; a photo of mine plagarized by the then photo editor. (Although an apology soon followed.) This time, the photo of Corey Abel, in Scott Allen's article on rock climbing, is also my work.

Given that no direct credit is given to anyone, to say "photo courtesy of Corey Abel" leaves an intended ambiguity as to the picture's origin, usually used when the photographer is believed to be anonymous. In this case, it is safe to say that the photographer was most definitely known, at least by the individual who lent the photo for publication.

I do not believe the mistake to be directly the fault of the Catalyst. However, especially because this is the second time this has occurred to me, and probably others on campus, it should be stressed that proper credit for all publication should be thoroughly investigated before printing. Publishing without giving proper credit is plagarism, no matter what phrase one uses to avoid searching for the correct origin.

This Letter Courtesy of Elizabeth Brownsberger

Colorado College A Liberal Institution?

The Colorado College sells itself with its radical block plan as being a liberal institution. Among other responsibilities, a liberal institution must concern itself with a wide diversity among its populous and a constant activity within the social issues that surround it. Although The Colorado College has made an effort to appear as though they are concerned with these issues, they have failed to demonstrate any significant actions that would indicate that it is indeed a liberal institution.

One of The Colorado College's most boasted aspects is that it is very diverse. The Colorado College is so diverse that they have a propaganda pamphlet available entitled "Diversity." In this pamphlet one may find information on Financial Aid, Deadlines for Applications, Available Majors, the Faculty/Student Ratio, and other areas that are vital to the diversity of an institution. In this pamphlet one may not find the diverse racial breakdowns of The Colorado College students or faculty. Consider, while our diverse country consists of 83.4% whites, 11.8% blacks, 6.5% hispanics, and .60% native americans, our diverse Colorado College student body consists of 89.1% whites, 2.8% blacks, 3.3% hispanics, and 1.0% native americans, and our diverse faculty has 94.9% whites, 2.2% blacks, 2.9% hispanics, and 0.0% native americans. Diversity is a relative term. If an institution considers itself diverse within its country, then it should be at least as diverse, if not more diverse, than its country.

The other prerequisite for a liberal institution is its concern for social issues that surround it. In the past two and one half years one of the main social issues on this campus has been divestment by The Colorado College in South Africa. In the past three months four conservative firms that are leaders in United States industry: General Motors, International Business Machines, Warner Communications, and Honeywell Inc., have committed themselves to their own divestment in South Africa. In the past two years over seventy big U.S. firms have divested in South Africa. How can big businesses that are considered to be very conservative and not extremely sympathetic to social issues commit themselves to their own divestment while a liberal institution such as The Colorado College continuously refuses to disinvest its assets from South Africa?

It would not take a great deal of effort on the college's part to demonstrate its willingness to be a liberal institution. The college must show that it does care about the social concerns of the community. The college must make strides to disinvest their assets from South Africa. Also, the college must recruit students and faculty with diversity in mind. The administrators must hire more minority faculty members. The Colorado College sends representatives every year in search of high school seniors that would be interested in our school. These representatives must travel to high schools with the idea of recruiting a diverse freshman class. The Colorado College is not a liberal institution, but with a little effort it could be. □

By Scott Krueger

Elizabeth Cheney

Mikhail Gorbachev is "opening up" Soviet society. proof of this he is releasing highly visible dissidents li Anatoly Scharansku and Andrei Sakhar Unfortunately, despite Soviet rhetoric to the contr such releases do not indicate movement toward an op society. Instead, the very fact that there were and people imprisoned in the Soviet Union for their beli point to the the crux of the Soviet dilemma.

Soviet society can never be "open." Reform impossible, and Gorbachev's "glasnost" campaign band-aid at best. The moral to the Soviet story should a lesson to us all—Socialism does not and cannot wo

But, you say, the Soviet Union isn't really socialis things have gotten pretty heavy-handed over the Exactly my point. What we are seeing in the So Union is the inevitable outcome of an attempt at theory of social organization based on governme ownership, management, or control of the means production and the distribution and exchange of good

This type of social organization can't avoid produci the kind of society extant in the Soviet Union today. Th society does not allow dissent and demands that even children be conformists rather than innovato idealists, and free thinkers. This society, in short, crushe the human spirit.

Socialism breeds such an environment because i completely contrary to human nature. People no incentives and socialism does not provide them. striking example can be found in Soviet agricultu production. 3% of the farms in the Soviet Union are n by people who stand to gain a profit from the sal their produce. These semi-independent farmers responsible for producing close to 30% of agricultural products of the Soviet Union. So much the innovative experiment of the communal farm.

Because socialism fails to provide incentives, government must set up 5-yr. plans and award citiz for reaching production goals. It must keep a tight re on all activity to ensure that citizens don't develop th own set of goals. This, after all, would not be good for state. The government must, therefore, dema complete conformity and Societ citizens are taught from the earliest years of their lives.

In Soviet elementary school art classes, first grad draw identical pictures and straying from the norm frowned upon. Individual thought is complet discouraged, and the nation pays a price for this. Wh you persecute free thinkers you close the door innovation. When you say to your citizens, "Think o about your role in fulfilling our current 5 year plan being an exemplary worker," you are ensuring that y society will stagnate. Such a society soon begins to c apart at the seams, and the only way it can be he together is by an authoritarian government. This is path the Soviets have chosen.

They have closed their borders making it nea impossible for citizens to leave the country. Th incidentally, gives Gorbachev an extremely cap audience on which to impose his "openness." They ha placed strict limitations on contact between So citizens and foreigners, especially Westerne Westerners, know how to think for themselves and t is a dangerous thing. They continue to imprison anyo who speaks out against Soviet policy. They censor ev piece of news that reaches their citizens. Pravda example, has never had a single typographical error its final edition because so many eyes pass over the pa of print before a copy ever hits the street. The list g on and on.

The current Soviet leadership is not completely blame. They are heirs to a system that cannot wor system which has as its shining example, its gr experiment, a nation which is a Third World country every aspect except its ability to build weapons.

Gorbachev may indeed be trying to remedy the cri economic situation of his country. What he seems m missing is that all the propaganda in the world c replace human innovation. When you imprison y citizens for thinking freely, it's a sure bet they will n use their brainpower for the advancement of country. Without it a country can never really adv

Soviet rhetoric aside, we in the West know the meaning of the words "open society," and should no fooled by Gorbachev's "glasnost" campaign. We sho at the same time, be impressed and inspired by peo like Andrei Sakharov who refuse to be silenced in face of dire consequences. Such remarkable hum continue to prove Charles Colob's assertion "Tyrants have not yet discovered chains which can fe the human mind." □

David Makarechian

Last week, the Rocky Mountain News published a brief story about a little girl who was hassled by the IRS. I clipped the article, and showed it to a number of people. The IRS seems to be everybody's worst enemy. People read the story with sick amusement, and were just glad that the goverment had left them alone. And nobody seemed surprised. This may reveal a dangerous trend in our society: People seem to oppose powerful governments and strong government actions, but are accustomed and unsurprised by them.The U.S. is turning into a country of statists. The IRS and the story about the little girl can serve as a test case to illustrate just how big the government is.

Little Shannon is the daughter of a carpenter. Her father, Kevin, set up a bank account in Shannon's name to budget for piano lessons, braces, and her education. For three years Shannon saved her allowance and did odd jobs. Last October Kevin was laid off. Kevin owed the government $1000 in back taxes. He couldn't satisfy his debt so the tax-collectors satisfied it for him. They seized the entire contents of Little Shannon's bank account.

The actions of the IRS in the Burns case illustrates the philosophy—and is symptomatic of the direction—that our society is going. As the State balloons with a heavy burden of expensive programs, we have precipitated the development of the Statist philosophy. People depend on and ask for successively more from the government, and are accustomed to its vastness. But just as the government gives, the government also takes away: It has become a legalized criminal with power to use brute force against defenseless individuals.

The Burns case is not unique. A Senate subcommittee recently investigated IRS procedures. Among other abuses, the subcommittee reviewed cases where agents had tricked defense attorneys to obtain confidential documents, set up "loaded" grand juries, and intimidated defendants to discourage legal action. The subcommittee found that 8000 agents have legal power to grant "pocket immunity" to any law breaker to get more information. Federal agents routinely—and legally—disrupt and interfere with the lives of individuals.

An absolutely simple, flat rate tax is the short term solution to IRS abuses. The 10% tax propsed by Rep. Mark Siljander would repeal 2119 pages of tax laws and 10,000+ pages of regulations the IRS enforces. Most of the 82,000 IRS employees could return to productive work in the private sector, and the $5 Billion IRS budget could be drastically reduced.

Statist trends in other areas of the government follow from the IRS example. Horror stories about government abuses abound: Drug enforcement agents violate property rights with illegal searches; welfare officials probe the private lives of beneficiaries; defense department contractors take taxpayers for as much as they can; medicare and social security officials have been known to play favorites and sell special services.

The cure for the disease that is Statism is readily apparent: reduction and simplification. To get the government out of our lives we need less of it. But in these days of Reagan-fascism, calls for less government are fashionable and trendy. A real commitment to reducing the size of goverment implicitly includes the affirmation that governments fail, and indivuduals achieve. So reducing the size of the government means reducing our dependance on it, too.

A long term solution to goverment abuses and infringements on individual liberties will require Americans to change the Statist attitude that has been developing since the New Deal. Government services should not be gratuitous. In an absolutely free society, individuals must regard the government as a servant, not a ruler, of the people. The government should be an agent who does not do something for nothing. For example, the police, law courts, and any other essential services should be paid for by the users voluntarily.

Eliminating fraud and waste, and restoring individuals' integrity and dignity stem from the simplification and reduction of government. But that's not the message Shannon Burns was taught by the IRS. Preserving the principles of liberty in succeeding generations should start now with a commitment from this generation: Less Government now. ☐

Victor Greto

The idea of being an American, the thought which always brought the curl of a smile to my face, the old burning sensation to the stomach, was the thought that I was anti-establishment. Anti-establishment Populism (as it is called) is supposed to be the major force which drives American politics today. This Populism ideally cuts across all lines of ideology we have, liberal and conservative, economic and social, and so on. Yet I submit this prideful anti-establishmentarianism to be shallow and thus a paradox: for we tend to worship without thinking the foundations and symbols of our society. As with symbols of "what it means to be an American," we refuse to question and fail to see through the rhetoric. The Declaration of Independence is one symbol which we refuse to criticize; another, the Statue of Liberty, exemplified by the narcissistic celebration we threw last July fourth and now it will be, this year, the Constitution of the United States. Yet there are other more crucial and fundamental aspects of our society which, beyond symbol, we refuse to question, hiding behind a surtout of rhetoric.

The cry we hear today, from mostly everyone of the middle class, is that we long to have government "off our backs," to be free to pursue our happiness with those grandiose rights of equality, life and liberty. But there is a factor which we blind ourselves to, for when we cry-lament "Government, leave me alone!" we are making the cry from the top and satisfactory portion of society, a cry downwards upon the head of the taxman and that indeterminate mass of Poor who "reap the benefits of our hard work." In other words, our anti-establishment stance in this respect is grossly irresponsible, for we intrinsically owe our positions to the Capitalist system, a system which in its nature is unfair, above all, because it requires a working class to support itself, and necessitates the measurement of human beings in terms of money. The reduction of human beings to numbers in an equation which our employers hope will be black at the bottom line, in "the final analysis," is an assumption we prideful anti-establishment people take for granted. There exists no "freedom" in a society based on capitalism, for there must be workers as there must be employers and owners. Capital has as much value as the labor of men and women. Any responsible individual can hardly bitch about "too much government" when he sees halfway clearly from where his position derives. The "invisible hand" of Adam Smith's system or world lies atop the ideal assumption that people who are workers will know their place, recognizing the obvious element that all are not "free" to move "up" from their lowly positions or the entire system will fall for lack of foundation. It is true that competition creates a lower price, but, as I have been saying, the assumptions which underlie the conditions for such a statement, are, if responsibly looked upon and thought about, intolerable.

And what I have been saying does not even approach the major problem of Ethnic groups in this country; as to why most of the ghettos are populated by Blacks and Hispanics is yet another assumption and piece of the establishment which, I think, we are too afraid to grapple with, for it involves wrestling intensely with our very selves on a scale which would make Jacob's bout with his angel a sideshow.

Thus the self-satisfaction which I complain about, the burning pride which we all feel for being so anti-establishment, daring, even by definition "American," is as false as the "natural" system which we live and work in. What we consider to be our "universal values" are hardly that, they are more "bourgeois values," and even then they are obstinate and narrow bourgeois, for we refuse to see, behind the shroud of our anti-government rhetoric, to what we owe our positions in the first place.

We are the provincial, unquestioning, narrow anti-establishmentarians. "Communism," as a scare word, functions as our blinders to the world around us and to the facts which will eventually consume us. Ignorance is not bliss, and eventually ignorance will become the means of our (here I am speaking middle-class and upper-class America) downfall. Anyone who has an inkling of the immensity of our ignorance should probably be shrinking in fear now. In a way, however, I long for our downfall. I long for the end of ignorance, for the end will probably come from the pathetic inner decay of our thought and assumptions. It does not matter if what succeeds us will be "better" or "fairer," for even if the tables are merely turned on us, at least a modicum of justice will have been done. ☐

Michael S. Mehan

The Bottom Line

On Monday the nation celebrated the official holiday commemorating the birth of slain civil rights leader, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Now, that the righteous speeches and services and vigils are all over, let us not just pack up this holiday, like so many Christmas bulbs and store it for next year, the spirit of Dr. King should live with all of us every day of the year, not just on one day.

What we must remember, is that Dr. King was not an idea, he was not a concept, nor was he just a high minded dreamer; he was a man, a brave and courageous man who gave his life in order to defeat ideas of racism and practices of segregation in this country that were blatantly and grotesquely in contradiction to the values of equality, freedom and justice upon which America was founded, and which should be the true spirit of this nation.

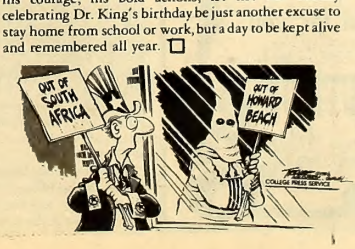
We must not only remember Dr. King, but all those who joined his struggle and who fought for racial equality in the American Civil Rights movement. We must remember all those who were brave enough to step forward and fight for what they believed, risking their safety in order to eliminte an oppressive system of racial injustice. It was a long road to improving social conditions in this country. One filled with violence: water cannons, tear gas, police dogs, mass arrests, sit ins, marches, riots and protests. There were many sacrifices made, and many people, black and white, died in the struggle to break down the color barriers in this country.

What Dr. King and everyone in the Civil Rights movement did was not only to put forth bold ideas, but to put forth bold actions. They shook this nation deep down in its moral foundations, and their actions, their stubborn resistance to a racist system, was not smothered in its embryonic spark, but ignited into a blaze of change in American society. Dr. King and his followers dared to break the laws of men, they dared to upheave a society securely set in hypocrisy, in order that this nation might realize the true meaning of the higher, Liberal/Judeo-Christian values which it represents, and in order for America to raise itself up in greater fulfillment of these values.

Dr. King focused the attention of the nation on its and oppressed, bringing concrete results in the form of monetary and nutritional aid programs to poor people in the cities around the nation. He started a grass roots movement of social change which swept the country, unfortunately, he could not continue his work of fighting poverty in our cities, since his life was cruelly taken by an assassin's bullet.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was, and truly is one of America's greatest heroes. A man whose courage we should all emulate in the struggle against inequality and social injustice. We must always keep him in our hearts, for he is not just an American hero, but a man who inspires people around the whole world. He is a hero and symbol of non-violent revolution and freedom to all people, fighting oppression in the world. You can be sure that he is still kept alive in the hearts of those fighting the system of apartheid in South Africa, or in other Third World countries, in which people are struggling for freedom and justice.

Do not simply put Dr. King away like the Thanksgiving silver, polished and wrapped up, waiting for next year. In this age of "Yuppie" materialism and Reagan conservatism, where poor neighborhoods only attract real estate speculators who want to tear them down and build condos; where the attitudes of the young people have changed from building social justice, to building resumes; a time when our government still supports oppressive regimes in Chile and South Africa, and violence and terror have become our policy in Central America, now is the time to remember a man who fought non-violently, to change a system of hatred and oppression, and who won many of his battles. Let us remember not only what Dr. King symbolizes, but also his courage, his bold actions, let not the holiday celebrating Dr. King's birthday be just another excuse to stay home from school or work, but a day to be kept alive and remembered all year. ☐



Broan to Smithereens

Would somebody please tell me what's so special about these guys that I'm missing? After reading rave review after rave review, I couldn't help but expect a hell of a lot more from "Especially For You," the debut album from The Smithereens. Don't get me wrong, the album is fun, in fat tons o' fun, yet it lacks the originality and talent that most bands need in order to be hoisted to such a god-like new-band status.

"Especially For You" is a study in the success of marketing new-sixties nostalgia tunes in the eighties. The Monkees recently proved that songs from '67 sell quite well in '87, and The Smithereens have driven the point home. What we have here is a collection of ten or so bouncy, tight pop originals that just may have been sung by the Monkees twenty years ago. Like the Monkees, these guys boast cutesy vocals, predictable harmonies, and well-rehearsed guitar "solos."

On the bright side, we hear a flawless production job by Don Dixon (who has worked with R.E.M. and Guadalcanal Diary). Most importantly, this album is fun. Nothing special, but fun. "Especially For You" may be the best buy around for non-dead-heads who want to ride the fashionable bandwagon of sixties nostalgia. In fact, you may even hear some of these songs at frat bashes in place of "Louie Louie" in the near future.

Since the album is "a masterpiece of [illegible] craft (as Brett Milno of Boston Rock delicately put it)," almost all the songs must, by rule, sound just like one another, right? Right, they do. This lack of originality and diversity is what prevents me from being a firm believer in The Smithereens. After all, what's so increditably original about being nostalgic? These guys may be fun, but they're frightfully overrated.

MARTY BRO[illegible]

Elipses and Hyperbole

It was a normal occurrence. I went to the reference desk of a certain library, in hopes of finding a book. "Rock polishing!" exclaimed the librarian, "I haven't looked for a book on rock polishing in quite a while."

The reference person attacked the shelves, throwing books in all directions. I just wanted one book but was bombarded with lists of possible periodicals, helpful handbooks, and several certain sources on Native American rituals and rock polishing songs.

"Is this the book you're looking for?" he'd ask and then hand me another book before I could even look at the table of contents. And the librarian didn't stop. He was still rambling on about cross references, inter-library loans, and computer searches, when I hid behind the best seller shelf.

As that little man ran off to call a French library about a history of famous rocks, I realized there are creatures on this planet that are humanoid but not human. These overly zealous beings are found not only behind reference desks, but also at the head of aerobic classes.

My sources indicate that many of these creatures are created spontaneously in renovated Twinky factories and sneak into the population through small doors in shopping malls. They infiltrate the society and often end up as contestants on the Newly Wed Game.

A large percentage of these pseudo humans are car salesmen or talk show hosts. Rumor has it they worship Vanna White. The U.S. government is starting to get worried.

In Arizona, the government is attempting to find exactly what these creatures are made of, utilizing a giant people accelerator. In the accelerator, a TV preacher is bombarded with neutrons until he gets very angry and runs down a long tube where he collides with a Miss America contestant.

After the collision an All Star wrestler is created, but he is very radio active and quickly decays into Mary Lou Retton and Slim Goodbody. All the while, the reaction produces angry people particles that fly off and usually end up working behind Loomis desk.

Just recently, they have discovered the anti person particle. This happened when they first noted the anti-Einstein, a short lived radio active person that is completely stupid but combs his hair ingeniously.

The government doesn't see a political threat as much as the danger of a big explosion. Apparently, all it would take is one errant aerobic instructor to run into a half-time performance by Up With People, and the entire solar system could be vaporized.

AARON SHURE

Turntable Picks

Neil Kopitsky, Junior, Sociology Major
The Go-Gos, "Beauty and the Beat"

Dixon Musselwhite, Senior, History
James Brown, "Mother Popcorn"

Derek Pizzey, Sophomore, Business
Eddie Money, "Where's the Party?"

Erik Browning, Junior, History
Accept, "Balls to the Wall"

Lea Bauman, Junior, English
Jackson Browne, "Running On Empty"

Chris Bennett, Senior, English
Todd Rungren, "Healing"

Join World Party

"If you want a revolution baby there's nothing like your own. You don't have to do all those burnin' books. Revolutionize at home." So states the quirky title track from World Party's debut album: Private Revolution.

Okay, relax. This new group probably has no intentions of stirring up a new breed of radicalism, but that's not to say that the music world might not be shaken up a bit.

World Party is the creation of British-born Karl Wallinger formerly of the group The Waterboys. He is the brains behind most of the ten songs of the album and provides lead vocals that have a certain sense of familiarity (maybe like a younger Bowie or Jagger).

Although the songs on Private Revolution cover a variety of musical styles, clever lyrics that embrace subtle political satire and a possible quest for a better society are a constant through-out the album.

The first released single from side one is entitled "Ship of Fools." It starts out with a slow Blues-like feel and contains a rather bleak analysis of the state of things. Later, the song swings into a more upbeat [illegible] for the refrain: "Save me. Save me [illegible] tomorrow. I don't want to sail with [illegible] ship of fools." Along these same lines, from side one is the beautiful instrumented ballad "All come true."

The search for Utopia continues on [illegible] two, but for the most part takes on a [illegible] different sound. "Hawaiian Island Wife" is a country tune that humorously [illegible] tale of the demise of a small rural town [illegible] tries to escape into dreams of [illegible] paradises. Buffet fans will probably [illegible] this one. Another notable song [illegible] same side is a spiced-up remake of [illegible] Dylan's "All I Really Want to do."

Even though much attention was [illegible] to the thought-provoking lyrics on [illegible] album, the quality of music was [illegible] sacrificed. World Party's songs [illegible] enjoyable listening material and [illegible] the group's first-rate musical ability.

Overall, Private Revolution is a [illegible] of fresh air for a world being suffocated [illegible] techno-pop music.

KATIE DALSE[illegible]

It's Valentine's Day
At the Lotus Eater,
And we have a heart on for you.

Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm Sat. 11-5 pm

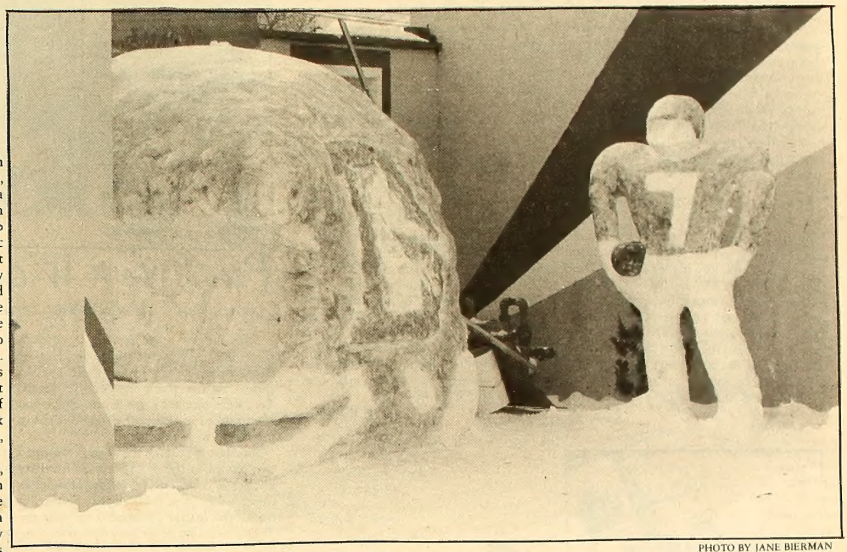
THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE

Downtown on Platte Between Tejon & Cascade

phone: 635-2118

Breitbard heads for LA; Graphics Editor Mourns

Little Shop of Horrors Reviewed



Artists everywhere thrill to the exploits of their beloved Broncos.

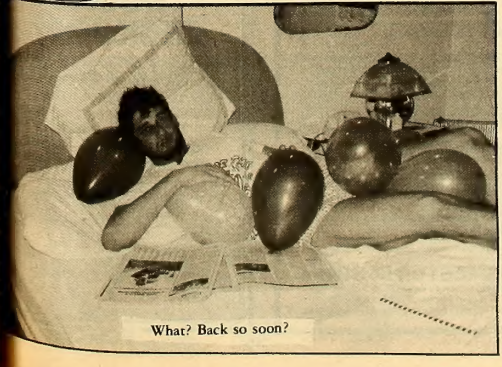
PHOTO BY JANE BIERMAN

I was on one of those nights when dom led me to just any movie theater, when God had miraculously hidden a dollar bill in the depths of my jean cket, that I discovered the "Little Shop Horrors." Although I am usually allergic ny staged, musical production that ears on the silver screen, I really yed this flick. Produced by David ften, and directd by Frank Oz, all the ery theatrics of a Broadway musical are phasized in "Little Shop of Horrors" to e it the funniest film I've seen in ages. I'm not talking about little chuckles rted out the nose, I mean outright dulterated guffaws, and whole scenes of l stomachs and contorted cheek scles. It stars Rick Moranis as Seymore, vable geek reminiscent of Dee Bakers d in "Swamp" last year (or visa-versa), discovers an enchanting new plant in basement of the flower shop, where he rks alongside a squeaky blond dish ed Audrey. In exchange for daily dings, the magic plant fulfills Seymore's ry desire — Audrey's attentions, fame, une, fast cars, etc. But the plant grows nto a dangerous, demanding, and very ky character all its own that feeds off of, guessed it, human flesh.

Little Shop of Horrors" rocks us with es by Alan Menken. Tops are groovy bers sung by the plant (Levi Stub) — ed me Seymore. Feed me all night long. C'mon boy, you can do it!" —, and down chorus tunes, including the me, sung by three sequinned beauties who can really doo-wop. For the romantically minded, the film gives us a haunting melody from Audrey (Ellen Green) called "Somewhere Green," and the swoon-worthy duet "Suddenly Seymore.". Don't let me forget co-stars Steve Martin and Bill Murray. My previous proud illusion that "Steve Martin is not that funny" was shattered by "Little Shop of Horrors." The man is hilarious. He plays a sadistic dentist. I died laughing during his entrance, in black leather astride a motorcycle singing "You'll be a Dentist," only to be resurrected for the scene when Bill Murray, the masacist patient, shows up for a long, slow root canal. What can I say? "Little Shop of Horrors" is a mean green mother from outer space. Run, don't walk to the Citadel Terrace Theater before it leaves town.

LAURA FINLEY

Yeh, You think you've got it bad? Let me tell you about the day
MARY LOU RETTON SHARED MY MIND
RISE and Shine, LARRY! How do you think I Got the Gold in L.A.? By staying in Bed all Day?
While you fix Breakfast I'll stretch out for our routine. BOY, DO I Feel SPUNKY today!!
All that CRACK you smoke is throwing off our timing, Larry. You know how bad we want to get back on the team in '88, don'tcha?
Come, on!
TO BE CONTINUED....
PeterScott



What? Back so soon?

the HI-FI shop
"Music for your home."
We Transform Records into Music
a tempo
Forget The Jargon, Listen To The Music
maxell XLII 90 $1.89 each*
*Limit 5 per customer.
2026 N. Academy Blvd. (303) 574-7747

Tigers Tear Texans

Just when you thought it was safe to write off the CC Men's Basketball team for the season . . . just when you thought Colorado College Clippers would be a more appropriate epithet, the Tigers turn their season around and do something that a CC men's hoops team hasn't done in twenty-five years: they win a NCAA invitational tournament. A Tiger team which began its weekend in Texas with a dismal 4-10 record left the state at 6-10. All of a sudden things look a little brighter. And all of a sudden a winning record is a distinct possibility.

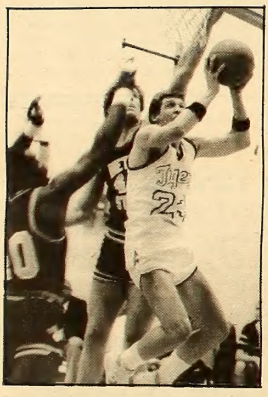
The first round of the Trinity University Invitational pitted the Tigers against Millsaps College, a team that has traditionally given the Tigers headaches. As usual, CC built up a big lead early in the game leading by ten at the half, yet let Millsaps back into the contest in the second period. In the end, however, the hustling Tiger defense stymied Millsaps' offense, and CC pulled out the victory 62-58 in what one Tiger player considered CC's toughest game of the season.

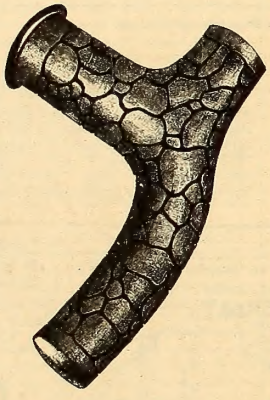
Yet one doesn't really have an accurate perception of toughness until one plays in front of close to a thousand screaming Texans, as the Tigers did Saturday night. In the championship final, the Tigers faced tournament host Trinity University. The trademark CC fast break was going strong and their trapping defense led to an incredible total of twenty-three Trinity turnovers. The Tigers were also boosted by a balanced scoring attack in which Seniors Dave Rakel, John Sacha and Rob Bogue all scored 18 points. CC won the game, and the tournament by a final score of 85-81.

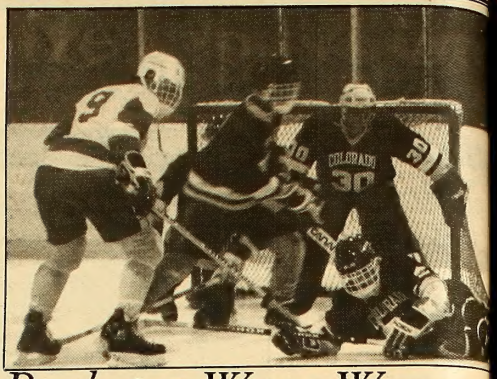
For the first time in recent memory, three CC players were named to the all-tournament team: forward Dave Rakel and guards Rob Hemminger and Rob Bogue.

Now the Tigers have a big trophy to compensate for the trials of a rocky first half of the season. But in addition they have something else: "Momentum." says Co-captain Dave Rakel. "We're playing with a lot of general intensity." If the Tigers can maintain their momentum and intensity, tonight's game against Regis in the El Pomar Gym should be a good one. Tip-off is at 7:30 pm.

DAVE EVANS







Puckster Woes Worsen

Another in a neverending series of must wins for CC

CC's hockey team has slid to seventh place in the Western Collegiate Hockey Association, losing 11 of their last 13 games. At one point this season, the CC icers were number three in the league and even ranked in one poll as one of the top ten teams in the nation.

Just last weekend the Tigers dropped two games to the WCHA cellar-dwellers Michigan Tech. This pulled the Huskies as close as they have been all year to moving out of the league's basement and put the Tigers only two points away from moving in.

After a series of mistakes that cost the Tigers the 7-4 loss Friday night, CC recovered somewhat but lost 7-6 in overtime the next night in Michigan.

In Saturday night's contest, the Tigers outshot their opponents 55-39.

First period goals by Doug Kirton, Rick Boh, and Cal Brown were matched by the Huskies and the second period started with a 3-3 tie. The Tigers were held scoreless during the middle-frame but the Huskies put themselves up one, 4-3.

A power play goal by Rob Doyle after four minutes of third period play, evened the score. But the Huskies took over the lead again.

A shorthanded goal by Guy Gadowsky tied the game once more. And less than two minutes later a Scott Schneider shot gave the Tigers the lead, 6-5. But that was it for CC and for leading scorer Rick Boh who missed the last 10 minutes of regulation time and the first 2 of OT because of an illegal amount of curve in his blade.

With the man advantage the Huskies tied the score throwing the game into extended play and eventually scoring once more to win.

Sophomore Matt Gilbreth came up with 32 saves for the Tigers by Husky [illegible] Dave Roach stopped 49 Tiger shots to lead his team to victory.

It might as well have been Friday the 13th last week for CC. Mistakes by the Tigers in their own zone gave Michigan scoring opportunities that they capitalized on.

Rick Boh and Tim Budy scored in the first period with Doug Clarke and Rob Doyle adding the other two in the second period. That was all the offense CC could muster and the third period attack by Michigan.

Going into the final twenty minutes with an even 4-4 score, CC was shutout while the Huskies exploded for three goals and the victory.

The one bright spot for the team was the individual success of Rob Doyle. The senior defender who has also been playing forward lately, tallied four points this weekend to move him into sixth place overall in the school's all-time scoring list. With 185 career points, Doyle also has the highest scoring CC defenseman ever. This weekend's points moved him past the old record holder defenseman Dave Feamster (1976-80). Feamster held the record for most points for a defenseman since [illegible].

Now CC faces number 3 Wisconsin in a two game series at the Broadmoor this weekend. CC traveled to Wisconsin in the fall and the Badgers wswept the series with 2 one goal margin wins in overtime. If the Tigers can get back on track, they have a good chance to mark one or two in the win column. The team showed us once what they could do, now it needs to repeat that performance.

KATHY MAHO[illegible]

What if you don't get into the grad school of your choice?

Of course, you may get into another school, but why settle? Prepare for the LSAT, GMAT, GRE, MCAT or any grad school entrance exam with the best test prep organization— Stanley H. Kaplan.

For nearly 50 years, Kaplan's test-taking techniques have prepared over 1 million students for admission and licensing tests of all kinds. So call. Why go to just any grad school, when you can go to the right one?

KAPLAN
STANLEY H. KAPLAN EDUCATIONAL CENTER LTD.
DON'T COMPETE WITH A KAPLAN STUDENT—BE ONE

761-8904
or see Judy Gibson for info.
MCAT classes
starting Feb. 14
All classes held in Olin Hall

SEMESTER IN SPAIN
(BEGINNER OR ADVANCED)

Not just for Spanish majors only, but for everyone: beginners, "in between" students, and advanced. Put some excitement into your college career!!

BEGINNER OR ADVANCED-Cost is about the same as a semester in a U.S. college: $3,870. Price includes jet round trip to Seville from New York, room, board, and tuition complete. Government grants and loans may be applied towards our programs.

AP-12
college you attend your name your present street address
city state zip
If you would like information on future programs give permanent address below.
your permanent street address
city state zip

Live with a Spanish family, attend classes four hours a day, four days a week, four months. Earn 16 hrs. of credit (equivalent to 4 semesters taught in U.S. colleges over a two year time span). Your Spanish studies will be enhanced by opportunities not available in a U.S. classroom. Standardized tests show our students' language skills superior to students completing two year programs in U.S. Advanced courses also.

Hurry. It takes a lot of time to make all arrangements.

SPRING SEMESTER—Jan. 30–May 29
FALL SEMESTER—Aug. 29–Dec. 19
each year.

FULLY ACCREDITED—A Program of Trinity Christian College.

For full information—send coupon to:

SEMESTER IN SPAIN
2065 Laraway Lake Drive S.E., AP-12
Grand Rapids, Michigan 49506
(A Program of Trinity Christian College)

AIM HIGH

WANT MORE THAN A DESK JOB?

Looking for an exciting and challenging career where each day is different? Many Air Force people have such a career as Pilots and Navigators. Maybe you can join them. Find out if you qualify. Contact your Air Force recruiter today. Call

(303) 528-1751 collect

AIR FORCE

PHOTO BY JERRY WANG

No Hockey at CC ?

Women's soccer also jeopardized under proposed amendment

As a National Collegiate Athletics Association (NCAA) Division III classification school, Colorado College is one of 345 such schools nationwide that compete in NCAA sanctioned sporting events. But, along with twelve other Division III schools, CC is actually a multi-divisional classification school, sponsoring Division I varsity teams in both Men's Hockey and Women's soccer. This policy of granting certain Division III schools multidivisional classification school, sponsoring Division I varsity teams in both Men's Hockey and Women's Soccer. This policy of granting certain Division III schools multi-divisional classification was, but has been for the past five years, a hotly contested issue at the annual NCAA convention held in San Diego January 5th-January 10th.

A contingent of Division III school officials from the North Coast Athletic Conference (NCAC) in Ohio (Kenyon, Oberlin, Wooster, etc.) launched a comprehensive campaign of literature, motions, and other propaganda aimed at persuading convention delegates to vote for a proposal that would eliminate the regulation allowing Division III schools to sponsor Division I athletic programs. The NCAC schools claimed that granting certain schools multi-divisional status provided those schools with an unfair advantage, both athletically (in terms of attracting better athletes and better facilities) and administratively (regarding the additional administrative personnel Division I programs carry). Had the proposal, Amendment 105, passed (it was soundly defeated on the convention floor), multi-divisional sports programs would be disallowed, meaning the termination of CC's Division I programs.

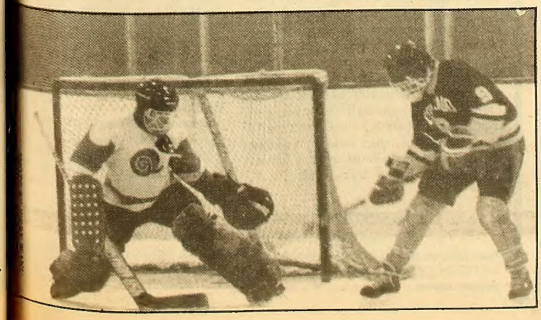
CC Athletic Director Richard Tabor spearheaded the thirteen member multi-divisional Division III school effort to defeat Amendment 105. The opposition began with a letter from Tabor to Division II and III schools before the convention urging those schools to vote against Amendment 105. At the convention, Tabor solicited support from Athletic Directors and School Presidents from around the country to speak on behalf of the Division III schools. CC was directly responsible for soliciting the speech of the President of the University of Wisconsin, a friend from the WCHA.

"Obviously, they [the NCAC Delegates] hadn't done their homework," offered Tabor, citing results from the past five years of Division III national athletic competition. In those five years, 102 Division III athletic championships have been decided in various sports. Of those 102 championships, multi-divisional schools have won only two, while Kenyon College, a member of the NCAC, has won eight itself in men and women's swimming.

Along with refuting the allegations of unfairness, the historical entrenchment of the Division I programs at their respective schools also aided the multi-divisionals' cause. While Division I Hockey has been at CC since 1938, Division I Lacrosse at Johns Hopkins has been an institution in itself for more than a century.

Whether mentioned or merely implied, academic integrity is also a major aspect of the multi-divisional issue. Again, the academic credentials of the schools in question only added to their case. And, as Tabor noted, the Division I athletes CC admits are representative of the differing academic abilities that characterize CC's general student population. "On the hockey team," says Tabor, "we have a guy who is almost a four-point, and we have some guys that are C+ students." So, as long as both NCAA and school requirements are met, Division I sports will continue to be an integral part of the Colorado College athletic program.

DEAN CAMPBELL



Intramural Hockey

A League

1. Civil Disobedience	3-0-0
2. Lake Placid Revisited	2-0-0
3. Upperclassmen for Dinner	1-1-0
4. The Inverted G's	1-3-0
5. Beta Cunning Linquists	0-3-0

B League

1. Dolphins	3-0-0
2. Faculty Snails	3-1-0
3. In Tocus Pocus	2-1-1
4. Disciples of Znus	1-1-1
5. Gerbil Jam	1-1-0
6. Carl Smith & the Sticks	0-3-0
7. Ice Cubes	0-3-0

C League

Division I

1. The Defeskaaters	1-0-1
2. Dean is Dieing	1-0-0
3. Ice Goats	1-2-0
4. No Names	0-0-1
5. Cy & the Family Stoned	0-2-0

Division II

1. Rink Sphincters	2-0-0
2. The Rink Worms	1-0-1
3. The Metrons	1-1-1
4. Herbalife Victims	1-2-0
5. Bush Boys	0-1-0

Division III

1. Ice Hocks	2-0-0
2. Awesome Icers	1-1-1
3. Milk Toast	1-0-0
4. Selective Pressure	1-1-0
5. TK & the Loverboys	0-0-2

Division IV

1. E.M. & the Dang Semis	2-1-0
2. Flintstones	1-0-0
3. Beta Biscuit Eaters	1-1-0
4. Puck Thrusters	0-1-0
5. Slip "N" Slide	0-3-0

Recreational League

Division I

1. King Pucks	2-0-0
2. Kim's Killers	1-1-0
3. Better On Ice	1-1-0
4. Senior Icers	1-1-0
5. Hard Core	1-1-0
6. The Jello Heads	0-2-0

Division II

1. Ice Fall-ies	2-0-1
2. Cosmic Puckheads	1-0-1
3. The Sphincters	1-1-0
4. The "Y" Team	1-2-0
5. $3,000 Refrigerators	0-1-1
6. Rod Squad	0-2-0

Division III

1. Tigers	2-0-0
2. Hockey Team	1-0-1
3. Ground Waste	1-1-0
4. UFO's	1-2-0
5. Puck U	1-2-0
6. The Rosy Palmers	0-1-1

State of the art equipment
for the backcountry connoisseur.

Mountain Chalet
CC's Outdoor Connection
226 N. Tejon
Downtown •633-0732

Dean's Drivel

With America's fall couch potatoes bemoaning the NFL season's close, and the NHL sleepwalking through its customarily insignificant regular season, basketball now assumes its position as the winter's most exciting major sport. Though NBA players often seem as uninterested and complacent as their NHL counterparts, at least there is still the hype and hoopla of the college basketball scene. And of course, the hotly competitive CC Intramural Basketball League (IBL) continues to be one of the Western Hemisphere's best entertainment values.

THE WEST:

Two of the West's best teams squared off in Norman last weekend, with Oklahoma's Sooners Hustling UNLV's Runnin' Rebels by a single point in what is the season's best game to date. These are the region's only remotely legitimate Final Four contenders, with the possible, though doubtful, exception of Kansas. FINAL FOUR: UNLV

THE MIDWEST:

Indiana looks early on to be this region's finest team, but top-ranked Iowa certainly can't easily be argued against. The Hawkeyes, coming off a rousing victory over Purdue in West Lafayette, lead a Bit Ten Conference that claims four of the nation's top ten teams (Iowa, Indiana, Purdue, and Illinois). FINAL FOUR: INDIANA

THE SOUTHEAST:

The picks down South appear to be Clemson, North Carolina and LSU. Clemson, who escaped the Omni with a one point win over Georgia Tech's Yellow Jackets, has now won seventeen straight. ACC rivals North Carolina, after hounding the Wolfpack (NC State, another one point victor at Tech) 74-61, remained tied with the Tigers atop the ACC. And the Bayou Bengals, blowout winners against Kentucky in Lexington, will battle Alabama, Florida and Auburn in the SEC. FINAL FOUR: NORTH CAROLINA

THE EAST:

The East is again stacked with great teams. Georgetown, Syracuse and Temple lead the pack, with St. John's Redmen also challenging. The winner of the Big East should advance to New Orleans. FINAL FOUR: GEORGETOWN

THE REAL AMATEURS:

Phi Slamma Jamma garnered the coveted Intramural Pre-Christmas Tournament, as Ron "Horn Dogs" Warner weaved the length of the floor with three seconds remaining in the 60-58 final victory over Larabeeee. These two teams should meet again in the post-season tournament finals.

FINAL: PHI SLAMMA JAMMA

Photo Special! Every Monday!
coupon
FREE SECOND SET OF PRINTS
Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!
This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon.
Limited time offer.
819
Kodak Colorwatch System
WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!
College Pharmacy
833 North Tejon • 634-4861

Sport Shorts

Football

Senior offensive lineman Bill Young and three teammates from the 1986 Colorado College football team have been named to the Denver Post Colorado Small College All-Star Team announced on December 10.

Young, a 6'1", 270-pound center from Englewood, was selected to the first-team offense. Tiger wide receiver Matt Holmes and place-kicker Mike Ukropina earned second-team offensive honors while linebacker Scotty Robertson made second-team defense.

Young helped CC generate 1,935 rushing yards during the '86 season and 2,742 yards total offense, an average of more than 300 per game. The Tigers recorded their first winning season in five years, going 5-4 in nine outings.

Holmes is a 6'0", 185-pound junior from Littleton. He caught 32 passes last season for 423 yards and six touchdowns. Ukropina, a 6'3", 215-pound sophomore from San Marino, Calif., booted three field goals and connected on 21 of 22 extra-point attempts to finish the campaign with 30 points.

Robertson is a 6'1", 220-pound sophomore from Arvada. He was in on 166 tackles (89 solo with 77 assists) for the season, as well as recovering a fumble and making two interceptions.

Coach Mark Rinehart's downhillers traveled to Crested Butte, where the women finished third and the men sixth in a national qualifying meet against opponents from the Rocky Mountain Collegiate Ski Conference (RMCSC). CC's Michele Fisher (sr., Breckenridge, Colo.) took fourth place individually in the giant slalom and fifth overall, while teammates Julie Miller (soph., Breckenridge, Colo.) and Kim Kepner (soph., Evergreen, Colo.) were sixth and 11th overall, respectively. Teamwise, the women captured third place in the giant slalom and tied for second in the slalom. Western State and Brigham Young tied for first overall. The CC men were led by Jim Grossman (jr., Sun Valley), who took seventh place in the giant slalom and 16th in the slalom. Geoff Craig (fr., Durango, Colo.) was eight in the GS as the Tigers finished sixth as a team in the GS and fourth in the slalom. Colorado College's next scheduled meet is January 31, probably at park West, Utah.

Baseball

C.C. Varsity Baseball Tryouts begin Feb. 2 at 3:30 in the El Pomar turf room. All interested players, especially pitchers should attend.

Men's Club Hock

A newly improved CC men's club team shocked the Air Force Falcons first 25 minutes of play last Saturd

After a 13-2 AFA shellacking of the two teams' last meeting the Falc not take the Tigers too seriously a But after heading to the locker room one goal deficit at half time (the consisted of two 25 minute halves Force Ice), the Falcons changed the plan (and goalie). AFA came back 12-8.

CC scored five times in the firs lead 5-4, with goals by Dave Roe Hurley, Dean French, Wiley Bland first of a pair by Rich Lieberhof. Hurley also chipped in with two as Jerry Wang was between the pip CC and held his own, with defensiv from the Brothers Roe, Kip and Lowe Billingsly and Lieberhof defensive unit thwarted the Falcon limiting the cadets to four goals in 25 minutes.

The Falcons tied the score in t two minutes of the second half exploded for three more goals in th five minutes. This gave Air Fo commanding 9-5 lead over CC.

With 8 minutes left in the gam Tigers applied constant pressure Falcons' net for two and a half m befor Lieberhof pounced on the rebo a Dave Roe backhander for his secon and the Tigers' sixth.

Momentum swung to the Tiger after that goal. Mark Noah took and the puck down the left b connecting with Mark Pankoff in th to narrow the margin to 4 goals at 11 Force matched that goal though mi 12-7 with two minutes left to play.

Pankoff scored again with 33 s left in the game for a final score o

The Tigers will have another cha the cadets in a couple of weeks. For that does not reguarly practice or h coach to assist them, CC has done well in comparison to the Falcons have several recruits, practice eve three coaches, and complete ma uniforms.

This weekend the Tigers, posting record, will host the Colorado Ch semi-pro team from Denver at Hom Palace. Face off will be at 11:15 Sun

It should prove to be an ex weekend as one team member sai have only had one fight this year so due for a brawl."

Women's Club Hock

In the friendly surroundings of Ice Palace, the women's club hock almost posted their second victory season last Saturday. With a 2-1 loss Denver Bandits, the Tigers dropped to 1-5. But things are imp with the addition of a few players and changes in the lineup.

Moving Sarah Meskin from def left wing proved to be a valuable ch she put the sole point on the board Tigers last Saturday. Taking a pa Kathy Mahoney at the red line, broke in alone putting the puck awa upper left corner to tie the game for the Bandits was an ex-CC goalie. ex CC players make up the majority Denver team that last year won the and the April tournament.

Between the pipes for the Tige junior Sarah Turner who anchor defense and was a major factor in t the score close. Turner came up w saves and frustrated Denver's potent offense. Aiding Turner defensive zone was the strong co play of summerstart Martha returning sophomore Chri Chamberlain, rookie Doreen Sm sophomore Gretchen Smith.

The Tigers don't play again u first weekend of February when C CU home on Saturday and the again on Sunday in Denver.

Hoopsters Lose Bitterly

fter three consecutive victories upped r season record to 7-7, the CC men's Basketball Team dropped osts to NAIA opponents Chadron braska) State College and University of thern Colorado last week to drop their rd to 7-9.

n Tuesday, January 20th at El Pomar rts Center, the Lady Tigers dropped a gh battel to USC's Lady-Indians, 60-56. scrapped its way to a 25-23 halftime but USC, led by a combined output of points from Shelly Watts, Debbie Donald and Suzanne Gonzales, shook the rustiness of a one week layoff to ister the victory. CC, suffering from 35% shooting from the field, had only player score in double figures, senior d Kitzie Pettersen with 13.

On Friday, January 16th, also at El Pomar, CC fell to Chadron State's Lady Eagles 75-57. The game was close until the final minutes when Chadron ran off a string of points to put the Lady Tigers away. Kitzie Pettersen again paced the Lady Tigers with 17 points, while Sally Bush and Chris Sanchez chipped in 12 and 11 points, respectively. Pettersen also contributed 7 steals and added 4 assists to the Tiger totals. Mary Perrien and Amy Pandel guided Chadron State with a combined 42 points and 20 rebounds.

CC returns to action this evening in Denver, where they'll face Metropolitan State College's Lady Roadrunners at 5:30.

DEAN CAMPBELL

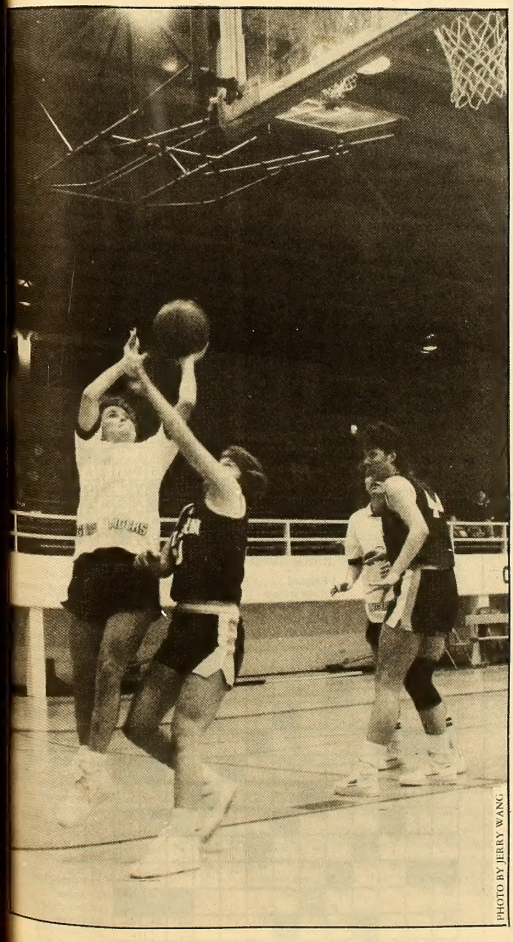

PHOTO BY JERRY WANG

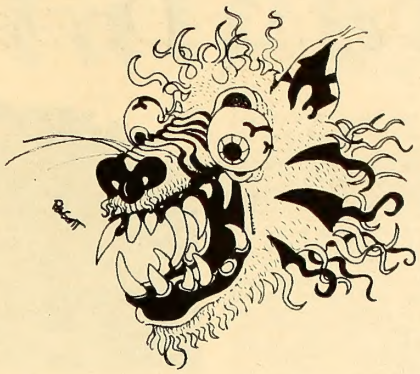
Guard Kitzie Petersen, shown here in action against Chadron State, leads the Tigers in scoring.



Big Cat Swimmers Roll to Second Place Finish

Despite injuries, illnesses, and irresponsibility, the CC men's swim team was fantastic this weekend. The battered Big Cats traveled to Boulder for the 12th annual Intermountain Swimming and Diving League Relays and chalked up their highest finish ever as they blew past rivals Mines, Metro, and C.U. to take 2nd place. Former N.A.I.A. champions D.U. won the meet by a forty point margin, but in the dogfight for 2nd the Tigers again showed that they have more heart than their competition.

Once again, the Big Cat divers led the team in scoring. Juniors Craig Clear and Tom Smith captured CC's only 1st place in the one meter diving and went on to take 2nd in the three meter event. Under the direction of new diving coach Laura Luckett, the diving duo is undeniably becoming one of the leagues toughest competitors.

Yet, while the divers were brilliant, Coach Jerry Lear's swimmers were every bit their equal. Senior Captains Kevin Diffee and Dave Surbeck proved that they are the foundation of the team as they spurred their teammates to four crucial 2nd place finishes and an equal number of 3rds. Diffee, traditionally a breaststroker, showed his versatility when he abandoned his strongest stroke and switched to distance freestyle to fill in for absent team members, while Surbeck turned in some of the fastest splits of the day proving that he and his blinding turns may make him the best sprinter on the team.

The captains, however, were not the only Big Cats to be reckoned with. Tom Shimotake, Doug Hodge, Tom Hackett, Roger Denny, Kent Van Metre, Brandon Sheafor, and Bill Hulings all helped obtain the important 2nd and 3rd place finishes. The new Fresh Cat squad, although missing backstroker Wolfbait Gottschalk due to a shoulder injury, showed their strength. Speedster Jay Lupine, butterflyer Rudder McCauley, and distance specialist John Dorsck all proved their value to the Tigers.

Although this finish is a definite boost for the team, the Big Cats did not celebrate for too long. The team had to sober up quickly to prepare for the upcoming dual meet with C.U. The meet will be held at our own Schlessman pool at 1:00 p.m. this Saturday. There is an excellent chance that CC will take its first victory ever over the Buffs and crowd support can only help. It is your first and best chance to check out what may be the strongest group of Big Cats CC has ever had.

BRANDON SHEAFOR

Snow Drowns CC's Chance at Bears

After a strong second place finish to the Air Force Academy two weeks ago at the CC Invitational Relays, the women's swim team was looking forward to a chance to "prove" themselves Friday in a dual meet against U.N.C. At the relay meet, the Big Cats came out ahead of U.N.C. for the first time in the history of women's swimming at CC. But Alas, the snow that caused the cancellation of classes buried the Big Cat's hopes of topping U.N.C. for a second time, as the meet was also called off. The Tigers had to set their sights instead on Metro for Saturday's tri-meet at the Air Force Academy.

Getting psyched to swim U.N.C., only to have the meet called off, was quite a let down. Knowing the Falcons would win on Saturday but hoping to grab a win over Metro kept the Big Cats psyched to go to the Academy. Upon arrival at the Falcon pool, the swimmers were informed that the Metro team had "opted out" of the competition. Although this made the meet much shorter, the races seemed that much tougher. Diver Beth Olsen won the 3-meter diving event for the only Tiger first place of the day. When asked to sum up the weekend, team members agreed that "Shit, Marge!" was most appropriate.

The women's record is now 1-1 in dual meets, with a 2nd place and 1st place finish in invitational competition. This Saturday, both the men and women host C.U. at Schlessman Pool before heading to California for a block break full of competition (3 meets in 3 days!). So, if you're looking for lotsa skin and lotsa action, head down to Schlessman, Saturday at noon where you're sure to have a good time!! See you there.

Cynthia Surrett

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Apartment to share - beautiful space 1300 blk. Nevada, $150.00/mo. Ask for *Will 635-4279 or 475-7843.

LOST AT TUTT: A small gray pack. Please return to circ. desk lost and found, or call: 632-7468. REWARD!

Wanted, New Master. Well endowed, WSM preferred. (Feeding costs are extreme.) Contact: 635-9929 for info and ask for Opu.

Win friends and influence people!! Make yourself and your views known!!! Submit to The Disparaging Eye and show everybody your knowledge and intelligence. We are looking for enlightened, pragmatic people interested in writing about politics, business, economics or anything else having to do with the real world. For more info. contact Dave Makarechian and/or Brian Smith at x276, or Norm Leahy at 520-9248.

Don't miss Theatre Workshops' A Sample of American Musical Theatre. Friday the 24th and Saturday the 25th, at 8:15 in Armstrong. Free tickets with CCID in Student Center. Way to go Kira, Nina and all!!

Hey You! Win friends, impress girls, pack your resume. If you would like to write for the Catalyst—and who wouldn't?—come down to the Catalyst office for an informal meeting Monday night at 7:00.

ANYONE WHO INVESTED participated last spring in preparation The Grounds coffeehouse and would refund or to help decide what to do the rest of the money, please call 632-9910.

Who was the only NFL team to beat the Donkeys and the Giants this season The Seattle Seahawks! You know it hee titter titter. Get off me...

83 Honda Accord LX, like new. A/C PS AM-FM cassette stereo. Michelins. 633-3842.

Food, prizes for Dialogue participants. Sign up now in Taylor and major dorms for phone-a-thon on Feb. 3, 4, 5 and 10, 11, 12. Dialogue will occur in Tutt Alumni House 5-10 pm.

Attn X-C Skiers! ORC wants your X-C ski equipment. If you want to sell, call x766 M-W-F 1-4 pm.

In Search of Monkeyman. Shake my tree you hoary ape, before the 'nanas fall in brown splotchy disregard. Kiss me fool. Bow wow.

January 27th — MEDITATION—SHOVE CHAPEL 8:00-8:30 a.m. Music, silence, mystical and/or other writings (enter by northeast door)

January 27th—Shove Chapel - 4:00 p.m. Extra curricular studies in the letter to the Ephesians and some of the religious poetry of T.S. Eliot.

PIZZA SHUTTLE
Where The Pizza Is Out Of This World

Feed Your Super Bowl Crowd
With A Super Deal

$4.00 Pizza!

That's Right!
Get a 14"
Single Topping Pizza
For Only $4.00
Just Call

578-8686

Thick Crust Only 50¢
Extra With This Special

Please phone an hour ahead for orders of more than 10 Pizzas

Special May Expire Anytime

The Gemini Program
Two Pizza For One Low Price
Two 10" Cheese Pizzas Only 5.89
Two 14" Cheese Pizzas Only 8.89

Single Pizza Prices:	12"	16"
Cheese	5.00	7.20
1 Topping	5.75	8.30
Additional Toppings	.75	1.10

PIZZA SHUTTLE Guarantees To Deliver Your Pizza Within 30 Minutes Or You Get $3.00 Off Your Order.*

Open Daily At 11:00

*Road & Traffic Conditions Permitting

Our Drivers Carry Less Than $20 Tax Not Included

ARE YOU A SENIOR STUDENT
INTERESTED IN SPRING SEMESTER
CAMPUS INTERVIEWS?
IF SO, YOU MUST FIRST ATTEND THREE PROGRAMS:
Using The Placement Service • Resume Writing
Interviewing Skills
Phone the Career Center for program dates (ext. 426)

Mock Interview Day, February 3rd
Interviews begin February 5th

THE CAREER CENTER
Ticknor Hall, South 473-2233, ext. 426

Hertz ®
You don't just rent a car. You rent a company.

Call for Weekend Rate and Eligibility

315 N. Weber
473-2444
8-6 Mon-Sat
Appointments possible at any other time

5% discount with Ad

The Puzzle

ACROSS

1 Insect
5 Winter precipitation
9 For what reason
12 Japanese aborigine
13 Drink heavily
14 Regret
15 Sparkling
17 Attending
18 Cloth measure
19 Animal coat
21 Bog down
23 Cavalrymen
27 Kind of type: abbr.
28 Quadruped
29 Sweet potato
31 Chapeau
34 Spanish article
35 Antlered animal
37 Obscure
39 As far as 40 Recent
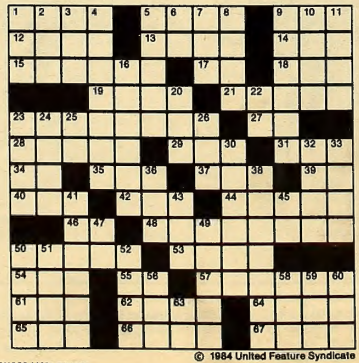
42 Stitch
44 Cupolas
46 That man
48 Unnecessary
50 Rays
53 Small valley
54 Everyone
55 Behold!
57 Tried
61 Stalemate
62 Poker stake
64 Heavy volume
65 Possesses
66 Average
67 Stupefy

DOWN

1 Existed
2 River island
3 Nahoor sheep
4 Intention
5 Fashion
6 Japanese drama
7 New Deal agency: init.
8 Dampens
9 Garland
10 Body of a vessel
11 Shout
16 Repulses
20 Attempt
22 Agave plant
23 At that time
24 Part in play
25 Either
26 Mournful
30 Center
32 The sweetsop
33 Hurl
36 Range of knowledge
38 Meddles with unwarrantably
41 Large sea mammals
43 Marry
45 Coroner: abbr.
47 Printer's measure
49 Consumed
50 Trail
51 Lamb's pen name
52 Bridge term
56 Single
58 Small child
59 Large bird
60 Lair
63 Symbol for tantalum

S	H	E	■	S	C	■	A	W	A	R	E
P	O	M	M	E	L	■	D	E	L	P	T
O	N	■	S	T	A	N	D	■	T	E	A
T	E	A	■	E	W	E	R	■	O	D	■
■	■	■	P	R	E	S	S	E	S	■	S
H	A	T	E	■	■	T	S	A	R	■	O
E	N	■	A	G	E	■	S	T	Y	■	G
A	T	■	P	A	L	E	■	■	O	D	O
P	A	C	■	S	E	R	R	A	T	E	■
■	■	R	A	■	V	I	E	D	■	W	A
A	P	A	R	■	A	S	P	E	N	■	O
D	E	F	E	A	T	■	A	P	O	L	L
■	S	T	A	L	E	■	Y	T	■	A	S

answer to last week's puzzle



© 1984 United Feature Syndicate

COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 6 February, 1987 Volume 21 Number 3

Finley Named New Dean

Political science professor, David Finley, will succeed Glenn Brooks as the Dean of the College. Gresham Riley announced his selection at the monthly faculty meeting on January 26. Finley will assume his role as Dean in September.

Glenn Brooks, who has been Dean for the past eight years, will return to teach in the political science department at CC after a year long sabbatical. During his year away, he will explore the geopolitics of the third world through research and travel. He plans to return in 1988-9 with an enriched knowledge of developing areas such as Africa, Latin and Central America and Southeast Asia.

Following Brooks announcement that he was stepping down from the position in November 17, Riley announced that he would choose a successor from within the faculty.

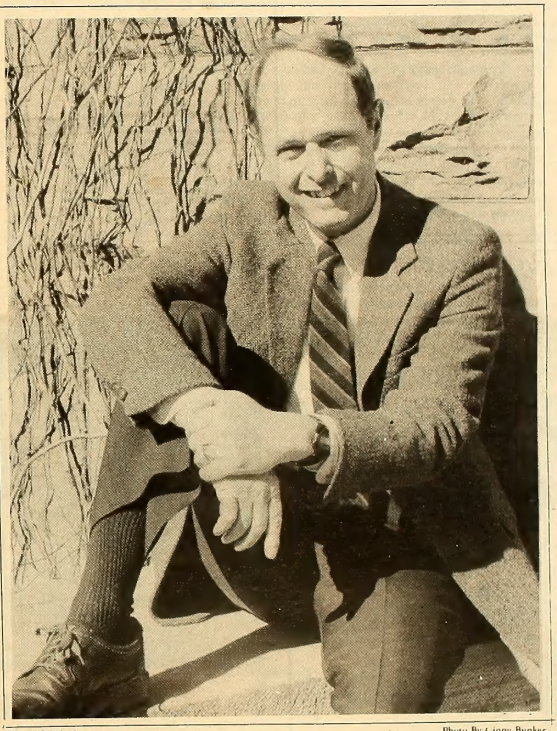
The Dean of the Colllege serves as the chief academic officer of the college, overseeing such areas as the academic program, the curriculum, and the faculty. One of the primary roles that the Dean performs with regard to the faculty, is the recruitment and hiring of new faculty candidates. In addition, the Dean makes recommendations to the President regarding appointments, promotions, tenure, and salary raises for current faculty members.

Riley selected David Finley as the new Dean after consulting with various committees, including the Committee on Committees, the Women's Concerns Committee and the Minorities' Concerns Committee.

Citing some of the qualities which he looked for in a new Dean, Riley stressed the importance of a "non-special interest candidate." He underscored the need for the Dean to be someone whose views would mesh with Riley's current agenda for the College, but also pointed out that the Dean would have to be a good spokesperson for the faculty, representing their broad and varied interests.

Riley communicated with 45-50% of the faculty as he considered potential candidates for the new position. Many of those who advised him stressed the importance of the new Dean in maintaining the current momentum in the reshaping of the Academic Program. Riley searched for a candidate who would provide leadership for using the resources generated by the aggressive new Capital Campaign. He wanted the Dean to have an understanding and appreciation of the "material resources" which could provide the source for strengthening the faculty and the college as a whole.

"David Finley has the ideal credentials for this appointment," Riley noted of the incoming dean. "He has been an outstanding teacher, a creative scholar with regard to Soviet-American relations and Soviet foreign policy, and has received valuable experience as chair of the political science department and as a member of all major faculty committees."



David Finley

Photo By Ginny Bunker

Finley responded to the selection saying, "I am proud and happy to be a member of this faculty. I have every confidence that with continued commitment and energy, we will continue our effort toward pre-eminence in American undergraduate liberal arts education."

"The central purpose of Colorado College," he continued, "is to provide the best teaching for undergraduates in the traditional liberal arts and I will do my best to keep that commitment central."

Finley admitted that "the challenge to fill Glenn Brook's shoes is a daunting one." He believes that "the College is on the course for realizing its aspiration to be one of the best liberal arts institutions around."

"The ongoing capital campaign is producing resources which will allow the college to do things it has been unable to do in the past," Finley noted. "I am eager to be helpful to the Colorado College in taking advantage of such opportunities."

Finley is a tenured full professor of political science and chaired that department from 1981-1985. He received his bachelor of science degree from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, in 1955. He then received an M.A. degree in political science from Stanford University in 1961. In 1966 he received his Ph.D. in political science from Stanford.

Among the grants and fellowships he has received are: an Associated Colleges of the Midwest grant for research travel, to Costa Rica and Nicaragua; two Colorado College Faculty Development grants, for travel and research in Eastern Europe and Asia; the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace travel and maintenance grant, for research on East-West European relations; and a Social Science Foundation research grant for travel and research in the Soviet Union.

KATIE KERWIN WITH ASSISTANCE FROM JOE BARBER

Dialing For Dollars

For the tenth year now, CC students have an opportunity to participate in alumni fundraising through a program called DIALogue. The money earned through DIALogue pays for the educational costs that tuition doesn't. The program was founded by Barbara Yalich who is now the director of development here at CC, the program is presently under the direction of Artie Kensinger. DIALogue was held February 3rd, 4th and 5th and will continue on the 10th, 11th and 12th. All sessions run from 5-10 p.m.

About four hundred students have volunteered to participate. Students work in two and a half hour shifts. Jobs consist of calling alumni who have donated in past years and requesting further financial support. Students try to select alumni who participated in similar activities as themselves. For students who prefer not to call but would like to help out many secretarial type jobs are available. While volunteers work they can enjoy food donated by local chains such as McDonald's and Pizza Hut. As well as getting plenty of munchies, door prizes donated by local businesses are awarded to student workers.

For every hour a student works he or she earns twelve points that will later be used to bid for more prizes. If a student is participating in DIALogue through a group such as a dorm wing or fraternity he or she will earn twelve points for him or herself as well as for the group for every hour he or she works. The auction for prizes will be held on February 18th at 7:00 p.m. in the Hub. A professional auctioneer and CC alumn, Ray Holt has volunteered to host the auction.

Overall, the program works out well for

Continued on pg. 3

INSIDE

Tim Fitzgerald's South African Saga

Page 2

Hendrickson Lets Carter Off The Hook

Page 7

Comparative Lit Major Rocks CC

Page 9

Filmmaker Miller Hits Big Time

Page 15

Hockey Plumbs The Depths

Page 18

What's News?

This past February 2, the Central Intelligence Agency Director William J. Casey resigned from his post for health reasons. He is still recovering from a December 15 surgery that removed a brain tumor. Reacting quickly, President Reagan nominated agency career man Robert M. Gates, and most anticipate his Senate confirmation later this month.

During Mr. Casey's six-year tenure, the Agency was no stranger to controversy, finding criticism in several actions including the mining of a Nicaraguan harbor, and the more recent possible involvement of CIA agents in the Iran/Contra affair. Casey, who headed the OSS secret intelligence for Europe during World War II, often used covert methods similiar to his war experiences. Some critics have gone as far to say that Casey's CIA has run the war in Nicaragua. With a career rooted in intelligence analysis, Gates will rely less on covert "military" means and more on intelligence information to conduct operations.

This possible change in methodology prompts the question of what the CIA's intended role is, and by what means the Agency should enforce that role. Should it be merely a bureaucratic organization concerned with national security through domestic operations, or should such concerns also include the activities of foreign nations? Historically the latter has been the case, though the justification for such priorities should not then go unquestioned.

Questioning the Issues

If one accepts the need for such foreign investigation, where should the boundaries of such activities be drawn? Should limits be set at intelligence analysis only, or should they allow covert operations? Does the use of covert military operations fall under the jurisdiction of the 1973 War Powers Act limiting the use of military force by the President without Congressional consent? This remains unclear.

It appears as though the Agency has a fair degree of autonomy from the people, inclosed within a complex Executive Branch bureaucracy. This raises the question: to what degree do we want the CIA to be representative of the voter? Shall the national election act as a mandate allowing the CIA, under Presidential and Congressional discretion, to perform at will? Such discretion has historically varied depending on the Agency Director's candor. Should the degree of such discretion by representative officials be more clearly defined?

As the budgetary strength of the CIA is considerable, it becomes even more important to decide what role such an institution should play. Furthermore, a 40-year tenure does not give such an Agency a position without question in our political system. As the Agency adjusts to new leadership, its role, resources and very existence should undergo the same questions and analysis it espouses.

NEWS EDITORS

Colorado Director Lives Wildlife

Colorado Division of Wildlife Director James Ruch discussed "fish, wildlife, and the Development of Natural Resources — The Future of the Southwest" at a luncheon address Tuesday, February 3, at the Satellite Hotel in Colorado Springs.

"My concern for Colorado and the Southwest is how man will co-exist with the natural environment in the future. What will be the state of our economic resources and quality of life by the year 2020?," Ruch questioned.

Ruch categorized his speech around natural resource issues that face Southwest Citizens and the environment in which they live. "Categorization proves difficult, however, because so many of these issues are related," he added.

"Take water. We live in a desert. Water's importance is total — It's driven the way that we've developed as a society. Lately we've experienced good water years, three wet seasons in a row. How to deal with water during dry years — that's an environmental concern."

Ruch addressed energy and mineral resources in the Southwest and how the development of such resources affects natural habitat for fish and wildlife as well as local and regional economics.

Toxic Waste is growing as a western issue. There's going to be a lot of conflict. Where will we put the stuff? How will we protect our water? How will we protect ourselves?"

"Investment has so much to do with these issues," Ruch stated. "People sink money into water rights or mining and expect to make a quick buck. An investment means more than making money. We've got to worry about the future — how our actions will affect land around us."

Ruch also spoke about agriculture and problems in the Southwest. He mentioned that Southwest livestock provides less than 3% of total American food." Farmers have worked their land for generations, selling out and moving to Front Range cities," Ruch added.

"In general, big cities are outcompeting rural areas. We have to find a way to keep these areas liveable," Ruch said.

"Hunting and fishing certainly helped many of these small town economies." "It's not just battin' rabbits in the woods anymore — We're talking big business. These hunters buy Jack Daniels, they buy guns, fishing rods, they stay in Colorado hotels and buy food in Colorado restaurants. The Hunting and Fishing industry brought over $1 billion dollars to Colorado last year.

In the supervision of Colorado fish and wildlife, Ruch sees his mission as two-fold. "We've got to maintain wildlife for the hunters and fishermen but must also protect these animals as members of the ecosystems."

"It's all going to take cooperation," Ruch says. "We've changed the Southwest in so many ways. Look at the abomination that is now Los Angeles. Fifty years ago it may have been one of the fairest places in the world."

"And now look at the Front Range and our water and air problems. These are problems we have to confront. If we don't pay to correct our mistakes now, our children will pay alot more later."

ALEC REKO

Watson Fellow Returns

"Do you want us to send white boys to kill other white boys to save the niggers?," quoted Tim Fitzgerald from a statement made by a former campaign manager for a prominent U.S. Republican Senator.

Tim Fitzgerald, a Watson Fellow and a 1985 CC grad, shared his experiences as a reporter in South Africa with an audience of 30 on Jan. 22nd in the Loomis Lounge. The lecture was sponsored by the Political Science Advisory Council. One of Fitzgerald's first challenges upon arriving in South Africa was to learn what he was allowed to write and what was forbidden by the South African Government Press Restrictions. "Beware, because the flow of information is very restricted," Fitzgerald siad. He explained that what journalists must attempt to do under such a repressive regime, is to survive, while simultaneously communicating vital information within the constraints of the government. Obviously this is not an easy task since almost all prominent black leaders cannot be quoted as they are 'banned people.' Many foreign magazines that manage to arrive in the country are strictly censored before they are distributed. 'Liberal' journalists are under psychological pressure because "anything you write can be considered subversive," said Tim. "The secret police can call you up, threaten you, open all your mail, and even come to your house without a warrant. They always come in the Newspaper office with big guns, and we would wonder who they were coming for this time...Sometimes I would wake up at night scared, not even knowing why..."

Asked about the Black leaders, Tim said that Bishop Desmond Tutu, the Nobel Peace Prize laureate, is not the leader that Americans perceive him to be. "He is an Americanized leader, and most blacks identify more with the A.N.C.," he said, and this is why the release of Nelson Mandela, who is still popular among black children, after more than two decades in jail, would be very important. His release would lead to the unification of blacks which the South African government seeks to prevent. Israel is an important accomplice to the Apartheid regime. Fitzgerald said that "there is no question that South Africa and Israel are allies," for there is clear evidence that Israel provides South Africa with atomic technology among other things, and even trains all South African pilots.

Fitzgerald believes that eventually there will be a South Africa without Apartheid, as a civil war is already under way. "The white children starting at age seven are equipped with weapons and they are

Continued on pg. 5

the Stagecoach Inn®
702 Manitou Avenue

On Fountain Creek
in Manitou Springs

An Elegant Treat for your Special
Valentine

Valentine
Dinner
Sat. 5 - 9:30

Sunday
Sweetheart
Brunch
10:30 - 2:00

Reservations 685-9335
Banquet Facilities
On All Occasions

OFFICE WITH A VIEW

The Peace Corps is an exhilarating two year experience that will last a lifetime.

Working at a professional level that ordinarily might take years of apprenticeship back home, volunteers find the career growth they're looking for and enjoy a unique experience in the developing world.

International firms and government agencies value the skills and knowledge mastered during Peace Corps service.

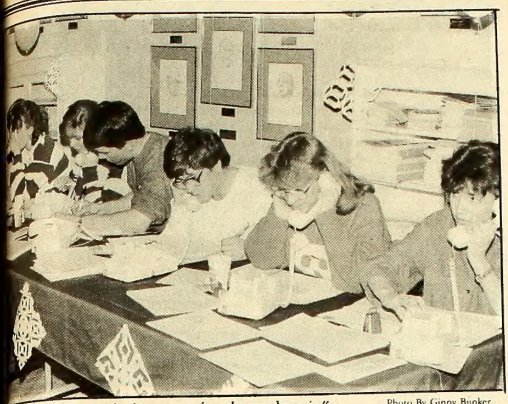
INFORMATION TABLE:
Feb. 16 - 18, Armstrong Hall (Great Hall), 9 am - 3 pm

FILM SEMINAR:
Feb. 17 at 7 pm, Armstrong Hall #353

INTERVIEWS:
March 3

For more information call collect to the Denver Peace Corps Office at 866-1057, ext. 165.

Peace Corps
The Toughest Job You'll Ever Love.



"But Dr. Ruth, that's the way we've always done it." Photo By Ginny Bunker

Tutt: Hockey, Investments and Colorado Springs

"I worked like hell at everything," said William Thayer Tutt when asked how he had managed to be so successful in so many endeavors, ranging from turning "CC into a formidable hockey pool" to being chiefly responsible for bringing the Olympic Hall of Fame to the city. The founder and director of the El Pomar Foundation addressed three topics: hockey, investments and the growth of Colorado Springs, in a luncheon sponsored by the Investments Club. The February 3rd discussion was held in Cossit C.

"This room is very nostalgic to me, because it was here in 1934 that a CC organization formed to provide scholarships for a good hockey team," said Tutt. The team that that body built went on to win the national championships in that decade and the respect of competitive teams around the nation. Tutt has been active in the building of the hockey rink at the Broadmoor and in providing the city with greater competition facilities for the sport. Also influential on the national level, Tutt has served as chairman of the national team and is now the honorary president of the same committee. "Your school has great tradition in that sport. CC has always had the team spirit, and to me, it started right here in this room in 1934," he concluded.

"When you're in the investment business, you have to have the competence to sell the stocks and to warn the client when to get out. That's the problem with the business today," said the former broker. He opened his first office, the Boettcher Financial Company, in the thirties here in the Springs. He described it as being a "little office with a secretary."

Continued on pg. 5

DIALogue Continued from pg. 1

oth students and the school. The program as proven very profitable in the past and lows students to enjoy being involved in important CC function as well as rtaking in the free food and prizes. Jan lark, secretary to Artie Kensinger xplains, "We really make it fun for tudents." Anne Doud, a student chairman DIALogue, feels that fundraising has one very well so far and is optimistic bout reaching their goal of $110,000. Students who are interested in DIALogue, but never got around to signing p can still participate by showing up on e 10th, 11th or 12th. Jan Clark mphasizes, "We can always use more olunteers!"

MARGO LEVI

Josh & John's

DELIVERS
ICE CREAM
Starting TONIGHT
632-0299

75¢ delivery fee • delivery on the hour • 1 qt minimum
11 am - MIDNIGHT

LATE NIGHT SPECIAL!
One 12" two topping pizza
for only $4.99 plus tax!
(After 9 pm)

Now from Domino's Pizza, it's the late night special. Any night of the week beginning at 9pm, you can get a 12", 2-topping pizza for only $4.99! (tax not included) Just $4.99 for a fresh, custom-made, 2-topping pizza delivered hot to your door in 30 minutes or less—guaranteed! So when you get the late night hungries—no problem! Just call Domino's Pizza. One call does it all to make your late night special. Offer expires February 28, 1987.

We accept checks.
Prices do not include tax.
Our drivers carry less than $20.00.

All Pizzas Include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.

Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95

Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers,
Extra Cheese (1 item)
Double Cheese (2 items)
Thick Crust, Extra Sauce
Each Item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19

$3
If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes, present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off that order—right then.
For safety reasons, if roads are icy, snowpacked, or flooded, please add 15 minutes to our guarantee.
One coupon per pizza.
30 minute guarantee good with any offer.
Fast, Free Delivery™
Good at listed locations.
DOMINO'S PIZZA®

Coke Classic® 12 oz. cans
Coca-Cola Classic

©1986 Domino's Pizza, Inc.

$4.99
Order a 12" two-topping pizza for only $4.99 from 9 pm until closing, any night of the week!
Offer expires February 28, 1987.
No coupon necessary.
Fast, Free Delivery™
Good at listed locations.
DOMINO'S PIZZA®

TWO 12" PIZZAS FOR $9.14
ONE TOPPING
(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.

One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!
For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same!), and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings

Two 12" pizzas for the price of one 16" pizza!

Superb Cheese	$7.95
1 topping	$9.14
2 toppings	$10.33
3 toppings	$11.52
4 toppings	$12.71
5 toppings	$13.90
6 toppings	$15.09

Twice the pizza for one-low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minute or less, GUARANTEED!
Offer may expire anytime

635-1511

Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.

Limited delivery area.

Fernandez Speaks on Modern Cuba

On Tuesday, February 3rd, Damian Fernandez, a new political science professor at CC with a PhD in political science from the U of Miami, gave a talk on what has been happening in Cuba since the 1959 revolution which brought down the dictator Fulgenao Batista and installed Fidel Castro in power.

Professor Fernandez started his talk by pointing out that the Cuban revolution was a popular revolution, widely supported throughout Cuba, involving many different groups and led by the upper-middle class. Fidel Castro, fighting in the mountains around Havana, had declared before the revolution that once Batista was overthrown, he would institute the 1940 constitution, which called for free elections and democratic reform. But in a 1961 speech on the eve of the Bay of Pigs invasion, broadcast over Cuban television, Castro announced that "We are Marxist-Leninists." At his point many Cubans who had supported the revolution until then fled the country, including much of the professional class.

The period between 1961-1968 was a very hard time for Cubans. The U.S. had embargoed all trade with the island, and the U.S.S.R. was not yet providing financial aid to Cuba because of a difference in tactics: the Soviets favored spreading socialism in Latin-America through the democratic election of communist parties while Castro thought that armed struggle was the way to effect change. But in 1968 the Soviet Union invaded Czechoslovakia; Castro announced his support for the invasion and along with a promise to avoid armed struggle in Latin-America, won the support of the Soviets.

During this same period, Castro consolidated his personal power and that of the revolutionary elite, revealing his ideological proclivity toward centralized power, social change through revolution, controlled participation (that is, through official channels) and anti-Americanism. By this time, Castro was firmly established in power with the army and the Communist party playing an increasingly larger part in Cuban life.

Through the years 1975-1979, the revolution became institutionalized and Cuba enjoyed the fruits of the revolution in the form of increased international prestige. Castro was the acknowledged third-world head of Soviet internationalism and there were—and still are—40,000 Cuban soldiers, doctors and teachers worldwide. Cuba was a role model for many third-world countries.

However, in 1979, things started to go downhill. Castro declared his support for the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the only member of the non-aligned nations movement to do so. This act caused a great loss in prestige for Cuba among the international community. Within Cuba there were a great number of changes; Professor Fernandez termed the period from 1979 to the present the "schizophrenic years" because Castro experimented with programs, liberalizing the economy and easing up immigration to and from the U.S., but then abruptly shut them down. And while the socialist government had provided significant improvements in health care and education, the economy was a mess. The land reform initiated after the revolution had not worked out; the joint ownership of the land provided no incentive for production. Overtures were made to improve relations with the U.S., but when President Reagan initiated broadcasts to Cuba over Radio Marti, those attempts at reconciliation failed.

Cuba in the 1980's faces many problems: A faltering economy overly dependent on sugarcane and aid from the U.S.S.R., which provides Cuba with 4.5 billion dollars a year. The Soviets can no longer afford this and are pushing for greater economic austerity and efficiency. There is declining support for the revolution among the population. Cuban society is becoming increasingly militarized; there are 30,000 Cuban soldiers in Angola, the war there is not going well and Cuba has no jobs for them at home. Fidel Castro is over 60 and there is no one to replace him that is charismatic and well-liked. Cuban attempts at fostering socialism in Latin-America and the Caribbean basin have suffered grave setbacks in Grenada and Nicaragua. At the same time, Cuba is no longer the role model for Latin-American countries that it once was. As strong, charismatic and democratic leaders have appeared in South America such as Raul Alfonsin in Argentina or Alan Garcia in Peru. In response to this, Castro has tried to coordinate Latin-American solidarity in the form of a debtors cartel and urged other Latin-American countries not to pay their foreign debt (Professor Fernandez observed that Cuba does pay her debts to Western creditors and on time). At home Castro has tried to augment his popularity with new social policies and has issued a book on his religious views, Fidel ... Religion.

At the end of the talk, Profes... Fernandez held a question and ans... period. In response to one question ... whether or not he favored open U.S.-C... relations, he replied that he did because ... interchange of people and informa... would make it more difficult to main... a totalitarian government in C...

MARK LARHE...

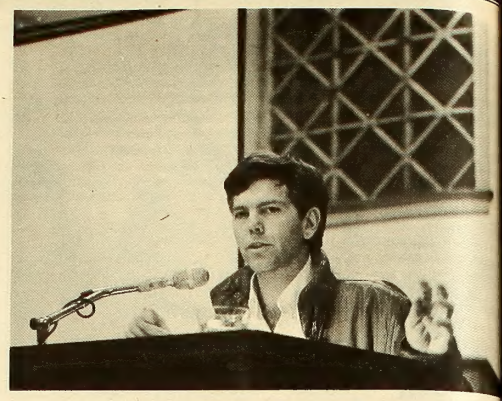

Photo By Anne Basing

ENACT sponsored speaker Randy Hayes discussing Rain Forest management.

ENACT Speaker Concerned About Rain forests

On Tuesday night in a packed Gates Common Room, ENACT sponsored speaker Randy Hayes, director or the Rainforest Action Network. Hayes presented his ideas, supplemented with slides, of the importance of the rainforest and strategies to prevent its destruction.

Half of the world's life subsides in rainforest. What was once 14% of all land mass has decreased to a mere 7%. Hayes stressed that the destruction of the rainforest is the ecological issue of our time, similar in magnitude to the urgent nuclear issue.

One of his slides illustrated the buttress root system found in the rainforest. These buttress roots stem from above the top soil and contain 70% of the required nutrients within themselves. The soil is relatively weak in nutritional value. Therefore in a slash and burn situation, destroying the vegetation also removes the majority of the nutrients. This deforestation process in non-reversable, once the extraction of the forest and its nutrients occurs, it is gone. Although the use of reforestation is common as a possible solution to the rapid loss of total acreage, Hayes claims it to be a joke and ineffective.

Hayes emphasized that the U.S. has responsibilities for its rainforests in the Trust Territories like Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, and the Pacific Isla... Commercial logging in Puerto Rico ... wood chopping for fuel in Hawaii ma... such responsibilities. U.S. involvement ... been considerable. Congress passed th... bills in favor of the rainforest, and ... World Bank, 20% of whose funds co... from U.S. whose tax dollars also cont... much of the development in rainfo... regions. Hayes further stressed, howe... that the loans for development given ... the Bank often create near-sigh... destruction of the rainforests. H... provided a slide to illustrate ... dissatisfaction with the World Bank. T... two story banner presented to the ann... September World Bank organizatio... meeting at the international headquart... in Washington D.C. stated the "Wo... Bank destroys tropical rainforests."

Hayes felt that a grassroots movem... to monopolize the government's ability ... better care for these forests is q... feasible. Energetic student response to ... lecture sparked the creation of a Rainfor... Action Group. Anyone interested in th... group is welcome to attend a meeting o... Wednesday, February 11, at 7:30, follow... the ENACT meeting, in the ENACT offi... in Mathias.

ANNIVERSARY SALE
1st Anniversary at our Southgate store!

Perms • Perms • Perms
Any Perm
$18.95
*complete
*includes shampoo, cut and style
(Save up to $24.00!)
(Reg. $19.95 - $42.95)
20% Off All Other Services
(with ad)
Expires 2/28/87
coupon

NO APPOINTMENT NECESSARY
GREAT EXPECTATIONS
PRECISION HAIRCUTTERS
6 Southgate Road (Southgate Mall) 520-9957
Mon. -Fri. 8-7
Sat. 8-5
Sun. 11-5
Family Hair Care with the Personal Touch

	Regular Price	Your Price
Shampoo, Cut & Blow Dry....	10.95	8.75
Shampoo & Cut.....	6.95	5.55
Just-A-Cut.....	5.95	4.75
Colorings.....(from)	24.95	19.95

the Date Bar a Restaurant
Serving UNIQUE HOMEMADE RECIPES
10% off with CC ID
Serving Breakfast & Lunch
Mon.-Sat.
7 am - 4 pm
24 E. Kiowa
578-5693

Continued from pg. 3

rt
the subtopic of securities, Tutt ained that they are dependent on tax Giving some insight, he said, unicipal bonds are going to be a new aking again, especially since they are tax mpt." "It's a big gamble," he said, rning to the business. He pointed to ous pre-war financing his company ed with aircrafts as examples. "Some ed, others didn't." On the new taker trend, he commented, "It's a big dache to direct bought companies."
mentioned the problems of getting se already running it" to be loyal to the owners while "they're stuffing their kets." Too, there is the problem of ng off existing debts of the bought panies. "A lot of times, you [the new ner] can't handle them, and you have to them," he said.
Colorado Springs has a great future," inued Tutt in his reference to the wth of the city. The only problem lies h the lagging downtown, which he said also take off in time. He informed the dience of new buildings that will come to Antlers site, bringing with them the siness that will eventually turn it into a siness center. The limitations are few in eyes. "The water port is pretty much at od, and we sold our [the Foundation's] ter system to the city for that purpose."
d since there is "so much land," the eatest in resource development is great.
When asked what the Foundation does, said, "It gives away money" earned m the dividends of its many stocks. To , the organization has given $80 illion to many beneficiaries in the state, being the greatest recipient.

AKLILU DUNLAP

nny Weiskopf Photo By Anne Basting

influential Tutt.

Black Awareness Month Celebration

The month of February is Black Awareness Month, and the Black Student Union, as it has in the past, has planned a week of events it believes will be of interest to all members of the CC community. The week of celebration begins with a workshop on African, Caribbean, and Brazilian precussion instruments, and ends with an all campus Third World Dinner on Sunday, February 22nd.

The schedule for the week is:

Feb. 12—Thursday-at-Eleven, Packard Hall: Drum Workshop
Feb. 13—Lecture/Slideshow "Blacks in Film" Donald Bogle, Gates Common Room, 7:30 p.m.
Feb. 15—Elizabeth Sobewko Lecture, "S.A. Students in Tanzania," 7:30 p.m., Gates Common Room
Feb. 16—Dr. Portia Maultsby, "Black Popular Music and Consciousness," Gates Common Room, 7:30 p.m.
Feb. 18—Black Poetry, Armstrong 39, Downstairs, 7:30 p.m., Readings by BSU members
Feb. 19—Lu Palmer of the Urban Studies Program: Gates Common Room, 7:30 p.m.
Feb. 21—Laura Partridge-Nedds, "Celebrating Black Womanhood," Cossitt 'C,' 7:30 p.m.
Feb. 22—Third World Dinner, Bemis Lounge, 7:00 p.m.

We hope you will come and join in our celebration.

Sindi Medar-Gould, President
Black Student Union

Fitzgerald

Continued from pg. 2

trained in how to shoot them," said Fitzgerald. He once covered a right wing rally and said "it reminds you of Nazi Germany." They believe that they were not colonizers and that it is their God that has given them the right to rule the country and to make blacks their servants.

Fitzgerald concluded saying that, "In South Africa the dream of peace has been destroyed by those who dream awake. Now the struggle is being won by a powerful nightmare which haunts even the daylight." He asked, "with whom are we constructively engaging? Whose side are we on before the shooting starts?" He said, "Gestures and symbols are very important, because there is not much else for the moment. Imposing sanctions is the only legitimate weapon of disapproval at our disposal. I believe that disinvestment is a good start."

PASCAL GASIRABO

Photo of the Week

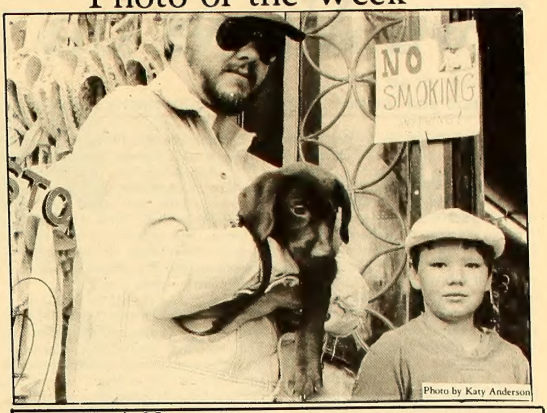

Photo by Katy Anderson

President's Notes

CCCA meets the first and third Mondays of each block at 3:30 in AH 259. The meetings are open to anyone.

The Big Picture:

CCCA remains involved in the eight-block year plan discussion. In the near future, we will solicit student opinions about the plan. We then may hold a referendum or conduct a student poll. The data collected will be presented to the Board of Trustees before their next meeting. Alumni representatives have contacted the CCCA and are interested in adding their opinions to the discussion.

CCCA looks forward (like everyone else) to the completion of the Worner Center for next year. The center will be a focal point for campus, and will have space for CCCA and other student organizations. CCCA will be ready to assign space to other organizations and to keep things coordinated and running well.

CCCA is supporting DIALogue both financially and with volunteers from the council.

The Week's Budget Items:

Student/Alumni Association—All-Campus Talent Show—Packard—3/20-21 Funding: $311
Black Student Union—Events for Black History Month—begins 2/12 Funding: $2175
Nuclear Action Coalition—Speaker—Gates 2/10 Funding: $111
Native American Student Association—Big Mountain Information and Fund-Raiser/Dance—Cossitt—2/13 Funding: $352
International Students Organization—Peruvian Dinner—Spanish House—2/12 Funding: $150
International Students Organization—"Carnaval"—Loomis Lower Lounge—2/6 Funding: $90
Russian House—USSR Workshop Advertising Funds—Gates—3/4 Funding $50

JON-MARC PATTERSON

THE ANTLERS HOTEL
Colorado Springs, Colorado

Picture yourself at The Antlers Hotel for graduation.
Colorado Springs' finest...for only $60!

The Antlers...Colorado Springs only Four-Star, Four-Diamond hotel, located just nine blocks south of The Colorado College, has a special offer for families and friends of graduating students.

- Single or double occupancy room rate of only $60
- A portrait of graduate and family, compliments of The Antlers
- Complimentary valet parking

Call Cynthia at The Antlers for reservations...we'll make this special event picture perfect!

4 S. Cascade Avenue
Chase Stone Center
Colorado Springs,
Colorado 80903
(303) 473-5600
(800) 232-2323
Operated by The Broadmoor Management Company

© 1987, The Antlers

Graduating Students

If you haven't found your career yet, you're probably asking these questions. What can I do with my knowledge and training? Where can I best invest my talents and abilities? Where can I continue to grow in education and experience?

We think we can provide pertinent answers to these questions. That's why we're inviting you to explore joining a small and extraordinarily talented group of American men and women.

They're the professionals of the Central Intelligence Agency . . . operations officers dedicated to obtaining information of vital importance to our country.

Your rewards will be unique . . . superb education and training . . . overseas assignments that call on the deepest resources of your intelligence, knowledge, and responsibility . . . the opportunity to make truly meaningful contributions, for your benefit and the nation's. U.S. citizenship required (self and spouse).

We place high value on your academic training and experience. If you want the facts on a unique career, contact your College Placement Office, or send your resume to:

PERSONNEL REPRESENTATIVE
P.O. Box 38428
Denver, CO 80238

Central Intelligence Agency

The CIA is an Equal Opportunity Employer

Two Views on America's Cup

The View of an Editor
'Stars and Stripes' Proves U.S. Superiority

Every afternoon in recent weeks hundreds of sun-blistered Australians have gathered around Fremantle's Challenger Harbor to watch the America's Cup yachts slip out to Gates Road. Afternoon has meant relief for the tourists—The Fremont Doctor, as the western winds that breathe cool sea winds across the western Australian earth are known—has prescribed something more violent for the open seas where the yachts race.

The Fremantle Doctor has meant plunging waves and howling winds throughout the opening rounds and Cup finals. Sails have torn under the wind's onslaught as crews winched furiously in hopes of victory. Masts have snapped. Half a dozen crew members have dropped in the drink. A narrow margin has separated the winning boat's successful flat-out drag racing and technical dueling and the losing boat's dumped-in-the-water despair. Dennis Connor's sea bronco "Stars and Stripes" has made the margin and now he's a dinky die Yank hero ready to tote the silver trophy back to the States.

This past best-of-seven sea battle has proven far more than a ritualistic convention of sea-faring blue bloods. The 1987 America's Cup has reitterated the event's recent media appeal through which it commanded attention around Australia and the USA as well as coastal ports throughout the sailing world.

Certainly the past 1983 American loss created a vague patriotic imperative in the 1987 US challenge. Due to the 1983 loss, this time the American sports fans stayed attentive. As the New York Time's Dave Anderson observed, "Now the American 12-meter has regained what most of America never knew it had—until the Aussies snatched it and brought it out here to Western Australia.

Unfortunately for all interested in a sailing duel, the Dennis Connor-led Cup retrieval proved amazingly anti-climatic. The San Diego Yacht Club's "Stars and Stripes" plowed through qualifying rounds and dismantled "Kiwi Magic" (one of the early challenge favorites) in a convincing 4-1 rout. In doing so the American boat earned its right to meet Australia's Kookaburra III in a western showdown on the plunging Indian Ocean.

And "Start and Stripes" has shown everyone who races the faster yacht. No doubts Mate. The slate-blue 25 ton speedster sails like Poseidon, a horse that plunges its way to victory again and again. Those Aussie blokes were lucky the competition ended at best of seven. Want to try eight of seventeen, boys?

Victory may prove heavenly benediction for Connor who at age 44 became the first U.S. skipper to ever lose the Cup since the schooner "America" joined a fleet of British boats for a race around the Isle of Wright back in 1851. This first American challenger wrestled Queen Victoria's silver cup back to the New York Yacht Club's sheltered confines where it was successfully defended for the next 132 years—132 years before Connor began his "lose it and snatch it back" exploits.

It's scary to see how methodical the US comeback has been. The whole operation—and not just the American effort—has a disconcerting military-industrial ring to it. For example, Connor's design team used three naval architects, Boeing and Grumman aerospace engineers as well as consultants from another Pentagon subcontractor to create a winning yacht.

When one remembers who led the American challenge, however, the incredible efforts became more understandable. Dennis Connor, it seems, will go to nearly any length to win. In 1983 Connor lost because the Aussies sailed a faster boat. After the 1983 races Connor decided he would never lose another Cup due to inferior equipment. So he gathered the best in American technology and set out to retrieve the cup. Well done, Mate.

While prestige, revenge, and pure sailing competition certainly figure into the America's Cup, money controls the modern victory quest. The races mean up to thirty million dollars in tourism for Fremantle. Development has exploded along the western Australia coast, bl... it with a southern Florida-like exp... rate.

Big bucks aside, much has proved u... in this "down under" Cup finale. T... were the Indian Ocean's tempest-b... waters. Who knew what might hap... New Zealand danced through the op... rounds. "French Kiss" appeared strong... The Aussies seemed to possess... advantage in home-waters knowled... well as technical innovation.

But the Yankee challenge p... insurmountable. "Stars and Stri... managed for the most part to stay cl... tacking duels against the wily Austral... and used superior straight-line spe... sweep through the marks and the fi... Even on calmer days where the Au... claimed superiority, Dennis Connor ... "Stars and Stripes" her head to ... through the easy swells on speed al... without becoming entangled in time-consuming tacking duels.

While the Aussie crowds that gath... around Challenger Harbour to watch ... 12-meter aluminum-hulled creatures ... out to sea may be disappointed in t... nation's Cup defense, they have ha... witness to the fastest 12-meter afloat, ... boat that paid a house call to the Fremo... Doctor.

ALEC REK...

...And the View of a Gambler
U.S. Wins the Battle of the Bankbooks

I love the underdog. That's why I like CC athletic teams, they're always the underdog. The first time I ever cheered for the Broncos was during the Superbowl, because they were eight-point underdogs. That was, of course, before I turned the game off in the third quarter. Nothing is better than to watch an underdog win. It was great to watch the low key Penn State farm boys grab Vinny by the Testaverdes and beat that cocky Miami team. But for me, nothing beat watching the Australians take the America's Cup back home with them three years ago.

In 1983 the Australians showed up in Newport, Rhode Island against the odds, but they held the ace. The final American defender, Freedom, was financially backed by the limitless funds of the New York Yacht Club. Now the NYYC has the same theory of winning as George Steinbrener, "if we don't have it, buy it, and spend more to buy a better one." They had massive design and support teams. They also had some of the best personnel. Freedom was skippered by Dennis Connor, winner of the 1980 America's Cup. Occasionally, the NYYC also had been known to misuse their power by cancelling races when the winds favored the opponents. The Australians did not care that they had a limited budget and that their skipper, John Bertrand, was inexperienced at America's Cup racing. Their boat, however, held the ace. Every night when Australia II was taken out of the water, they would shroud her keel from view with a skirt. It was not until they had won the cup that they revealed their unique winged keel which gave them the advantage. This ingenious device provides lift and reduced drag which increased Australia II's speed. They had won these races by using technical innovation instead of writing checks.

The result was that they got to keep this gaudy Victorian Cup. It was presented to them as "Australia's Cup," but they declined the name declaring that it would remain America's Cup. But they did take the cup down under, where the races would be held in the Indian Ocean off the coast of Freemantle, Western Australia.

Now the pedestal where the cup had stood for 132 years at the NYCC is barren. The cup headed south where it was greeted by jubilant Australians. There were ticker tape parades just for this ugly cup. The celebration got so out of hand that four people died. But on this side of the equator, no one knew what had been lost. Half the population of the U.S. thought that an America's Cup was something worn by a baseball catcher. But it didn't matter, the Americans knew they had lost something, and they wanted it back.

So in the image of MacArthur returning to retake the Philippines, the American "taskforce" invaded Fremantle. They were not alone; seven boats from five other countries had also appeared to challenge the Australians. There were six American boats, more than ever before. One, Heart of America was from that city with such vast seafaring history, Chicago. The America's Cup had overnight become a much bigger deal than ever before.

Why? Why did all these countries want to spend a minimum of ten million, some as much as 25 million per boat? I don't know, just the 50 or more sets of kevlar sails for each boat cost a million and a half. Why would they take these precious pieces of aluminum half way across the globe just for a race? Beats me, the boats are too fragile for any type of ocean sailing. They had to be shipped to Australia by freighter for a cost of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Why would anyone want to win such a hideous looking bottomless cup that can't even hold water? Why? I have no idea. But since they did, I thought I might as well keep up with the races.

The U.S. has followed the 1987 races closer than it had in any previous America's Cup campaign. For this I give credit to ESPN. I love sailboat racing when I am in the boat, but to sit and watch the races is as intense as watching grass grow. ESPN has been so successful in making these races exciting, that they have created millions of bar room skippers. (I had to watch these races in bars because my housemates are to busy watching game shows.) These inebriated pseudo-sailors like to yell such nautical terms as "free air," "weather helm" and "high aspect ration," without having a clue of what they mean. But that's O.K. they were having a good time and that's all that matters.

The racing for the 1987 America's Cup started in September, and culminated at 1 a.m., our time, this past Wednesday morning. For the challengers, it has been five months of racing, and two rounds to eliminate ten boats, so one could challenge the Australian champion for the cup.

The first series of races was not dominated by the favored American boat, San Diego Yacht Club's Stars and Stripes. Rather, it was New Zealand's Kiwi Magic, the first fiberglass 12 meter ever built. Ahhh, what is this? New Zealand a small, obscure country that's only known for its lamb. And fiberglass, a technical innovation to boot. This was music to my ears. This was a true underdog. This was a David in a world of high tech, and high budget Goliaths.

This glass twelve meant business. Its twenty-five year old skipper, Chris Dickson, was so hard core he fired his own father from the campaign. They had been in Fremantle practicing a year before the other boats even arrived. After the first thirty-two races, Dickson had only lost one race. Stars and Stripes, skippered by Dennis Connor, was second. Connor had lost the cup in 83 and was determined to get it back. But after this first round he wasn't even close to the Kiwis. He had lost seven races out of thirty-two. But they both advanced to the second round with America II from San Francisco and French Kiss from France, both of which were eliminated quickly. This left a seven race showdown between the Yanks and the Kiwis, which should have been very close. But Connor swept it 4-1, and the only ... came when he had a sail blow out. T... Connor raced and creamed the Austra... champion Kookaburra, 4-0, for the ... This was a slaughter, Stars and Stripes ... simply faster, she made Kookaburra ... like she was dragging an anchor.

Why you ask did Stars and Stripes w... handily after she had such problems in ... first round? She was faster because she ... a new surface applied to her bottom ... the second round—a scotch tape ... material designed by NASA to reduce ... water friction against the hull. In th... Dennis Connor had his picture on ... cover of Time, because NASA taped ... bottom up, I'm sorry that was in bad tas... just wanted an underdog, like N... Zealand, to win. The worst part is t... Stars and Stripes won this cup by usi... technical innovation and by writing ... checks. The Australians were just getti... taste of their own medicine back from ... U.S. I guess technical innovations ... alright only when the underdog has cho... Na, that's just bullshit Marc O.K., ... admit it, Stars and Stripes deserved to ... But now look New Zealand will have to ... back to its lamb and Fremantle ... become a ghost port as the cup mo... north to San Diego.

Americans and Australians show... spirit as they rooted for their boats. ... ESPN reporter covering fan support ... the streets of Fremantle, asked a ... Australian girl who she was rooting ... What the reporter, and the rest of Amer... watching live, didn't know was t... rooting to the Australians means to engag... in sexual intercourse. The mother ... the girl away with a look of disgus... Australia IV's crew exploded into laugh... But now ESPN has to return to cover... kick boxing as we sailors wait three ye... for the San Diego show down.

MARC GAMB...

terview

endrickson: A Man and His Book of: Talks on Politics, CC and Golf

David C. Hendrickson, an assistant fessor of political science at the orado College, is in the midst of a year from the classroom. An Olin owship has allowed him to commit the to writing. With Robert W. Tucker of shington, D.C.'s School for Advance rnational Studies (SAIS) he is writing a k on Three Moralists in Foreign Policy: rson, Wilson and Carter.

n Oklahoma City native, Hendrickson duated from CC in 1976 with a history ree. As a student he edited the ghan in 1975-1976. Works to his dit include The Future of American tegy (just released by Holmes and per) and The Fall of the First British pire: Origins of the War of American pendence (1982, Johns Hopkins) ch he co-authored with Tucker.

Since he began teaching at CC in 1983, fessor Hendrickson has become a gular instructor in American foreign icy and international studies.

ig: Although you've been out of the sroom working on the Three Moralists, 've remained here at Colorado College, ort of internal exile. Have you enjoyed time off?

endrickson: Actually, it's a lot less of an le than most faculty members cience when they go on leave. Because haven't gone anywhere I still make all of department meetings. I like my year , but I am looking forward to returning the classroom. Talking to your word cessor all day gets a little boring after hile. I really do miss the classroom. I ss the class parties.

: How far have you progressed on the rent book?

: I spent the summer and fall working Jefferson. Tucker and I are dividing the ting on this section and should be ished in late spring. This summer I'll ld like a madman on Wilson before I rt teaching again in the fall.

: So when will we see the book on the okshelves?

: 2001. No, 1999, at least before the illenium.

We should be finished with Carter metime in 1989, and then it takes actically a year to get it into print. I'd ess 1991.

: Could you describe the general thesis of e work. I assume that the moralistic ement in these president's foreign olicies is treated critically.

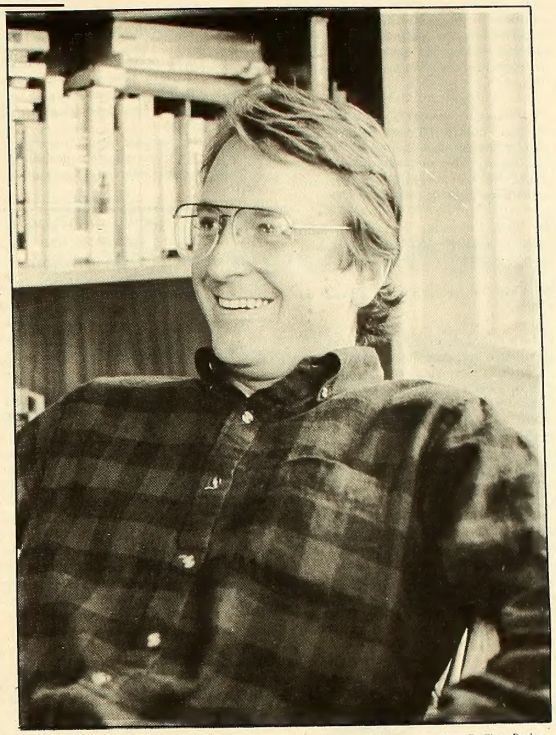
: Yes. Although Carter will probably me out looking better than either fferson or Wilson.

: Why is that?

: Carter had the good sense to abandon st failed policies in 1980, whereas both fferson and Wilson persisted until the tter end. Beyond that, I don't really want speculate on any broad lessons we might rrive at through the study.

: Many analysts today have labeled the reness of Ronald Reagan's foreign policy moralistic" or sentimental. His sweeping ti-communism, for instance, is based on sort of moral stance.

: Reagan has in some respects adopted e Carter policy—at least rhetorically. There is a sense in which the Reagan dministration has sought to "reform" e international system—Star Wars is an example, so is aid to the contras.



David Hendrickson

Photo By Ginny Bunker

We actually considered making Reagan the third man in the sequence, and we are going to say something about him in the book. But Reagan's attitude toward military power is a lot different than that of Jefferson, Wilson, or Carter.

C: The Future of American Strategy has just been released. Is this book a prediction as to the future course of American strategy, or a personal blueprint for what this strategy should be?

H: It is a recommendation for what American strategic policy should be like. I formulated the basic ideas for the work four years ago, and I was persuaded that the Reagan defense buildup was unsustainable, that there would come a time when defense spending would be falling. This book tries to lay out the defense strategy that is appropriate for fiscal stringency, or a period where there are continuing pressures on the defense budget. And that has happened. The defense budget is not growing in real terms anymore. It's all in disarray.

C: The budget?

H: The whole administration is in disarray. They've tried to do everything, they've been unable to make any choices. They have entertained a lot of hair-brained schemes. And the result is that five years from now we might be in as bad a shape as we were when the Reagan administration took office.

C: Describe a few of these hair-brained schemes.

H: Star Wars is exhibit A. There's this weird combination of a utopian dream—to rid the world of nuclear weapons—combined with a set of defense programs—offensive counter-force weapons and strategic defenses—that are extremely menacing to the Soviet Union and which pose a larger threat to strategic stability. And my feeling is that since the utopian dream cannot be realized, what we are going to get is the extremely menacing part.

C: So SDI would destabilize things without adding any sort of security.

H: Right. It's important not to place your adversary in a desperate position. Because when that happens, instability and war are often the result.

C: But you do support deterrence.

H: I have an argument about nuclear weapons that 90% of the world will dislike, that people on both the right and left will dislike. I think we're going to have to rely on the threat to use nuclear weapons first if the Soviet Union launches a massive attack on the West.

Now I believe in constructing our nuclear forces in such a way as they don't pose a first strike threat to the Soviet Union. But if they attack us, we have to make them pay a big price. And if that includes the limited use of nuclear weapons, so be it.

The truth is, I intensely dislike the subject of strategic nuclear weapons, and I intend to forget about it.

C: How about a second example of hair-brained schemes?

H: Exhibit B is the administration's policy in the Persian Gulf towards oil. This book was written before the recent revelations, but what the administration did in selling

Continued on pg. 8

SKYWAY VIDEO

Rentals & Sales

577-9047

Hours:
Monday-Thursday
10:30-7
Friday & Saturday
10:30-8
Closed Sunday

- Foreign Films (Excellent Selection)
- Classic Films
- Operas
- Musicals

As well as an extensive selection of

- Current Releases

— No Club Or Membership Fees —
Tuesday Special - $1.49 Rentals
Sunday Rentals - Free

Skyway Plaza • S. 8th & Arcturus
(feel free to call for directions)

What if you don't get into the grad school of your choice?

Of course, you may get into another school, but why settle? Prepare for the LSAT, GMAT, GRE, MCAT or any grad school entrance exam with the best test prep organization— Stanley H. Kaplan.

For nearly 50 years, Kaplan's test-taking techniques have prepared over 1 million students for admission and licensing tests of all kinds. So call. Why go to just any grad school, when you can go to the right one?

KAPLAN
STANLEY H. KAPLAN EDUCATIONAL CENTER LTD.
DON'T COMPETE WITH A KAPLAN STUDENT—BE ONE 761-8904
or see Judy Gibson for info.
MCAT classes
starting Feb. 14
All classes held in Olin Hall

Hendrickson: New Books Cont

arms to Iran was a terrible error. We might yet reap the whirlwind from that. Part of this whirlwind is that Iranian troops are eight miles outside of Basra, and they got there partly because of the increase in military capability provided by American weapons.

The other part of it is that the administration has refused to recognize the national security implications of relying on the Persian Gulf for the West's oil supplies.

The Gulf is an unpredictable part of the world. A lot of people who live around it, the Iranians primarily, want to do us in. And the only way to prevent that is to reduce your dependence on the area as much as possible.

C: What alternatives were there for preventing dependence on Persian Gulf oil.

H: There are a lot of things they could have done to stop this relentless increase in Persian Gulf oil production, and they have done none of them.

C: For instance?

H: I think they should have imposed a tax on energy consumption and what is called a variable import fee on oil.

C: And a final example of poor American strategic planning.

H: Exhibit C is the administration's economic policy. The President is just fanatical about not raising taxes, so given the public consensus in favor of entitlement programs, like Social Security and Medicare, the result is that this entire defense buildup has been financed with borrowed money. You just can't live like that.

C: Along the lines of changing America's strategic policy, you have another book coming out in May: Reforming Defense: An Inquiry Into the State of American Civil-Military Relations. Tell me something about this work.

H: Well, I'm going to insist to Johns Hopkins that the book be done in blue, orange and white—Broncos colors.

C: That's unfortunate. How about the content.

H: It's a critique of military reform, and particularly the ideas for military reform set forth by Gary Hart.

Now I like Gary Hart in a lot of ways, some of his ideas are pretty good. He has a serious attitude, for instance, with respect to the implications of our dependence on the Persian Gulf for oil. But his ideas for reforming the military—the small aircraft carriers, the daylight fighters—are half-baked.

The peculiar thing is that the first book is a critique of the fashionable ideas and dominant tendencies in the GOP, while the second book, Reforming Defense, is a critique of the fashionable, but wrongheaded, ideas popular with the democrats.

C: And the book also studies specific areas for reforming the defense establishment.

H: The main focus is on civil-military relations. On how best to organize the military establishment, the degree of autonomy which should be allowed the military services.

One of the main questions I investigate is whether the military has bungled things as badly as critics contend. I don't think they have.

"One of the main questions I investigate is whether the military has bungled things as badly as critics contend. I don't think they have."

C: Such as on weapons procurement.

H: Everyone says that the large deck aircraft carriers and the big, expensive bombers are turkeys. But I don't think they are.

C: You graduated from Colorado College in 1976. Do you perceive any major changes in the political or social outlook of the student body?

H: I think the basic rhythms of student life haven't really changed. You have a substantial number of party animals today, you had them back then. You have a number of serious students today, you had them then.

There obviously has been a change, however. When I was in school we were still in Vietnam. Getting out, but still in it. I got my draft number when I was a freshman in Slocum. It was 319.

The campus activists back then were all leftists. I was about the only conservative then, and I was conservative. I'm less so today.

Students now are more interested in what they're going to do when they get out, a little more worried about that. Politically, there has been a shift to the right. I think its nice. I don't think students should go around blockaiding boulevards or throwing blood on draft boards.

A lot of the so-called apathy today is all-right with me. I don't think students are really any more apathetic than they were fifteen years ago.

C: How well do you think your CC education prepared you for graduate and professional work in the field of political science.

H: A student is capable of getting a sup... education here that is just as good, if... better, than any education in the cou... When I was at Johns Hopkins I ... amazed at the difference in instruc... available to the undergraduate studen... compared with what I got when I was h... The advantage of CC is that you have s... classes, your instructors are usu... Ph.D.'s, and you don't take classes f... graduate students as you do at many o... more "prestigous" institutions.

Naturally, everything depends upon ... amount of work the individual student p... in.

C: What about the block plan? You ... seen it from both sides, as a student and ... professor.

H: When I was a senior, I took ... incomplete in every course. Edit... Leviathan (eight issues then) took mo... time than I anticipated. I was always abo... a month behind, but very conscientio... about eventually getting the papers in.

I like the block plan. I've never taug... eight blocks, only seven with Mel... blocks. Eight a year is extremely difficu... Seven a year can be very taxing, especia... if you're doing some writing at the sa... time. Both books were written while I w... teaching. But I like the overall structure.

Block breaks are definitely not the thi... for professors that they are for student... because you have to grade all those pape...

C: Any comment on the eight-block pla...

H: It would have been nice to retain th... nine-block year if it had been possible to d... so while accomodating the real need of th... faculty to reduce the heavy load in teachin... But I think the eight-block year will wor... fine.

C: In addition to your teaching and ... writing you serve on Cutler Board.

H: I enjoy working with the students who ... are interested in the publications. They are ... always a good group. I enjoy beating the... in golf. I used to beat Alex Stoll on many ... occasions. That was satisfying. I've bea... you on numerous occasions. This also was ... satisfying.

C: Finally, the arts editor needs to know ... "what's on your turntable?"

H: Well the Neville Brothers, the Allman ... Brothers, the Doobie Brothers. And the ... Pointer Sisters.

TED CRAIG

Valentine's "Red" Sale!

at

Mountain Chalet

IF IT'S RED*...IT'S15% OFF!
ANYTHING RED

Red...skis, ice axes, swiss army knives, sunglasses, daypacks, backpacks, rugby shirts, clothing by Patagonia, Marmot, North Face, Long John shirts and nightgowns, bandanas, stuff sacks, water & fuel bottles, and much more...

February
12, 13, 14

Red buckets of paint & magic markers must be checked in at the door

226 N. Tejon • Downtown •633-0732

CAFE BIJOU
DINING & SPIRITS

• serving • lunch & light dinners, exquisite desserts & coffees
• first floor •
jazz, cocktails & hors d'oeuvres
• second floor •
Trip the night fantastic in a turn of the century home
411 East Bijou 632-9640
Bring in this ad for a free specialty drink with your lunch or dinner

Comparitive Lit Initiated at CC

New Major Challenges Students

Faculty members from several departments within the Humanities Division of CC are organizing a comprehensive program in Comparative Literature. This is a program which has been evolving gradually and is now emerging from its elemental stages, becoming a dynamic program with its own curriculum. The ground work for establishing "Comparative Literature" as a major began 7 years ago, when a basic course in Comparative Literature was pioneered under the heading of "Humanities 125" (now also known as CO100). Comparative Literature has recently been approved as a major and is expanding its selection of course materials.

Comparative Lit. is not a "traditional" major at the undergraduate level, however, other liberal arts schools have similar programs. Herving Madruga, Comparative Lit. Coordinator, likens the newly established program at CC to the Literature/Comparative Literature major at Yale University. This academic year marks the first time that students will graduate with a degree in "Comparative Literature" at CC. In the past, students pursuing a major in anything resembling Comparative Lit. have had to submit a proposal to the Advisory Committee to the Vice President and have it approved as a Liberal Arts and Sciences major. Two seniors, Becky Bark and Amy Schroth are a graduating this year in Comparative Literature, setting the precedent for future majors.

What does the discipline of "Comparative Literature" include? The term was first introduced in the mid-19th Century, used to designate a rather "technical" pursuit, a historical study of a national literature and its "influences" upon another or several other national literatures, (i.e. the influence of French authors on English authors or vice versa). The first portion of the 20th Century was predominantly dedicated to the study of Structuralism and Hermenutics; Comparatism was not recognized as a unique discipline until later in the century, initially in Europe and then in America. Since the mid-60's, reports Owen Cramer, "the discovery of a new interaction between philosophy and literature" has emerged.

Thus, Comparative Literature has become a comprehensive study, which considers the philosophical, psychological, anthropological, historical, linguistic, and artistic perspectives related to literature. The study of Comparative Lit. not only considers various desciplines and how they interact, but also various genres within those disciplines and how they develop. For instance, Cramer describes the evolution of the "epic" to the present-day "novel," or Greek "tragedy" and "comedy" to 20th c "drama." Simultaneously, one must consider the effects of how the times or the conditions of an era (its history) affect what was produced in literature and art at that time.

It is precisely this wholistic and comprehensive approach to literature which appeals to the faculty involved in instigating the Comparative Lit. Program. Herving Madruga states that the function of a study in Comparative Lit. is: "to combine different genres and different eras and come up with similar visions . . .(specifically) to find universal traits of the imagination."

Some of the courses that will be available in the coming year(s) include the following: The Critical Tradition, The Writer and Society, The Language of Narrative and the Language of Film, Gide and the Sexual Unconscious, The Faust Legend, Myth, The Rise of Narcissim in 20th Century Arts. Many other courses have also been proposed for the Comparative Lit. curriculum, which the staff is excited to offer.

The Committee involved in organizing the Comparative Lit. Program is comprised of faculty from the following Departments: Herving Madruga (Coordinator) and Marcelle Rabbin from Romance Languages, Marcia Dobson and Owen Cramer from Classics, Harvey Rabbin from Philosophy, George Butte and James Yaffe from English, Dirk Baay from German/Russian and Joanne Klein from Drama. Other faculty members within the Humanities are supportive of the program and have favored the inclusion of Comparative Lit. courses in the CC curriculum.

The Committee encourages the acquisition of a foreign language and majors are required to take at least two Literature courses in an ancient or modern language other than English. Cramer expresses his desire for students "not to be daunted by foreign language." He and other members of the Committee for Comparative Lit. speak of the value of reading a text in its original language: of becoming familiar with the nuances of a language and knowledgeable of another culture.

Marcia Dobson speaks also of establishing a "common language" among literatures and among cultures, which is derived from the comparison of individual texts of different nationalities. The elements of "commonality" may be discovered through the study of the "mythology, archeology, psychology, and history" that encircle the text. Marcia Dobson's particular interest lies in the exploring of myth as it appears in literature, ritual and art, which she will pursue in a 200 level Topics course starting next year.

The Comparative Lit. Committee looks forward to hosting visiting professors to teach courses in various disciplines within Humanities to enrich the program. Last year a famous Mexican novelist, Sainz taught several courses in Spanish. Currently, Jan Dingome from Cameroon is on campus, teaching courses on African Literature. Next year a distinguished writer from Hungary, John Konrad, will be teaching several courses-three for the Comparative Lit. Program and one for the English Dept. Konrad will be the first to assume the "Maytag Chair" for Comparative Lit., a position which has been made possible through a generous endowment of $1 million. The professorship is a temporary, one-year position which may be extended to a tenured track after 7 or 8 years.

"Essential to the study of Comparative Lit. is the 'participation' of the reader with the literature, the willingness of the reader to engage himself or herself fully into the text."

Owen Cramer encourages students to have the "courage" to accept the challenge offered by the discipline of Comparative Lit. Essential to the study of Comparative Lit. is the "participation" of the reader with the literature, the willingness of the reader to engage himself or herself fully into the text. The individual must be dedicated to the "working" of the text or the "experiencing" of the art form. The staff encourages anyone interested in the specifics of the curriculum of the Comparative Lit. Program to speak directly with the faculty involved.

MARY BUTCHER

FOR VALENTINES DAY
SHOW YOUR LOVED ONES
HOW BIG YOUR HEART
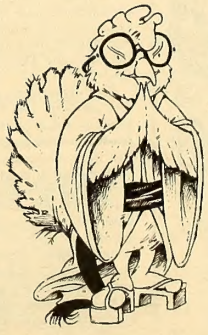
CAN GET; WITH GIFTS
(we have the best) AND
CARDS (the best too)
FROM
Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm Sat. 11-5 pm
THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE
Downtown on Platte Between Tejon & Cascade
phone: 635-2118

YAKITORI
Sushi Happy - Hour
Saturday's 5 - 7 pm
Most Pieces of Sushi $1.00 a piece*
* Some are more.



Downtown
16 E. Bijou
578-0915
Yaki-Doodle

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor:

If you live in Arthur House, sections of Mathias, or any of the 3 fraternities on the quad, you are being experimented upon: SLEEP DEPRIVATION! The overpaid union workers are scheming with the administration to insure that no one living in these areas gets to SLEEP past 6:45 AM, the time those churls start revving their engines & beeping their beepers!

If you live in one of those areas, you probably pay $11,000 and more to be there; you should not be disturbed before 8AM!! We all know the administration loves to torture the Phi Delts; but now they are going too damn far! When you study until 2 or 3 AM for an exam and then are jolted out of bed at 6:45 by the beeping and rumbling thunder, it is highly unlikely that you are going to fair very well.

I have the solution!! Don't do the school's fundraiser, that will only augment your sleep deprivation by keeping those rukus making machines gassed up. D I A L - A - HOG will solve our problem. As soon as you are rudely awakened head for the nearest phone, dial one of these numbers, and curse, scream, or merely demand that they cease construction before 8, or 9 AM. Gresham Riley (632-1682), Wenzlau (577-4575), McLeod (685-1387), Paul Jones (520-5360), and Dana Wilson (633-1603). Another Hog who must be called; but in the middle of the night, is the construction, school liason, Claude Cowart (634-5419). He won't be so cheery eyed at 6 AM if 300 people ring his phone off the hook all night. If it doesn't work, there is always sabotage & bomb threats. If you stick a nail through the hydraulic fluid lines on the tractors, they will be placed on injured reserve. A dump truck without brakes might even kill a few of them. One stick of dynamite if properly combined with bomb threats would make those Hogs a lot less eager to disturb you sleep.

If this sleep deprivation does not stop by the next issue, I will offer more suggestions as well as the addresses of the administrators and the construction workers. One last thought, let the construction workers know how you feel - FLIP THEM OFF!!

—Devin S. Standard

THE COLORADO COLLEGE

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETE LOACH, News Editors
DAVE EVANS & ANNE MANHART, Features Editors
MUNIR MEGJHEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
•
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETE SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editors
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
•
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
•
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Cutler Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 extension 675. The Catalyst is printed tri-monthly from September to May, except during holiday periods.

Cutler Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its education programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local laws.

Editorials appearing in the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 400 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Rastall Center, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

A work of considerable length may be submitted as a guest commentary. Persons interested in submitting commentary should contact the Catalyst at 632-4999 or 473-2233 ext. 675.

The Catalyst reserves the right to edit or cut letters to the editor and guest commentaries.

Wipe The Slate Clean

To the Editor:

This letter is in response to Victor Greto's rebuttal to my rebuttal to his rebuttal to my earlier article. In his latest letter, Victor Greto accused me of repeatedly employing and abusing the word "natural" in my last article; however, I used the word only once. Ironically, one of the leading delusions in the view he consistently presents in his articles can be demonstrated by his own understanding of the word.

To anyone who shares the popular liberal viewpoint presented by Victor, whatever cannot be understood and consciously controlled by mankind is unnatural, and therefore undesirable. This exaggerated confidence in human reasoning power stems from the Scientific Enlightenment, where flourishing scientific discoveries and the correspondingly rapid expansion of the boundaries of scientific knowledge made human potential seem infinite. However, not even within Nature is everything understood, and certainly not controlled by human reason. To such a confident attitude, any aspect of human existence is fit to be put to trial, where we are the judges and the verdict is determined solely on the basis of human reason.

Just as any thought of a limitation to human omnipotence is unbearable to this viewpoint, so is the thought that we may not be able to question everything. Since history and tradition are not completely under deliberate human control, Victor and other liberals like him alternate between arrogant assertions that they can detach themselves from tradition, and assertions that they are not influenced by traditions anyhow.

If tradition were under our control, the past would be unimportant and a lack of consensus would be the only barrier between us and Utopia. The futile attempt to question every aspect of history and tradition is an arrogant display of an inflated opinion of human power. This view denies the past, despises the present, and can find its only hope in the future.

Victor, the representative of this naive view of our existence, claims: "I question every assumption I have, my society, my religion, ;the reasons why I feel the way I do." This is quite a feat. I wonder if Victor Greto's middle name might be tabula casa. No one is born into a vacuum or can ever achieve the complete detachment necessary to question every inherited belief and value—the detachment necessary to treat history as an object unattached to us. If we could detach ourselves completely from our culture and its inherent beliefs and traditions, we would have nothing upon which to base meaning. Our tradition and culture provides our human self-understanding.

But Victor doesn't claim to question his need to question every single aspect of his life. Couldn't this need also be questionable? If everything were open to question—to have its fate decided by inconsistent human reason, then we would have no values upon which to base our conclusions. Victor's approach tries to unravel the world and leads to an infinite number of questions and no way of answering any of them. The result is a kind of nihilistic relativism, where morals and values have no more permanence than fashions, and therefore, no ultimate significance. Morality becomes nothing more than "an amorphous, protean code of personal ethics we choose for ourselves." With such beliefs, liberal relativists are chiseling away at the very ground they stand on.

Victor claims that "the idea of a New Year, of beginning again, of wiping the slate clean is amazingly nonsensical," yet he claims his own capability to clear the slate on which generations and generations of his ancestors have written; in his article in the last Catalyst, Victor Greto spreads the popular belief that each and every day can have the cleansing, liberating power of New Year for liberated modern humans who can mold tradition in their hands and take a buffet-style approach to history, choosing what elements they accept and which they reject. This approach is not unlike the totalitarian rewriting of history's books, except that rather than hoping to erase past beliefs and events, this buffet-style approach to tradition encourages the present to remember the past and smile deprecatingly at its folly while applauding only the development which it views as "progressive." He makes my point very clear when he arrogantly writes: "I hold the belief that I, as an individual, can transcend the traditional chains which bind me."

His own blind naivete ridicules his claim that he "can usurp wishful thinking and its implied fatalism." What could be more wishful than the idea that we can sculpt our world in our own image, as though it were made of new clay. Through his rejection of the past; Victor Greto is chaining himself to a status quo that he cannot explain, cannot escape, and above all refuses to accept. Instead we need to have the humility to distinguish between what we can and cannot control. If we cannot approve of the status quo because we can imagine a better state, at least we can achieve some degree of complacence. Maybe we can learn to "feel at home" in this world which we cannot escape.

—Inger Thompson

ENACT Wants You

To the Editor:

Are you sick and tired of big multi-national banks and corporations destroying the earth? Many 'noble' organizations like the World Bank are funding the destruction of the earth's rainforests, under the guise of humanitarian aid. They lend money to national governments to build roads to destroy unique and irreplaceable rainforests.

This money is supposed to provide jobs and money to the indigenous peoples. This though is only a short-term answer, and an extremely destructive one at that. These corporations have already destroyed half the world's rainforests and are working on the other half. These corporations must look to the future and realize what they are doing. They do not have any right to destroy the earth.

They do not think about and do not understand what they are doing. The World Bank has vastly more public relations people on their staff than ecologists. It is time to educate these people. It is time to make them realize that there are people in the world who care about the environment. It is time to get mad and tell the World Bank to get the hell out of the rainforests.

If you are interested in getting more involved in this issue and other environmental issues then come to the ENACT meeting on Wednesday, Feb. 11 at 7 p.m. in Mathias dorm. We are forming the CC Rainforest Action Group (CCRAG). That night we will have a letter writing party to the World Bank and let them know that we mean business. We will also make plans of future actions against these "rainforest rapers."

—David Williams

Landslide

Coming back to school (especially after taking a block off) is always a shock. However, I don't think anything could have prepared me for the strange happenings around here.

Okay, I know it's nothing new to speculate on the construction (or destruction) on campus. So, call me a conformist, but I'm going to have a shot at it too.

True, I'm pleased as punch to see the progress on the new Worner Center, but what's the deal? Is it spreading a disease? I mean, imagine my surprise when I was riding my bike down Cascade and narrowly escaped impaling myself on a flashing barricade. Hey, give me a break this change back to a higher altitude always has a strange effect on me.

As we all know the other side of campus is also bustling. Progress? Well, maybe. The hole for the future Olin addition is, uh, bigger and deeper and Arthur House is getting more and more obscured from view so something must be happening.

I can't say though, that I'm too overjoyed with the many yards of fence surrounding the area. Do you get the feeling that someone doesn't trust us? What do they think we're going to do? Take one of the bulldozers for a spin down Nevada some Friday night?

Perhaps the renovations can best be compared to all the Rocky movies. You always hope there won't be any more, but unfortunately another one is always on the way.

And speaking of clueless jocks abusing themselves, how 'bout that Super Bowl? Coming back to witness the final hours of Bronco mania was another added delight. Maybe you can already guess that I'm not exactly a big fan. I did try to watch some of the game, but unfortunately I'd just bought the latest issue of Rolling Stone and quickly became engrossed in an article on Pee Wee Herman.

I don't think the avid fans I was with were too appreciative of this. Also, I'm surprised terms like "communist" or "traitor" weren't hurled at me because I seemed totally unphased by the fact that the Broncos were getting their butts kicked.

I did, however, catch a few glimpses of the game. I'm sorry but that half-time show really gagged me. Can you say schmaltzy? I was also somewhat bewildered by the in depth commentary on how the winning team dumps the water buckets on each other. Gee, will I ever know what it's all about? Good thing I'm in college now.

BY KATIE DALSEMER

Michael S. Mehan

The Bottom Line

The Recovery That Isn't

or over four years we have continualy heard the ministration's boasting of how well the economy is g and how they are to thank for it. "Are you better low than you were four years ago," was the familiar on of the 1984 Presidential Campaign, when the sident campaigned hard on the good shape of the onomy, taking credit for every drop in the interest . However, recently, many economists have taken a look at the economy and are not liking what they

The so called Reagan "recovery" may turn into the gan slump, and quite a slump, too. The "Yuppie" nding binge of the 1980's could be planting the seeds the next boom, a boomer of a recession that is.

cording to the Wall Street Journal, one of the rest problems our economy faces is the huge amount bt, not only government, but private. Right now, vernment debt accounts for only one quarter of the en trillion dollars (up one trillion from last year) in mulated debt in our economy, the rest is from ivate sources. The increase in private debt, by porations and individuals has caused many nomists to raise their predictions of a future ession, from about 20 percent chance, to 40 percent. e now slowly shrinking federal budget deficit could to as high as 300-400 billion dollars in the event of a ere recession.

The "recovery" of the early eighties is not that solid a od of economic growth. During this period we have en more loan defaults, bankruptcies, bank failures and ings and loans closings than in any previous ession. More than 150 banks are expected to fail in near future, and the list of troubled banks has grown m 1,150 to 1,500 in the last year.

Currently, we have two large economic institutions ding in opposite directions, the dollar is plummiting value, while the stock market soars.

One reason given for the booming market, is that due the collapse of the American industrial sector and the ainant buy outs and mergers, that threaten the bility of many businesses, the stock market has come the only productive place in our economy in ms of earning money. However, as John Kenneth braith pointed out in an article in the January lantic, the current boom in the stock market rests on a ky foundation of debt. Prices have reached such heights, that they no longer bear any relevance to the stocks themselves. The rise of large brokerage houses has led to a decline in any type of business production, since the sole purpose of these houses is not to call management shots as stock holders, but to shuffle paper, and collect their money.

The decline in the dollar, a move designed to decrease imports and increase American industrial production is having a rather unappealing effect. We hurt the Japanese and make the Europeans nervous, but unfortunately, the third world nations, whose currencies are directly tied to the dollar, and who owe western banks about a trillion dollars, are hard hit by the falling dollar. Also, as cheaper dollars flow out of the US's pocket and into foreign coffers, the possibility of inflation increases at home as banks raise the interest rates to get more from a dwindling supply of lendable dollars.

Basically, what we have seen in the last six years is a period of unstable, unequal growth. There has not been a real productive period of economic expansion. While interest rates declined, along with inflation, unemployment has hung around seven percent. Whole industrial sectors have gone belly up ie. steel. The auto, and airline industries are on extremely shaky ground. Many regions of the country are hit with severe economic conditions, such as, the textile industry in the south, the oil industry in Texas (A friend of mine likes to joke about how half his neighborhood is up for sale in Houston) and Louisianna, the industrial sectors of the mid-west, not to mention the farm crisis. As Reagan was running around the country a few months ago in the Congressional elections, telling everyone how we are going to grow even more, General Motors was closing plants, taking the jobs of 25 thousand people.

The accusations that companies squandered the tax break money in the early eighties, buying each other out, are proving true. There was no capital realignment, or investment. Companies did not strive to rebuild their facilities or improve production. The production and consumer bases have not grown in six years, and capital investment is flat on its back. A recent CIA report doomed our one productive area, high tech industries, saying that if American high-tech firms do not get their act together, soon, we are once again going to get burned by the Japanese and Europeans, like we did in the auto and steel industries.

The end is not iminent, but if the American business sector does not put itself back together, and end this period of sterile growth, we may be in big trouble. A sharp rise in oil prices, coupled with a declining dollar, leading to a rise in inflation, along with increases in corporate bankruptcies and bank failures could insure that the "Reagan recovery" sleeps with the fishes.□

Too Little Time and No T.P.

During a recent visit to one of CC's many public rooms my attention was drawn to a disturbing ility. Yes, there are members of the Colorado College ministration who are firm disciples of the school ich says, "a person shall receive no more than three ets of toilet paper at a time." To a serious toilet paper ainee this presents considerable problems. I guess the anist ideology "from everyone according to their ility, to everyone according to their need" does not ply to bathroom tissue.

Admittedly, many of these greedy t.p. dispensers have en surgically neutered so as never to harm the human e again. Yet many of the adamant contraptions still lish in their pristine state at strategic locations on mpus. And it is a conspiracy.

However, avaricious toilet paper dispensers aren't the ain issue here. For while cursing the rapacity of the metal Beelzebub on that cold gray wall I realized a rallel which runs throughout our daily lives: "Don't e too much." Let's look at some of the things that, as dents of Colorado College, we aren't allowed to take much of (besides toilet paper).

Time. If one takes too much time turning in a paper, prof. issues a lowered grade; if one takes too much e paying his/her tuition, one gets into trouble with e business office; If one takes too much time paying rent the landlord threatens eviction; Don't take too ch time turning in library books either, or a serious bill for $1.98 will plague your mailbox for the st of your natural life; And could you please hurry up the phone, buddy? I gotta call my girlfriend; And atever you do, don't take too much time on a "ten-nute break," for when you casually try to slip through e door the entire class will eye you like they've just allowed a wad of chew. And the list goes on.

Liberties. No, don't take too many of those either. t's look at the library for example. Sometimes I have question the legitimacy of an institution whose primary objective appears to be keeping food in the snack room. Granted, food with studying is an extremely messy enterprise. Yet CC worrying about a few Snickers' wrappers when there's a three-acre bottomless pit of dirt in the fraternity quad seems a bit absurd. And take no liberties with the bathroom walls. For no matter how brilliant your disestablishmentarianist rhetoric, your words will ultimately fall prey to the cold antiseptic of custodial editors.

Now I'm not saying we don't need rules. On the contrary, we need all the guidance we can get. For we've known no war, and we're not the ones who hated our aunts and messed in our pants. We're the ones who were breast fed on the Brady Bunch in a land where Watergate, Keith Partridge and Maxwell Smart walked the fine line between fantasy and reality. We need rules to keep us real . . . and maybe we even need the North basement Diet Pepsi Gestapo. I'm just saying, in the astute words of the Violent Femmes, that "my body has been punished with too much and not enough." Too much pressure, too little time and no toilet paper in sight.

BY EVAN DAVID

What's the Point?

BY PAUL "SCHAEFFER" HAMAMOTO,
DICKSON MUSSLEWHITE,
WITH VERY LITTLE [illegible]P FROM MIKE WEED

(a sort'a somewhat belated reaction to last month's career symposium)

I hope everyone out there got a chance to attend the career symposium. It certainly helped me focus my career objectives and thus define my life. I really have begun to make sense...at last...some sense...oh, career sweet career...

CAREER. nOW THAT'S A DIRTY WORD. nO, IT'S WORSE THAN A DIRTY WORD. IT'S CHARLES MANSON AT A BABY SHOWER. IT'S HELL ROLLED INTO TWO SYLLABLES...

Wait, does this mean that we're back to...

yUP, THE "c" WORD....

Will you guys stop this nonsense? Everyone has got to get serious sometime. What are ya' gonna be the ant or the grasshopper?

aHH, GRASSHOPPER...AS THE SHAO-LIN PRIESTS SAY, "aNT ALWAYS LOW DOWN. bUT THE GRASS HOPPER, HE IS HOPPY..."

And man with hole in pocket, he feel cocky all day.

Because a man with a hole in his pocket has nothing else to do, like the C.C. student, until he gets a career...

Wait, you mean to say that career people don't masturbate...

oF COURSE NOT. THEY DON'T NEED TO. THEY GET IT FROM THE BOSS.

Oh, that's what makes him sing...

No, it's his career. Now there's a success story. Born in the U.S.A. don't you see, that's what it's all about. That's life.

I BEG TO DIFFER, MY DEAR BUTTBREATH, I CAN'T BELEIVE THAT YOUR LIFE, YOUR C.C. EDUCATION SIMPLY LEADS TO THIS: WE ALL GET SUCKED INTO A CAREER, BUT WE DISCUSS JOYCE AT THE PHOTOCOPIER.

Don't be silly pal, after four years you got a full bookshelf, a dandy resume, something to hang in the bathroom, and Gresch's handshake.

Damnit, you gotta get real, you gotta start making sense sometime in life.

I THOUGHT IT WAS MAKING SENSE ALL ALONG, OR AT LEAST WE WERE LEARNING TO MAKE SENSE. WHY DO I HAVE TO LEAVE MY IDEALISM AND MY CURIOSITY NESTLED AT THE FOOT OF PIKES PEAK?

How curious can you get about a Detroit rush hour or changing the toner for the xerox machine?

THAT'S NOT THE POINT. ARE WE HERE TO LEARN TO MAKE SENSE OR TO MAKE CENTS?

Dude, you make the sense, and he'll make the dollars If you keep making sense, you'll never make more than cents.

BUT I THOUGHT LIBERAL ARTS WASN'T JUST FOR C.C. ANYMORE: WHAT ABOUT LIFE?

Some cereal...supposed to be good for you.
I'M NOT GOING TO TRY IT
Let's get Mikey.
He won't eat it, he hates everything...
AAAKK.

AAAKK.
Aren't you boys forgetting something?
Oh yeah, Honor code upheld.

P.S. This weeks "No More Mr. Nice Guy" is a pack of lies. □

BIG REWARDS
for Industry's Most-Wanted Men

David Makarechian

Does CC teach its students to be thoughtful or reactionary? Let's take a quick test to see.

Question: (answer true or false) People who want to reduce the size of the government, and to eliminate most social programs, lack a commitment to the poor, don't care about the good of society, are uncaring products of the middle class, and haven't eaten at Poor Richard's enough.

If you answered "true" to the above question, you reacted as most people would. Everyone knows that only conservatives want to reduce the size of government—and their taxes—so they can have more money to spend at the country club. They don't care about the poor and they have no vision about improving society, right?

Wrong. Admittedly, Reagan conservatives have (to some degree) sought to reduce the size and scope of government, but long before it became trendy, thoughtful radicals have sought to limit the government because it is the cause of evil in society. It's not tax savings and weekends at Club Med...it's a vision of a better society that promises to improve the condition of individuals. It comes not from the middle class but from all classes and all individuals.

Examples of government oppression and abuse of the poor abound. To discern them one need only look beyond the typical knee-jerk response to social problems. Below I've examined some issues of concern to CC students and how spurning the "Liberals" reliance on the state and rejection of the human potential can help to build a better, freer society.

The homeless. The government has created the shortage of low-income housing. It has prostituted the market for cheap housing by limiting the rental space available with city zoning requirements, or by regulating rates land lords could charge: those who would normally rent to low-income groups can't. The state has also created a finite amount of low-income shelter by maintaining a monopoly on housing projects. The private sector has no incentive to house low income groups, because the government is already in the business.

Unemployment. The government has kept Americans out of work in a number of ways. Since the New Deal one method has been the minimum wage. By trying to insure that all workers receive some arbitrary "fair" amount, the State has prevented smaller businesses that can't afford the specified wage from hiring any workers at all. This regulation has especially kept teen-agers out of the job market.

Hiring restrictions have limited the advance of minorities and perpetuated unemployment. Affirmative action programs create an incentive for minorities to seek only certain (often low paying) jobs because they are easier to attain. Businesses spend resources on meeting restrictions rather than on expansion and job creation.

Import restrictions and protectionist trade policies make the job market sluggish by raising prices of products in other sectors. Wharton Econometrics estimates that tariff legislation on Canadian timber products currently before Congress will save some jobs in the US timber industry, but will cost over 16,000 jobs in related industries overall.

Regulation forces business to waste resources on complying to rules fabricated in some Washington bureau, and deeps resources from going into expansion and the creation of new jobs. A regulation familiar to us is the 55 MPH speed limit. In addition to the fact that experts are displeased with its saftey performance, the law drains $202 million from the private sector for enforcement costs, and wastes one billion man hours a year on compliance.

The Environment. America is wasting a way because the government can't manage its own land. Rather than enforcing strict user taxes where those that ruin our air, water, and land pay the full cost of clean-up, almost every entity in the economy picks up part of the tab. Industries have no incentive to seek cleaner methods or substitutes for their polluting products because they don't bear full costs.

More people with a roof over their heads, more people with a job, and an environment that we can enjoy—just by limiting the State's control. These aren't the bleatings of the "selfish middle class." This is the Libertarian vision repudiating shop-worn, "Liberal" accusations about social responsibility. The shoe is now on the other footf. Thoughtful radicals implore you to keep you "commitment to society" from destroying of us. □

Victor Greto

I live in a padded American cell. So do you. Everyday, when I come home from work, from class, from whatever, I enter it. I hardly notice that it's a cell, that it's padded, that it's even American (not to mention that I' never truly leave its confines anyway). Yet with every movement I make, whether I turn the television on, the stereo, munch on potato chips while reading a homework assignment, or stare off into space, out the window at the passing cars, I make and reaffirm the cell. The television tells me things (assuming we're not talking about sitcoms): about what's happening in the world on the evening news; PBS documentaries show me the history of the Civil Rights movement (we giggle at the ignorant Southern white bigots with their blank pasty faces, blackrimmed glasses, sharp determined noses), show me other countries, the story of English, how the universe changes with perception, the variety of the colors of nature. I may even see the militant Nazis march over the dead husk of Poland, see the tight smile and quick wave of Stalin, a grim-lipped Churchill, an old Roosevelt. From watching documentaries I get the sense the twentieth century has revolved solely about the Second World War. And perhaps it has.

Perhaps, for I'll never know. My padded cell, soft and reassuring only in its warmth and security, keeps me from knowing the reality of anything I see. I seem to be always one step away from what I feel; I lead a secondhand existence, through television, the stereo (the sweet, saccharine emotion of pop songs!), even books. I grow fat from my own certainty, from the warmth of the blankets atop me, the woman beside me. I grow at ease with turmoil—for what have I to fear, really, inside my cell? South Africa is somewhere out there.

I scream at the ignoramuses who vent their ludicrous opinions on television; I chuckle at the situations in novels, magazine stories, radio newsbulletins. I sit at the typewriter, often, whether the reason be for a paper for class or my own "creativity," and think like a bumpersticker: I'd rather be elsewhere.

When we strike out into the world, we fear for our lives, we long for and retreat back into that cell where we have all the controls at our fingertips—we wish for emotions, thoughts and feelings after they've been broken down, reduced, interpreted for us. Then we may comment upon the comment with a blast of cynicism, a roll of the eyes, a shake of the head.

What does all this mean?

How can we really know anything at all about the world as long as we lock ourselves securely into our padded cells? How can we ever take the rest of the world seriously, the problems, the starvation, the homelessness, the deprivation, the spiritual hunger, the empty and pitiless lack of self-respect of some, the mental illnesses of chronic schizophrenics who cannot come close to touching what our society wants of them? How can we touch anything with our padded cells between us, behind in us? In the land of affluence, material wealth, self-satisfaction, how may we return from our high plateau of existence and touch reality again? "To teach thee," sayeth John Donne (in quite a different context), "I am naked first...."

To be naked...perhaps that's a start; stripping away all the facades of our society, the rhetoric, its basic and essential assumptions, holding America up to a mirror naked and ashamed—yet still, alas, a fig leaf flutters haphazardly across its hanging dollar sign. No, the televisions and radios and books and warm houses do not have to be literally stripped away; only that blasted assurance, that full-throated yell that all is fine in the world and God is in his heaven, that insulated arrogance of men and women lucky enough to be born in the good old U.S. of A. Remove that horrid smug expression when listening to others' ideas, that cynicism from your voice when talking of politics and the assumed uniform motivations of all people—it is all too easy. Remove the intellectual aridity of stating certain forms of government and society are "contrary to human nature." As we have found out after two world wars, there is nothing contrary to human nature. Pragmatic, ambitious, in love with universal concepts and the need for compartmentalizing every aspect of living into "understandable" categories, we cannot help but make definite statements and create elaborate "truths" from our perception of reality. And this aspect of our personalities is exacerbated by the affluence of our surroundings, of the security of our padded cells. Our minds become cells for we are incapable of thinking anything differently than from that "truth" which has given us such material wealth and physical pleasure-security. We must proclaim: This is the way it is, all men are greedy, self-interested, out for themselves, it is natural, we Americans are simply more honest than the other idealistic fools who preach meaningless self-sacrifice, socialism....

Our padded American cells will, like all other delusions, fall; and it will be a crash like any other. Our beautiful grandiose vision of the world will fall apart of its own accord to the reality we will never know. For though perhaps no one can ever know what "reality" is, we who confine ourselves to these comfortable and secure padded cells will never come close. We are too far gone, lost in our own illusion, in delusions of our own grandeur. With that note, perhaps the many who now suffer from our truths may take solace in tomorrow. But we have that Bomb, and perhaps the end of our reality will be made the end of everyone else's.

O well.

Maybe, beyond the smoking remains of our legacy of nuclear craters, the earth, over thousands of centuries, and I hope enlightened by her previous experience, will bring forth a truly new mode of being, a being which does not need to struggle—and retreat—but who has rooted memories of a race which once did. □

Mark Thesing

Mr. Nice Guy's Back

I had one of the worst experiences of my life. I was trapped. For ten hours I was trapped in a car with three of their disciples. I was trapped in a car with three disciples of the "Greatful Dead."

After ten hours of listening to that bullshit I would have been greatful to be dead.

When the "music" started to play, I thought that it was the noise from the musician tuning their instruments. Suddenly when the people in the car started convulsing in an autistic manner, I realized that the noise was part of the song.

The Dead is the lowest form of music (assuming it belongs in that category). Their "music" is as unharmonious as fingernails scratching across a blackboard and the rhythm could only be set to a broken metronome.

I asked my friend what he liked about the Dead. He was offended that anyone could even question the Dead. He responded, "DUDE."

The Dead commands unquestioning devotion. He further informed me that the "shows" (not concerts) are awesome and that everyone is totally happy and loving. He suggested that I go to one.

I felt as though I was going to vomit. This is my worst nightmare. A bunch of people destroying the remains of their minds, dancing, and being groovy.

This is a free country, the showered and the unshowered share equal protection of the law. Respond to Mr. Nice. □

The The

This infection is blistering, contagious, if you will, infectious. Out of the clouds pop stalemate and pretentious neo-ley schmatlz rises The The with a ch needed original sound. First, imagine rawness of John Lydon (aka Johnny ren) fused with the smooth and erotic nd of Michael Hutchence (of INXS) for ls. Then add the most intense, ating drums, haunting Cure-ish rumentation, occasionally jazzy riffs, you have The The in a nutshell.

nger and lyricist Matt Johnson, for the st part, is The The, since he is the only sician to appear on every cut. For his orts here, he should be nominted for d. He has crafted each of the eight tunes ferently and ingeniously, yet he doesn't render the all-important criteria of ught and fun.

ide One opens with an awesome and eering title cut that rivals the best in ceable new rock. The three remaining s on the side combine jazzy chordings h sleazy, erotic lyrics, suggesting an ate decadence in us all. On "Out of the e," for instance, Johnson drones "She lying on her back with her lips parted, aling like a stuffed pig — I was going ough the motions — faking the sitions, and wriggling around like a rd in a tin." In "Heartland," he foresees e destruction of America, the land of ss stinking shopping centers."

Side Two is equally potent and chilling. e radio broadcast vocals on "Sweet Bird Truth" sound distant, yet hit harder an any others. "Slow Train to Dawn" oses the aching eroticism of "Out of the e," and adds catchy, chiming guitar-ork. "Twilight of Champions" allenges all capitalism stands for — "Y-e I sold my soul, to pay for dinner, my much grew fuller, but my heart grew inner."

All the songs here are fast and fairly ter, yet slick and fun in their own creepy ys. The The exemplify what rock should doing today — going in new directions ther than old. Because of their ingenious e of painful beats, crafty musicianship, er lyricism, and biting vocals, they may the hottest band around . . .Check out e The.

MARTY BROAN

Wolves Produce a Dog

Back in late 1984 we heard Los Lobos' Will the Wolf Survive. They brought a unique style to the pop scene. Their sound was kind of country with a definable east LA Latin influence from possibly bluegrass roots. Whatever it was, we loved it. It was happy fun and refreshing. Well, Los Lobos have a new one out which, after such a wonderful introduction to the band, is a bit disappointing.

The Wolves seem to have lost something because By the Light of the Moon is not as hot as their first album. This is not to say that it should not be appreciated. There are some very good tracks which remind us of the old Lobos. These songs include "One Time One Night," "Is This All There Is," and "Tears of God."

One positive attribute to By the Light of the Moon is that Los Lobos seem to be diversifying their music. "Shakin' Shakin' Shakin" gets a little heavy on the rock side while "Prandz del Almz," a tedious melodramatic love song in Spanish, takes the complete opposite side of the scale covering the wishy-washy bogocity. Generally on the album we seem to have Los Lobos adopting all sorts of styles. In most circles diversity is a good thing, but for Los Lobos success will lie in developing their own style further.

Although the album is all pretty danceable, especially boogieing tunes include "All I Wanted to Do Was Dance" and "The Hardest Time."

Tunes to look for on this album are those written by David Hilgzdo and Louie Pérez. Not those by Cesar Roses.

If you're a Los Lobos fan, definitely listen to the album. There is some quality stuff on it. The album as a whole, though just doesn't have what one would have expected from a band that had such a good start and produced a quality first disc. We're all allowed a little slack. Los Lobos has great promise and all we can do is hope for an exceptional third album.

E.J. BERNACKI

albums supplied by Budget Tapes Records

This Week in Art

February 1-22 Exhibition by Southwestern artists Marie Romero Cash and Bob Haozous. At the Colorado Springs Fine Art Center.

February 5-8 Cellist Paul Tobias will perform with the Colorado Springs symphony at the Pikes Peak Center. Performances at 8 p.m., 3 p.m. on the 8th.

February 10 Burt Lancaster and Katherine Hepburn in "The Rainmaker" at the CSFAC, 8:00 p.m.

February 10-12 The New Zealand film "Silvia" at Poor Richard's Book Store, 8 p.m.

February 13-16 John Cleese in "Clockwise" at Poor Richards, 8 p.m.

February 14 Neil Simon's "Biloxi Blues" at the Pikes Peak Center. 2 and 8 p.m.

February 14 The Preservation Hall Jazz Band will appear at the Colorado Springs Fine Arts Center at 8 p.m.

LIFE AT C.C. WITH CORNBREAD HEAD
My History
It all happened when student Lapsy Shoupe was at Saga eating.
Dare you to eat the cornbread!
Yea!
This means I won't have him that sick pack
After he ate it he begin screaming at his meal plan
AHH! 219! 219! Take my tray!
Every Since then Lapsy prefers "Cornbread" what Black is it?
I wear overalls too!
219
LIFE AT C.C. with CORNBREAD HEAD
Cornbread came as a summer start to Colorado College RAWHIDE!!
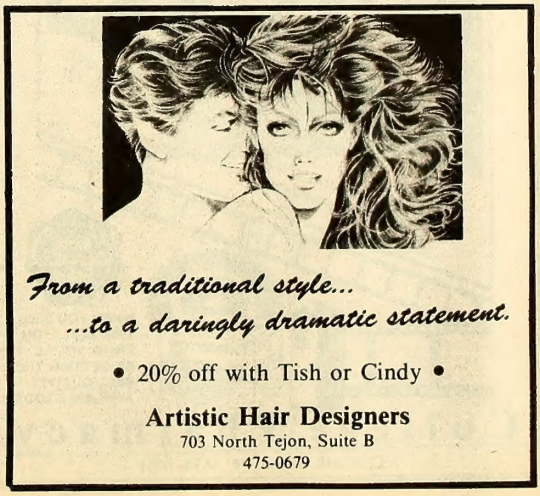
He participated Socially
what do you mean I can only take you out If you can bring a date?
and academically
Hey, what is this? I've never before seen half this stuff on this final!!
Joe Leonard

Next Week: Platoon



From a traditional style...
...to a daringly dramatic statement.
• 20% off with Tish or Cindy • Artistic Hair Designers
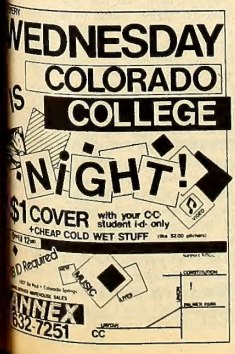
703 North Tejon, Suite B
475-0679



Slick, and Stupid

Eddie Murphy lives about four blocks north of my parents' house. He drives a black Rolls Royce with tinted windows. He wears huge, jewelled rings on every finger and lots of leather. So what does that have to do with his latest movie? Well, having been told that everything is relative, I would say that whether or not you'd like The Golden Child has a lot to do with how you'd feel about the Rolls, the diamonds and the skins; it all depends on your taste.

You can go ahead and write your own ending, and it probably won't be too far off...

It may be testimony to my taste that I saw The Golden Child a week ago and can hardly remember any of it. But, as far as I recall, here's how it goes: we start off in Tibet. Some sort of religious ceremony is taking place, and the sweetest little boy in the world is bringing dead parrots back to life by touching them. The bad guys burst in, clank a huge iron bird cage over the kid, and take him away. The credits roll in along with a funky disco melody, and we flash to Eddie Murphy bopping along the streets of LA posting up "Have You Seen This Girl?" signs. We spend a little time with Murphy's new(?) character and discover that he is, and I quote, a professional "finder of lost children." O.K. One day, while he's playing basketball with some underpriveledged kids, a very attractive young Tibetan woman shows up. She informs Murphy that he is "the chosen one" and that he must recover the kidnapped "Golden child." Luckily, since I would presume finders of lost children don't have much on hand cash to fly to Tibet, the bad guys have dragged the kid all the way to L.A. to hold him hostage.

Now you can go ahead and write your own ending, and it probably won't be too far off from the actual script. There are a couple of things I personally don't understand, like why a kid with such strong telekinectic and hypnotic powers doesn't just bolt by himself instead of waiting around for the very mortal Eddie Murphy to blunder in and release him. How did they fly that bird cage from Tibet to L.A. with the boy in it without getting questioned? I wouldn't say that The Golden Child is a bad movie; it's just a very certain kind of movie. If you don't have a problem with tying up those little loose ends yourself, and if you like the kind of scenes where people proclaim their intense love just before they - (GASP) - die, you'll love The Golden Child. It's ever so slick and boppin. If you're a sceptic who gets confused by complicated, illogical plots....stay home and watch Jeopardy.

NINA DE GRAMONT

Dutch Vocal Ensemble Sings to Packard

The Quink Vocal Ensemble, a young Dutch singing group, performed last night before a near capacity Packard Hall audience. Formed in 1978, the group has recorded three records, regularly plays on German and Dutch television, and has sung in many international music festivals. The New York Times said of their ability: "The 'Hymn to St. Cecilia' reveals Quink's abilities: elegant phrasing, impeccable intonation and a purity of tone reminiscent of Renaissance madrigals." Their repetoir consists of renaissance, baroque, romantic and contemporary classical a cappella music from all over Western Europe.

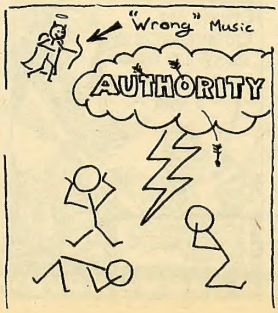
Last night's performance included a wide variety of songs. In the first half, Quink concentrated on secular and church hymns from the Renaissance by English, Flemish and Italian composers. The "Quel Augellin Che Canta," a lively piece Italian Claudio Monteverdi recei especially enthusiastic applause. Qu ended the first half with Daan Manneke "Canto (Canticles 4:16; 5; 1 & 2)," a po written intentionally for Quink. The gr spread through the audience and gav rousing performance of the mode dissonate work. The second half picked where the first left off with Qu performing nineteenth and twenti century works from such greats as Mau Ravel and Camille Saint-Saens. T "Cycle: Petites Voix," proved especi interesting.

Earlier in the day the group perform for the Thursday-at-Eleven. The concer were sponsored by the Great perform and ideas at Colorado College.

MIKE FRATERE

The Tulio Tapes: How to Listen

Everyone has thought about music. Have you ever thought about how you listen to music? Well gosh durnit, that's the difference between tofu and puddin' pies. We're talking ambience, surrounding atmosphere. It's the difference between watching a Mike Tyson fight at home with your mother or in a bar full of half-crazed food ol' boys gettin' all excited. So, what are some of the best ways to listen? That depends on what you're listening to and where. If you're washing dishes at Bemis Taylor, anything with a kick to it's gonna get lost in the frenzy. Simple, foot-tappin' sing-along tunes are what you need. CCR and the Stones will get you through a broken garbage disposal like nothing else.



As far as social gatherings a concerned, besides the company you k keeping, the choice of tunes is factor numero uno. Looking down that windin memory lane of past festivities, so ma of the key memories are implanted house-rockin' jam sessions (Jimmy Pa shall live forever) or easy chillin' round fire with a guitar and key individua (James Taylor as well). And when you at a party where the music's as generic the bimbos you're trying to talk to th only hope for fun is finding A) A infectiously danceable mix tape, B) A sweet Dead bootleg (this is all some people need for a warm, toasty smile stay on their face all night), C) Some kick-ass Heavy Metal to clear everyone out so you can get to the keg. (This is some people need for a confused and injured look to stay on their faces all night long).

Get it? Got it? Good. Never assume because you didn't like a song when you first heard it/saw it on MTV (or anywhere else) that it sucks. Maybe MTV and your particular mind frame were to blame. Never, ever, turn yourself off to song you're groovin' to just because you were down on it the first time you heard it. Who cares if it's in bad, bad taste. Now's the time to enjoy that sort of thing. The older you get the more focused you tend to become, and the less time you have for just plain Ill'in. Yes yes ya will and ya don't don't stop/ You keep on Rock Shot / Cause this is it.

TULIO BROWNING

Photo Special!
Every Monday!
coupon
FREE
SECOND SET OF
PRINTS
Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!
This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon.
Limited time offer.
819
Kodak Colorwatch System
WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!
College Pharmacy
833 North Tejon • 634-4861

Tim Miller: CC Filmmaker

Tim Miller makes movies, good movies. least PBS thinks so; they've already one and will be airing work by this CC or a few weeks from now. His current ect is entitled "Indecent Exposure" 's in the making. If you're interested ing a part of his (and possibly your) up coming future, your chance has ved. This Saturday Tim and co-director n Robinson are eagerly searching for s to power plant in the Springs.

Indecent Exposure" is part of Tim's designed film major. The plot revolves nd a young art student, played by Rob ison, who is plagued with recurring hmares of nuclear holocaust. Within visions is a scientist, played by fessor John Longo, who Rob later nunters outside of his dreams. Together y discover that they've been having ntical visions and have seen each other hin their respective nightmares. These characters take this series of events as sign" and combine the two realms of art d science to fulfill the task apparently signed to them through their dreams. e result is...well, Tim Miller would her not give it away. Other cast mbers to look out for are Laura Travis, ura Finley, Patrick Flynn, Jen Sincero, urtney Janak and Ted Hubbard.

I asked Tim whether Colorado College s proving to be an aid or a burden ards his study of film. Though he pressed his regret at not having a ecific curriculum and faculty available for studies, he wishes to stress the excellent pport of his ideas and proposals from his visors and professors Joanne Klein, urcelle Rabbin and James Yaffe. Another ilar of support on campus is David Ives the leisure program who has also been hind Tim in guiding and planning his jects.

Here, on campus, Tim has cultivated his dent, which began as a high school hobby y working with the Video and Film Workshop. This little known appendage of e CC Leisure Program has been suffering bit from lack of exposure (no pun tended). Right now the workshop is elcoming others interested in learning bout video and film making providing an mphasis on its technical as well as creative pects. For information contact either ary Kate Mendoza or Tim Miller, the o leaders of the group.

For those of you interested in catching a glimpse of "New Shoes" and other works by Tim Miller, Mary Kate Mendoza is currently planning an "Original Productions Night" here at Colorado College. This film festival is scheduled for late march, early April. Included in the features will be graduate school film projects by CC alum David Armstrong as well. A series of films will be shown over a period of a few days. This should provide the rest of the campus with an education on what to expect from the Video and Film Workshop as well as some hidden campus talent.

Tim's involvement in the Video and Film Workshop led him to stay in the Springs last summer when he began working at Cablevision here in town. It was there that he met Ralph Giordanno, who aided Tim in getting his first video on television via the PBS affiliate in Pueblo. The piece was a music video entitled "New Shoes" starring the now defunct CC band of the same name.

What is in store for producer/screen writer/director Tim Miller? "At this point I really need a year off," was his honest reply. Of course, this "year off" is going to involve more shooting and editing of videos. The life of a movie maker is by no means a secure path to fame and fortune. Tim says he knows this all too well and remains hesitant to build up any grand expectations. His goal is simple and that is to do what he does well. He says fame would be nice in that it would allow him the leverage to produce his own projects but he'd rather the recognition be for his skill insted of box office returns. "Let me put it this way, I'd rather be a William Hurt than a Sylvester Stallone."

If you're interested the potential for a glamorous life through the Video and Film Workshop, as was mentioned before, the group is looking for you. Also, for those of you who think dressing up and looking like a passively resisting nuclear protestor this Saturday sounds stimulating, you should contact either Tim Miller (473-6892) or Jillian Robinson (632-7682) for more information. Who knows, you may see yourself at Poor Richard's some day.

LESLIE A. SCOTT

Clockwise from Patrick Flynn (in Denver Sweatshirt): Laura Finley, Rob Madison, Courtney Janak, Ted Hubbard, Tim Miller, John Longo, Jillian Robinson, and Cara Trowis.

What's On Your Turntable?

Anne Wagner, Senior, History
Joan Armatrading, "Show Some Emotion"

Ted Miller, Sophomore, Undecided
Velvet Underground and Nico, "Andy Warhol"

James Yaffe, Prof., English
Mozart Piano Concerto #27 B Maj.

Harvey Rabbin, Prof., Philosophy
Mozart, String Quartet

Michael Grace, Prof. and Chair, Music
Chopin, Piano Trio

Dickie Hertel, Para. Prof., Chemistry
Michael Hedges, "Aerial Boundaries"

Hair Designers for Men & Women

RAPUNZEL

Style cuts, Cellophanes,
Perms & Color.
Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.

Stop in or make your appointment:

827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

...Valentine Love Lines...

...Valentine Love Lines...

Are you in love?
Or in like?
Or better yet, in lust?

If so surprise your friends and sweethearts by putting your loveline in the Feb. 13 issue of the Catalyst!

Call and leave your dedications and messages at this number by Wednesday, Feb. 11
632-2998
It's even free!

...Valentine Love Lines...

Hardcover "Hurt" Books
$2.49 each
Originally Priced
$15.95 - $19.95

Colorado College Bookstore
McGregor Hall

Bikers To Invade CC?

No, CC will not be violated by a wild pack of marauding Harley Davidson riders, but, if all goes well, the gentle whirr of bicycle tires will become a sanctioned part of CC's athletic program in 1987. Though the possibility is still in its early stages, Athletics Board approval later this month could mean the formation of a nationally competetive intercollegiate cycling team at CC.

In the wake of cycling's escalating popularity in recent years, CC has accumulated a large number of serious riders. So far, 45 riders have expressed interest in forming a team at CC, and team organizer Sandy Kinnee expects many more to ooze out of the woodwork once the team gets more widely recognized. Kinnee, himself a rider with more than six years of competetive racing experience, has led the charge for sanctioning cycling at CC for more than three years.

CC took a big step toward establishing itself in area inter-collegiate cycling by hosting the Rocky Mountain Collegiate Cycling Conference (RMCCC) meeting Saturday, January 23rd in the Gates Common Room. Representatives from the RMCCC's other member schools (Air Force Academy, Colorado School of Mines, University of Denver, University of Colorado, Colorado State University, University of Wyoming) met to discuss the 1987 RMCCC schedule, insurance responsibilities, and national qualifying requirements.

The most important issue raised at the meeting was insurance. In such a high risk endeavor as competitive cycling, insuring riders and providing overall liability coverage for spectators and host schools can be astronomically expensive. The insurance question, and each individual team's ability to provide comprehensive liability coverage for the race it hosts, lies at the crux of whether or not CC will officially recognize the team and allow it to host a race here on campus.

The insurance dilemma is complicated by the two-fold purpose of developing a cycling team at CC. On one hand, increased awareness and participation in cycling is a main focus. The RMCCC wants to promote cycling as a viable athletic alternative and attract as many new riders as possible to strengthen the area's cycling program. But at the same time, RMCCC members want to establish serious recognition and respect for the sport so that more serious riders become involved. Although these two aims are not entirely mutually exclusive, whether to further the development of the program by increasing participation or to establish a strong reputation that will in turn increase involvement creates a dilemma that seriously influences the direction of the budding program.

Whether to proceed along strictly competitive lines, or to actively incorporate the recreational rider relates back to the question of insurance. The most likely method of insuring CC's riders will be registering them through the United States Cycling Federation (USCF). The United States Collegiate Cycling Association (USCCA), of which the RMCCC is one of four regional conferences, is part of the USCF, so that USCCA members registered through the USCF are covered by USCF insurance. With individual licensing fees at $32.00, and team entrance fees at $60.00, proponents of a largely recreation oriented cycling program argue besides the considerable investm required to buy necessary cycling additional fees for licensing will many people from getting involved the school cycling program. But individual insurance a much expensive alternative, association with USCF seems the most viable option.

Interest in establishing a cycling tea CC is heightened by the distinct possib of some CC riders qualifying for USCCA National Meet May 15-1 Stanford. Though CC's riders don't any collegiate experience, they accumulated significant experience other comparable racing environme And, if the Athletics Board agree sanction CC's entrance into the RMC CC will likely host a qualifying race her campus this spring. In any event prospect of establishing a nation competetive sports team at CC that potentially include a large number recreational participants is one of interest.

The cycling team will hold a mee today at noon in the Bemis vegeta section. The meeting will serve to fin prospective plans and iron out de about insurance, classification, and hosting. Seriously interested cyclists encouraged to attend.

DEAN CAMPB

Experience is the best teacher.

BR

BRUSSELS SEMESTER ON THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

UK

LONDON SEMESTER ON BRITISH PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY

UN

SEMESTER ON THE UNITED NATIONS

DREW UNIVERSITY OFF CAMPUS SEMESTERS

Please send me information on the following international semesters:
☐ Brussels
☐ London
☐ United Nations

Name
Address
City
State Zip

Please also send me information on:
☐ New York Semester on Contemporary Art
☐ Washington Semester on American Politics

Return to:
Director of Off Campus Programs
Drew University
Madison, New Jersey 07940
Or call: (201) 377-3000, ext. 438

DREW UNIVERSITY

CLD287

Relax & Let
Taylor Travel
Help you with your BLOCK BREAK Plans...

"Your Campus Travel Agency"
818 N. Tejon 636-3871

Tigers Thrice Triumphant

The CC men's swim team w undefeated for the third straight yea their tour of California, crushing Calte 135 to 64, Occidental, 142 to 49 Whittier, 107 to 53. The weekend befo the Tigers lost a grueling meet to CU to 99, barely getting touched out in decisive last relay by eight-tenths of second.

"It was the best we have swum all ye with everyone making substantial drops their times," Coach Lear commented the meet against CU. Outstandi performances were turned in by G Clear, taking a first in the one-meter div with a score of 198.8 and first in the thr lmeter with a 215.6.

Kevin Diffee took a first in the 200 L with a time of 2.07.9 and second in the breast with a 2.23.7. Tom Hackett too first in the 200 free with a 1.52.4 and to second in the 500 with a time of 5.16.

Jaybird Levine and Rob Griggs help out in the sprint events, taking second third respectively in the 50 free w Jaybird coming in with a 22.7 and Rob a 22.9. Rob also came in second in the free with a 50.6.

Coach Lear felt that the result of meet would have been different if Tigers had been free of injury and illne he says that the Big Cats are look forward to swimming the CU team at ISL Championship meet at the end February.

The Tigers came back strong from thi first dual meet defeat by crushing th opponents in California. Jaybird Lev Tom Hackett, Doug Hodge, Roger Den Kevin Diffee and Craig Clear w undefeated in the meets.

The traditional BIG CAT vs. fresh football game went as expected, with BIG CATS stomping the freshcats into warm 55 degree Pacific Ocean. Coach L was pleased with the Tigers' performan and is anxious to see the Big Cats in ac in the remaining dual meets and at the Championship meet.

The Tigers take on the NA Champions, Denver University, Friday at home. Should be a close me Come out and support the team!

DOUG HOD

igers Dunk Orediggers

fter winning only four of their first reen games this season, the Tiger 's basketball squad has made an ressive turnaround. What only a few ks ago promised to be yet another barrassing season for the Bengals will turn out to be their winningest on under four-year head coach Jim he most recent triumph came against Orediggers at Colorado School of s on February 4th. It was a cularly sweet victory for the Tigers, suffered a bitter defeat to the guys Golden almost two months earlier. found themselves down at halftime by points, yet came back out with a erance. Two Dave Schroeder free ws gave the Tigers the lead with 16:43 in the game. Mines pulled ahead by a t with 4:45 to play, yet the Tigers came strong in the final two minutes with key inside buckets by junior center g Fox. A Rob Bogue jumper followed wo made free throws iced the victory the Tigers 86-83 as they improved r record to 9-11.

The win was highlighted by a balanced scoring and rebounding attack as five CC players scored in double figures and four players had 9 or more rebounds. Senior John Sacha was high point man for the Tigers with 18 but it was CC's "Mr. Consistency" Dave Schroeder who had the best all-around game with 14 points, 10 rebounds and 3 steals.

Before losing to New Mexico Highlands 79-68 on February 1st, the Tigers boasted a four-game winning streak. It was the longest win streak in twelve years for the CC men. Before the loss to Highlands, the Tigers posted an upset win on January 23rd over perenially tough Regis College, 78-70, and walked all over Colorado Christian College, 107-71. Rob Bogue was high scorer in both games, connecting for 22 and 16 points, respectively.

Things appear to be finally coming together for the Tigers. But the true test will come Tuesday night when CC takes on arch rival Western State in the El Pomar Gym. State punished CC 92-73 in their first meeting this year, and the Tigers will be out to even the score. DAVE EVANS

CC's Dave Rakel slams one home over Regis' Kevin Childress. JERRY WANG

ady Tigers Win Three

ff and running from the opening tip- the CC Lady Tiger basketball team e open a close game midway through second half to post a 72-63 decision the Cowgirls of New Mexico hlands Sunday, February 1st at El mar Sports Center. After a January 23rd at Metro State, home wins over Notre me January 29th, Trinity Janaury 31st Highlands give the Lady Tigers a 10- eason record and their second three me winning streak this season.

Balanced scoring keyed the Lady Tigers' tory over Highlands as ten different yers scored in a tight first half struggle t ended with the two teams tied, 33-33. hlands had to rely on a much less inced attack, with four players counting for 31 of their team's 33 first f points.

In the second half, CC's aggressive fense forced Highlands to shoot an mal 33% from the field and allowed Lady Tigers to pull away. Freshman ter Sally Bush pumped in 19 points and trolled 7 rebounds, and Terri Livermore ded 8 points, 8 assists and 4 steals to the m totals. Highlands' Theralene Howell all scorers with 23 points and 10 bounds, but the Cowgirls' inept bench dn't support their star. While four of hlands' starters accounted for 59 points, the entire Cowgirl bench could only muster up a feeble 4 points.

On Saturday, January 31st, Sally Bush tossed in 22 points and handled 11 rebounds as CC trounced Trinity, 83-58. Six Tiger steals and 16 Bush points allowed CC to compile a commanding 48-24 halftime lead as Trinity shot only 32% from the field. The Tigers were never challenged in the second stanza, and Coach Beth Branson used all fourteen players to complete the rout. Balanced scoring was again the name of the game as eleven Tiger players got ink in the scoring column.

The College of Notre Dame journeyed to El Pomar Thursday, Janaury 29th, but CC stole a 71-65 victory. Twelve Tiger steals, including three thefts each from Chris Sanchez, Julie Miller and Kitzie Pettersen, complemented 25 points from Pettersen, 10 from Miller, and 11 from Brenda Hull. The Tigers also benefitted from 26 Notre Dame personal fouls and a technical against center Maryann Santella to garner 21 points from the charity stripe. Patricia Sylvester led Notre Dame with 21 points and a game high 14 rebounds.

After the Tigers travel to Greeley (Colorado's glorious and glamorous grain capitol) to face Division II opponent University of Northern Colorado Friday, February 6th, they will return to El Pomar for a February 10th battle with NAIA nemesis Adams State college (Adams State downed CC earlier this season in Alamosa, 77-70). Tuesday's game will commence at 5:00 p.m.

DEAN CAMPBELL

A NOSTALGIC BOUTIQUE
Antique Costume Jewelry
Equisite Clothing
Unique & Fun Accessories
126 N. Nevada Ave.
636-9640
Use this for 10% off

SEVENTY DAYS OF SUMMER IN COLORADO
AND SOMETHING NEW TO DO EACH DAY.

SPEND your summer at the University of Colorado at Boulder, where you can take advantage of:

A NATIONAL reputation for educational excellence

MORE than 450 exciting courses, including special classes and seminars by distinguished visiting professors

A SUMMER full of world-class performing arts activities

ALL IN THE BEAUTIFUL SETTING OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS

SEND for our free course bulletin or

CALL (303) 492-4184 (24 hours)

CLASSES begin June 8, 1987

University of Colorado at Boulder 1987 SUMMER SESSION

Office of Admissions
Regent Administrative Center 125
Campus Box 7
University of Colorado at Boulder
Boulder, CO 80309-0007

Affirmative Action/Equal Opportunity Institution

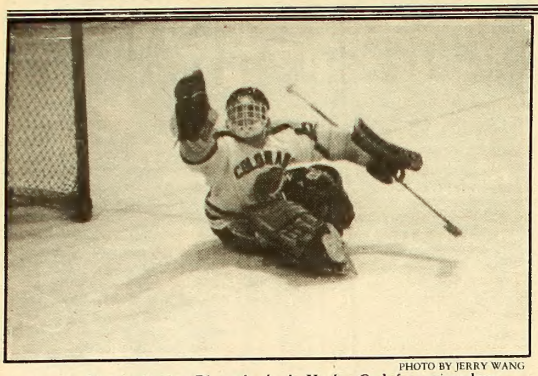

PHOTO BY JERRY WANG

Arm upraised in supplication, Pizzer thanks the Hockey Gods for a miraculous save.

Tigers Split Twice

It's status quo for the Colorado College Hockey team. Over the past two weekends the Tigers split series with the Wisconsin Badgers and the Minnesota-Duluth Bulldogs, leaving them still in seventh place, four points behind the sixth place Bulldogs.

Last Friday in the subzero temperatures of Duluth, the Tigers battled to the 3-1 victory in the first period, chalking up their first road win since the middle of November. Junior Keith Hoppe and seniors Rob Doyle and Doug Clarke put CC on the scoreboard. Rick Boh had two assists.

Sophomore Derek Pizzey was in the net for CC and kicked away 32 Bulldog attempts. Pizzey has been a solid anchor for the Tigers, consistently keeping the games close. The brutal bodychecking by Scott Campbell, along with the defensive efforts of Dave Hardie, Cal Brown and Mark Olsen, was another key factor in shutting down the Duluth offense.

Saturday night CC penalties dragged them down when Duluth capitalized on their man advantage situations three out of five times. The Tigers' power play crew was unable to penetrate UMD's goalie, who finished with 24 saves.

Pizzey had another busy night between the pipes, stopping 44 Bulldog shots.

Keith Hoppe provided the offense for the Tigers scoring both goals. In the last two weekends Hoppe has really come on strong for the Tigers, tallying five points with 4 goals and an assist.

Two weeks ago CC hosted the University of Wisconsin in a two game series at the Broadmoor World Arena.

Friday night's match resulted in three players from each team being ejected after a brawl broke out in the second period. Tensions had been mounting during the first half of the game and two minutes after CC tied it up at 2-2, the fights began.

The game resumed after six game disqualifications, a 10 minute misconduct, and a couple other minor penalties had been handed out. CC lost three key defensemen: Scott Campbell, Cal Brown, and Tom Pederson. Another key defenseman, Doug Kirton, was already benched from the previous weekend's game.

Wisconsin pulled ahead again with two minutes left in the second period. The Tigers evened the score five minutes into the final period on a Rick Boh goal. Boh had three points for the night, assisting the first two Tiger goals, one by Scott Schneider and the other from Rob Doyle.

Midway through the third, the Badgers scored the winning goal and the Tigers lost another game by the slim margin of one goal that has haunted them for the past two seasons. This one goal loss was number twelve in the 1986-87 season.

The Tigers came back Saturday still missing most of their defensive core but this team came to win. And they did, 5-3. Rob Doyle and Doug Clarke were moved back to defense and some others saw some extra playing time in this Tiger victory that was a long time coming.

CC struck first on a goal from freshman Chris Anderson, assisted by Mark Olsen, in the first period. The Badgers tied it up less than a minute later, but CC took the lead again on a Gord Whitaker goal. Once again the Badgers evened the score and once again the Tigers took the lead. This time it was Rob Doyle's turn to light up the scoreboard.

CC widened the margin to 4-2 two minutes into the middle period with the game winner from Scott Schneider. The Badgers pulled within one late in the second, but CC held them from there.

KATHY MAHONEY

CU Sucks

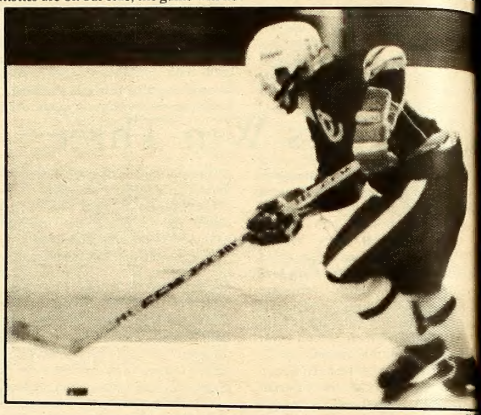
The women's club team has not won a game since November. That's a long time without the thrill of victory. Nonetheless, the women believe the losing streak will end on Saturday against the CU Buffaloes. (11:15 a.m., Honnen Ice Palace)

The game will be passionate because a unique rivalry exists between CC and CU in women's hockey. The Buffs and the Tigers are the cellar dwellers of the league. Each squad needs this win to establish a sense of self respect knowing there is one team to whom they have not lost.

A victorious outcome favors CC as our women have defeated the Buffs consistently in the past. Although the statistics are on our side, the game will not be easy. CC must contend with intense animosity toward the Tigers their pugnacious behavior on the ice Tigers can keep their cool and frustr Buffs at the same time, Tiger talen overcome the Buffs' often dirty tact

The women often experience the discouraging results as men's v losing close games by one point. Hope the Hockey Gods will give the thum to all CC hockey teams playing weekend, and they will WIN!! Sinc can't watch the varsity (unless you Minneapolis) watch the wome Honnen. It's much closer and mu expensive.

SARAH FL



Ace right winger Susan Deeds skates like an Egyptian.

Clubbers to Face Falcons

On January 24th the men's club hockey team arrived at Honnen Ice Arena to play their last '86/'87 home game against the rough and rugged Denver Chiefs. Greeted by the cheers of their many loyal fans, the high spirited boys hit the ice with their dazzling speed and agility. Unfortunately both their speed and agility quickly succumbed to exhaustion.

The Chiefs exploded to a four goal lead, despite excellent net minding by Jerry "The Cat" Wang. The Tigers, however, regrouped between the second and third periods and came out strong with gaols by Rich "I didn't know they played hockey in Virginia" Leibhebor, Dean "Dino" French, and David Roe. Along with the goal scoring the Tigers received some strong defense and big hits from Kip "speed" Roe, Low "tower of power" Billingsley, and Clark "the Chief The team effort, however, wasn't to come away with the win and the T ended dropping the game 5-3, bringi team's record to 4 wins and 3

This Saturday at thirteen hundred (1 o'clock) the Tigers will get a chance at the A.F.A. Falcon's J.V. Tigers have dropped two straight Falcons (13-3 and 12-8) and are lo for revenge. When asked about chances this weekend, Coach Eric K responded "What game?" The game be played at the Academy in the House (the same rink the varsity pl play in) and I'm sure the boys w appreciate some of you fans to go up see them.

DAVE R

HEY GANG, IT'S TIME
101 USES FOR A CC HOCKEY GRADUATE QUIZ!
WHICH OF THE FOLLOWING IS THE MOST LIKELY FATE OF YOUR FAVORITE CC ICER?
A.
Good News, Kid! You and your Five best friends are taking over our starting line!! See you in Edmonton on Monday!!
B.
So you didn't make the draft. BIG DEAL!! With your outstanding academic record you're a shoe in for executive vice president in our investment firm!! Let's have lunch...
C.
Hey Bud, 15 Jumbo Jacks and make it FAST!!
SMILE

GO FOR YA LIFE'S MATES. THE AUSSIES ARE BOUND TO BEAT YA YANKS... THERE'S A CRATE OF STUBBIES FOR THE WINNAS.
AMERICA'S CUP
FREEMANTLE
Australia
FOSTER'S

Dean's Drivel

There is nothing in the world like an NBA-All-Star Game. The best basketball players in the world are thrown together into a situation that produces some of the most amazing athletic creations in all of sports. Watching Michael Jordan shed three defenders to drill a fadeaway, double clutch jumper, or Magic Johnson end a fast break with a no-look pass to James Worthy for a life threatening dunk, or Isiah Thomas weave through the lane, change hands in mid-air, and loft a soft left-handed shot over a leaping Akeem Olajuwon, is something we expect from the best in the world. But when all of these players are on the court at the same time, special things happen. The players, basking in the glow of being acknowledged as the best and getting a chance to play with guys they wouldn't ordinarily get a chance to, are at their best. The end result is an uninhibited and raw display of pure athletic talent and love for the game. The NBA All-Star Game is a must see for any sports fan.

This year's game will take place in Seattle, Sunday, February 6th. the Eastern Conference starters will be: Center Moses Malone, Washington Bullets; Forward Larry Bird, Boston Celtics; Forward Charles Barkley, Philadelphia 76ers; Guard Michael Jordan, Chicago Bulls; Guard Julius Erving, Philadelphia 76ers. Starting for the Western Conference will be: Center Akeem Olajuwon, Houston Rockets; forward James Worthy, Los Angeles Lakers; Guard Alvin Robertson, San Antonio Spurs; Guard Magic Johnson, Los Angeles Lakers. West Head Coach Pat Riley (Los Angeles Lakers) will have to appoint a starting forward for the West team after selected starter Ralph Sampson of Houston tore cartilage in his knee during the first period of Tuesday night's loss to the Denver Nuggets. Seattle Supersonic forward Tom Chambers will replace Sampson as a West reserve.

Here is a brief synopsis of the NBA season to date:

WESTERN CONFERENCE

The Los Angeles Lakers, owners of the NBA's best record, are indeed the league's best team. Magic Johnson should win the MVP award if the Lakers win the championship, and Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and James Worthy are both having their customarily solid seasons. Michael Cooper and A.C. Green anchor a solid bench that includes such stiffs as Mike Smrek (Canisius) and Frank Brickowski (Penn State) to keep the Lakers under the NBA's salary cap.

Dallas will provide the Lakers with a stern test in the Western Conference Finals. Mark Aguirre and Derek Harper are having perhaps their best professional seasons, and Sam Perkins, Rolando Blackman, and James Donaldson round out a starting five that rivals any in the NBA for offensive talent. Detlef Schrempf, Brad Davis, and rookie Roy Tarpley head a reserve crew that has helped the Mavericks become only the third NBA team to win 30 or more games this season.

Six other teams would occupy playoff spots if the season were to end at the All-Star break: Utah, Portland, Seattle, Golden State, Houston, and Denver. The Jazz, bolstered by the rapid development of Karl "Mailman" Malone in to one of the most powerful forwards in the league, also sport seasoned veterans Darrell Griffith and Kelly Tripucka. The Trailblazers, who lost center Sam Bowie to the umpteenth broken leg of his career, are led by offensive specialists Kiki Vandeweghe, Steve Johnson, and the athletic Clyde Drexler. Seattle is this year's surprise team in the West, guided by new found scorer Dale Ellis, Boulder native and now All-Star Tom Chambers, and bald but beautiful Xavier "X-Man" McDaniel. Golden State has also shown marked improvement, and, despite rookie center Chris Washburn's voluntary hiatus for drug rehabilitation, has two players, Eric "Sleepy" Floyd and Denver East High School product Joe Barry Carroll, on this year's All-Star roster. Houston's Rockets, hurt by the loss of guards Lewis Lloyd and Mitchell Wiggins to drug suspensions, added veteran forward Cedric "Cornbread" Maxwell to assist stars Akeem Olajuwon and Robert Reid. And the occasionally pathetic Denver Nuggets continue to battle along with one of the least talented teams in the NBA, led by the league's second leading scorer, Alex English, and the West's second best point guard, Fat Lever, the Nuggets must play their absolute best to win any game and will fight it out with Phoenix for the conference's eighth and last playoff spot.

EASTERN CONFERENCE

Any team in the NBA must still play their best to beat the Boston Celtics. The Celts, who have the league's second best record, still boast two of the league's top six scorers in Larry Bird and Kevin McHale, and solid veterans Robert Parrish, Dennis Johnson and Danny Ainge. A somewhat suspect bench, led by Jerry Sichting and conspicuously missing last year's hero Bill Walton, could prove Boston's undoing.

The heir apparent to the Eastern Conference Championship is Atlanta. The Hawks, even without pivotal backup guard Larry "Spud" Webb, have beaten the Celtics twice this year, including a 126-123 overtime win Tuesday night in which Dominique "The Human Highlight Film" Wilkins poured in 54 points. Wayne "Tree" Rollins, rising star forward Kevin Willis, Glenn "Doc" Rivers, and youngster Cliff Battle fill out the Hawks' starting five, and second-year man Jon Koncak has improved immeasurably to become a competent backup to Rollins. If the Hawks can get Webb and pure shooting guard Randy Wittman healthy again, they could supplant the Celtics as rulers of the East.

The most surprising team in the East is the Central Division leading Detroit Pistons. Led by Isiah Thomas, perennially near the league lead in assists and a two-time All-Star Game MVP, the Pistons certainly got the good end of the Adrian Dantley-Kelly Tripucka trade. Hard working and good shooting center Bill Laimbeer is again near the league lead in rebounds, and former Chicago Bull Sidney Green and streak shooting guard Vinnie Johnson provide excellent help off the bench.

Other potential East playoff contenders include Milwaukee, Philadelphia, Washington, Chicago, and Indiana. The Bucks, after trading center Alton Lister to Seattle for Jack Sikma, still have one of the NBA's best players in forward Terry Cummings, and Ricky Pierce, Paul Pressey and Sidney Moncrief and perhaps the best trio of guards in the conference. Philadelphia's 76ers are led by the Round Mound of Rebound, Charles Barkley, who leads the league in both field goal percentage and rebounds, and the East's best point guard, Maurice Cheeks. Washington is led by the Malones, newly acquired (from Philadelphia for often injured Jeff Ruland) Moses and established veteran Jeff. Michael Jordan is the Chicago Bulls. The league's runaway scoring leader is all the Bulls have got besides Charles Oakley and John Paxson. And finally, the Indiana Pacers have an exciting young team led by Wayman Tisdale, Herb Williams, and tremendous athlete rookie Chuck Person. Look for this team to blossom with a few years of experience under their belts.

Zsa Zsa Gabor Shuns Swimmers

Not now, dear" replied Zsa Zsa Gabor, en asked by Big Cat Michelle Skeels if could take the star's photo. Several er swimmers" ran into Miss Gabor, mother, her sister and her dog in erly Hills while the team was there ing Block Break. By the time they overed from the initial thrill of seeing a ar" in person, it was too late to invite to the meet, but I'm sure she would e tried to make time in her busy edule to go cheer them on at Occidental lege.

The women had a tough schedule — no ationing in Sunny California for the Big s. 3 meets in 3 days took its toll. First, women had a tri-meet against remont College and Occidental College. e beat Claremont 79-62 and lost to Oxy 78. Although the meet was held outside d the chilly weather adversely affected ne of the swimmers, a few of the Tigers rned in some very good times. In the eeling 1000 yd. freestyle, Denise Collins pped 11 seconds (12:05.59) and Carla anca cranked out a personal best time. sh Franciosi, normally a breastroker, ed second in the 200 free (2:13.28). nthia Surrett won the 100 Breastroke h a personal best time of 1:13.8. Other first places were turned in by Beth en (1-meter diving), Gina Olsen (200 k), Brigitta Robinson (500 Free) and 200 free relay team of Michelle Skeels, is Lullenegger, Alison Wolfinger and gitta Robinson.

Local CC Alumni hosted both the Men Women's team for a pot luck dinner in after the meet. Special thanks go out those alumni whose efforts made the together a huge success.

Friday a.m. found the Women's team en route to San Diego for a day of "fun in the sun" and an evening of competition vs. U.C.S.D. (University of Cool Swimmin' Dudes). The U.C.S.D. women's team is ranked +2 Div. III, so the Big Cats focused on good times and not winning races. Some of the races were fast, and even with the distraction of the U.C.S.D. men's team having intersquad "races" between the women's heats, CC managed to take 5 first places: Gina Olsen (100 Back), Brigitta Robinson (1000 Free), Cynthia Surrett (100 Breast) and Beth Olsen (1 and 3 m. diving).

For the third and final meet of the "break," the Big Cats flew to Phoenix, Arizona early Sat. morning then drove to Flagstaff where they swam against Northern Arizona University (one of the top Division I swim teams).

The swimmers were dismayed at how long the pool looked, and felt — thinking it was an optical illusion and jet-lag until they learned it was a 25-meter rather than a 25-yard pool. Despite the longer distance, higher altitude and extreme exhaustion, most of the Big Cats swam well. Becky Warren swam a personal best time in the 200 Breast (2:56.3) with altitude conversion). Trish Franciosi (200 I.M.), Chris Luttenegger (100 Free) and Beth Olsen (1-m diving) added the only first places, but enough second and third place finished brought the final score to NAU 134, CC 115.

The Big Cats will face NAU again today in Greely in a tri-meet with U.N.C. Next week the Tigers host Metro on Thursday, then travel to Mines for the final dual meet of the season. We hope to see you all at Schlessman next Thursday.

CYNTHIA SURRETT

ANNOUNCEMENTS

The German Anti-War Classic Das Boot (English sub-titles) is showing Wed., Feb. 11 at 9:00 p.m. in the German House.

Coming Soon—Art Fish Day.

SKI's For Sale: Blizzard Thermo Slalom 195 cms; only used once. $180 ($360 value). Call Michele Fisher at 632-2058.

Tee Shirts—Fun Run participants must get their tee shirts from Adam Burke, 229 Loomis Hall, x243.

Leadership America

The program places special emphasis on building an international perspective and on increasing its participants' understanding of technology. In addition, students will practice leadership in the group setting, increase their self-awareness and build their self-confidence.

To be eligible for selection to Leadership America, a student must be currently enrolled at CC and have completed the junior year of his or her studies by June 12, 1987. The primary criterion for selection is that the student have an "outstanding potential for leadership." Selection will begin in February 1987, and will be completed by May 1, 1987. For additional information contact Dean Peterson, Summer Session, ext. 655 or 653. Applications for this program must be completed no later than March 13, 1987.

Want To See Your Face on the Silver Screen? Come dressed as a nuclear protestor Saturday (Feb. 7th) at 12 noon in Armstrong parking lot. Will drive to location, please bring car if possible. For more information call Jillian Robinson at 632-7862.

Furnished One Room Apartment, 235/month, bathroom, fireplace, sunny. Call 632-1723.

Rick Life will speak about his experiences on the Great Peace March for Nuclear Disarmament. Tuesday, Feb. 10th at 7:30 in Gates Common Room.

Spring Break Trip to South Padre Island from only $159. For information call Abby at 636-1022.

ACM Florence and London-Florence Programs—Information meeting Wednesday, Feb. 11, at 3:30, Palmer 223. Applications available from Judy McClow in the History Department office. March 15 final application date for the fall semester in Florence, early application for spring 1988 in London and Florence.

Study Abroad—Student planning to study abroad in non-ACM programs must apply to Foreign Studies Committee by March 2nd. See Prof. Blasenheim, Palmer 210, x532 for additional information.

The Cruise Line Industry has targeted college students for many of the over 8,000 open and available positions expected this year. Due to a tremendous increase in the number of passengers and new ships, being added to existing fleets, an unusually large number of new employees are needed.

GREAT PARTY ATMOSPHERE!

Interested college students should send their name and school address to: Cruise Lines International, 444 Brickell Ave., Plaza 51353, Miami, Floriad 33131-2492.

Lost: 2 rings; 1891 gold wedding band and 1930 class ring—possibly lost in Olin—Reward. Betsy, x317.

The Deadline for Requesting a Leave of Absence is March 1 for a leave which begins in the fall semester. Students are encouraged to apply for a leave even if they are awaiting word of their acceptance to a program. On formal application, a leave of absence will be considered for one of the following reasons: financial or personal emergency, ACM programs, the Washington Semester, or study abroad.

The withdrawal form must be submitted by March 1. However, it may be considered "pending" up until May 1 if the student so requests. All students who decide to interrupt their education at CC, and who do not qualify for a leave of absence, or who wish to transfer to another institution, are expected to withdraw formally from the College. Students who fail to submit an intention to withdraw by March 1 forfeit the general obligation deposit.

Valentine Love Lines... It's free!

Call and leave your dedications and messages at this number by Wednesday, Feb. 11

632-2998

Attention All Health Profession Students: There will be two important meetings of interest to all premedical and predental students— Monday, February 9, Mr. Frank Jiminez will be here from the California College of Podiatric Medicine. We will meet in Olin 100 at 3:00 p.m. Tuesday, February 10, we will be visited by Ms. Arlene Wrobleski, associated with the Marquette University Dental School in Wisconsin. Join us in the Olin Hall Fishbowl at 2:00 p.m.

Shove Chapel

Feb. 10th & 12th—Meditation—Shove Chapel, 8:00-8:30 a.m. Music, silence, mytical and/or other writings (enter by northeast door).

Feb. 11th—Shove Council Meeting, 12:00 noon, Shove Lounge.

Feb. 13th—Worship Service, Shove Chapel, 12:05 to 12:40.

Boettcher Basement

Sunday—AA Meeting, 6-7 p.m., small classroom. Monday—Adult Children of Alcoholics and Other Difficult Family Situations, 3-4:30 p.m. Monday—Weight Watchers Group for people who need to lose 10 lbs. or more, 12-1. Tuesday—Drug Group, 8-9:30 p.m.

Massages available by appointment.

Herpes Group—2nd Wednesday of each block, 7-9 p.m.

Please call x384 for further information.

Student Entries are now being a... for the fifteenth annual NICK A... SHORT STORY PRIZE competition... prize, named for the young Mich... protagonist of many of E... Hemingway's short stories, con... $1,000 given by an anonymous d... stimulate the literary creative ... among students at the Associated C... It will be awarded to the studen... submits a short story which ... exemplifies the creative proces... results of the competition w... announced, and the $1,000 prize a... to the winner, in May. Last year's ... was won by Timothy Fisher of S... College.

Each entrant may submit to the ... English Department as many a... stories, on any subject. The story ... have been written especially fo... competition, although it must not ... been previously published off-c... Deadline for submission of stories ... ACM Chicago office, through Prof. ... of the CC English Department, is ... 16. Further details of the contest and ... of previous winners' stories are ... available in the English Department ... x508.

Found: One large, black bomb wit... initials, KE. Curious? Meet at S... Chapel at 12:00 Fri. night. Bring $10...

Josephine Lazaru...
Instruction in the Yogas
(303) 475-9721

Are you people-oriented?

Would you like to spend the summer in Southern Wyoming, working on a guest ranch?

A representative of the A Bar A Guest Ranch will be on campus interviewing on February 10. Contact Nancy Nish in the Career Office if you would like to set up an appointment. Or, call Bob Howe (307) 327-5454 for more information.

Judd Nelson
Elizabeth Perkins
FROM the HIP

PG DEG

amc 598-5200
TIFFANY SQUARE 6
I-25 & WOODMEN RD.

STARTS FRIDAY, FEB. 6TH!

STUDENTS-Inquire about our special discounts!

100% Real Cheese

16 oz. Bottled Soft Drinks 60¢ Coca-Cola

PIZZA SHUTTLE
COMING AT YOU!

NOW 2 LOCATIONS

OPEN DAILY AT 11 AM

INTRODUCES THE 12 TOPPER

Two Large PIZZAS FOR ONLY

Toppings are: (No Substitutions or Deletions)
Pepperoni, Green Pepper, Onions, Ham, Mushrooms, Sausage, Ground Beef, Black Olives

$9.55 Plus Tax

(May be added upon request)
Green Olives, Pineapple, Anchovies, Jalapenos

Delivered FREE in 30 Min. or $3.00 OFF
(In Our 30 Minute Zone – Road & Weather Conditions Permitting)
Offer May Not Be Combined with ANY OTHER SPECIAL or COUPON Offer May Expire at Anytime – Our Drivers Carry Less Than $20

578-8686
2573 Airport Rd., Serving Colorado College and Central Colorado Springs

390-4040
7070 Hwy 85/87, Serving Ft. C., Security, Widefield and Fountain

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 13 February, 1987 Volume 21, No. 4

Photo by Anne Basting

The boys are back.

"Welcome to the Line"

Next week CC has the opportunity to ness a birth.WELCOME TO THE NE, a new play by Bill Sonnega and ected by Neal Baron will open for its ld premiere here on the main stage of rmstrong, February 19-22.

"WELCOME TO THE LINE drops in on lives of Colt, a 33 year old Ford factory rker who relishes in his glory days of n-pro baseball; Skye, his aerobicizing fe, who dreams of glory days to come; ll, their 15 year old rock and rolling ughter; and Blue, Colt's factory and ball ying buddy.

The characters, played by Mike nnocucci, Lisa Holtby, Heidi St. Marie, d Tajani Cole struggle to preserve family friendships in the midst of lay offs, pay hidden truths, and the underlying ent of racism.

The play has been through several staged readings, but never a full production. It won first place in the NYU Tisch School of the Arts Festival of New Work in 1983, and was a finalist at the O'Neil National Playwright's Conference in 1985 and the Actors Theatre of Louisville Great American Play Contest in 1983.

In its first production Baron and Sonnega capture the pulsating, real-life pain of a family suddenly stripped of security, ironically juxtaposed with the cold rolling of the Ford Plant conveyor belts.

Baron and Sonnega, both graduates of CC, have been at the college since 5th block, Neal teaching Beginning Directing, and Bill, Writing for Performance. Both stumbled into Drama at CC, and left here

Continued on p. 13

Honor Council: Some Misconceptions Cleared Up

No power trip here

They don't really do anything, do they?" t seems like a secret police force - you ar they're after you and then you isappear into the Black Hole of Honor ouncil Trials." "Everyone who goes fore the Council is found guilty." They're all on a power trip." "They aren't ing a very good job, people are still sting."

This is a sampling of opinions voiced by udents concerning the CC Honor ouncil. In the interest of balanced porting I should say we did get some mplimments, but generally people have ttle understanding of who we are or what e do.

The current Council has 14 members. ach April the Honor Council seeks minations for new members. Those udents who are nominated and wish to ek a position, submit a letter of intent to e Council. These letters are made ailable for the student body review and ections are held. Each student, excluding embers of the Honor Council, may vote for two nominees. Those receiving the highest number of votes are interviewd by the Council. Once a student becomes a member he or she remains on the Council until they graduate.

While the duties of the Council include orienting new students to the system and working with faculty and administration, the most important and time consuming thing we do is conduct trials. We average two trials each block, and no, everyone is not found guilty.

A quorum of at least 11 Council members is present at every first violation hearing, and at least 13 at second violation hearings. Trials usually involve the accused, the professor or student who brings the case before us, and character witnesses for the accused.

The accuser appears first. Before testifying he or she is read a section of the Constitution which states the Council presumption that students are innocent until proven guilty and reiterates that perjury by a witness under oath is a

Continued on p. 12

Archdruid Speaks

Environmental activist, David Brower, spoke to CC students and local citizens on "Directions in Environmentalism" last Sunday night in Packard Hall.

As former director of the Sierra Club and now as board chairman of Earth Island Institute, an environmental agency based in San Francisco, Brower has fought to save wilderness across the world for over thirty years.

Nick-named the "Archdruid" ("a religious figure who sacrifices people and worhips trees") some years ago by Carolina resort developer Charles Frazier, Brower stands at the forefront of the environmental movement with the reputation as an ardent defender of all unspoiled wilderness.

As Brower says "I'm trying to keep at least two percent of the terrain as wilderness — Two percent is under pavement. I'm trying to do anything I can to get man back into balance with the environment. He's way out — way out of balance. The land won't last, and neither will we."

During his Sunday speech Brower mixed much of his personal history and favorite quotes into his speech regarding the Earth's situation. "We travel together on this tiny spaceship — Earth. Our need isn't for greater brains and technology but for a gentler tolerance. We depend on a limited resource — this planet, which is totally unique. And we must learn to protect it."

"We've reached the point where we can successfully get rid of ourselves and everything else worthwile on this planet," Brower stressed. He then used the Christian concept of the six days of creation to illustrate how little time human beings have spent on the earth yet how quickly they have drastically altered its delicate balance.

"We're building tensions beyond belief yet we only got here on the sixth day a few minutes before midnight. And most of that time we've spent as hunter-gatherers. That was a good life the hunter-gatherers led. But then a few workaholics came around and invented agriculture, stated Brower.

Just mention the "ArchDruid" to large-scale developers or Washington lobbyists and one realizes that Brower hasn't built a reputation as a compromiser.

"Compromise should be the job of people elected to higher office. Compromise doesn't always work. We need to stop logging. The forests, the Grand Canyon, they aren't ours to compromise. We have to stand firm for our views. I try to do that," Brower adds.

Brower also spoke on the need for cooperation within the environmental movement and emphasized his Earth Island Institute's role in providing direction for various environmental groups.

"We must work toward making this a green century — restoration of the environment we have damaged and trashed. As environmentalists we must create the blueprint. The greatest conservation goal must be the long-term restoration and preservation of our earth."

ALEC REKOW

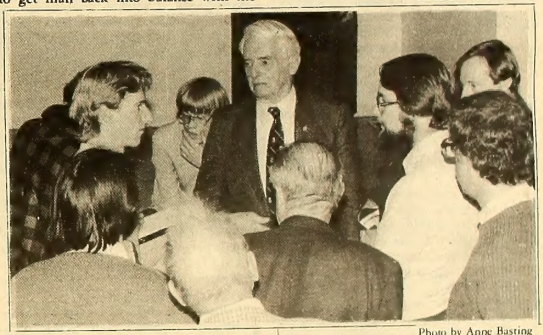

Photo by Anne Basting

Working for a green century.

INSIDE

CC Cheated of TRIBES
Page 4

Fitzgerald Lambasts Catalyst
Page 6

Love
Page 10

Iron Maiden Kicks Ass
Page 15

Drivel Reaches Torrential Proportions
Page 18

What's News?

Questioning the Issues

A dispute is brewing over whether states should legislate English as the official language of the country. And Colorado is no stranger to the controversy. As usual Colorado and other states look to California for precedent-setting legislation. One of California's recent decisions to declare English its official language (in the November, 1986 election) has challenged Colorado to grapple with the issue of whether English should be the only officially recognized language in the state. When 75% of California voters pledged their enthusiasm for Proposition 63, which established English as the official language, in what is known as an English-only bill, state politicians around the country initiated similar actions and prepared to follow suit.

As the Colorado legislature debates whether or not to follow the lead of California in adopting an English-only bill, we must question exactly what kind of leadership California has provided and explore the potential results of English-only legislation.

Proponents of the English-only movement cite poor knowlege of English among immigrants and minority residents as evidence that the U.S. needs to declare an official language. Asserting the official dominance of English, argue leaders of the U.S. English movement, will augment both the nation's productivity and overall power, and elevate the quality of life for immigrants whose poor English may limit their ability to compete in the work world and thus their ability to become "successful." They argue that many Spanish speakers (among others) are failing to assimilate themselves into the predominant culture because they cannot speak English. In order to integrate these people with the cultural heritage of the U.S., English-only advocates believe that English must be force-fed. The strength of the U.S. depends, they say, on the unity that exists among its citizens.

Those who oppose the English-only concept concede that English is a vital tool for survival in the U.S. They argue, however, that legislating the official superiority of English threatens to destroy a variety of multilingual services offered for non-English speaking immigrants. Critics cite, for example, the potential loss of vital bilingual education programs in cities such as Los Angeles, which boast a potpourri of citizens, ranging from Hispanics to Asians to Latin Americans. Bilingual education attempts to nurture increased knowledge of English among young immigrants and seeks to prevent children from floundering in confusion during the key primary school years. The loss of funding for such programs, argue English-only opponents, would undermine the attempt to promote sound education and the preservation of diverse cultural values.

As we consider the pros and cons of the issue, the question arises about why the movement to assert the dominance of English has recently gained popularity. Why, when English holds an astounding strength and dominance as an important language on the global scene and boasts a similarly comfortable tacit dominance within the U.S., is English-only support spiralling? Do we perhaps fear the loss of jobs to what seems like an ever-increasing influx of immigrants? Or do we more generally fear anyone alien to ourselves? Is it merely coincidence that the legislation targets residents of Pueblo and not those who live in Aspen?

The bill before the Colorado legislature on the surface is very simple. It says, "The English language is the official language of Colorado." Its proponents view the legislation as a simple strategy for encouraging unity. Why then, are Hispanic leaders so offended by the bill? The Gazette Telegraph reported on Monday, February 9th that Colorado governor, Roy Romer, has promised to veto the bill. Would passage of such a bill be a symbolic act, merely reflecting a reality? Or is enforcement a crucial consideration? What impact will the "officiality" of English have? Will the law enable law enforcement officers to punish non-English speakers or businesses to discriminate against them?

Does the idea of English as the official language have implications that stretch beyond its apparent simplicity? Is American culture one that has been formed by diversity or dominance? The influence of Spanish speakers, for example, in Colorado and the entire Southwest is undeniable. Before ratifying this bill, it is important that we examine the roots of both our national and state culture.

Seventy five percent of Californians supported an English-only bill. What does such a mandate say about the priority of preserving diverse cultural traditions in the U.S.? Is there indeed one cultural heritage to which all races must submit, a melting pot in which all disparate members meld into one? Or is the melting pot really a stew in which each element retains its own identity but contributes to the flavor of the whole?

California made a strong statement in November. States such as Hawaii, Louisiana and New Mexico have already legislated bilingualism. Fourteen other states are currently considering passage of English-only legislation. Which path will Coloradans choose?

NEWS EDITORS

News Briefs

Woodrow Wilson Fellow Visits Campus

Madelon DeVoe Talley, chairperson of the Women's Economic Round T and nationally known financial consultant, will visit CC the week of February 1 Woodrow Wilson Visiting Fellow. During her visit she will give two speeche campus. At 7:30 p.m. Tuesday, February 17, in Gates Common Room, she speak on "Ethics in Business." AT 8 p.m. Thursday, February 19, in Gates com Room, Talley will speak on "Women in Business." Talley is known as a progres representative of that segment of business leadership that advocates business as a public leader in ethical issues. She is also a dynamic speaker on women's i and on women in American business.

The Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Program, based in Princeton, N recruits as Visiting Fellows succesful men and women from business, journal public service and other professions, for a week of intensive dialogue with stud and faculty at small liberal arts colleges. The Fellows try to help equip student the social, political and economic environment that the students will be enter

Political Science Symposium

On February 21, 1987, the Colorado College Political Science Department host a Political Science Symposium. Students from the Air Force Acad University of Colorado at Boulder, University of Denver, and Universit Colorado at Colorado Springs have been invited to participate. Colorado Col students are invited to participate in the symposium, too. Four round discussions will be held during the symposium. They will address the topic Political Theory, International Relations, Public Policy, and American Poli Students may participate in the symposium in three ways. First, students present papers they have written during their political science careers. Sec students can discuss papers assigned to them. Third, students can add to discussions as observers. Every Political Science major or joint major at Colo College is eligible to participate in the symposium. Information sheets application forms are available in the Political Science office.

Chinese New Year Celebration

A WEEK OF ASIAN EVENTS: FEBRUARY 14-20
Sponsored by A.S.I.A., East Asia House, CCCA, Extra-Curric, and Great Performers and Ideas

SATURDAY—"North of the Great Wall," a lecture/slideshow on Manchu with Wally Beevers. Armstrong Rm. 300, 2 p.m., reception to follow.

SUNDAY—"Japan: A Student Perspective," a slideshow/discussion w former Waseda University students John Flanagan, Leslie Scott, and Leg Thomsen. East Asia House, 6 p.m.

MONDAY—Mr. Lee, Vice-President of Ch'angsha University, will speak 8:15 p.m. in Loomis Lounge.

TUESDAY—Darrel Hess will speak about Japan and Korea at 8:15 p.m. Loomis Lounge.

WEDNESDAY—Pat Mauney, Coordinator of Overseas Ministries for t Spiscopal Church, will lecture about the church in China at 7 p.m. in Gates Comm Room.

THURSDAY—Chinese Night at SAGA. An Origami Festival will be held East Asia House at 7 p.m.

FRIDAY—CHINESE NEW YEAR PARTY! The band "Order in Progres will play in Cossit Hall from 9 p.m.-1 a.m. Come celebrate "The Year of t Rabbit."

FOR VALENTINES DAY
SHOW YOUR LOVED ONES
HOW BIG YOUR HEART
CAN GET; WITH GIFTS
(we have the best) AND
CARDS (the best too)
FROM
Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm
Sat. 11-5 pm
THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE
Downtown
on Platte Between Tejon &
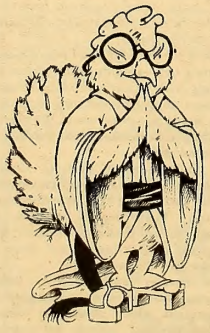
Cascade
phone:
635-2118

YAKITORI
Sushi Happy - Hour
Saturday's 5 - 7 pm
Most Pieces of Sushi $1.00 a piece*
* Some are more.



Downtown
16 E. Bijou
578-0915
Yaki-Doodle

eace March Discussed

The Great Peace March for Nuclear armament saw triumph last November over 1200 marchers reached shington D.C. When asked whether the ch was a success beyond the distance lked, Rick Life, a local Colorado Springs dent sponsored by the CC Nuclear tion Coalition to speak on the event last sday night, admitted "Yes, but to grees not really measurable."

The march, begun in Los Angeles in rch, 1986, neared defeat before reaching vada due to unforeseen financial costs. e explained how Pro Peace (People ching Out for Peace) sponsored the tial days before going bankrupt. The ney went fast for luxuries the group n realized could not be afforded. Life o mentioned that many doubts existed how the group would fair in the harsh mate of the Nevada and Utah deserts. nonetheless over 350 of the original 1200 ged to continue, and through fund- ing along the way, and perserverance ough the heat, they managed to tinue for eight long months to shington.

The group consisted of people from ny professions and ideologies, but all ched a concensus on four goals that st be met: 1) Immediately cease and tist from all nuclear testing while ectively negotiating the Comprehensive st Ban Treaty. 2) Actively support a tually verifiable freeze on all nuclear apons development by all nations. 3) gin effective negotiations for the duction to zero of already existing uclear weapons stockpiles. 4) Support ly peaceful uses of outerspace.

In addition Life added his personal ncerns for general peace. He approached nuclear disarmament as a global issue that must start at the grass roots level, and cited the imminent need for peace as a means to alleviate the psychological distress of the generations of children growing up in the nuclear age.

While they often received negative rhetoric from members of the many communities they passed through, "the positive reactions countered them one-hundred fold," asserted Life. It is on this level that Life found the march a success.

Continued on p. 5

Photo by Ginny Bunker

Life on life.

Buy a "Warm Fuzzy" for someone you love
20% off - stuffed animals
20% off - all books with "love" in the title

Colorado College Bookstore
McGregor Hall

the Stagecoach Inn
702 Manitou Avenue
On Fountain Creek in Manitou Springs

 A Special Offer **

25% off any meal for two
Sunday through Thursday
Must bring in advertisement
Expires February 28, 1987

Reservations 685-9335
Banquet Facilities
On All Occasions

LATE NIGHT SPECIAL!

One 12" two topping pizza for only $4.99 plus tax!
(After 9 pm)

Now from Domino's Pizza, it's the late night special. Any night of the week beginning at 9pm, you can get a 12", 2-topping pizza for only $4.99! (tax not included) Just $4.99 for a fresh, custom-made, 2-topping pizza delivered hot to your door in 30 minutes or less—guaranteed! So when you get the late night hungries—no problem! Just call Domino's Pizza. One call does it all to make your late night special. Offer expires February 28, 1987.

We accept checks.
Prices do not include tax.
Our drivers carry less than $20.00.

All Pizzas include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.

Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95

Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers, Extra Cheese (1 item) Double Cheese (2 items) Thick Crust, Extra Sauce
Each Item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19

$3

If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes, present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off that order—right then.

For safety reasons, if roads are icy, snowpacked, or flooded, please add 15 minutes to our guarantee.
One coupon per pizza.
30 minute guarantee good with any offer.

Fast, Free Delivery™
Good at listed locations.

DOMINO'S PIZZA®

Coke Classic® 12 oz. cans

Coca-Cola Classic

©1986 Domino's Pizza, Inc.

$4.99

Order a 12" two-topping pizza for only $4.99 from 9 pm until closing, any night of the week!

Offer expires February 28, 1987.
No coupon necessary.

Fast, Free Delivery™
Good at listed locations.

DOMINO'S PIZZA®

TWO 12" PIZZAS FOR $9.14

ONE TOPPING

(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.

One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!

For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same!), and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings

Two 12" pizzas for the price of one 16" pizza!

Superb Cheese	$7.95
1 topping	$9.14
2 toppings	$10.33
3 toppings	$11.52
4 toppings	$12.71
5 toppings	$13.90
6 toppings	$15.09

Twice the pizza for one low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minute or less, GUARANTEED!

Offer may expire anytime

635-1511

Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.

Limited delivery area.

CC Loses Coveted TRIBES Program

The Council of Energy Resource Tribes (CERT) has announced the relocation of the TRIBES summer program from Colorado College to the University of Colorado at Boulder. According to CERT spokeswoman, Lucille Echohawk, the decision came primarily as a result of CU's ability to offer professional Native American counseling for the students and increased follow-up on their activities after participation in the summer TRIBES program.

TRIBES (The Tribal Resource Institute in Business, Engineering, and Science) is a program designed to enhance the academic skills of graduated American Indian high school students. The program has taken place each summer at CC since 1982. The TRIBES academic program stresses science, mathematics and writing, seeking to cultivate skills among Indian students that could enhance their knowledge of energy and natural resource issues.

Echohawk, an Associate Director of CERT described the decisiion to move the program to CU as a very difficult one. "Ultimately there were additional programs that CU could offer," said Echohawk. Noting the financial restraints that limited CC, she stressed CU's ability to offer a larger, full time, Native American counseling staff and the already existing mechanism to record the effects of the program on former participants. CC had never provided such a service. Echohawk noted that the ongoing staff support that CU could offer through its full time staff would enhance the continuity of the program. Each year that TRIBES took place at CC, a new summer director organized the program. Echohawk noted that these directors were very effective, but she commented on the "burn out" that they experienced. Year long planning by a continuous staff, CERT anticipates, will strengthen the program.

Both administrators and former TRIBES participants at CC have reacted with disappointment to the January decision. Summer Session Dean, Pete Peterson, stressed that "we certainly want the program back." Barry Sarchett, Assistant Dean of Summer Session, believes that the program is much better off at a smaller campus. He admits that the Native American staff is larger at CU, but notes that "CC had a good community support system" and that the student Resident Advisors for the TRIBES program "were terrific."

Echohawk noted that everyone at CC worked hard to keep the program. She felt that both President Riley and Dean Peterson offered it their complete support. "In a way it's unfair," she said. "We've had tremendous experiences with CC, but CU can simply offer more."

CC student, Chris Watchman, who participated in TRIBES during its first year at CC in 1982, and has remained involved as an RA and student advisor for the program since then, felt that the program "should never have been moved."

"You'll never find a program at a large school that will give a student an experience of personal attention, both academically and socially, that CC does," said Watchman. He stressed the importance of TRIBES in preparing Indian students for college experiences. "I like the intensity of CC. It forces native Americans to confront other students which increases their confidence." Watchman also fears that the TRIBES students will become isolated at CU. At CC the Native Americans were integrated with the summer starts, forcing both groups of students to grapple with racial differences. "Summer starts have lost a lot," notes Watchman.

Barry Sarchett echoes Watchman's views. He notes what a rare learning experience TRIBES provided. "All I can say is that it is a terribly sad thing to lose. Both the summer starts and the TRIBES students will be losing a unique multi-cultural opportunity."

Other potential long term losses for CC include a probable lower enrollment of Native American students at CC. Chris Watchman also stresses the loss in recognition that CC will suffer, noting that TRIBES is the only program of its kind for Native American students in the nation.

Watchman understands CERT's decision to a degree, because as he says "TRIBES is CERT's pride, their only funded educational program. Of course they want to upgrade it by making sure the statistics measure up." The follow-up program will aid in statistical evaluations. Watchman also concedes that the program at CC suffered from a lack of continuity. He noted that getting the program staffed each year was always a challenge and that often last minute hiring contributed to disorganization.

Watchman and another former CC participant in TRIBES, Mark Towersap, also fear that continuing problems may have precipitated the decision to move the program. Speaking for CERT, Lucille Echohawk concedes that alcohol abuse created a persistent problem. "Although problems with alcohol were not a major reason for moving the program, they certainly were a concern for CERT." "We are comfortable that CU will have stricter rules on alcohol policy." Although Echohawk says that plans for this summer's program are not finalized, she believes that alcohol abuse will most likely be reduced by stricter restrictions imposed on the students. Students will probably live all together and will not be integrated with other CU students. If the students are housed off-campus, the imposition of a strict alcohol policy will be facilitated by the fact that the program will not be hampered by campus alcohol policies.

Although both Towersap and Watchman concede that alcohol is a problem, they note the importance of students developing a mature sense of responsibility.

Towersap stresses the importance of TRIBES as a preparatory program for college. "CC does stimulate a realistic experience." Watchman says that as an advisor for the program he did not wish to act as a parent or disciplinarian. Instead he believes the program should foster growth and maturity in the students. "They need to take responsibility both for learning and for their behavior."

"It's true that some students need help in becoming oriented in different environments, but it is by their own choice that they come to a new environment and it should be in their best interest to adapt," says Watchman.

Towersap believes that a very strict alcohol policy will inhibit student adjustment to college life. At some p they must take responsibility for mature use of alcohol. "Cutting them from the rest of campus will just them go crazy later," says Towersap.

Barry Sarchett reacting to the al issue says, "I don't know how it will be easier to curtail alcohol problems Boulder. I mean this is Boulder talking about." He stresses that alc abuse is a number one problem on reservations, but he says, "The i TRIBES is to prepare students for rigors of college life and that me teaching self-discipline." He doubts the discipline problems would be en of a reason for anyone at CC to be rel about the relocation of TRIBES.

Chris Watchman notes that, "the thing I got out of TRIBES was not just it strengthened my academic foundat but that it helped me learn how to w with people and accept help." He no that the Native Americans coming t program often have a very strong sens pride and that helping them break thro that is vital.

Watchman believes that one-on-o counseling is the most effective strat for helping students work out th problems with adjustment to the acade and social challenges of college life. T he believes that the increased couns staff at CU will be an asset to the progr But he stresses that RA's were succes counselors and that the TRIBES stude are probably more responsive to p tutoring. The experience of trying understand what it is like to be Na American also proved invaluable to RA's, Watchman believes. Watchman

TRIBES continued on p

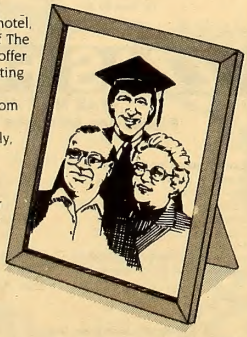
THE ANTLERS HOTEL
Colorado Springs, Colorado

Picture yourself at The Antlers Hotel for graduation.
Colorado Springs' finest...for only $60!

The Antlers...Colorado Springs' only Four-Star, Four-Diamond hotel, located just nine blocks south of The Colorado College, has a special offer for families and friends of graduating students.

- Single or double occupancy room rate of only $60
- A portrait of graduate and family, compliments of The Antlers
- Complimentary valet parking

Call Cynthia at The Antlers for reservations...we'll make this special event picture perfect!



4 S. Cascade Avenue
Chase Stone Center
Colorado Springs,
Colorado 80903
(303) 473-5600
(800) 232-2323
Operated by The Broadmoor Management Company

© 1987, The Antlers

Valentine's "Red" Sale!
at
Mountain Chalet

IF IT'S RED*...IT'S15% OFF!
ANYTHING RED

Red...skis, ice axes, swiss army knives, sunglasses, daypacks, backpacks, rugby shirts, clothing by Patagonia, Marmot, North Face, Long John shirts and nightgowns, bandanas, stuff sacks, water & fuel bottles, and much more...

February 12, 13, 14

Red buckets of paint & magic markers must be checked in at the door

CC's Outdoor Connection
226 N. Tejon • Downtown •633-0732

Economics in Hungary

...ading toward a freer market?

...Hungary must be watched," asserts ...bert Hornik, a senior philosophy major ...o spent block five in Budapest, Hungary ...h the help of a CC Venture Grant. ...bert spoke of his trip in an hour-long ...sentation in Palmer Hall Wednesday ...ht. The focus of his presentation was, ... interpretation of the effect of the ...plementation of free market ...chanisms in the microeconomic sector ...Hungary's planned socialist economy. ...Hungary, like most eastern bloc ...tries stems from a monolithic (one ...ty) sytem that breeds passivity in a ...iety alienated from politics and ...stomed to a paternal government. ...ngary's Socialist government sparked ... impressive reconstruction and ...dustrialization after the destruction of ...rld War II. The Hungarians admit that ...ialism worked wonders for the rapid ...odernization of their country but as of ...w they want to scrap some of their ...anned market mechanisms in order to ...ieve the economic efficiency found with ...e implementation of free market ...chanisms. This brings forward a ...confrontation between Marxist Socialist ...eology and economic reality. Hungary ...es the problem of achieving economic ...ficiency while maintaining the economic ...uality they have known in their planned ...onomy.

Being a sate lite of the Soviet Union, Hungary could have good reason to be wary of taking their reforms farther than the Soviets would approve of. As of yet, however, Hungary has the Gorbachev go ahead on their economic reforms and is acting as a test country, dipping its toe into the pool of the free market. The question is whether or not Hungary will develop into a unique model of a changing economy or copy social democracy. Robert sees three most likely manifestations of free market implementations in Hungary: 1. That Hungary will develop an effecient economic compromise between command and free market systems. 2. Hungary will develop a purely free market system and a rift in the Communist Party leading to a multi-party system. 3. Hungary will develop a purely free market system with a liberalized monarchical political system where education in socialist ideology will teach social consciousness.

Robert compared Hungary's economic status after World War II to the developing nations in our world today. He pointed out that socialism is the best way to modernize and industrialize a developing country and thus the US should take the initiative to implement socialism in developing countries - as it is better equipped capital-wise to do so than the Soviet Union or the other eastern bloc countries. This suggestion drew a large amount of discussion from Robert's audience.

BILL CAMPBELL

Photo of the Week

Photo by Katy Anderson

Awards in Literature Offered

...Do you want to explore? Do you like to ...ravel? If so, it may pay up to $2,000 to ...nvestigate the "CC Award in Literature" ...rants offered for 1987.

A fine opportunity awaits potential ...pplicants on Thursday, February 19 at ...:45 p.m., when the four 1986 Award ...inners will report on their experiences in ...he English Club Room (245 Armstrong): ...laire Brown on "Stepping into the Hills ... living and writing fiction about the ...Missouri Ozarks," Tracy Thomsic on ...Faulkner's Conception of Women," ...Priscilla Perkins on "Family Outlaws," and ...Tony Lopez on "A Tribal History of the ...Crow Creek Sioux."

The presentations will not only provide ...n opportunity for last year's winners to ...share their experiences with the CC ...community but will also allow interested ...students to learn about some award-...winning proposals and to ask questions ...about the kinds of projects that are most ...likely to succeed and the way to apply for ...them.

All CC juniors are encouraged to apply ...for this award, which is given to three or ...four juniors in any major field each year. (Recent winners have included majors in Anthropology, Sociology, Philosopohy, and Music.)

Offered since 1981, the CC Award in Literature has meant up to $2000 toward junior-senior summer projects and $100 toward block projects. The money can be used for travel, relief from the necessity of a summer jobf, or other purposes.

This year with over $5000 in its budget, the "Award in Literature" committee hopes to give two awards for the junior-senior summer and one or two for a single block in the senior year.

"The summer awards tend to be free-wheeling, while the one-block grants may be more attuned to independent study, with the possibility of academic credit, depending of course upon faculty consent," states committee member Professor Reinitz.

"A lot of freedom comes with the award," Reinitz adds. The only real obligation recipients need to fulfill is the presentation. Other than that, they're free to explore.

In the past, applications have proved diverse. Proposals have ranged from living and working in a fishing village off the western coast of Greece and writing about it" to "writing a musical comedy in Fishers Island, N.Y." Reinitz admits that "while many of the application ideas sound interesting, the ones that win have been well thought out and presented to the committee."

Students interested in more information should contact "CC Award in Literature Committee" members: Profs. Reinitz, Butte, Stone, Fred; Priscilla Perkins, Chris Bell, and Debbie Nichol.

The deadline for completed applications is Friday, March 20, at 5:00 p.m. in Armstrong 253 (George Butte's office).

ALEC REKOW

TRIBES continued from p. 4

that he can understand why the program is being moved, but that he still cannot justify the decision.

Echohawk notes that the decision to move TRIBES is a one year decision. CERT hopes that should the program not work out at CU, CC would be receptive to hosting it again in the summer of 1988. CERT, which will put $85,000 into TRIBES this summer to fund 30-50 students, is most concerned with providing Native American students with an excellent experience.

KATIE KERWIN

Life from p. 3

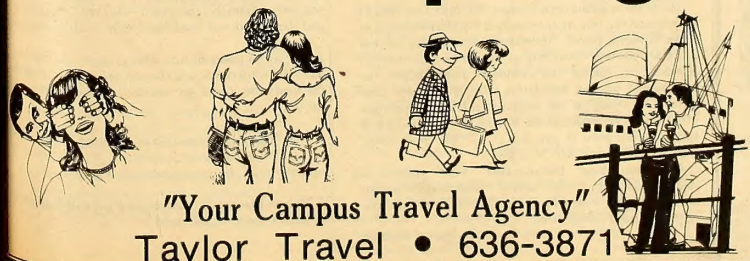
The four common goals sought by the hundreds of marchers remain elusive, yet the sympathy, concern and hope found by many along the way represent success. Life described many moments of tearful encounters and responses of good will from the public. He clarified that along with many other marchers and witnesses, he is "a much changed person for participating." He sighted new direction and ambition toward future studies and a career in politics as a product of his experience.

The March for Peace continues next summer, moving to the Soviet Union for a jaunt from Leningrad to Moscow. Life hopes to attend and once again reaffirm his strong beliefs in world peace.

Think Spring!



"Your Campus Travel Agency"

Taylor Travel • 636-3871

On Hockey

Last weekend the CC hockey team dropped 2 heart-breakers to perennial powerhouse Minnesota. Their record stands at 11 wins, 22 loses and 1 tie—good for a last place tie in the WCHA. Any team can have a bad year, but this season's performance has proven especially frustrating for the Tigers because the experts forecasted a strong CC showing. 14 one-goal-game loses have not helped. Why do they lose all these close contests? Because they're supposed to. CC lacks the winning tradition most of their opponents carry (they haven't been a national powerhouse since the fifties), and they simply don't have the personel. Every CC hockey player is at least a competent Division I player, but to compete in the WCHA requires the best. Lacking the tradition, and existing in a state short of hockey talent severely hampers CC recruiting efforts. More often than not CC will come up short in recruiting wars with more recognized teams such as Minnesota or Denver. CC to the WCHA is like Northwestern to the Big Ten.

The hockey dilemma poses some questions. Does the hockey team compromise CC's academic reputation? (Yes there are geniunely smart hockey players.) What are the prospects for future recruiting and competetive success? How important is the program to campus life? And finally what is the program's financial standing? Is the team financially successful or could its money be more effectively utilized by the college? These not so pressing questions are often posed when Division I teams flounder.

The typical negativist response would be "send 'em to Division III with the rest of the sports." But it's not that easy. Beyond the typical legal hassles that go along with big business (and CC hockey is big business), that would accompany such a radical move, more problems loom. Alumni certainly would not be happy, the very successful Division I women's soccer team would be relegated to the Third Division, and the college would lose a significant contact to the Colorado Springs community.

A storm is rising as people become more disgruntled with the program. Some form of change is obviously needed and whatever direction the college decides to take, it is sure to receive intense journalistic and intr-campus scrutiny. My initial reaction is to at least change conferences—the WCHA has always been the nation's strongest league. More to come later.

M.F.

THE COLORADO COLLEGE

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETE LOACH, News Editors
DAVE EVANS & ANNE MANHART, Features Editors
MUNIR MEGJHEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
•
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETE SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
•
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
•
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Cutler Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone: (303) 473-[illegible] extension 675. The Catalyst is [illegible] monthly from September to May, except during holiday periods.

[illegible] tion, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its education programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local laws.

Editorials appearing in the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 400 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Rastall Center, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

A work of considerable length may be submitted as a guest commentary. Persons interested in submitting commentary should contact the Catalyst at 632-3990 or 473-2233 ext. 675.

The Catalyst reserves the right to edit or cut letters to the editor and guest commentaries.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Tyrannical Dead

To the Editor:

Thanks to Mr. Nice Guy. I am glad to see that someone finally stood up to the tyrany of the Dead.

— Andrew Christensen

Breathing In The Dead

To the Editor:

In response to Mr. Thesing's article concerning the Grateful Dead, I must agree with him on one of his very first points. He is definitely trapped all right. He is trapped inside his own narrow, judgemental psyche. A psyche that tells him to criticize instead of accept. It is a disappointing aspect of society that has people do, say, and print things without the opportunity of experience.

It is my feeling that it is wrong for a person to pass a judgement on something without fully experiencing it first. Simply listening to some Grateful Dead tapes or shows does not give someone a true feeling of what this band is about. In order to fully comprehend the band, one should attend a show and "breathe in" their character, their harmony, and their spirit. It's not only the music, however, that defines a Dead show.

All you have to do is look around the crowd at a show and you can feel the happiness and love the people themselves create. Skeptics may assess this euphoria to the use of psychedelics, and granted, a drop of acid doesn't suck. But it is the drugs, combined with the colors, the dancing, the music, and the feelings that constitute the true Dead experience.

Please don't let me be misunderstood. I'm not saying that everyone should like the Dead or that if you don't enjoy a show, there's something wrong with you. I just see how the Grateful Dead has brought so much joy into so many lives and I only wish that people like Mr. Thesing would experience before criticize, accept instead of judge. Mark, go to a Dead show, empty your mind beforehand, and inhale the atmosphere and then you can fairly make a judgement.

I didn't write this article to declare the Dead as the greatest Rock n'Roll band. In fact, they can't even be compared to any other musical group. Their sound is quite unique and often difficult to grasp. But as promoter Bill Graham says, "They (Dead) are not the best at what they do, they are the only ones who do what they do."

— Rick Goldstein

Wayne v. Mr. Nice Guy

To the Editor:

Now that the uncaring, undesirable and altogether misinformed malcontent Mr. Nice Guy is back in print, I felt it only appropriate to respond to such a low vermin with some "nice guy" sentiments of my own. Death to Wayne was not nice.

Although I am not known to be antagonistic, upholding my pride is necessary. Mr. Nice Guy is as un-American as quiche and should travel back to the mother country that exiled him. He would not understand the symbolic overtones of a U.S. flag if it was draped over his coffin after his "accidental" military death. (Uzis are my specialty). No, this vile Russkie cannot even feel the pride instilled in the bosoms of all Americans. Go home, Mr. Nice Guy!

I state these accusations because Mr. Nice Guy fails to understand the true motives behind my glorious quest to make America proud. Optimism is the key for success and since you don't have any, go open a borscht stand in Kiev. I am raising the common man's hopes for recognition in this wonderful country of mine, and putting CC back on the map when David Letterman introduces The Voice of the Future. My campaign will live forever, even if you don't : . . like your lover, Liberace. Go home, Mr. Nice Guy!

One last thing, blintz-maker. Your slanderous remarks concerning my "sexual" profit organizations are now under review by F. Lee Bailey. Take care, you have just been subpoenaed.

— Wayne D. Rudner

Music: A Universal Languag

To the Editor:

Music. When I think of music I think of pure emotio[n] flowing through the rhythyms of a beat and the sub[tle] nuances of a melody. Music is a powerful medium [of] expression, one through which completely differe[nt] individuals may blend consciously together in harmo[ny]. Music is a universal language; a language of the huma[n] soul.

Therefore, when people dance and feel groovy to the[ir] favorite tunes, I say, "alright!" I know they are leav[ing] the barriers down and experiencing the rush of pu[re] emotion flowing through their veins. They are able [to] relax and perceive life through the expressions of oth[er] individuals. In crowds of thousands or simply two peo[ple] alone, the feeling is the same. The creative energ[y] there. Yet, sometimes I hear of people criticizing othe[rs] for their musical tastes and I have to laugh. I la[ugh] because I know that these people are consciously blocki[ng] themselves off from what other people have to say [by] denying themselves access to one of the basic tenets [of] life: variation. If we forget that the great beauty of lif[e] this planet lies in the incredible array of biological a[nd] geological variation, then how are we to ever re[ally] understand one another. Music is a unique solution. A[s] Peter Tosh says, "Music is the universal language." Music belongs to us all, and thus can cross cultural a[nd] ideological barriers alike.

So, let's let people dance and feel groovy to the[ir] favorite tunes without criticism. If I feel great when I listen to the Grateful Dead, then I should be allowed to feel so without fear of criticism. If you feel groo[vy] listening to Frank Sinatra or Iron Mainden then [you] shouldn't criticize you. We should allow all forms of musical expression to exist simultaneously, and ma[ke] wholehearted attempts to at least conceptualize the[ir] source of those feelings. Whether or not we agree wi[th] the music should be inconsequential. If we disagree, we should keep it to ourselves. We might be a hell of a lo[t] better off in this world today if we could just open up our hearts and minds to other people's emotions and ways of looking at life. So why not start now? There is no ti[me] like the present to start opening up and maybe, just maybe, we might learn something new about ourselves and the people around us.

Sincerely,
Matthew Wilso[n]

"Clearly, mistakes were made...

To the Editor:

Unfortunately, the reporter did not contact me, as I requested, to re-read the article he wrote for the Catalyst (Watson Fellow Returns—Feb. 6, 1987). I am partly to blame for not trying to contact him as well, although the polite dictates of journalism usually leave this responsibility to the reporter. If he had reached me, this letter might not be necessary; since he did not, I feel a duty to rectify several mistakes in the article. Too much is already misunderstood about South Africa and Apartheid.

Statements I made were taken entirely out of context and the choice of quotes seemed to reflect more the reporter's particular bias than my overall statement.

1. The opening quote by a senator's campaign manager ("Do you want to send white boys to kill other white boys to save the niggers") appeared about three-quarters through the talk, and was only an anecdote to statements concerning America's involvement being possibly analogous to another Vietnam. Besides the fact that a news article should never begin with a quote, the one chosen hardly reflects any overall theme in the talk. It was only a dramatic statement—not very informative—and the way it was used could only result in confusion.

2. The secret police do not "always come into the office." They did sometimes, and they carried guns. It is true that the times they came, we wondered if they were coming for us.

3. The "flow of information is restricted." This ends up being a two-way street sometimes. It is not always the opponents of the government who suffer.

4. Nelson Mandela's release could lead to the unification of blacks, not "would" lead.

David Makarechian

adical Environmentalism and Radical Libertarianism

t's Environmentalism month at CC Didn't you ow? Everybody's talking about it. Environmentalists campus are sponsoring a number of guest speakers ering a wide range of issues — from rain forests to e politics of the movement.

In a nut shell, less environmentalists are barking up e wrong tree. Instead of turning to big brother for p, they are realizing that the government cannot help movement . . . the State is ostensibly pro-ironment but full of empty promises and two-faced grams. The smart environmentalist is seeking ative solutions to a problem that goes beyond filling public policy.

But where can you turn if you can't turn to the vernment? By examining the government's actions in environmental crisis we can find an alternative lution.

What has the government done? It has prostituted the nomics of the environment and has enforced a ead of changing rules, regulations, and public nership policies that have precluded efficient derness management.

The government has neglected to enforce a systematic set of private property rights in developing new lands. land purchases and acquisitions, combined with laws such as the Preemption Act, the Homestead Act, and the Desert Land Act, allowed settlers to exploit land essentially as a free good. The government gave the advantage to the developers, and ignored the other users of wilderness areas — the conservationists. By the 1930s, the demand for wilderness areas started to increase because the government had hastened the reduction of its supply.

The government clouded the picture even more by affording the conservationists an advantage: unlike the developers of the wilderness, the environmentalists never had to pay any sort of charge for the benefits they derived from the land. Automatically, environmentalists have come to expect something — aesthetic benefits — for nothing. The government has skewed incentive systems in wilderness lands.

The next blunder occurred as the government sought to arrest the apparent destruction of the environment — a problem that it had created in the first place. The State started to grab land. The result: The feds own one-third of the land area of the United States. This included 66% of Utah, the state famous for government nuclear tests and its high rate of cancer. Randy Hayes, the rain forest expert sponsored by ENACT, pointed out U.S. Forest Service abuses in publicly owned lands in Puerto Rico. Similarly, Hawaii is busily destroying its rain forest with commercial wood chip operations.

If government policies have hastened the destruction of the environment, it seems asinine to look to them for help. That would be like entrusting the fox with the care of the chicken coop. The obvious answer is to get the government out. Analysts at the Cato Institute in Washington and at the Center for Political Economy and Natural Resources at Montana State University, have found an innovative — if not radical — solution to domestic environmental woes.

In brief, the plan calls for turning over public lands to environmental groups and establishing strict private property rights. Once individual groups received title to lands, they could do with them what they wanted.

The most attractive aspect of the plan is that it eliminates what I call the bureaucrat-effect. Currently, U.S. wilderness lands are managed by largely uncaring paper pushers in Washington who have no incentive to get the maximum yield — in this case the yield is preservation — out of the lands. In place of the slimy politicians, the plan would install individuals committed — and with an economic incentive — to manage the wilderness properly.

Better still, the plan would encourage free market efficiency. Environmentalists could determine the real value of preservation. For example, an environmental group might choose that to better accomplish their goals they should sell land in one area to buy even more in another. Decisions based on the combination of a commitment to the earth and economic incentive would insure the most efficient use of wilderness lands. Also, with the lands in private hands, most of the related government regulations would become obsolete. Scotland, which has among the world's smallest government land holdings, needs no agency to enforce pollution regulations. But since individuals own water and land rights, Scotland enjoys far less pollution than even the American west.

The plan's proponents have yet to work out details such as who could take initial control of the lands, and how land parcels should best be divided. But they believe that given the government's crucial need of slimming down, and its poor record on environmental issues, the plan could soon get serious consideration.

If the wilderness is ever going to be saved, it's going to be up to individuals — not Big Brother. I consider radical solutions to environmental problems, such as the one outlined above, to be a challenge — and a challenge worth accepting — to effect real progress in the environmental movement.

Graphics Courtesy of Tulio Browning

I am not sure I said all of South Africa's pilots are ined by Israelis. If I did, it was a mistake. Many of em are.

I do believe that there might be a South Africa without partheid, but the result could be almost anything. I told e story of the white children on the Northern Border South Africa re-loading their parents weapons. Some even year old black children have also been seen with apons. I saw some fourteen-year-old whites shooting apons. This is hardly "the white children, starting at e age of seven, are equipped with weapons and are ained how to shoot them." This would be absurd. I am rry if I was misleading; yet, this was certainly not a ttter quote as it was printed.

Overall the article was ambiguous, completely isleading, and it is probably better to disregard it tirely than for me to try and explain what is true or se. This is also partially my fault. I wanted to leave the idience with some of the general ambiguity and anxiety felt myself. Perhaps I was too successful. I wrote this atter because the Catalyst, the reporter, and the formation should be taken seriously. Also, I have made any of these mistakes myself, and was grateful that ey were pointed-out to me. I know how hard it can be oducing this paper. The penalties are a lot harder in e professional world. You would have been ccessfully sued.

Sincerely,
Tim Fitzgerald

We sincerely regret the many errors that occurred in the article. We have no excuses for this blatant lack of professionalism and we will try our best to see that these problems do not happen again, expecially in at an important and controversial article as this. Once again, our apologies.
—The Editors

Mark Thesing
No More Mr. Nice Guy

The Schmack is Back

I always enjoy my family reunions because I like to lie to my relatives.

Last Christmas I told my Grandmother that after college I was going to join the Jesuit seminary. This year she ran up to me to give me a hug and she said, "Mark, it is so nice to see you and I want to hear all the news about the seminary."

I responded, "it is so wonderful to see you Grandmother, so much as has happened since we last talked. I started to see an analyist and he has helped me so much with my sexual confusion."

At this point Grammy is choking on a Christmas cookie, so I sat her down. "Grammy don't worry, since my analyst explained that I am homosexual I have been so happy." Grammy is gasping for breath. "I have a boyfriend Grammy, and we are very much in love," I inform her.

Catching her breath she asks, "aren't you afraid of dying of AIDS like Liberace?"

"Of course, it really concerns me and that is why, I, as president of the Homosexual Collective at the Colorado College we sponsor orgies where everyone must wear condoms for safe sex." I kiss her on the cheek and wish her a happy new year.

I continue to work the party for other unsuspecting relatives until I am forced to talk to my uncle Jack, an IBM executive salesman. Many people in our family don't like to talk to Jack because he is a braggart.

I told him last year that I had straight A's in my business major and that I wanted to be a corporate president. He asks, "so Mark, how is school?"

"I dropped out," I said.

"What! Are you crazy if you finish one more year you will be raking in six digits in no time?" Jack retorts.

"I have found something that I am good at and I plan to pursue it," I explain.

"And what might that be?" He questions.

"Marijuana farming." I stood to see his face turn from confusion to disgust.

He murmured, "disrespectful hippie" as he turned to get another scotch.

The family reunions need not be boring and taxing.

Everyone at the reunion is too drunk to really remember what happened so I am sure I'll be able to victimize several more relatives next year.

Beware of Mr. Nice Guy.

Ellipses and Hyperbole

Call me Ishmael. When I read Moby Dick, I got sea sick. You see, when I read books I become absorbed, and my world shifts. I was terribly depressed and afraid of rats when I read 1984.

Happily, I found a remedy. To offset the ego distortion I suffer when reading one book, I read at least one more to cancel the effect. For instance, I read Diary of Anne Frank and ten different Mad magazines at the same time.

I used to alternate chapters from each book, but now I alternaté every page. I find that this method actually increases my comprehension. I could probably tell you verbatim what happened to Laura Ingals on the moors, because I read Little Heights and Wuthering House on the Prairie together.

I remember every vignette as Lenny and George struggle to overcome their clubbed feet and become rabbit doctors in the Salinas Valley, having read Human Men and Of Mice and Bondage.

I've read many other books in this way, like Tale of Two Flies and Lord of the Cities, Catcher House Five and Slaughter in the Rye, Cat and the Sea and Old Man's Cradle (or was that Old Badge of Courage and Red Man and the Sea or Mobby Badge of Courage and The Red "something or other").

No matter what its title, a book is a great thing to curl up with. I like to curl up with a good book and watch TV. I especially like to take a bath with a good book. Actually, it's just fun to curl up. That's right, just curl up and get in the tub with a good TV.

If you are going to take a bath with a library book, be sure not to put any water in the tub. And if you're going to mark in public books, be creative. I like to take a real thick library book like Brothers Karamazov and highlight all the articles and conjunctions. It's also fun to highlight horizontally.

When I'm reading a thick dull book for class, my math skills improve. I like to compute what page is the exact middle of the assignment. I like to compute what percentage of the assignment I have completed.

After all this math, I will look at the edges of the pages to see if it really looks like I have 98.9% of the assignment to go. I often stay up all night trying to compute exactly how many hours of sleep I will be getting.

The word "read" is a strikingly ambiguous little morpheme. You can't really be sure how it should read or be read. But there is no problem when it's heard or said, just when it's meant to be read.

You now have read 43/46ths of this article. It started out interesting and died in a rhyme. Let this just show how the best laid plans of mice and bondage can often go awry.

AARON SHURE

Victor Greto

I was walking back, a few weeks ago, with a friend of mine from a class breakfast. We happened to be talking to another student who was having car troubles, something about her carburetor and a stuck choke. We passed by a group of denim clad kids who happened to be also working on their carburetor, flexing the choke, screaming to one another when to turn the ignition on, when to "wait a minute." My friend laughed because of the coincidence, aloud, and was yelled at by the kids working at the car: "What the fuck you laughing at, asshole?" and other such terms and gestures. My friend rolled his eyes and shook his head, and as we headed toward campus, said "The difference between us and them is education, man. Whenever someone gets an education he rises above that kind of aggressive ignorance, violent reaction."

I had to think about that. My first reaction (practically involuntary) was "Yes, of course," but I've changed my mind since. I would first like to get away from the cynicism of "uneducated people" who label intellectuals or people with college educations "intellectual idiots," or "big word manipulators." But there exists an element of truth in their cynicism. I think that education as a way out of numbing ignorance is an essential tool, but as any other tool it can be mismanaged, misused, abused and so forth. If I can read I usually assume I have "one up" on the man or woman who cannot. Yet if I read with preconceived goals in mind, read to reaffirm my already stated assumptions, I am as ignorant as the so-called "uneducated" person—perhaps even more so, for I am striking out into the educated world only to soothe, stay and hold beliefs I have already held. I am afraid the most intelligent people I have known are the ones who have never gone to college, have lived and experienced things firsthand and figuratively, "naked." Though their narrow mind set tends to offend, their hopes, their lives, their desires are bound in the "real world," that is, in the experience of living and working in society. It is easy to understand their cynicism, their instinctive hatred or distrust of an educated self-appointed elite. But are we "above" them because we delve into abstract concepts (big words) in order to understand the world around us? Maybe we are different because through our investigation into the whys of the world we may also attempt to change things for the better. This is far from being above them. An educated individual is a person utilizing intellectual tools to help change or stay the movement of society, to define it in order for him to understand it. If we, as educated individuals, remove ourselves from society, the striving for social justice, the social application of our so-called profound probings, we shall be, as the old joke has it, intellectuals who are brilliant but who have absolutely no idea of what's going on. For me, and for all my pretensions towards intellectualism, this joke is the most telling and thus most painful of all.

This idea also seems to work for political analysis, the manipulation of ideas and concepts through rhetorical abstractions and fancy footwork.

I have been accused of "rejecting the past" because I question the present assumptions of our society. Hardly. As I have stated before (and now for the last time), I do not, in any sense of the rhetoric, "reject history." In fact, my questioning lies atop the fact of history and its consequences. I believe in no metaphysical Truth which lies outside, atop, or primary to history. I believe in no transcendence of history to something more "basic," more "true;" for all elements that are in history have their meaning only in history, in their context and historical consequences. What I do argue against is interpretation of history, of history as conceived as some sort of movement towards a particular preconceived goal. Thus I take issue with the way our society interprets the events of the past and portrays us as some "inevitable" result of the struggles of our ancestors.

I have been accused of disregarding the reasons why I ask why to our society and its assumptions. That is false. My reasons are the social conditions which our society allows to exist as part and parcel of its existence. The reasons that ghettoes exist, that men and women lose their self-respect in a world devised and entrenched in bourgeois values are what I question; and I question because I do not believe the values in our society to be "universal" — we and our values are products of the past. This is not a "buffet-style" view of history. I have been accused of saying anything men and women cannot understand or control is "unnatural." That is again false. I would not use such a term in dealing with human society and the individual human being's interpretation of his reality. To question our assumptions is a prelude to necessary changes in the social order, a social order that allows blatant injustices to exist. The propellant for all my questions is the social conditions I see around me. I do not believe in the perfectibility of man (or woman for that matter); and I am not only a product of the enlightenment, or whatever other label may be stuck to my thinking. Yet I do believe that the room for change exists, and my incessant questions are a product of this view. Liberalism, in this sense, is my tool for attacking the present satisfied assumptions of our society; it is not a dogma or an end, but a means. I am not a liberal dogmatist out of the eighteenth century (as laissez-faire Reagan seems to be), but a user of liberalism for social change.

Education, then, is a positive step, an attempt to strike through the facade of society; it endows the openminded individual with a means to change the conditions of living itself. We can label these actions pompously as being "above," yet the word's hierarchical implication is nonsense, based on our competitive society's continual delineation of groups. Education is yet another step towards some modicum of social justice, a tool to cut through the rhetoric of a self-satisfied society, fat and grinning, its very existence teetering atop the backs of the Poor.

Michael S. Mehan
The Bottom Line

Give the U.S.S.R. a Chance

In the United States, when it comes to analyzing the Soviet Union, there are usually two schools of thought: those who let ideology cloud their vision, and who, subsequently, look at the Soviet Union with their eyes closed, expecting more than is realistic, and those who are more scholarly and realistic in their approach to the good ol' "Evil Empire."

Thus, when looking at the recent changes that have been taking place within the Soviet Union, the people of the first school of thought mentioned above tend to say, "big deal, they let a few people out of prison and published a few books, the rest is just hot air." These people seem to expect elections to be called for the following week, and the name of Lenin banished from all the history books.

For those of us who look at the "Great Red Menace" with a more open mind, the changes of the past year represent the significant first steps in what will truly be a journey of a thousand miles.

We must have patience, change in the Soviet system will not come over night, if at all. Americans are always expecting to wake up and find that the USSR has changed while they sleep. Well, if we keep thinking that, we will keep waking up to disappointment. We must remember that Russia, is a country that changes slowly. It took the Russians a hundred or so more years to over throw their monarchy than it took the rest of Europe. Russia has always been a society that moves slowly. Many argue that it has not changed at all, that the General Secretary has simply replaced the Czar, the Politburo has replaced his ministers, and that Marxism/Leninism has replaced Christian Orthodoxy.

With what he has already said and done, General Secretary Michail Sergeevich Gorbachev has stretched his head out on the chopping block. The fact that he has not done four fifths of what he said he would a year ago, is not only due to the fact that he is a politician, but that a strong opposition, stronger than he, still exists, entrenched among the "Old Guard" of the Brezhnev era. To move this huge obstacle to progress may be out of the reach of Gorbachev, or anyone for that matter.

Already we have seen significant changes. The transition period from Andropov to Gorbachev was achieved in record time. This period of intense power struggle can go on for years, as it did in the fifties between Kruschev, Malenkov, Molotov and Kagonovich. Gorbachev, though still trying to consolidate enough power to back further reforms, has solidified his office quicker than any other Soviet leader.

Gorbachev has tried to break with complacency of the Brezhnev era. He has admitted that the Soviet Union is in trouble. Recently in speeches, Gorbachev has moved away from the pretense of socialist/Soviet infallability. One of the most significant aspects of this is his "Glosnost" policy, or the policy of increased openness in Soviet Society. "The search for truth should be conducted through a comparison between various viewpoints...that is why we emphasize the need for courage, for initiative in advancing new ideas," he said in a recent speech to Soviet social scientists. Gorbachev understands the need for new ideas, for an open flow of thoughts if the USSR is to make the transition from an industrial society to a modern, technological society. He has admitted failure in the Soviet system, he has admitted that the system is backward, out dated and stagnant, and in need of long term reform. This goes far beyond similar statements made by previous leaders.

Michail Sergeevich faces an enormous task, one which most Americans do not understand. We seem to feel that all Gorbachev has to do is declare the USSR a democracy, and it is done. It is not so easy to tear down over sixty years of Stalinism, and to break through the wall of inertia that is the Brezhnev legacy. It is like Reagan telling us that in the next six months he is going to nationalize all American industry; there is going to be stiff opposition.

Already we have seen what may be a good start in the long drive to reshape Soviet society. One of the first steps must be to open up, or relax, the controls over many parts of Soviet society, such as the press, arts and the economy. In these areas, Gorbachev has, under his policy of "Glasnost" or openness, planted the seed of change. In the last few months, several banned books, such as Anatoly Rybakov's Children of the Arbat, and others by Vladimir Nabakov, have been openly published. Once controversial films, "Repentence," which honestly examins Stalin's purges, and "Is It Easy To Be Young?" a film about troubled youth and Afghanistan veterans who cannot adjust back to society, are not shown being shown in Soviet theaters.

The press, while still heavily censored, has moved from the rigid style of the Brezhnev era to a more open position. Many journalists who were exiled for their views have returned to take up important positions in the Soviet mainstream press. Sensitive areas, such as exposing KGB brutality, and anti-Soviet protests in the Central Asian city of Alma Alta have found their way to the front pages, a practice heretofore unheard of under previous regimes.

In the economy, Gorbachev has implemented adaption of low level, experimental capitalism. He has eliminated many ministries, given more power to industry to manage itself on a day to day basis, improved worker incentives, played with subsidized prices, and allowed many low level service areas, restaurants, barber shops and repair shops to operate after hours for their own profit.

Along similar lines, in agriculture, Gorbachev has encouraged workers to cultivate private plots, and given the collective farms the right to sell surplus food on the open market at prices determined by the forces of supply and demand.

Gorbachev is wrestling with the stubborn bureaucracy and the "Old Guard" to reform the party itself. Two weeks ago he announced a radical new change in the voting rules of the party, allowing for more than one person to run for party positions and for them to be elected by a secret ballot instead of the traditional show of hands. He has replaced or "retired" many of the old liners in the Politburo, and the party Secretariate, which runs the country on a day to day basis, is almost all Gorbachev supporters. However, it is at the middle and lower levels that he faces the most opposition, and thus he still has a long way to go in trimming the fat from the party.

A long and treacherous road awaits Mr. Gorbachev if he hopes to take the Soviet Union from a dying or dead, industrial giant, and turn it into a technologically advanced super power. He must continue to push his Glasnost policy, increasing the openness of the press and a more tolerable attitude toward dissent. The main problem facing the Soviet Union is that it cannot enter an age of communication if communication is forbidden. How can a country that locks up its Xerox machines hope to deal with an era of personal computers, advanced laser optic telecommunications, thousands of centrally linked data bases and the spread of information faster than the government can censor it? Gorbachev must decide, if the USSR afford to muddle through in its typical, paranoid fashion, safely playing "Big Brother" to Soviet society, while the rest of the world moves on I believe he has made his decision.

In the next few months as we watch the "drama" in the Soviet Union unfold, we must bear in mind, that we are seeing some pretty remarkable forward movement, by Soviet standards. Whether it will work out and to what ends, is anyone's guess at this point. Michail Sergeevich Gorbachev may prove to be the Lenin of the last part of the twentieth century, leading the Soviet Union into a new millenium of technology and growth, or he may wind up being another Krushchev, spending his last days in bitter defeat, crushed by his own policies and reforms, his own vision, and by the very system he was trying to help.

Prof Speaks of Evolving Perspective

Visiting on our campus from Edea, Cameroon is Jeanne Dingome, a professor with a rich background in language studies and literature. She has studied in the US and in France to obtain her Master's and Ph.D. She is a professor at the Grande Ecole, (the University), of Dovala, Cameroon, where she teaches literature courses, English-usage and style to the Anglophone community and English language to the Francophone community.

Cameroon is a bilingual nation, which is a "result of colonization," explains Professor Dingome. After WWI Cameroon was divided between the British and the French: the British annexed a rather small portion of Cameroon adjacent to Nigeria, leaving the greater portion to the French. Thus, the country was divided into two territories with different languages until Cameroon gained its independence in 1960. A single state was re-established in which both French and English were spoken and continue to co-exist.

As far as "native" languages are concerned, Jeanne Dingome says, that there are perhaps "as many as 200 African languages" still spoken in Cameroon, particulary in the smaller villages. Dingome still speaks basaa with her parents and people of their generation. She speaks of the necessity to preserve languages like basaa in a society where traditional languages and customs are being challenged by "modernization."

To be a part of the modern world, one must accept "the languages of the colonizers," French and English. However, it is the responsibility for people of Jeanne Dingome's generation to keep the native languages "alive." We are continually "creating" and "changing" languages, she says. Languages must be perpetually "active" and receptive to change in order for them to survive.

These changing times affect other aspects of African society as well, specifically the role of women in African communities. The assumption that women serve two primary functions of wife and mother is being challenged. Women are gradually asserting themselves and entering into the career world. "Ever since the 1940's the roles of women have been changing...(which is due in part) to education." it has become more acceptable in recent years for women to obtain college degrees and pursue employment in various fields, ranging from medicine to education.

Jeanne Dingome stresses that these changes in women's roles have been gradual and have met much resistance. Particularly in the political arena, women hold few offices and Dingome predicts that perhaps women will never hold positions of great importance in government. She sees these appointments as an attempt to appease the female population, without challenging their traditionally dominant position in society.

Visiting Prof. Jeanne Dingome from Cameroon. Photo By Ginny Bunker

The liberation process is a complicated one: attitudes of both men and women must be receptive to women's capacity to change. In Cameroon and throughout Africa, "women are their own enslavers," reports Professor Dingome. They are often content to "stay in the kitchen" because that is what tradition dictates. Many women still choose motherhood and the life of a housewife over a career and unmarried women are still not highly respected, even among other women. Thus, the resistance to liberation comes not only from the male sector of the population, but also from women who fear or do not desire a change in their status.

Jeanne Dingome speaks enthusiastically about the emergence of African writers, many of whom are women, who are obtaining recognition on an international level. Buchi E. Mecheta is an example of a woman who refused to be controlled by a male-dominating society and who after a painful marriage began writing on her own. Among her books, which Professor Dingome highly recommends, are: The Joy of Motherhood, The Slave Girl, & Double Yoke, all of which deal with the African woman "caught between tradition and modernization." Jeanne Dingome dealt specifically with this issue in a course she offered 5th Block entitled, The Female Voice in African Literature.

Interestingly enough, it was not until the introduction of westernization and industrialization to Africa that the "plight of the individual" or that of the "suppressed woman" entered into African thought. In literature, for instance, the genre of the "novel" never existed in Africa for precisely this reason. The emphasis had always been on the community, "where the individual does not exist," explains Dingome. The novel requires that there be a central character which is usually in conflict with society. Until recent years there was never a need to express this sort of opposition.

The "narrative," as the more traditional genre in African literature, presents community and societal concerns. Jeanne Dingome is presently teaching a course on the African narrative, introducing students to tales from North, Central, East and South Africa. Some of the texts she is using are written in her native language, basaa, for which she has provided her own English translation. Many of the tales demonstrate some kind of moral, but some are written for sheer entertainment, "to celebrate life."

Dingome speaks of the corollary between African folk tales and Native American folk tales, which her students at CC have discovered. It appears that the similar emphasis on community, religion and ritual of the Native American Indians that African populations share has produced similar world views between these two cultures.

Professor Dingome's focal point of study seems to be how the modern world is challenging traditions and how African societies are coping with the changes that are infiltrating specific communities. According to Dingome, "progress" entails allowing certain traditions to persist, while incorporating them into a new framework. African communities must recognize their own evolution and examine the changing role of the "individual" and the varied roles of women in modern society. Jeanne Dingome invites anyone who wishes to further explore any of these issues to visit her in her office, Armstrong 316, before her return to Cameroon at the end of Block 6.

MARY BUTCHER

OFFICE WITH A VIEW

The Peace Corps is an exhilarating two year experience that will last a lifetime.

Working at a professional level that ordinarily might take years of apprenticeship back home, volunteers find the career growth they're looking for and enjoy a unique experience in the developing world.

International firms and government agencies value the skills and knowledge mastered during Peace Corps service.

INFORMATION TABLE:
Feb. 16 - 18, Armstrong Hall (Great Hall), 9 am - 3 pm

FILM SEMINAR:
Feb. 17 at 7 pm, Armstrong Hall #353

INTERVIEWS:
March 3

For more information call collect to the Denver Peace Corps Office at 866-1057, ext. 165.

Peace Corps
The Toughest Job You'll Ever Love.

Hair Designers for Men & Women

RAPUNZEL

Style cuts, Cellophanes,
Perms & Color.
Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.

Stop in or make your appointment:

827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

Ann's Ode to Love

Jeff: Happy Valentine's Day! Love Jenny.

Rob: Roses are Red
Violets are Blue
I want your chest
and what's between your legs too!
Kathy

Karen: Lets have a few drinks to celebrate - tonight at 7:00?
Mark

Pat: Happy Valentine's Day! I love you,
Karrie

Blair: Will you go to the pledge formal with me? I tried to reach you for the Christmas formal but you line was busy. Would you be my dancing Valentine?
Love,
A serious Theta

Karen: I know this is queer, but thought you would like it. I love you, Jerry

Trow: Thrashman lives! Happy V-day!
Love
Freddie & Frannie

You know who you are - Don't even try cuz I'll say goodbye, and you'll get the Heisman for sure.
—Any Girl you try to scam on

To Minnesota Man
You're so good with the puck,
I bet you're a great fuck.
Happy Valentine's Day

To Sarah F.
Love me,
your goalkeeper

Mom,
Happy Valentine's Day!
Love David

Jennifer R.
Will you be mine?
Your Anonymous Valentine

Matt: Happy Valentine's Day - Remember February 21st! I miss our talks and friendship.
—Love Emery

Kappa Sigs: Happy Valentine's Day! You guys are the best!
Love, your lil' sisters

Bella Latulla: Have fun tonight! I'll be thinking of you! Boulder action and Corona! Yea!
Marcillus

Eh, Vic, Dave and Lowe
You are the guys that make us go
I know most of the time we bitch and moan
But we couldn't do it alone.
Although victories have been scarce and far and we should have spent that time in a bar
I don't think we could go much lower
But don't worry the seasons almost over.
We love and appreciate you,
The Women

Bob: Will you be my Valentine?
Love,
your lab partner

Opu—I want you to be the mother of my children.
—Secret Admirer

Kappa Sigs in Promotory Condo #18: Have you slept in Captain Krunch lately? We just wanted to serve you breakfast in bed. Happy Valentine's Day,
Love,
Vickie & Michelle

Wayne D: You are a God! I would ask you to be my Valentine, but only if we could use your legendary passion pit!
Love,
Your bunny

Emily G: Have a Happy Valentines Day
From
Your Secret Cupid

N-N :
Roses are red
The golf course is green
You're my Triple B
Because of my Triple E!
Wiwuvoo,
N, N,

What kind of Valentine B.S. is this anyway?

Happy Valentines Day, Alec and Mike
You are our leaders, fearless and true
Where would the Catalyst be without you two?
We love you and worship you every day
Especially when pizza and mocha shakes are on the way!
Guess who!

Sarah: Remember - February 14 is anti-Valentines Day - wear black and we'll go steal roses!
Vickie

Rob Peck: You'll never know how much I adore you. I wish you were mine, Happy Heart Day.
?

Dean: My cupid is shooting my heart towards you, I only wish you knew.
Love,
Your Anonymous Valentine

To the few remaining members of V.S.G.:
Happy Valentines Day!
From your president for life

D:Happy Valentines Day!
Love,
Your roomie

Darla:
Please be my Valentine
Love
Spanky

A,Happy Valentine's Day!
Happy Valentine's Day - I miss you,
M.M.

Wendy, Pam, Liz, Jody & Michelle: Paradise misses us - unfortunately we don't miss it! But - I do miss you guys - Happy Valentine's Day!
Love,
Jaba

Gin & Kristin:
I hope that Mr. Valentine
Will take us all to wine & dine
It's about time...
We saw some action at 1629.
Love,
your roomie

Liz: Can you believe we survived Peters colloquium?! Scary! Thanks for everything - remember, preferences are better than addictions! Telluride here we come!
Your aerobic partner

Vicky: My cupid is looking for you. Stay away if you know what's good for you!
A.P.

69: You know who you are - it was great. Let's go for a repeat performance to celebrate this Valentines Day date!
96

Beenie:
Happy Heart Day!
Love,
Twixer

Happy Valentines Day Stubbies!

Happy Valentines Day Lady Jane!

Schlubb: I heard about your Limp (or should I say stiff) Lizard - too bad I was looking forward to it for the V.D. festivities!
?

Z: I'll always love you but not as much as your landlords!

Les:
It's been a month and a half
Tonights's the night
Don't worry Brig
She'll still be tight!
I'll miss you!
Your loud, immature housemate!

God Like One:
Are you coming tonight?
Your secret admirer

Stephanie Y: I miss you! Let's take a quest for yogurt (the free kind!) soon! Don't forget the hot fudge & butterscotch chips too!
Love,
Friendly

Sherry:
Happy Valentine's Day
Love,
Christopher

Dave:
The nights at the Catalyst I know you remember
How I wished they'd go on forever
I don't know why they call you Guts, considering the size of your you know what.
I can only sit here and cry thinking of the times you would satisfy.
Yours in lust,
Blair

Today is the day Miller!
Congratulations!

Elliot darling: Happy Valentines Day from your wife! The kids, Emery and Nicolas, will be flying in from the Riveria at 8:00 - We'll be cocktailing from 8:00 to 9:00 - then dinner at the Broadmoor. Please be there, or call me and we'll dine at Poor Richards soon.
Love,
You know who!

Julie: Happy Valentines day! Get through this block, and spring break will be here! Get psyched!
Tracy

Julie, Emma, Wendy, Beth, Karen: I think Josh and Johns could be a call soon! Happy Valentines Day!

Becky: Happy Valentines Day! I wish you could be mine - in bed.
Tim

1304: From a Wall Quote lover—Have a totally erotic V-Day!

In these alienating times, when it seems the spaceship earth has lost its course, [illegible] leeches love beacon shines bright.

Gary:
I adore you. Please be mine.
Foxy Lady

Joel:
Happy Valentine's Day!
Andrea

Tom:
I love you!
Jo

Sandy:
Happy V-day! Have fun!

Mary: I wish I could ask you out on a date but I don't have a car. Happy Valentine's Day anyway,
Frat

To Frat boy:
I've admired you from afar
Everyday across the bar
I spill my drink
Everytime I try to think
You enter my thoughts, but I wish you'd enter me.
Love,
Sorority Girl

Lester: Would you be my boyfriend?
Pat

Kevin: Would you be my cute valentine? We can be sweeties at the date tonight.
Carol

Happy Valentines to all the new sorority activies! Have a great time at the Valentine Formal tonight!
Pam

Tony: This is for times gone by - I still love you - will you be my Valentine?
Love,
Elizabeth

Roxy: Lets cancel another Valentine's Day Dance for old times sake. Hysterical
Love,
Frat

Maria:
Will you be our Valentine?!
Love,
Anna & Pete

Scam I:
Happy Valentines Day!
Lets scam all the way!
Love,
Scam

Brad: I was in your second block class and think you're very attractive - I've admired you ever since.
?

Chris: Get ready for an "Enchanted Evening." (Hint #1)
Love,
your anxious girlfriend

Hey Thetas! Have a great time tonight. Happy Valentines Day!

Mike: I would love to have tea in the Sahara with you. When we leave the yellow brick road, lets take Bagely & Beau, some Corona and a camera to go. And please remember to store the moon in your backpack.
Love,
[illegible]

THE DISPARAGING EYE

A Journal of General Interest

VOLUME 3 NUMBER 1 FEBRUARY 13, 1987

Free the Greeks

BY NORM LEAHY AND DAVE MAKARECHIAN

"You've gotta FIGHT—for your RIGHT—to PAR TEE." Ramblings of the Beasty Boys or does it mean more? For those of us who have struggled under the dogmatic dictates of the tin-hearted administration's Greek policies, it means much more. It means, simply, a struggle for survival. We live in world of intense regulation. Every aspect of daily life—from how fast you can drive your car to what language you hear on TV—is scrutinized by myopic bureaucrats who never experience the situations they create. Even during college, where we are encouraged to be different, and to experiment, and to expand the limits of our understanding, their stands like a haggared old crone with a willow switch, the spectre of regulation. Individual choice is preached—all we ask is that it be allowed.

Our experience with Rush once again demonstrated that rules will be the death of the Greek system. currently we comply to a Byzantine set of regulations: Parties may last no longer than two hours; houses must provide alternative beverages and food; absolutely no alcohol can be served on Sundays; and all alcohol otherwise served can be no stronger than 3.2%. Failure to cowtown to these obscure ordinations can—and often does—result in stiff fines.

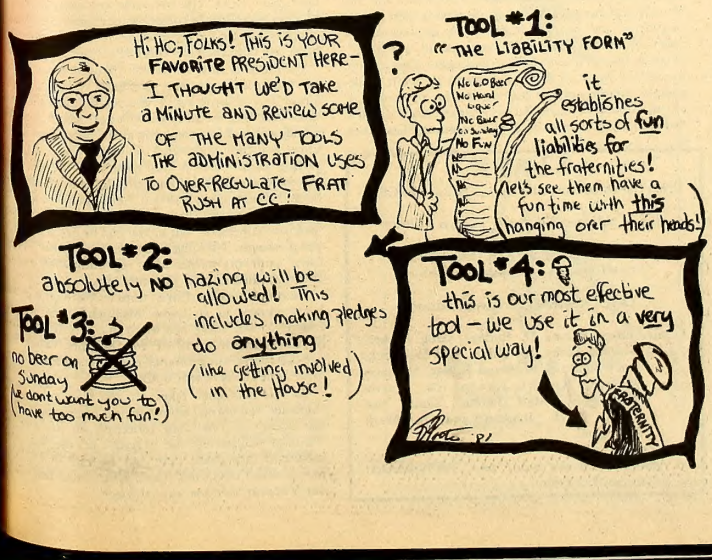
But we propose that we abandon there attempts at social engineering. Instead we advocate a positin of enlightened self-restraint. We are of the firm conviction that when it comes to regeneration of the membership of private organizations, the membership of that organization should be the one who prescribes the methods used. When we say the membership of each house, we mean the individual organization—not a collectivist, puppet organization that is the willing supplicant of the administration. The IFC, like all agencies, has a noble aim: to avoid schisms and maintain the status quo between the various Greek organizations. But like all agencies that derive their legitimacy from a higher authority, they function simply as the mouthpiece for the secret agents of the administration

This makes the case for self control even stronger.

As organizations with varied interests and objectives, it is ludicrous for there to be a continued interference in their existances by those who have a fundamental *dis*understanding of what those organizations are about. The disunderstanding manifests itself in its most horrid form over the issue of pledge education.

The administration has created the problem. They perceive pledge education to be nothing more than a group of simple minded barbarians forcing naive, innocent, young boys to commit acts on par with those of Sodom. They started with threats, which became rules, which carry punishments. The orgy of rules they have

Continued on p. 2



Hi Ho, Folks! This is your FAVORITE PRESIDENT HERE- I THOUGHT WE'D TAKE A MINUTE AND REVIEW SOME OF THE MANY TOOLS THE ADMINISTRATION USES TO OVER-REGULATE FRAT RUSH AT CC.
TOOL #1: "THE LIABILITY FORM" it establishes all sorts of fun liabilities for the fraternities! let's see them have a fun time with this hanging over their heads!
TOOL #2: absolutely NO hazing will be allowed! This includes making pledges do anything (like getting involved) in the House!
TOOL #3: no beer on Sunday (we don't want you to have too much fun!)
TOOL #4: this is our most effective tool - we use it in a very special way!
FRATERNITY

Ronnie Goes to Iran
Seeks New Playmates in Iranian Moderates

BY BRIAN SMITH

Recently, as reported in Newsweek, the Reagan administration has, "...for more than a year...secretly permitted shipments of US military equipment to Teheran in return for help in securing the release of Americans kidnapped by Iran's Lebanese allies—and in apparent hopes of someday restoring relations with the potential Middle East superpower." Previously, the administration has claimed a neutral stance in the ever-ongoing war between Iran and Iraq. However, over $60 million worth of arms has been sent to Iran within the last eighteen months. The administration's deal with Iran compfetely went around Congress, the State department and perhaps even the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The arms shipments (which included TOW missiles, Hawk parts and F-14 spare parts) may have broken several laws, especially those which prohibit the sale of arms to countries which knowingly sponsor terrorism. The arms shipments were made in an attempt to re-establish a working relationship with Iran, according to administration officials. Recently a dispute has surfaced between so called "pragmatists" in the Iranian parliament (those who are willing to make deals with the West) and hardliners who are determined to export Islamic-inspired revolution. The pragmatists are led by the Speaker of the Iranian parliament, Akbar Rafsanjani (whom the United States did business with in the arms deal).

The purpose of this report is not to evaluate the administration's ethics in this foreign policy gamble. Instead, I will prove by discussing recent (post WWII) Iranian history and American involvement in Iran, that the administration's attempt to re-establish a dialogue with Iran represented an exercise in futility at best.

Following World War II Iranian peasants and agricultural laborers began migrating to the cities in search of greater economic opportunities and a better standard of living. This "impoverished and increasingly volatile subproletariat" laid the foundation for potential social unrest in the cities. Meanwhile, other urban groups such as the bazarri (a class of merchants and artisans closely tied to the religious leaders) and the intelligentsia became increasingly willing to fight for greater Iranian political and economic independence. (Iran had been trying to rid itself from imperial pressures for over a century.)

As Nikki Keddie states: "The lower middle class groups, the artisans and shopkeepers of the bazaars...tended to identify problems with the operations of foreign interests. They were tied to a revived religious class...which wanted to reassert Islam and end foreign rule." The previous ruler of Iran, Reza Shah, had died in 1944. His son, Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, had then taken over as Iran's ruler. As opposition to Mohammad Reza Shah grew, he was forced to flee the country. Enter Dr. Mohammed Mossadeq, a revered nationalist and a former member of inflicted on the organizations have not cleansed the system. They have instead brought it to its knees.

Continued on p. 7

Leahy and Makarechian from p. 1

After all, how does one define hazing? Is it the page-long definition foisted upon the Greek system a year ago? Or is it beyond definition? Corporate character tests, divorce, being stopped for running a red light, an interview with a loan officer in a bank—this is real world hazing. Compared to those incidence which are committed by Greek organizations—and thus invite the unmitigated fury of the administration, these are far more cruel. We have to ask ourselves one question: Are the things we do as Greeks nearly as devestating as the things that happen in the real world?

No.

The administration is stifling the development of those who it is supposed to be enlightening. We are not taught to solve problems, face crisis, and deal with complex situations. We are instead taught to depend upon higher ups and their false platitudes. Instead of creating aggressive, thoughtful individuals, they create sheep who are lost without their shepard.

Greeks have no need for a simple-minded shepherd. What we need is the trust and respect of the administration to such an extent that we are our own policeman. Responsibility is acquired not enforced. Left alone the Greek system has the potential to flourish beyond the most remote expectations of Armstrong's pundits. To continue under the current rubric invites increased squandering of human potential. This is an asset that we cannot afford to waste.

We are on the brink. To go further means a life of observing the dictates of an anonymous authority. It means the death of youthful exuberance, the death of the spirit. Is this the price we must pay for our ideals?

The New Eye

Howdy, this is the new and improved Disparaging Eye. It's coming out now due to the great amounts of time and effort spent on changing the scope and format of the paper. Whereas in the past this has been the "Journal of Political and Social Thought," we have tried to introduce elements from outside of these realms. In doing so, we hope that the stuffiness, dryness and overall dullness of the Eye can become a thing of the past.

Nobody reads a paper that looks pretentious and is filled with dry rhetoric. To combat this, we've changed the masthead, enlarged the pool of contributors and encouraged the staff to have fun with their work. So, you will find contained within these pages articles on sports, people and Greek life as well as hardcore politics, economics and social thought. By branching out, the Eye may just become more down-to-earth.

A paper cannot function, however, without constructive interaction between its producers and its readers. We encourage you to write, pontificate, bitch, whatever turns your crank. Just let us know how you feel about the paper. Unless you tell us what you think, we will probably put some very strange stuff in the next issue.

Now we know some of you may find this hard to believe, but we, Norm Leahy, Brian Smith, Dave Makarechian, Steve Geraghty and the rest of our staff, are on an idealistic mercy mission, attempting to pump new life into an almost-dead publication. First and foremost, we are trying to pump some (are you ready for this) HUMOR into the paper! God only knows, we need more humor in this all-too-serious-world! Believe it or not, we honestly think that we can make The Disparaging Eye a fun publication to read. And we know that you, the academic community of CC, are both well-read and have a good sense of humor. Folks, we think you're going to like what we have to offer. Most importantly, give us some feedback—tell us what you think of the Eye. We would also like to attract as many writers and artists from the CC community as possible. (As a senior poli-econ major from a small town in Ohio once said: "Variety is the spice of life...)

So if you have something on your mind and you want to write about it, let us know. Or, if you've already written about a topic which you find interesting, again let us know. We want to make The Eye into the quality publication which it ought to be. And with a little help from you—the students and faculty of CC—we think we can do it. So for the next few moments, kick back, relax and prepare to contemplate this issue of The Disparaging Eye—and let us know what you think.

Brian Smith
Norm Leahy

Person of the Month:
Terry Waite

BY DAVE MAKARECHIAN

Editor's Note: In an effort to keep the Eye from ignoring current issues and wandering too far off into the miles of political theory, our creative consultants have produced the "Person of the Month" column. In every issue we will highlight the activity of one of the month's most important political newsmakers—good guy or bad, big name or nobody—if they're relevant, we will write about them. If you have any nominations for the Eye's Person of the Month, please contact the Eye's editorial staff.

So you don't know who Terry Waite is? Don't worry—you're not alone. In fact, his obscurity with the American public is almost as significant as his actions in Lebanon. Waite is an Anglican envoy who had semi-successful attempts at negotiating the release of American hostages. He disappeared in Beirut on January 20th. Terry Waite is the Eye's Person of the Month because he reminds us that eight Americans are being held in Lebanon by Allah-fearing terrorists, because he represents the futility of US policy toward hostile third-world nations, and because he represents the tragedy of a nation that has forgotten about its missing heroes.

The situation with the hostages in Lebanon has remained relatively stable. Even after the bungled arms-exchange deal, Americans keep disappearing, and officials keep down-playing the situation. Joining the eight captured Americans are six Frenchmen, two West Germans, and two Saudis. While the condition of the hostages is unknown, the Reagan Administration can "find no evidence that they are being badly mistreated." The terrorists' communiques reveal little. A recent photo showed hostage Robert Polhill, a 52 year old accounting professor, with automatic weapons aimed at his head.

Who are the violators of international and moral law? Western intelligence has been unable to make sense of the bweildering collection of terrorist groups, but will appear to be alligned with the Lebanese Shiite gro Hizballah, or Party of God. Hizballah, Islamic Jihad the Liberation of Palestine, Islamic Jihad Revolutiona Organization, and Organization of the Oppressed Earth, are the main players in hostage roulette. Obv terrorists seem to be competing with each other notoriety. All seem to have ties to Iran, though exp question the degree of control that some—such as Reagan Administration—think the Iranians have.

The administration's hostage policy can be constru as little else but total failure. The Iran arms deal destroyed all of its credibility. By bargaining international terrorists, the US has sold out, and played right into the terrorists hands. The terroris have received public attention, embarrased the US, still hold the upper hand. If the administration had firm to its no-dealings-with-terrorists-policy, the would not appear as a crippled giant—which is precis the effect that the terrorists wanted. Reagan's image flag-waving political chauvinist increases the effect more.

If it hadn't been for the arms deal crisis, the fate of hostages might have been forgotten by the Americ people. Unlike the Iran crisis, there's no hostage-wa no demonstrations of national concern, and very fe references to them as heroes. Who is Terry Waite? H the symbol of what's forgotten during celebrations the Statue of Liberty's birthday, or victory in America's Cup. Terry Waite is the symbol of Ameri not being back, the symbol that in 1987 everything is hunky-dory in Reaganville, and the symbol that we, a nation, have neglected our fallen countrymen.

The plight of Terry Waite and the rest of the hostag may help to arrest national apathy, and that might be cloud's silver lining. But what a big cloud. The staff the Disparaging Eye sympathizes with the Terry Wa and the American hostages, and for your struggles, salute you.

Brian Does Platoon

BY BRIAN SMITH

Once in awhile a film comes along which accomplishes what it sets out to do. Platoon epitomizes such a movie. Platoon attempts to show what the war in Vietnam actually was for the men who fought there—and it succeeds where other movies pertaining to the Vietnam War have failed. Written and directed by Oliver Stone, the movie presents a first-hand, mostly autobiographical, account of Stone's 15 months of combat duty in Vietnam.

The main character in the movie, Chris (played by Charlie Sheen) arrives in Vietnam in 1967, straight out of college. Chris voluntarily enlisted for combat duty but shortly after his arrival he sees his mistake. During his first night at the front, Chris experiences the horrors of Vietnam as he becomes paralyzed with fear as the enemy approaches. But in this kill-or-be-killed environment, Chris manages to survive the ambush with a relatively minor neck wound. On another patrol the sheer brutality of Vietnam shows clearly when Chris and the rest of the platoon enter a village, displaying their anger, frustration and extreme fright. Chris gets rid of his anger by spitting bullets at the food of a villager. Sergeant Barnes (played by Tom Berenger) takes it upon himself to shoot an innocent woman to death while another member of the platoon decides to cave in a villager's head. Sergeant Barnes is almost ready to kill a little girl when the platoon's other sergeant, Elias, saves her.

Barnes and Elias are rivals; both men have been Vietnam a long time and their reactions and attitude clearly display how the war affected everybody in different way. Barnes, for example, has been complete brutalized by the war while Elias has managed to keep some sense of sanity. Barnes' anger at Elias becomes s heated that he manages to kill him in cold blood during later patrol. One can easily refer to Barnes as a cold-hearted bastard, but after being in that type environment for a long period of time you can almo sympathize with him; here was a guy who was probably a decent human being before "Nam" turned him into pure, cold-blooded survivalist.

The change in Chris' behavior also vividly displays how war can tear at the soul. Chris deeply respects both Elias and Barnes. When he discovers that Barnes killed Elias, Chris considers taking revenge against Barnes. Barnes finds out about Chris' motives and attempts to kill Chris—twice. The first time, the other guys in the platoon save Chris by somehow managing to talk Barnes out of it. The second time, Barnes looks for him during a battle but both men are knocked out by a napalm blast.

During this time Chris has changed from a naive, idealistic college dropout to a battle-weary soldier no longer sure of anything. At the beginning of the movie Chris describes the situation in letters sent home to his grandmother. The letters stop as the movie goes on and Chris becomes concerned only with surviving and getting out of Vietnam. (Just about all of the men in the platoon care only about living through the hell and going home.) When Chris enlisted, he probably thought he was doing the right thing—fulfilling the role of a good, 'patriotic American,' but by the end he becomes cynical and distraught. No longer sure of what "justice" means, Chris confronts Barnes after regaining consciousness from the napalm blast and kills him.

Shortly thereafter, Chris' time in Vietnam is up and he is allowed to go home. Meanwhile, the perverse ironies of war come out when one of Chris' platoon buddies—virtually terrified for his life before the previous battle—is promoted to second lieutenant at the same time Chris is sent home.

As the helicopter takes off and flies away, Chris (bloodied and burned from napalm) begins to cry. This last scene—of one man reflecting on his time in Vietnam—illustrates the tragedy of the war. No subjective moralizing here, but instead an excellent movie which effectively displays the living hell which our Vietnam veterans went through.

STAFF

Brian Smith & Norm Leahy ..... Editors-In-Chief

Juan Calderon, Bill Porter ..... Art Editors

Dave Makarechian, Karl Ossentjuk & Steve Geraghty ..... Associate Editors

Dave Fitzgerald ..... Layout Editor

Contributors: Wayne D. Rudner, Greg Archer, Suzanne Leahy, Joe Hrbek, Bill Shaddock, Stacy Stanford, Maryrose Kohan, Shannon McGee, Robert Jurkiewicz, Karen Willoughby, Matt Sanidas, Louis Van Dyck, W.H. Briman and Jon-Mark Patterson.

A very special thanks to our "seer" and typesetter: Linda Shireman

Feminism and France

BY STACY STANFORD

I recently ventured into the professional world by volunteering at a museum. One of the curators was telling me about the museum's policies when a man walked into the room. He had been helping her with a project that he hadn't finished. So, he asked her if she and her associate could finish it for him. This is how he phrased his request: "Could you girls please finish this for me?" I had been with this person for about two hours and it had been obvious to me that she was a woman, probably in her late twenties. This woman thanked the man for the work he had done and politely agreed to his request. Neither seemed aware of the sexism that I perceived in that transaction.

One might think it picky to take offense at something that seems so trivial. Perhaps he was simply being informal by calling them girls and didn't intend to be disrespectful or sexist. But the fact remains that she is a woman and the term girl is incorrect. Just as it would have been incorrect for her to refer to him as a boy. He was placing himself in an elevated position by addressing her as an emotionally and physically inferior person. I don't know whether his intentions were to be informal or to elevate himself, but I think sexist language, either used consciously or unconsciously, can be a starting point for sexism on the whole. Therefore, it is not a triviality.

In order to combat sexual inequality on a larger and more basic level, it would be effective to begin with language. Some of the inequalities that confront women in the professional world are: lower pay for equal work, more difficulty in career upward mobility, and sexual harassment. These problems and many others exist for women. How can change occur when women are still called girls? It won't happen unless the attitude toward females is one of respect and equality, and that attitude is reflected in our language.

Nukes and the Future

BY SHANNON MCGEE

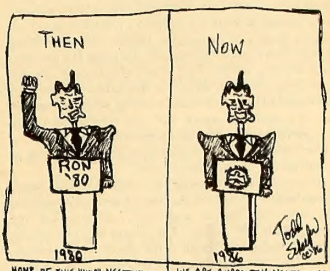
I have just recently finished a research project on the attitudes of CC students concerning the threat of nuclear war. The survey was small, consisting of only forty-four randomly selected people. The results indicate that only thirty-nine percent of those interviewed consider the threat of nuclear war to be one of the top three greatest problems facing the world today. Yet in fact it would seem that the threat of nuclear war is the greatest problem humankind has ever faced: the possibility of annihilation for the entire planet. This should then be the greatest political, economic, and moral problem of all current issues, that of living in the nuclear age.

President Dwight D. Eisenhower believes, as taken from a speech delivered in July of 1957, "War in our time has become an anachronism. Whatever the case in the past, war in the future can serve no purpose. A war which became general, as any limited action might, could only result in the virtual destruction of mankind." So war is not simple a contest between empires, but will bring destruction of the enemy and suicide for ourselves. The problem is not merely man atainst man, or nation against nation. It is man against war.

If we are to survive as an evolving species, we need to recognize that the planet is a common home of all life. No matter what geographical or political boundaries are created, we share the commonalty of humanity and the fact that all life is inter-dependent and inter-related. Herman Wouk writes in his novel, Winds of War, "Peace if it ever exists, will not be based on the fear of war, but on the love of peace. It will not be the abstaining from an act, but the coming of a state of mind."

Albert Eistein, along with other numerous scientists and politicians, has espoused that we must change our way of thinking about war. A national peace movement out of Palo Alto, Ca., proposes that we must build beyond war. As nuclear war will cause the destruction of the earth, war must become obsolete. Karl Jaspers, a German philosopher and recipient of the 1958 German Peace Prize writes, "Now unless all of us live with and for one another, we shall all be destroyed together. This new situation demands a corresponding answer. it is not enough to find new institutions; we must change ourselves, our character, our moral-political wills." He also writes in The Future of Mankind, "The threat of the atom bomb cannot be met by removing the bomb alone. it can only be met by removing war, by establishing world peace."

Conflict will always exist among people, but the challenge of survival in the nuclear age requires the discovery of peaceful conflict resolution. Seemingly, our alternatives are co-existence or ultimate destruction. J. Robert Oppenheimer, a scientist who played a large role in the development of the first nuclear bomb, writes, "We believe that the safety of this nation cannot lie wholly or even primarily in its scientific or technical powers. It can be based only on making future wars impossible." Thus nothing can be more imperative or vital than the prevention of any war, something to consider as one develops political and moral ideologies of their own.



THEN
NOW
RON '80
1980
1986
HOME OF THIS WIMPY NEGOTIATING WORKS! YOUHAVE TO SHOW THESE IRANIANS WHO'S BOSS! ALL THEY UNDERSTAND IS FORCE!
WE ARE CURRENTLY NEGOTIATING WITH THE GOVERNMENT OF IRAN FOR THE RELEASE OF HOSTAGES STILL HELD THERE.

A Voice in the Night

BY JON—MARK C. PATTERSON

On being a young white man:

I was reading the newspaper the other day. The Ku Klux Klan had held a rally in Georgia to protest the killing of a fifteen-year-old white boy by four black teenagers. What struck me most was what the Imperial Grand Dragon of Georgia had to say. He led the demonstrators with a bullhorn in hand, and was shouting something like: "Arent't you proud to be white? Come out with us and stand up and say that you are proud to be white!" (Not an exact quote.)

I thought about what he had said for quite a while. I realized that I am proud of who I am. I am proud that my family has preached the values of education and hard work. I am proud to be part of a middle-class tradition that advocates self-reliance, individual responsibility, and service to community and nation.

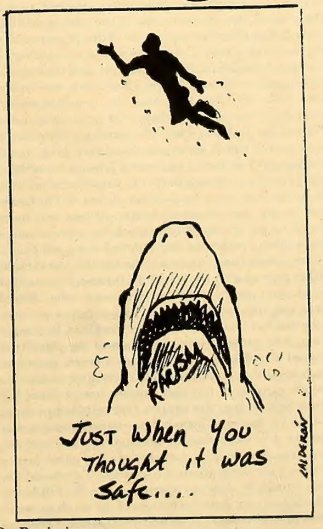
But I am not proud of that man.

And it worries me that he would point to his bigotry, hatred, and intolerance and call it his "whiteness"—and something to be proud of.

Now, thoughtful white people who despise what that man says are confused. If they say they are proud of being white, how do they distance themselves from racists? How do they say that being proud to be white does not mean that others must be ashamed to be anything else?

I am an idealist. I hope that we will one day all be proud of who we are and what we represent, and that our shared pride will be well-founded. Perhaps we will understand that there is room at the top for everyone—and that no one need pull someone else down to climb higher.

• • • •



On Patriotism:

It is far too easy to be a patriot these days. Anyone who likes Sylvester Stallone or chants "U-S-A!" to the television set or votes for a candidate wrapped in a flag is a great American.

With this pride comes a cocky self-assurance and an inane, poorly-founded optimism. The stock market zooms as our economy falters—for people are investing in a good feeling. This happiness pyramid scheme is producing wildly inflated values based on optimism rather than reality. I will not draw the now-fashionable historical parallel.

To fuel optimism, we borrow money. Our government spends money it does not have on weapons so that we can feel good about simultaneously paying fewer taxes and "being tough"—no strings attached. We as consumers take the next step—running up huge amounts of debt to buy things. These toys console us and keep us happy and optimistic.

The result: we get a lot more than we pay for! All we have to do is borrow now and promise that we will pay it back later. Everyone stays cheerful and eager to love America.

Something seems to be missing in the American people and, by logical extension, in those who run the government. The crucial element that makes patriotism different from a variety of jingoistic boastfulness is sacrifice. When people sacrifice, they give some of themselves so that the future may be better. They go into debt so they can invest in a better foundation for the days to come—whether this means capital for the economy or education for the next generation of minds. Today, we go into debt for ourselves, for the present; we don't give a damn about what our country will be for our children.

Perhaps we need a jolt to jar us from our reverie. Perhaps we need to struggle to keep ourselves above water for a few years, so we no longer take prosperity and lack of want for granted.

But I shouldn't worry. The way we are "planning" for it now, the future will come soon enough—with heavy doses of a corrective medicine. Then the true patriots will emerge.

America: Its Cup and Its Dreams

BY KARL OSSENTJUK

Rest easy, fellow Americans. The world-wide superiority of the United States has been firmly re-established with the decisive (though extremely boring) 4-0 victory of the noble vessel "Stars & Stripes" over the Aussie dinghy "Kookaburra III." As Dennis Connor and his red, white and blue 12-meter coasted across the finish line with the American flag waving gloriously in the wind, all worries of America struggling to maintain dominance in the future were seemingly washed away in the eyes of the general populace. The 1987 America's Cup was viewed by most Americans not simply as an elitist competition between upper-class yachting clubs throughout the world, but rather as an all-encompassing battle between nations for supreme pride and admiration throughout the universe.

The American loss in 1983 signaled not only the end of the 132-year monopoly of sailing's most coveted event, but it came at an ill-afforded time when the gospel being spoken in America stressed a rebirth of good 'ole Yankee pride and know-how. Dennis Conner's defeat aboard Liberty four years ago to Australia II must have made Ronnie and Mr. Lee "The Pride Is Back" Iacocca quite upset. For after all, it was more than the shocking conclusion of sport's longest winning streak. It was the end of a winning streak that had always been ours. Americans never paid much attention to the Cup prior to the 1980's because it was thought of as a given that an American boat would always win.

All appeared to be going as it should in 1983 when Conner held a 3-1 edge in the best-of-seven competition but then the "brave and sure" skipper did the unimaginable. He choked. The nation was in awe that such an atrosity could occur in these times of Walkmans, yogurt, John Elway and General Hospital. How could an American lose something that was such an important element in the foundation of this great nation of ours and symbolized so perfectly the tradition of the US of A as a country not to be taken lightly? America's Cup, though, illustrated how entirely this nation has come to expect victory without any effort. It is the United States that has come to regard other countries in the world too lightly. This was the case with Australia II in 1983, and it is the basis of our trade deficit with Japan. Dennis Conner, though, brought the Cup back to America in a manner that should be admired and duplicated.

The vastly experienced skipper, "Big Bad Dennis," simply went Down Under to make things "right" again. In the three years since his shattering loss, he had drawn upon the best technology that money could buy, and had rallied support around his effort to return this American symbol to its homeland. He formulated a strategy and practiced diligently to assure proper execution. Well, hey, it worked, and "Stars and Stripes" swept to a relatively easy 4-0 series victory thanks to superior skill, ingenuity and a brilliantly designed yacht complete with a special drag-reduction coating that may now even be utilized commercially.

American corporations and institutions need to take a lesson from Dennis Conner in what it takes to regain something that has been arrogantly allowed to unexpectedly slip away. Americans must assume the role of students again, and learn to respect and evaluate the accomplishments of other nations. The United States has become a land of blind teachers who are still living on the premise that America is the pulse of innovation that dictates the standards to the rest of the world. The steel industry in America has lost its world dominance because it attempted to continue to compete using outdated technology rather than investing in innovation to maintain its competitive edge. The US auto industry has suffered from a similar lack of foresight and alertness, and has thus become a symbol of American prowess falling by the wayside. The educational system in America continues to rest on its past success rather than focusing on its present shortcomings, and needs to reassess the components that make up an effective system. The fever and determination that drove Dennis Conner to an America's Cup victory in 1987 needs to catch fire and spread throughout the United States if this "great nation of ours" ever hopes to re-establish its pride and competitive spirit.

This year's America's Cup is probably the best example of this in decades. ESPN received its best ever rating at 12:30 a.m. EST on a Wednesday night when everyone watched Dennis Conner and company bring the Cup back home to the good ole USA. At this point, Dennis had a 3-0 lead, and everyone knew who was going to win. And at 12:45 a.m. MST, most people who began watching this race were still watching—and Dennis had well over a minute lead and would only lose if Moby-Dick or Jaws felt the urge to interrupt 12 metre yachting's greatest event. I must admit that I was one of those people who stayed up until they crossed the finish line, after which I promptly went to bed. Just like many non-yachters who found themselves interested in the events Down Under, I too was caught up in all of the hype. And isn't it funny how Budweiser seemed to be caught up in the hype of yet another Big Event?

Those Championship Blahs

BY STEVE GERAGHTY

For those of you wondering right now, this article does belong in the Disparaging Eye. "But," you say, "the Disparaging Eye is a journal of social and political thought." Well, we (the editors) decided that sports topics do belong in a journal of this sort. Sporting events are very social events. You find yourself meeting new people, whether you are just watching or actually participating. Where else would you expect to find 100,000 people together watching people that they've never had the chance to meet (besides Christmas mass in Vatican City)? Quite often we learn things about people that we didn't even guess they had in them. Other times we knew they had it in them, but hardly knew to what extent. Sports seem to tap at an inner reserve of human qualities and emotions. And it is with this in mind that the Disparaging Eye will now include sports. Well, at least topics in sports (have no fear, we will not give any scores from the weeks before!).

One thing that amazes me about the sports nut is his quest for the inside information. This one desire has led to the mass production of sports journals. (I know that this phenomenon is not just related to sports, as any number of news vendors would attest.) In turn, sports journals pick up on the stupidest little things about athletes; they are, at times, merely guides to sports trivia. Of course, the sports nut loves it. And there is no better time to find out that their favorite hero knew someone who wrote to the Vice President than during the few weeks (or days) preceeding the "Big Event."

The "Big Event" is itself an interesting thing. Here in America it's always the World Championship. We have World Champions in football, basketball, and baseball. America doesn't crown World Champions in soccer because everyone else has undisputably better teams than what we could put on the field. But if there is even a chance that America has the best team, immediately a World Championship is at stake. I always thought that World Championships were broadcast on ABC on Saturday afternoons, or were held only every four years. Yet not every sport is an Olympic event; that's probably why America laid claim to World Championships in the other sports. However, world-class athletes do not intentionally screw up their sports because of their own selfish interests. They don't care about the money—instead, they care about their sport. They don't go on strike—yet their governments may say that they cannot participate. True World Champions play because of their love for a sport, not because they get more money and then more endorsement opportunities. But the titles of the Big Events will not be changed. America will always crown a champion for herself—and also the rest of the world. I guess that this saves the rest of the world the time and money in deciding who is second best (as John Madden says: "Nobody goes around cheering we're number two!).

After the clouds of sarcasm disappear, a serious explanation for the Big Event title emerges: the sports fan loves hype. The more press coverage that an event receives, the bigger the importance attached to the contest. And also the less exciting the contest will be. Take the Super Bowl as an example of this phenomenon. Only one Super Bowl (IV) has been close to overtime—Baltimore beat Dallas 16-13 on a field goal with under ten seconds remaining in the game. Only one other, Super Bowl XI (Pitt 35, Dallas 31), was the perfect seesaw battle that everyone hopes the prize game in the NFL will be. And that was TEN years ago! Only two of twenty-one football championships have been really good games. Yet from August until January (or all year long if you live in Broncoland), this single game receives the attention of every football fan. A seat at The Game costs nearly one hundred dollars—if you are lucky enough to get a ticket from one of the representative team's office (otherwise five hundred is a good price).

Some sports have recognized the fact that the value of a ticket goes up with the title of the contest; so instead of having only one game to determine the World Champion, they have a series of games. Seven seems to be the number that those in charge liked best. First team to win four games at the conclusion of the playoffs is crowned the World's best. But with seven games in which to do this, both teams could win three so that the seventh game is in fact just another one of those big events. Seldom does this happen. One team jumps out to a 3-0 or 3-1 lead, and nobody cares who is going to win anymore, just when they are going to win it. However, many people will still buy a ticket to every game, just to say they were there when it happened. Yet should the series actually be close, no team ever wins the NBA title at the buzzer, nor does the bottom of the ninth prove to be the pivotal point in baseball's Fall Classic. The more hype attached to the Big Event, the more disappointed the fans will be. Yet the sports fan will never quit watching the Big Event until its over.

BY GREG ARCHER AND MATT SANIDAS

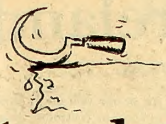
The modern literary trends of France have established a new genre of philosophical thought. Having spent several months in France and having taken numerous French literature classes, we have discovered a sense of "esprit ouvert" (opened mindedness) which is not equaled here in the United States. To begin, one must understand the foundations of French culture. France, like the United States, is a "melting pot" of different ideas and cultures. This is incorporated in the French literary trends of the twentieth century. In other words, modern French authors are more apt than their American counterparts to question the role of the individual in their society. That is to say, how the individual views his surroundings and tries to comprehend the unknown elements of an unstable world. Although we will only discuss two specific authors, we feel that they best represent the current literary trend in France.

Because of France's geographic and demographic position in the world, it is torn by the ideologies of both the East and West. These forces compel the French policy makers to create laws that reflect the diversity of the French population. Needless to say, this is also a major characteristic of French literature. Hence the "melting pot" theory of French society can be applied to modern French literary trends.

The concept of an "esprit ouvert" is established by numerous French authors. In the book L'Amant by Marguerite Duras, the reader is witness to a relationship of potential class and racial tensions. The narrator transcends these social barriers built by a close-minded society. She more readily accepts different venues of thought without passing critical social judgements. In a general sense, this is an acceptance of all that represents "l'autre" (the other). "L'autre" is the elements of different cultures and societies that we tend to ignore because we have no need or desire to understand them.

At this point, it is necessary to discuss the concept of "meme et l'autre" which is both the foundation of modern French philosophical thought and the basis for an "esprit ouvert." We attribute this concept to Roland Barthes. In his books Mythologies and Lecon, he analyzes the way in which people view their surroundings and the events that affect their lives. Man in general tries to understand the unknown or "l'autre" by internalizing it through his own definitions. If one applies this to society, it is apparent that a man who lives within the confines and ethics of his society, unconsciously applies these ethics to other societies and extracts only what he is capable of understanding. In a sense, one can say that Roland Barthes is trying to show us that by internalizing "l'autre" one destroys the essence of change. By change, we mean the inherent need to experience different thoughts and ideals in order to grow intellectually and philosophically.

Now we return to the "melting pot" theory and its relationship to the concept of "meme et l'autre." Because France is a crossroads of many different cultures and ideas, there is greater tendency to incorporate different opposing lifestyles without destroying the individuality of each. Perhaps the best example of this is the French political system. This system must establish an order without surpressing any extreme ideologies. In addition, it must find a political equilibrium acceptable for all. This will be the subject of our next article.



Poland On the Brink

BY ROBERT JURKIEWICZ

Reading the Wall Street Journal as often as I do wadays, I came across a string of articles examining Polish situation. These articles have portrayed the mmunist society as one trying to keep afloat. One rticular article revealed the existence of the black rket and the relevance it had to the Polish economy.
lieve it or not, Poland is one of the leading countries in ch United States dollars can be found. The United tes believes that there is about five billion dollars culating in this socialist country. The leaders of this onomically depressed society do hold the United States low esteem, yet they are more than willing to have our enbacks floating around in their economic system. As rry Newman of the Wall Street Journal reports, "The lish leaders are delighted that their citizens treasure at st as many pictures of Lincoln as they do of Lenin."
e government not only allows United States dollars to y a large role in their economy, but the government ntrols that market. Poland even has a bank that allows izens to deposit American dollars, so as to create re funds in which to pay off their increasingly oblesome foreign debt. As one official stated to the ll Street Journal, "We have financial problems and know it, so why not make good business?" The vernment is ecstatic to be able to participate in any pe, way or form in the black market so that it may be le to secure enough of those precious United States llars. Heck, the state doesn't even patrol the black rket, it is one of the only ways it can create capital (US llars) in such a society. Who said that free enterprise s dead in those communist countries?

So often we hear about Poland's foreign debt to the ited States and other Western Countries, that the estion of when will the Polish government pay that bt back comes up over and over again. My answer is mple, if and when this communist state that employs cialism as its economic doctrine realizes that pitalism—yes that system of laissez-faire—is the only y an economy can flourish. Then that debt of some rty-four billion dollars will be repaid.

Such a socialist system cannot achieve the desired goal economic stability when the system itself is flawed?
e Eastern European society has limited itself to the t array of capital available to it, because Moscow eves that capitalism is the root of all evils. Maybe it is, t at this point in time is one to believe ideology or ality? There are two reasons Poland is still afloat. One that Western countries are soft-hearted on the issue of llecting their debt because they do not want to lose out the principle owed them. The other is that the black rket is able to flood the country with enough enbacks that the government is able to capture that rrency and put it to work. As one Polish citizen told e Wall Street Journal, "In America you can buy erything for dollars and nothing for zlotys. In Poland, actly the same." Poland's debt can only be repaid ough the economic instrument of the U.S. dollar, so e Polish authorities are trying to manipulate the black rket so that they can curtail that deficit. Instead of ying to operate a black market, why not just create a pitalistic system which everyone can work under.

We all know that capitalism is the answer to all of land's woes. Where can such a system be found? Surely t in Eastern Europe. Only in Western societies do such stems flourish. If Poland and other Eastern European untries could realize the economic nourishment they uld receive with a more realistic and profitable system capitalism, insted of the highly ideological socialist em, maybe then Poland and others will be able to urish as they once did in the age of Kings. Maybe if y realized this, these satellites of the mother Russia uld revolt and demand independence and become an egral part of our Western society. Maybe it can ppen.

Wait a minute, I have just realized that this is a dream.
y alarm clock has just awakened me for class. Quickly I n on the morning news and there happens to be a ecial news story on Poland. "Poland's debt has not

Continued on p. 8

The Nicaraguan Elections Revisited

BY JOE HRBEK

The November four, 1984 elections in Nicaragua played an influential role in the affairs of Central America. For one, the mixture and type of US/Soviet world super-power influence in the isthmus would be greatly altered. The eventual result, an overwhelming Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) victory allowed the Soviet Union to greatly increase its prescence and influence in the region because of its alliance with the Sandinistas. Meanwhile, the US has been left in the cold as a result of the election, with less of a hold on the region which it calls its "own backyard." The Reagan Administration cried, however, even before November, that the elections were fraudulent; the ruling Sandinistas enjoyed unfair advantages which should invalidate the vote. In this paper, we shall discuss the election and electoral process to reach a fair conclusion concerning the subject. I hope to show the readers that the fairest conclusion is that the 1984 election was acceptable as far as choosing a government for the people in Nicaragua.

The arguments of those believing the elections were unfair are noteworthy, however. I asked Professor Paul Kutsche of his observations about the situation; he visited Nicaragua during the campaign in August, 1984. First, he noticed that the FSLN enjoyed an unfair advantage over the opposition in that most of the graffiti there was pro-Sandinista (Kutsche, interview, December 9, 1986). The only exceptions, he noted, were miniscule amounts of communist graffiti. Anti-Sandinista graffiti was illegal there, even if on private property. The person posting such graffiti, would be arrested and jailed. The importance of such a law is that graffiti provided free advertising for the Sandinistas. The opposing parties, on the other hand, already working with tiny budgets in their campaign, were forced to resort to other costly forms of advertising.

Second, in the time that Mr. Kutsche spent in Nicaragua, he was told of cases in which opposing parties were harassed by the government. Unlike graffiti, posting handbills was legal, but the person posting such literature ran the risk of being arrested and thrown in jail anyways (Kutsche, interview, December 9, 1986). As soon as the prisoners released was requested, however, the government would let him or her go. Their only objective in arresting the worker was to delay the campaign of the opposition, making it a less of a threat. Many argue that such harassment is enough reason to consider the 1984 elections fraudulent.

Also, the government's control of all radio and television stations in Nicaragua poses another advantage for the FSLN (Kutsche, interview, December 9, 1986). The opposing parties could use these two means of advertising only at the will of the government. These parties had to share thirty minutes of air-time on television per day, and 45 minutes of radio air time as well (Reding 1984, p. 492). The rest of the day, the FSLN was free to use these means of advertising as they pleased. The argument contends that the opposition was so smothered by these great FSLN advantages, that they didn't even have the chance to get out of the starting gate in the campaign.

Not only were the radio and television portions of the media virtually unavailable to the opposition parties in Nicaragua, but reaching the masses by means of propaganda was equally difficult to attain (Kutsche, interview, December 9, 1986). Tools such as printer's ink, news print, paper, and carbons are rare in the country. This scarcity causes extremely high prices for these materials. As I said before, these parties worked with small budgets, and a simple thing such as printing and distributing literature was simply too costly for the parties to do. Conversely, the FSLN government had easy access to these materials. The FSLN could therefore produce mass amounts of propaganda and distribute it widely at a low cost.

The fifth case which argues the elections were unacceptable is mentioned in the November 19, 1984 issue of Time magazine. The article contests that the election was insignificant because "...pressure to participate was high..." and "...the Nicaraguan election mood was one of indifference..." (Russell, 1984, p. 102). Apparently, here, the author of the article feels that since voters were 'forced' to vote, and were indifferent to the outcome, they just voted for the FSLN; hence, he feels, this is the reason the FSLN came out ahead. Later on in my research, however, I found this to be untrue.

Another question used to downplay the validity of the elections is what role did the nation's literacy/illiteracy play in them? Often times, so it goes, voters may have been literate enough only to be able to recognize and understand the FSLN's signs and abbreviations (Robert S. Leiken, 1984, as paraphrased in McIntire, 1985, p. 23). The argument insists that the people would have been able to easily recognize the FSLN's name, for it had been their government for five years, but they might not have been able to understand the new and unfamiliar names of the opposing parties. No person is going to vote for a party which is foreign to them.

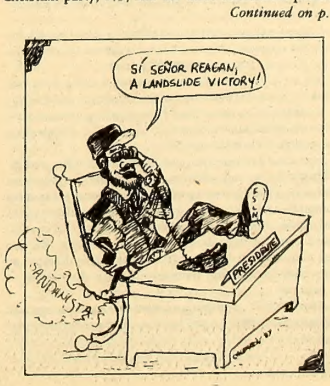
Seventh, the literacy question is related to another argument opponents of the election use to say it was unfair, that the Sandinistas enjoyed an unfair advantage in their control of the schooling systems. After taking power in 1979, the FSLN government initiated a literacy campaign in which the literacy rate rose to 87% (Land, 1986, p. 588). The complaint holds that the students were subject to FSLN propaganda in their learning. The books the people learned from were slanted in favor of the FSLN, giving them a head start in the campaign before it even started.

The last and most controversial argument which says the elections were meaningless is that "The Coordinadora, represented by Arturo Cruz, ...the largest and most influential political opposition to the Sandinistas..." did not even run (McIntire, 1985, p. 33). The Coordinadora, consisting of three separate parties which joined forces to oppose the Sandinistas, the Social Democrats (PSD), the Social Christians (PSC), and the Liberal Constitutionalist party (PLC), elected Cruz as their leader, but withheld from registering for the election in protest of the unfair advantages the FSLN enjoyed. The controversy lies in the question of whether Cruz was really ever a threat to the Sandinistas or not. I will address this question later on.

According to the arguments I have listed, it appears that the Sandinistas did have an unfair advantage in the campaign process; the opposing parties, especially with their measly budgets, had a difficult time advertising themselves due to restrictions and harrassment by the incumbant FSLN government. In this case, however, I feel the question is not whether the elections were "fair" or not, but instead whether they were acceptable for choosing a government in Nicaragua or not. It would be wrong for us to make a black or white, fair or unfair judgment in our context. We, in the United States, have had two centuries to perfect our democracy. The Sandinistas had only five years. We, in the United States, are not in the middle of a civil war. The Sandinistas were. We, in the United States, are used to achieving goals through negotiation and dialogue. Central Americans have grown up in an atmosphere where goals are achieved almost always through violence and repression. Therefore, our judgment of the Nicaraguan elections must be considerate of these factors; their newly born democracy must be forgiven. When it is, a positive conclusion will be achieved, the conclusion that yes, the elections in Nicaragua were acceptable in achieving their purpose.

First, we must note the overwhelming margin with which the Sandinistas won. It is significant. The FSLN captured roughly 67% of the votes cast. This talley beat the next highest percentage nearly five times over; the Conservative Democratic Party (PCDN) receiving 14% of the votes. Further behind the PCDN was the Indpendent Liberal Party, with 10%, the Popular Social Christian party, 6%, and the three communist parties,

Continued on p. 8



Feminism and CC

BY SHANNON MCGEE & KAREN WILLOUGHBY

What is feminism? Ask any number of women and the likely responses will be varied and sometimes opposing. With so many schools of thought, feminism means something different to each woman.

What about men? From the women's perspective, is it possible for feminism to be both a woman's and a man's issue? Does closing the gender gap mean considering men's positions as well?

Stereotypical terms like "chauvinist" and "militant feminist" separate men and women. Women feel intimidated and ostracized while men feel threatened. Perhaps closing the gender gap requires each sex to understand that the oppression of one is the oppression of both.

Maybe understanding the socialization process of both sexes will result in appreciation, mutuality, and respect for each individual. Isn't it stereotypes that prevent people from making decisions as individuals and impose on them the responsibility of traditional roles?

The poem "For Every Women," written by Nancy Smith, helps clarify the disadvantages of our social and cultural traditions.

For Every Women

For every woman who is tired of acting weak when she knows she is strong/there is a man who is tired of appearing strong when he feels vulnerable.

For every woman who is tired of acting dumb/there is a man who is burdened with the constant expectation of "knowing everything."

For every woman who is tired of being called "an emotional female"/there is a man who is denied the right to weep and to be gentle.

For every woman who is called unfeminine when she competes, there is a man for whom competition is the only way to prove his masculinity.

For every woman who is tired of being a sex object, there is a man who must worry about his potency.

For every woman who feels "tied down" to her children, there is a man who is denied the full pleasure of shared parenthood.

For every woman who is denied meaningful employment or equal pay, there is a man who must bear full financial responsibility for another human being.

For every woman who was not taught the intracacies of an automobile, there is a man who was not taught the satisfaction of cooking.

For every woman who takes a step towared her own liberation, there is a man who finds the way to freedom has been made a little easier.

Nancy Smith presents the extreme view from both perspectives. Do these or similar discrepancies exist at CC?

Is there a CC woman who is silent in class because she feels her opinion isn't as valid and is there a CC man who feels he must always prove his point?

Is there a CC woman who is tired of waiting for a date while a CC man is burdened with the initiative of asking?

Is there a CC woman afraid of appearing too assertive, thus masculine, and is there a CC man afraid of appearing too gently, thus effeminate?

One must become aware of the possibility for change Ultimately the individual is responsible for his own decisions. However we must recognize the expections of ourselves and each other, offer each other alternatives and allow freedom for needed change. A Liberation movement for women is also meant for men. We can free both women and men from limiting stereotypes so they may choose for themselves what they want to experience.

Are there CC women and men who will accept and support each other in the breakup of these limitations?

Conducting Business 101

BY WAYNE D. RUDNER

When asked to write an article concerning the contemporary business world, a myriad of approaches began to race through my open-vented idealistic mind. I was honored to oblige with the request because, let's face it, capitalism is and will be my life. Let there not be a single Colorado College student to doubt this assertion and state that one day I will sit atop some mountain post scanning the horizons for distant fires. No, the CC experience taught me well enough to respect others' views and leave the forests to our nature lovers.

Although I thoroughly enjoy hiking, camping or bicycling through America's mountains, a leisurely game of golf at Pebble Beach, the comfort and convenience of a Ritz-Carlton hotel, or a choice dinner at one of New York's finest best appeases my sense or tranquility—especially for conducting business. And this is the topic I grabbed from many swirling ideas entering through open windows up yonder when your fine editor-in-chief posed his request...how to conduct business.

Now, "how to conduct business" is a class in and of itself. Several variables comprise Conducting Business 101 essential to the graduating college senior and hopefully—I will enlighten my fellow colleagues on the ins-and-outs of this masterful art lacking at Colorado College. One thing, though, must be considered—those who aspire to learn nuances integral for impressing a client at a luncheon or cocktail party should leave the classroom at once. There will be no discussion concerning this variable for CB 101 entails only "how to conduct business" to get into business.

Class is now in session.

So you want to shoot under par at Pebble Beach? Well, you have arrived at the correct place after entering a realm all idealistic graduating seniors discover themselves in as the diploma lands on an open palm. Whether you enjoy it or not, before being even invited to play with the boss one must understand the capitalist system and intricacies of its inner workings. In two words, it begins with SELLING YOURSELF. To quote a location cited in your textbook by one "successful" self-promoter attempting to appear on 'Late Night with David Letterman': "marketing an image to the American public [businessmen] demands confidence, without which the individual usually fails in any job-oriented pursuit." Yes, idealism still works in America yet stems from the individual. A college student vacating the liberal arts education bears four years of diverse knowledge from diverse courses and concludes with a sharpened persona that requires an assured attitude. Confronting the real world with refined maturity commands certainty of one's worth (without which our Letterman self-promoter would have surely failed in achieving interviews on all media vehicles across the nation and receiving letters of support from congressmen, senators and actors). Class, the key to gaining entrance on Spyglass Hill before developing proficiency to impress the boss or clients as you birdie your way to bigger and better financial deals necessitates recognizing your own attributes and limitations, marketing them accordingly, and crossing Cache La Poudre with confidence that you alone will conquer and achieve!

Turning to Chapter 4, one is immediately struck by a photograph of the hotel bellboy transporting three suitcases of luggage to a penthouse suite in New York City's Ritz-Carlton. Asked the secret to his success, our image cultivator responds with an enthusiastic "PERSISTANCE!" The American manifest destiny responded to her liberated country's call for new land to cultivate and overcame great obstacles thrust before covered wagons to reach the white sands of the Pacific. Now it is time for CC freed to answer their own declaration for new challenges to experience and puncture the barriers obstructing hidden opportunities to green strands on the mighty dollar. The successful graduate must cast away concern about rejection and continuously attack his dilemma. With individual fortitude and confidence already honed into a working model, a student not only succeeds in reaching his goal with perseverance but gains respect from all he encounters. In actuality, class, our Letterman self-promoter has not yet entered the penthouse suite, nor even travelled to New York, for only time and persistance will actualize page 42's photograph. But if he lingers, the demise of his pursuit is evident. Ladies and gentlemen, do not be afraid to call, meet or knock on doors over and over again. The age of individual success is upon us...try, try, try again!

We will break for ten minutes.

Ireland

BY W.H. BRIMAN

1987 marks the second year under which the Un Kingdom will operate in Northern Ireland under t Anglo-Irish Agreement, and with this coming yea renewed hope exists around the United States that t "Catholics" in Northern Ireland will soon achieve t independence for which they have fought for hundre of years. Furthermore, the dream exists that wh London relieves itself of the burden of "protectin Northern Ireland, the Republic of Ireland will absorb Northern neighbors and all of Ireland will live in pea Sounds nice, eh?

However, most of those who so devotedly cry out f the end of British tyranny in Northern Ireland really h to realize, or even consider, the real problem Northern Ireland. This problem involves much mo than the religious affiliations of either the "Catholics" the "Protestants"—these names only serve distinguish between two groups; it lies in the bigo the transplanted Scots and Brits display toward the Ir Catholics.

This bigotry has manifested itself in every aspect daily life in Northern Ireland since the governmen Britain first offered Irish land to its citizens. The transplanted Brits considered the Irish a conque people and expected them to act as such, in a civiliz modest manner (as conquered people should). Th wherever in Ireland the British dominated, the Ir became second class citizens, especially in Northe Ireland—about the only place in Ireland for which t British acquired a taste.

Today the bigotry by those non-Irish toward the Iri in Northern Ireland continues stronger than ever wall as forboding as the Berlin wall seperates the Ir (Catholics) from the non-Irish (Protestants), and ser as a symbol of the degradation the Irish in North Ireland have suffered for over three-hundred years a will suffer for many more.

Freedom for Northern Ireland and its absorption the Republic of Ireland will probably not carry mu freedom for the Irish in Northern Ireland, for bigo transcends any political or religious affiliation. Tr freedom for the Irish in Northern Ireland, as well as t black in South Africa, the Jew in the Sovier Union a many other structures of bigotry will not blossom w change in power, but only at the time in history when t human mentality moves beyond the group level and t bigotry associated with it.

The last topic for discussion in today's lecture begin with food. Although time is near to break for lunch I fee a reverberating animosity towards leaving th classroom; probably since a choice dinner at The Fou Seasons in New York City, or food devoid of SAGA better suits the hungry palate of a seasoned businessma and perspective client. Yet no matter if the dinne originates with escargot or turkey cutlets, the principl behind effective conversation during consumption stems from KNOWING YOUR PEOPLE. Quali research by graduating seniors before contact an realizing another's potential towards satisfying a goa produces optimal gain for the endeavor. Though th social setting need not be over food (phon conversations, golf engagements, or casual walks in th park may suffice), prosperity occurs by combinin persuasive, mature and confident speaking (traits o must be already well-versed) with an ability to manage conversation so tactfully that the recipient fails recognize your unrelenting drive towards securing desired aim. The network system, a continuation "knowing your people," constitutes the lifeblood o American business and requires similar aforementione techniques to establish contacts throughout a myriad professional names outside the CC campus. Th opportunities for advancement via others is there, so u them! Our self-promoter example would have lacked exposure without this heartbeat of America.

SELLING YOURSELF, PERSISTANCE, AN KNOWING YOUR PEOPLE are important traits graudating students. Although the world may be strang and new, remembering and developing concepts taug in today's class allow you, the CC experiment an idealistic young generation, to forge ahead on the road success. A leisurely game of golf at Pebble Beach, t comfort and convenience of a Ritz-Carlton hotel, o choice dinner at one of New York's finest is just arou the corner. The best in capitalism is yours—seize th opportunity and continue "conducting business!"

Your author has, and as a result may soon appear 'Late Night with David Letterman.'

Conducting Business 101 dismissed. Test tommorro at 10:00 a.m.

What is Volunteerism?

BY BILL SHADDOCK

On Jan. 27, 1987 the Gazette Telegraph stated its opposition to Opportunity No. 7 which is to come to a vote of the citizens of Colorado Springs on April 7.

The city government is requesting authorization to pay the mayor and city council members, who presently receive no monetary compensation for their efforts. If the Colorado Springs residents vote yes on Opportunity No. 7, the mayor would receive $15,000 and the council members $10,000 each.

The GT contends that although the elected officials work long hard hours (the mayor contributing an average of 152 hours and the council members 74 hours a month), they knew they would be working long hours for no pay when they accepted their roles, that voters have repeatedly chosen a system of volunteer leaders, and that there is no shortage of qualified volunteers to fill these positions if the present officials should wat to resign.

These are persuasive points and are reflective of the recurring trend of voluntary activity within the United States. It's quite noble and impressive that this country has, since its founding, always been an example to other nations with its army of volunteers. But before we all cease our present endeavors and follow suit by volunteering 35-40 hours a week to a good cause (as the mayor does), let us reexamine the above issue and the consequences of not paying these officials.

First, not everyone can afford to donate 40 or even 17 hours a week. Many people are barely surviving even though they may work two jobs. If they're struggling to raise a family, that second job may be helping to make a down payment on a decent house or paying for the children's education. It is naive to expect these individuals to make the decision to give up their extra income or their precious time with their families, even though they may be concerned citizens with a knowledge of the workings of the system. Not paying officials not only restricts equal opportunity for the individual, it also caters to the elite, leaving the government vulnerable to unequal representation.

In addition, Colorado Springs is a growing city. Heavy annexation has caused its geographical domain to continually expand. The city's population has also increased from 236,000 in 1970 to 349,000 in 1984. As Colorado Springs grows, its problems will become more complex.

A case in point is the city's transportation system. Poorly coordinated to begin with, the "town's" growth has only aggravated the problem. Conventional forms of entrepreneurship may supply the people with jobs, but its not likely to provide them with a safe and speedy manner of getting to and from those jobs. Colorado Springs will increasingly need to coordinate the aspirations of the entrepreneur with its own visions of providing a clean and efficient environment which meets the needs of all its people. As the elected officials are responsible for working with private enterprise to achieve these goals, they will be carrying a heavier load.

My third and final point is one of a more philosophical nature yet that is not to impart that it is lacking in reality. It may be ironic that as voluntary efforts rise, which seems to be a good thing, we stand in danger of creating a very ugly phenomenon. For if one is to ask which tasks are expected to be fulfilled by volunteers, the answer seems to be many of those which are most invaluable to us. At the same time we continue to pay individuals for work of only secondary importance. The result is that insufficient time and concern are given to our most serious problems.

An illustration will help to clarify this conclusion. Let's say that in individual named Cindy believes that her time would be most productively spent working with the elderly. Although there seem to be many elderly residents in Cindy's area who would appreciate someone to run errands for them or just plain spend time with them, there are very few paid positions in this field. But Cindy needs an income on which to eat. As a result, she obtains a job working for a well to do family which hit it big in the corn chip market years ago. She spends 40 hours a week cooking and cleaning for the corn chip family, who allow themselves to be waited on. She is able to spend her free time serving the elderly, but of course her free time as well as energy have become limited. The result is that the needs of the elderly are inadequately addressed, while the corn chip family's every whim is catered to.

The corn chip family may believe its wonderful that cindy is serving the community by aiding the elderly. It may have even provided her with employment as a servant in their home so that she would not have to leave town and abandon the whole project in search of a "real" job. Yet wouldn't it have been more effective if Cindy's wages had been paid directly to her for the task of serving the elderly full time? And which task is more valuable to society, catering to those who are in no real need for assistance, or providing for the those who can no longer provide for themselves?

Although I have settled on a very explicit example, such routines are not uncommon in the United States. One must question the prupose of paying people generous wages to provide services which we could do without (the best money I ever made was busing tables), while at the same time not providing sufficient funding for those involved in desperately needing functions, such as caring for the elderly, or in the case of the public officials, the planning of cities.

The response of many to my interrogation would be to cite Adam Smith's belief that if the baker (or in this case the corn chip producer) looks out for his own best interest, everybody's best interest will be served Consequently they might respond that paying an individual to serve others would disrupt God's plan for an economy which is most efficient if left unmanipulated.

But it should be asked if it is not in our own best interest to serve others as well as ourselves. Not only does it hurt when one's own needs aren't addressed it also hurts to see someone else in need. This is an aspect of human nature many of us seem to ignore. Hence, when asking which investments serve our self interests, we limit our scope by dispelling the fact that we do indeed have a superego and concentrate only upon the inferior ego.

Such behavior is inadequate. It is time we reconsider what "self interest" really entails. Then, based on our conclusions, we need to reprioritize. We need to ask ourselves which investments of our time and resources will best serve our wants and provide us with fulfilling work. Following these steps leads us to an emancipating realization: Being free to pursue one's self interest does not mean being selfish. We can continue to be guided by the "invisible hand" of the free market. But if we are sincere in letting that hand lead us, we may find investing in people like Cindy or our public officials to be sound action. We may also find ourselves in Cindy's shoes!

Volunteers are an integral part of our society and certainly important. But all too often we've taken advantage of their good-will to our own disadvantage. Our illogical fear of compensating individuals who seek means to better society has often stifled efficiency. By not working to enable individuals to commit themselves to the job full time, we deprive ourselves of needed contributions. Therefore, only when we realize the need to invest in public service will our society begin to meet its greater needs.

Smith from p. 1

ran's parliament. Mossadeq headed a coalition of ecular and religious nationalists who opposed Mohammed Reza Shah (hereafter refereed to simply as he Shah). Mossadeq's coalition was known as the National Front."

As a member of parliament Mossadeq had called for ationalization of the existing British-run oil fields. He ook over as leader of Iran in the spring of 1951, and by eptember of the same year "Iranian troops shut the ountry's British technicians out of the oil installation hey had run for decades." But British Petroleum and its ix sister companies (Shell, Gulf, Texaco, Exxon, Social ood Mobil) responded by choking off the transport of ranian oil. They were able to do this because the ranians did not own a fleet of tankers. The oil ompanies stepped up production in other countries to make up for the Iranian losses and Iran essentially possessed a 'worthless' commodity which she could not ell.

The American government came to view Mossadeq as left-wing fanatic. At the same time, American nimosity toward Mossadeq increased. The American overnment backed the "Seven Sisters" decision to oycott Iranian oil, and this subsequently produced a arge amount of animosity in Iran toward the United tates. Mossadeq retained his popularity even though ran's economy began to suffer. However, a split eveloped in the Mossadeq coalition between the left nd moderate wings. The left became less supportive of Mossadeq. The Shah, and those loyal to m, wished to overthrow Mossadeq.

The army still displayed a substantial degree of loyalty o the Shah, for on August 19, 1953 the army managed to ge a coup. The coup was successful, Mossadeq urrendered, and the Shah reclaimed his power. But ommon knowledge now dictates that the C.I.A. played n important role in the coup. "There appears to be no oubt that the coup was C.I.A. sponsored...(it) could not ave succeeded without significant internal disaffection r indifference, but without outside aid it could not have ecured." In addition, "...many Iranians new from the utset that the United States C.I.A. was involved in the overthrow of Mossadeq..." Thus the man who would come to rule Iran for the next 25 years was put into power with substantial American assistance. Mossadeq, in turn, became an enduring symbol of hope and heroism.

Iranian oppositionists came to see the Shah as American—imposed and controlled. With the Shah's coming to power the United States took over as the dominant foreign force in Iran. American investment increased, as well as direct American involvement in Iran's oil-centered economy. Opposition hopes that the United States would help in creating a more democratic government faded. In fact, from 1953 to 1963, if American support had ceased, the Shah would most likely have been overthrown. In 1957 the Shah wanted to enhance the stability of his regime. He thus began the formation of SAVAK, whose members were trained by the CIA. As the Shah's reign became more solidified, America's government and American corporations felt very secure about the Shah's pro-Western stance, even though his regime became increasingly prepared to engage in acts of repression.

Nevertheless, during the fall of 1960 the Shah did make a major effort to liberalize Iran. 'He permitted some degree of electoral freedom and equal amounts of freedom for the press, speech and assembly." But the Shah ended this liberalization process as discontnet grew more fervent and became a threat to the regime's stability. Religious leaders and large numbers of the middle class (Mossadeq's biggest supporters) wanted to ouster the Shah.

As the Iranian economy expanded during the 1960s, so did the Shah's power. Of the three decades in which the Shah presided over Iran, the most stable period for his regime was during the 1960's and early 1970's, when Iran achieved relatively high rates of economic growth. During this period—the Shah increasingly attempted to 'Westernize' his country and turn it into a global military and economic power.

The Shah dealt with opposition forces in one of two ways. One method was outright repression measures such as jailing and torture. The other was "co-optation"—the bringing of oppositional university students into the ever-expanding government bureaucracy—with the understanding that they not speak out against the Shah. Obviously this didn't bring about real loyalty to the Shah; oppositionists knew that the Shah was attempting to buy their support.

By 1976 economic conditions in Iran began to deteriorate due to very high rates of inflation. Given the worsening condition of the economy, opposition to the Shah increased, becoming more vocal and more violent. Eventually, Ayatollah Khomeini stepped up his opposition efforts as did the religious leadership within Iran itself. With the Shah's support declining, he responded through greater acts of repression. In the summer of 1977 the Shah jailed Ayatollah Talequani (associated closely with Ayatollah Khomeini) to a ten year prison sentence. This action ended the Shah's backing among the lower classes, whose support had been steadily declining due to economic distress. The Shah hesitated in adopting austerity measures because they "...would be at the expense of the newly rich who comprised one of the Shah's few bases of support."

The growth in opposition and deteriorating stability also caused the Shah to increasingly criticize and distrust those in his security apparatus. "Arbitrary dismissals of security force officials adversely affected both morale and efficiency in the security forces." This led to greater inefficiency in the security forces and more importantly, increased confidence from the opposition. The opposition had also gained confidence from external forces, initially from Jimmy Carter's human rights campaign and later from foreign groups such as Amnesty International. Forces hostile to the Shah also formed a tighter, more unified coalition consisting of the National Front, the Freedom Front (Islamic-based) and radical group such as the Tudeh Party (a pro-Soviet, communitst party).

Futhermore, parts of the various opposition groups—"...middle class and elderly remnants of the National Front, students inside and outside Iran, the workers and the guerillas—had ties to the growing number of oppositionists who voiced their views in increasingly Islamic terms, "the religious opposition."

Continued on p. 8

Reagan Vs. the Democrats

BY MARYROSE KOHAN

Prior to the 1986 congressional elections, Reagan maintained a hero-like image in Congress. Although all his proposals did not pass into laws, he certainly did not lose many battles. Following the installation of the new Democratic majority in January, Reagan's image, as well as his ability to push legislation through Congress, will undoubtably change. How severe these changes will be and in what areas can be somewhat predicted. Reagan's next two years are predicted by many political analysts to fully live up to the term "lame duck." If he does not compromise and uses his veto as much as anticipated, not much will be accomplished. Strong clashes are likely to occur over the following issues:

The Budget

Reagan adamantly refuses to raise taxes. The Congress does not listen to such reasoning and will try to convince Reagan to use other measures to meet the unpopular Gramm-Rudman target.

Arms Control

The Democrats in Congress look forward to bringing back the unratified SALT II treaty, arguments are made that the US is already over its limit on nuclear warheads. Congress will attempt to follow SALT II guidelines in bringing down this number. Reagan, on the other hand, is not likely to agree to such guidelines, and moreover will have a difficult time selling The Star Wars package.

Funding to the Contras may be one of the only areas where extreme differences do not arise. The Democrats may not support the notion of continuing aid, but are not likely to take the extreme measure of completely cutting it off. Such a drastic move is risky in light of the upcoming presidential election. Democrats would not want to bear the burden of slogans saying they "lost Nigaragua."

Health Care

Reagan will not want to spend as much money on medical research and health care as Congress desires. Reagan has already rejected coverage for long term nursing-home care.

Lastly, environmental issues may prove to be an area of heated debate. Democrats are notorious for being big spenders on the environment and this congress will be no exception. It already wants to pass an 18 billion dollar "clean water and anti pollution" measure. Reagan is not noted for spending large amounts of money on the environment.

If indeed Reagan vetos many congressional actions and Congress in turn refuses to accept Reagan's programs, new legislation will be minimal. This may not have a drastic impact on the nation's well being, but will make evaluation of both Reagan and Congress difficult. The effectiveness of legislation will be restricted by the White House and Congressional disagreements.

Smith from p. 7

The religious opposition was essentially a reaction to the major Western-style changes implemented by the Shah, such as secularized and coed education, and a secularized legal system. Religious leaders looked at the Shah—and Western influences—as a threat to Islam. The religious opposition enjoyed widespread support and appealed to "far larger numbers than did secular liberals." The bazaari's and the ulama (the religious leaders) were united in that they opposed dependence on the West. In 1978 they began to organize massive demonstrations against the Shah.

The leader of the religious opposition, of course, was Ayatollah Khomeini. During the riots of 1963, Khomeini had not been well-known. But his popularity increased and by 1977 he had firmly established himself as a central opposition figure. Khomeini and his followers "managed to align themselves with other nationalist groups who had supported Mossadeq...Like Mossadeq he personifies the dignity of the nation but he personifies as well the dignity of Islam." Throughout his opposition-in-exile, Khomeini had declared the monarchy as contrary to the tenets of Islam. He was never willing to compromise with the Shah.

Ayatollah Khomeini successfully portrayed himself as an Islamic nationalist, something the Shah could never manage to do. Khomeini had, and still has, the ability to manipulate both national and religious symbols. He can mold symbols together, just as he had the ability to mold together different groups in their opposition to the Shah.

The gap between elites and masses—brought on by inflation—widened during the 1970s.

This meant that the most effective forces hostile to the Shah would come from those who could appeal to the disenchanted masses i.e. the religious leaders such as Khomeini. Westernization and the Shah's modernization drive didn't affect or benefit most of Iran's population. Eventually, "the vast majority" of Iranians became "more anti-Western and anti-Shah."

One can see from the brief historical analysis outlined here how the overthrow of the Shah was a reaction to Western—especially American—influence. This brings us back to our initial topic: the continuing controversy over the sale of arms to Iran. Iran is a country of strategic importance, bordering both the Soviet Union and the Persian Gulf. Almost anyone would concede that Iran's current regime displays extreme anti-American feelings. Yet there are those who believe that we must attempt to open some sort of dialogue with Iran because of its strategic importance. There are others who speak of Iran as being out of reach; meaning the United States ought to consider Iran a lost cause and concentrate energies elsewhere.

Looking at the matter as objectively as possible, the latter appears more plausible for two reasons. The first reason lies in the illustration of recent Iranian history as shown in this essay. The present leaders in Iran came to power as a reaction against American and Western influence in their country. Iranians bear ill will and a deep mistrust toward the United States and American interests. There is certainly a fair amount of justification in the Iranians' behavior, though this observation does not represent a condoning of the present regime in any way. Objectively speaking, no matter who wins the power struggle after Ayotollah Khomeini's death, the Iranian government will still be inherently anti-American. Iran's hatred and mistrust of America will not likely change anytime in the near future.

The second reason lies in the fact that channeling energies elsewhere can minimize the 'loss' of Iran. Moderate Arab states in the region view Iran as a threat to their own security. The United States could advance its interests more effectively by maintaining positive relations with other strategic states in the region, such as Saudi Arabia, the Persian Gulf states, Turkey, Jordan and Egypt, to name a few. There exists countries in the Middle East who want to maintain good relations with the United States. Enhancing our relationship with these nations represents a much wiser and more realistic policy choice.

In the wake of the Iranian arms sale, we can act in our own best interest by minimizing the damage done in covertly dealing with Iran. Specifically, we can admit our mistake and strongly reassure the friendly states in the Middle East of our support. We should also immediately cease all dialogue with iran. But in order to minimize damage and restore our credibility, the Reagan administration must act quickly.

Hrbek from p. 5

the Communist Party of Nicaragua, the Socialist Party of Nicaragua, and the Marxist-Leninist Popular Action Movement, each received only 1% of the votes cast (Kinsler and Evans, 1985, p. 188). Such a margin leaves no doubt as to which of the parties involved in the election was the favorite. Furthermore, voter participation was tremendous. "On election day, November 4, 1984, [of the 94% of those who registered] more than 80 percent ...actually voted (Kinsler and Evans, 1985, p. 188). This figure is "...fully 17% above the figure in the US election two days later" (Reding 1984, p. 490) in which President Reagan won. Concerning the argument that the people were 'forced' to vote, Andrew Reding, who spent time at poll sites, wrote: "Nowhere did I witness the slightest hint of coercion" (Reding 1984, p. 489). Alexander McIntire added: "Most observers agreed that the course of the balloting itself was generally smooth, and that order was generally maintained (McIntire, 1984, p. 1). Obvious is the fact that the people of Nicaragua voted because they wanted to. They voted for the candidate they wanted to. The party which the majority of the people wanted to win won.

As I mentioned earlier, the controversy lies in whether Cruz's opposition was significant or not. I question whether Cruz was as popular an opposition to the Sandinistas as he was deemed in the media. If he had been so popular, as much as President Reagan's Administration made him up to be, then why was the voter turnout so high? If Cruz pulled out of the elections in protest, certainly his 'numerous' followers would have done the same. But that did not happen. The reason Americans consider him to be a big deal is because "...the (Reagan) Administration successfully portrayed (his party) as the significant opposition force—..."but, "there was never any credible evidence that Cruz and the Coordinadora had a broad popular following in Nicaragua." (LASA report, as quoted in McIntire, 1985, p. 33). One Latin American man asked Andrew Reding: "To be sure, Arturo Cruz is no insignificant figure on the national scene...but why are you [Americans] so inflating his stature out of all proportion to the very modest level of support he has" (Reding 1984, p. 49

It is hard to imagine that Cruz could have seriously dented the margin of victory the Sandinistas enjoyed. H running for election instead of pulling out may ha taken some votes from the Sandinistas, but surely th other parties tallies would have been thinned out to

I said before it would be wrong for us to judge th Nicaraguan elections in our context of a fully develop democracy here in the United States. A fair comparison would be with the El Salvadoran elections March, 1985. The Reagan administration continues t support the 1985 elections as being fair and just, wh calling the Nicaraguan ones a sham. Certainly, if th Reagan Administration sees the El Salvadoran election as so, it must see the Nicaraguan ones fair too; th November elections were undoubtedly more democrat In El Salvador, Jose Napoleon Duarte was the victo representing the Christian Democrats, a moderate par on El Salvador's political spectrum. No parties to the le were allowed to even run for election that year at all, an liberal support in the country is significant. I Nicaragua, on the other hand, all parties, far left-wing far right-wing were not only allowed to run for electio but encouraged to do so! Which election was mo democratic? Without a doubt, the Nicaraguan one Wayne Cornelius concludes, "It was clear to us that if th same [Nicaraguan] elections had been held in a countr whose government was currently in favor with the U Administration (e.g., El Salvador, Guatemal Honduras), they would have been praised as models democratic practice and political pluralism" (Cornelius 1986, p. 23). By praising the El Salvadoran election Reagan has set the precedent of having to do the sam for the ones in Nicaragua. Moreover, as far as vot participation, the 94% of those who registered and 8 of those who voted in Nicaragua indicates "...muc wider participation [there] than in El Salvador" (Eva and Kinsler, 1984, p. 1118). Unfortunately, Presiden Reagan has deceived many of his fellow Americans in believing that the Nicaraguan elections were 'dirty an fraudulent,' while supporting the El Salvadoran one when in fact, if anything, the opposites would be tru "For cases so antithetically viewed in Washingto different symbols are employed and different criteria utilized" (Herman, 1984, p. 369).

The Nicaraguan elections of November 4, 1984 m not have been completely fair in terms of our standar in the United States. All things considered, howev they were acceptable. The fact of the matter is that o two-thirds of the people in the Central Americ country agreed that the FSLN should be their governi institution. With factionalism and polarization bei the normal, accepted, and usual case in Central Americ such a great percentage of the population agreeing one thing is a tremendous accomplishment of gain support by the FSLN government. The people Nicaragua voted for a winner—a rarity for them. Annu the people there are forced to accept leadership wi repression and bloodshed. Our president has insisted destroying the satisfaction of the Nicaraguans claiming the elections were a hoax. In such a case believe it doesn't matter if the people were persuaded vote for the Sandinistas by unfair means, such propaganda in the schools, unfair advantages for FSLN in the media, or even limiting the opposition their campaigns, because achieving a majority of t vote, especially in this area of the world, should not toyed with. Furthermore, the only reason Americans see the elections as being unfair is because listen to our President and his own propaganda speeches, allowing him to sway us to what he wants us believe. Moreover, as we have seen, the elections Nicaragua were comparable to others in Cent America, even more respectable than those labeled Reagan as 'illustrations of democracy,' like El Salvador in 1985. As Arturo Cruz said himself: "No one reg the Sandinista's preeminence, and this is not simp because of their military power. They earned their mo authority during the war of liberation" (McIntire, 198 p. 2). Hence, the Nicaraguan elections in 1984 we acceptable for achieving the purpose of electing government in the country.

Jurkiewicz from p. 5

grown any smaller and all economic indicators h fallen for the past month. The U.S.S.R. is calling Polish leaders to discuss their economic hardships have been brought back to reality. The idea of a independent system in Eastern Europe is only a drea Capitalism may be alive and well, but it is hidden un the guise of the black market. What can the governm do? All it can do is take part in the profits of its own b market and hope for better things in the future. I ho that the reality of their economic state will overrun th ideological beliefs that socialism can work in the f future, and that they will turn to capitalistic ideology formal and not a subsidiary economic system.

...it's in the air

ve: Despite the size of your ego
g other things) I still think you are
I won't go out with you though - Have Valentines Day,
You know who m:

Would you be my Valentine?
?

ck:
Happy Valentines Day!
Love,
Betsy

og, the Fiji: I see you almost day and am very attracted to you. I am ried - you would be too if you knew
I was. Happy Valentines Day,
Guess who

ppy Valentines Day to the Moose!

his day of hearts and lace
y I could tell you face to face
I love you.
emnately, you'll never know...
B.

aron:
Would you be mine!
Love,
Your Anonymous Valentine

Thanks for all your help - will you be lentine?
Love,
S.

dy:
Have a great V-day!
Love,
Martha

die:
Would you be mine?
Too shy to sign

Alison & Laura: Let's groove to banjo s and take the wrong way on our next mp! Rush doughnuts & mashed tos are great!
Love,
A.

2 & 4: Have fun at formal. Happy and remember the rank, my dog and y.
I love ya All,
2

Pucker up
Love,
Me

appy Valentines Day to Spotted Calf
Love,
Barefooted Loincloth

Hey Studid Cupid! Frilly and silly lentines Day is here! Rah! Rah! Rah!
Love,
Sweetie-pie

om:
"When they made you
they broke the cast,
don't want to be first
I just want it to last..."
Welcome back! Happy full-moon,
Happy V-Day — I love you!
Susan

ack Rack Fack:
Happy Valentines Day!
Love,
Mix Max Moo

cott:
Will you be my Valentine?
-An anomous admirer

Mic J.:
I wuv woo!
Love,
Regan

Grant: You are the greatest! Happy entines Day!
Love,
Laske

Mark:
I love you!
Love,
Ann

Andy: Happy Valentine's Day - Call me soon!
Jenny

Ted, Ted, Tunahead:
I wish I could get you in my waterbed
Under the covers
We could be lovers
And don't read these as intentions to wed.
It' s your body I crave
I'll be your love slave
With whips and chains,
you won't even complain
And to your friends you'll rave..

Tom: I love you with my whole heart and life,
Love,
Phyllis

Heidi:
Will you be my Valentine?
Dan

Rick: Happy Valentines Day - Will you be mine?
An Anonymous Admirer

Mary & Gretchen: Have fun at Formal! We'll have to head to Dale Street Cafe soon!
Love,
Grandma

To Ponch:
Happy Valentine's Day!
Love,
John

Happy 20th Birthday Beth! Happy Valentine's Day too!
Love,
Your buddies

Pat: I hope we have fun tonight - I'll try to make it good for you!
Love,
Jane

Michelle: While you read your cards, eat your chocolates & smell your roses, just remember those of us who are less fortunate. Thank God I'm your friend or else I'd hate you. Happy V-day!

Smebbyville: Happy Valentines Day! I love my friendly! We'll have to hit the "B" soon!
Love,
Annieville whore

DSG: Desperately seeking a girlfriend - 5'7", blue eyed, brunette preferred. Must watch Letterman addictively, enjoy movies at Poor Richards and be into Group Sex.

Ethan:
I love you and miss you.
G.S. Whaler

Mary, Sue & Kelly: Happy Valentines Day! Lets get trashed to celebrate our singleness!
Liz

Eenie, Meenie, Minie Pick
Grab a Fiji by his dick,
if he hollars give it a lick,
Eenie, Meenie, Minie Pick.

Happy Valentines Day Guys!

Dear Mary B.: I may be the lowest form of life, but I really get off. Wed me quick.
Much love,
Don Fish.

Goodie: the moon is one big tie die. I love you,
Lisa

Dani:
Happy Valentines Day!
Sue

Carol: Please be my Valentine. There is a present for you at Bemis desk.
I love you,
X

Zarathustra: God is pink and he lets us eat Nackhos in Denver.
Your little,
Dusfidanya

Rick:
Will you be mine?
Love,
?

Happy Valentines Day Alex!
Love,
XXX

Mr. Sunshine: I don't want to go to Finland anymore. Thanks you make me happy when skies are grey, you'll never know dear how much I love you.

To the horse known to prance proudly around King Soopers: I miss you,
Puah

Hey Kempers! Happy Valentines Day! Have fun this block break!
Love,
A friend from nearby home

D: Do you want me to turn it to 2 or to 4?
Love & kisses
T

Wayne Rudner: When can we go away to a deserted island & juke the night away? You're such a passionate man -
I love you,
Moon Beam

P.S. Happy Valentines Day

Andrea Trower: You don't know me but I've followed you around campus the whole year. Look over your shoulder sometime and I'll be there - pledge formal? Weight room? Lunch? We'll see. If you knew who I was you'd be interested...have fun w/o me tomorrow - maybe we'll share a dance.
Tall, dark and....

Mysterious Stranger: three squeezes because "you're neat." Happy Valentines Day!
Goose

Sky: Can I borrow your tie die?
Lisa

Tim: You are the sexiest (but you already know that!) Happy Valentines Day and don't forget my back rub!
Love you,
Me

P.S. When are you going to get another pillow anyway!?

Mannie: Happy V.D. So glad you be one happy Chiquita again. Audrey can't wait to come over and see her friendlies Freddy (Vaugh!) and Franny (Slash!). Too bad their roommate has got to move away.
Love,
Your bourgeoise pals Kara & Michelle & Nancy

Candy Buns: You joined me in Jim's room and block break was fine and now five months later I'm happy you're mine. Froggy loves daddy is S.F. a sin? Brush the crumbs off the bed and lets order in.
I love you

Nota Bene for you Met-Pet jockeys
Happy Valentines Day

Barry Carrol: Happy Valentines Day from ORC who luvs ya Baby?

Aesmic:
I love you
Gully-bull

Lara Travis: a.k.a. Cronie: Victor Hugo says the malicious have a dark happiness, what do ya say?
Love,
Drey

Happy Valentines Peg & Jen:
Much love,
Catherine

Denise: Things aren't as rosy as they seem...your soxs and eyeshadow can't always coordinate.
Love,
Ralph L., Guess?, Ann T.

Misha:
Where are you? I miss you.
Love,
Liza

Mer: You cody queen. Mexico and L.A. in seven weeks will be so nifty. Maybe we can see Peters her's can at midnight - in my room.
Love,
Drey

To my favorite people: Tacky D.A.K., Thrashman, and "T": You love me and I watch you dance. You're too cool for me. Freddy & Franny are totally jealous. Hope you are dateless and mateless this Valentines Day because I'm not !

Doug:
Get a clue!

Bear:
Uh, Uh, Uh, P.S., P.S., P.S.
Moose

Monkeyman: Valentines Day, like every other day, makes you think of bananas that ripen under a tropical sun..

Peter Scott: Happy Valentines Day you gorgeous hunk of man - everytime I see your artwork in the Catalyst, it makes me so hot, I want to make mad passionate love to the newspaper.
Yours always,
Sex Kitten

To Ellen Stein,
Long Have I lusted, little have I loved. Hope you'll be sent to me from someone above. My Valentine's Day will be lonely & blue. But all will be rosy if I can spend it with you.
Always—Your Real Man

I love you
R.A.C.

Happy Valentines Day
F.M.K.

S.L.C.:
'Cause of the sparkle in your eyes
the Alacrity in your step the smile on your lips
For taking blue modds
and painting the sky
Will you be my Valentine?
J.M.B.

Outward Bound Teaches Leadership

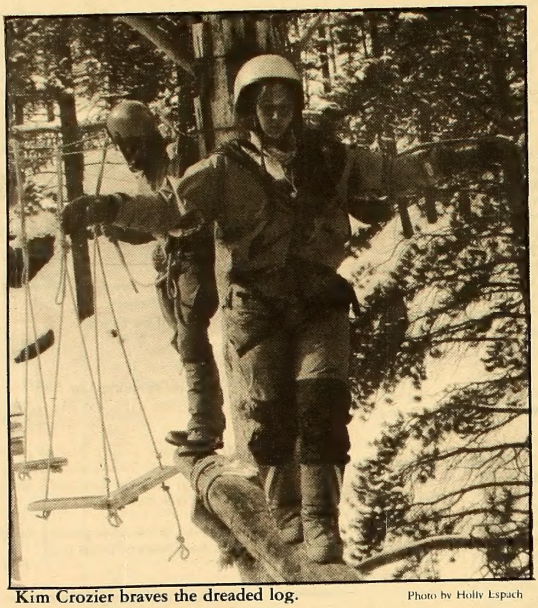
C.O.B.S.: Challenging but rewarding

You are forty feet above the ground. In front of you lies a wooden log that stretches twenty feet or perhaps twenty miles. Your task is to cross the beam. It is you against the log. Soon, however, you realize that it is you against yourself.

The situation above is one of the many challenges encountered during an Outward Bound course. Recently, eight CC students spent a block break at the Colorado Outward Bound School (C.O.B.S.) with an attempt to develop leadership abilities but also to simply enjoy some wilderness activities. While it was designed for CCCA members, only one member signed up so the remaining spots were filled up by a first-come first-serve basis.

The first outward bound school was founded in Wales in 1941. Twenty years later, the Colorado Outward Bound School was established with its basecamp located in Leadville, Colorado. The purpose of Outward Bound is to develop moral independence not only in the wilderness but in one's daily life as well. Entering its twenty-sixth year, C.O.B.S. serves many diversified groups including corporate executives, student governments, recovering alcoholics, substance abusers, cancer victims, and other health service organizations. Open-enrollment courses are also available to anyone interested. Different courses involve cross-country skiing, whitewater rafting, alpine mountaineering, multi-environment, leadership development, and others. A three-day course may cost you a couple hundred dollars while a thirty-day course may run you 1600 dollars.

Besides learning to survive in different environments doing different activities, Outward Bound serves a higher purpose. Through activities centered around problem-solving, such as getting the group over a 10-12 foot wall, one learns principles of group dynamics. Here, one learns the processes of being a leader as well as being led. Also mutual trust must be established within the group for it to be effective. One learns it is just as important to trust as well as be trusted by each member of the group.



Kim Crozier braves the dreaded log. Photo by Holly Lspach

Through the development of group dynamics however, something inter-disciplinary is learned by the individual. While interacting with other members of the group, the activity serves as a mirror that reflects the individual's behavior. The leadership course asks one to do individual challenges that pushes oneself to limi intensities of certain emotions such as as well as courage. During the course may be asked to tackle the ropes co This exercise involved a series of ev performed forty feet above the gro Even though one is hooked on to a sa harness system that prevents one f falling to the ground, one is asked t skills never imagined doing before. S of these exercises included the beam walking across a cable with only overhead cable to hang on to. It was at point, when the fear became the o obstacle between the success or failu an exercise, and when one needs to re deep within oneself for the power conquer that fear. This is a feelin process, that can't be taught, but must experienced. C.O.B.S. provides one opportunity to see oneself in a deeper than one had seen before.

"Here one learns the process of being a lead as well as being led."

During eighth block-break, C.O.B.S. sponsor a program through O.R.C. which a person will learn leader qualities enabling s/he to lead O.R.C. F.O.O.T. trips in the future. Watch bulletins concerning this opportu which is highly recommended for any who wishes to learn something a leadership or a group as well as leader of the self.

RICK GOLDSTE

Debunking Honor Council Myths Cont

Continued from p. 1

violation of the Honor Code. The student then takes an oath and questioning begins.

This part of the trial is rather informal. There is no order in which members may ask questions and no time limit. When the Council has finished questioning the accuser is asked to make a final statement and then reminded of the Confidentiality of our preceedings.

The procedure is the same when the accused appears before us, except he or she is also read the charge against them. The accused is allowed to bring character witnesses and may also choose any member of the faculty, administration, or student body to act as counsel. Counsel may advise the accused during a trial but cannot speak in his or her place.

After hearing the testimony and reviewing the evidence, the Council holds a discussion of the relevant points in the case. This usually lasts 30-45 minutes and is immediately followed by a vote. All votes are by secret ballot and are tabulated by one of the two chairmen. In most cases only the verdict is announced to the other council members and not the exact vote. An exception is made in second violation cases when a 9/13 vote is required for a guilty verdict.

If a student is found not guilty, all records and evidence of the case are destroyed. If a student is guilty of a first violation, the Honor Council keeps this information in our confidential records and makes a recommendation that the student receive either a no-credit for the class or for the assignment on which cheating occurred. If a student is found guilty of a second violation the Council recommends to President Riley that the student be dismissed from the College.

It is an irony that although the Honor Council is the single student organization that could most influence your academic career, we're also the one you hear the least about. This is partly a result of our Confidentiality policy. The current Honor Council Constitution stipulates that in the interest of both the accused and accuser all hearings shall be secret.

The problem of confidentiality is only protecting students who are involved in a trial. Tom Ori, co-chairman of the Council, explains, "While I'm not certain that open hearings are the solution, I strongly favor more Council openness. One solution would be to print, in The Catalyst, the Council's reasons for acquitting or convicting an individual.

PHOTO BY JERRY WANG

Honor Council: Defenders of truth, justice and the American way.

Although the current Council members understand this concern, we also believe that for the system to work students need to know we're doing our job. We've, therefore, been discussing proposals for making the system more public while still one of the issues the Council will be considering as it begins revision of the current Honor System Constitution. The revision process will begin Saturday, February 14 when the Council meets to discuss procedural points we feel need to be changed.

The Honor Council will be act seeking the involvement of the stud body when it begins discussing the m policy issues of the Constitution. We be holding all-campus debates and for this semester to consider such question should the Honor System apply t aspects of a student's life at CC, rather just Academics? Should one violation grounds for expulsion? Should trial public? Should Honor Council mem serve for only one or two years?

An all-campus vote will be held a beginning of next year when the stu body can either reject or ratify the Constitution. Any students interested being more closely involved in this pro should contact Liz Cheney or Tom Or Hopefully this article has given yo better idea of what your Honor Co does. Although we are a diverse group share a strong commitment to the ide Academic Honor. We all agree that environment fostered by this system is in which trust makes learning m enjoyable and rewarding.

If you have any questions or comm about the Honor System any Ho Council member would be happy to sp with you. Lists of our names and num can be found in each of the major do and academic buildings.

Next Week: "Revamping the Ho System Constitution."

LIZ CHENE

Play Debut

...ued from p. 1

...ri St. Marie and Lisa Holtby in rehearsal. Photo by Anne Basting

...rmined to make it in the World of ...ture.

...el Baron, raised in France, transfered ...C in his junior year from Emory ...ersity in Atlanta, which "didn't even ...a drama department." Here at CC, he ...ed in Psychology. He discovered the ...re department by directing a play in ...ch, when, as the story goes, late in the ...rsal process one of the actors asked ...when they were going to block. Neal ...to go ask Jim Malcolm what it meant. ...ering into Drama late in his junior ...Neal felt he needed more experience ...went on to get his MA at Denver ...ersity. After graduating he got a call ...ing him to participate in a new ...mer's program at Brandeis University ...ed by Jose Quintero.

...t all came from a connection here at ...said Baron. "David Wheeler, a guest ...ring teacher, remembered my work ...and recommended me to Brandeis. It ...quite an honor, as well as a shock." ...m Brandeis, Baron went on to study ...at NYU. He directed his first ...essional theatre show at the Trinity ...ertory Theatre in Providence, RI ...e he worked for 2 years. He presently ...s at Stages Repertory Theatre in ...ston.

...el says he would like to continue ...ing in the theatre, but finds it almost ...ically impossible, and hopes to do ...work with film in the future. He is ...ently working on translating a new ...HIGHEST STANDARD, by Keith ...in, into French.

...s advice to those considering a career ...e theatre is "Don't do it — that is," he ...nues, "unless you have the passion for ...He says one often has to sacrifice ...onships, money, and stability for the ...e. If you want to make it, "the ...re must truly become your spouse."

...l Sonnega, raised in Michigan, started ...college career in pre-med at the ...ersity of Michigan. After vacillating ...areer options, he finally decided to ...school and buy a truck. He and a ...d drove around the West climbing and camping, finally settling in Aspen for a year.

He happened upon CC by accident, when after a long day of hitchhiking, he mistook the Hub for a diner and crashed for the night at the Beta house. Disillusioned with the Aspen lifestyle, he toured the campus the next day and decided it was time to go back to school.

He designed his own major in Fine Arts, and after graduation set off to New York to make it as an actor. Plans changed when he broke his back in an accident that year. "In the hospital, all I could do was write." After discovering his new passion, he went on to NYU for an MFA in playwriting and screenwriting.

Trying to make it in New York, the budding playwright supported himself in several ways, ranging from the royalties of his play WHITETAIL and writing chef biographies for cook books to writing proposals for Tiffanys.

All told, Sonnega has written ten plays, and received several honors. He was chosen to participate in Arthur Miller's Playwright' Master Class in 1985, awarded the Michigan Foundation for the Arts Grant in 1984 for his play WHITETAIL, and received the Playwrights' Forum Award for his play THE FISHERMAN in 1981.

His advice to CC students is to wait. "I don't regret going to grad school, but sometimes it seems that it went too fast. He recommends waiting and exploring options. "People miss out on their youth. It's sad."

An ultimate goal for Bill would be to teach at a school where he would have complete artistic freedom and a forum for his work, either in theatre or film.

In the future, he expects to be working more in film, due to the lack of money in the theatre. "I love the energy, the hussle, and the politics of the theatre," he says, "but it's impossible to make a living."

ANNE BASTING

Michael J. is OK

Light of Day has it all: Michael J. Fox. Rock and roll. Joan Jett. Conflict and death-bed reconciliations. A cute five year old to act as a catalyst in the action and aforementioned conflict. The question is: does "having it all" make a good movie? Well, not necessarily.

The story is one of conflicting values. Joan Jett plays the rebellious daughter/unwed mother/rock and roller, Patty. Gena Rowlands plays the piously perfect mother who "only wanted the best for her daughter (and look what she gave me)." Michael J. Fox plays Joe, the younger brother caught in the cross-fire. Also caught in the middle is Patty's son Benjy, and the conflict arises in the story as the main players fight about what is the best upbringing for the boy: the conventionality of the world that Patty hates versus the unstable existance of a band on the road.

The movie also focuses on the struggle of Patty and Loe's band, the Barbusters, to make it big. Joan Jett is convincing in her roll as the band leader, as one might expect, and Michael J. Fox is good as her side kick guitarist (but he really can't sing). The relationship between the two, however is difficult to guage. We are told that essentially Joe worships Patty, but as to actually believing it from the performances of the two takes a stretch of the imagination.

The problem, I think, is that you don't really believe that Michael J. Fox is Joe. Joe works in a factory that makes cheap souvenirs. Joe has little education, and he defends quite adamently his sister who is, to be honest, pretty sleazy. The Joe we see in the form of Michael J. Fox is intelligent and sensitive—and unconvincing. Sort of an Alex P. Keaton with a social conscience.

Joan Jett does a surprisingly good job in her role in spite of the fact that her most emotionally demanding scenes consist of having to yell such gems as "Rock and Roll!" and "Feel the Beat!"...Yeah, well.

Gena Rowlands is wonderful as the perfect mother, making guilt into quite a production, and her illness and death are quite moving.

The music in the movie leans toward the heavy metal side, but the title song was contributed by Bruce Springstein. (I know that will send all you Boss fans out there straight to the theater.)

Indifference is the only word I can use to describe how I felt upon leaving this movie. It's not bad, it's not good. And, after all the build up, I found I really didn't care who the father of Patty's baby was.

BY J. REED

Fred Small to Deliver Big Message

Fred Small, a Yale graduate who left a profitable job as a corporate attorney six years ago and has since emerged as a major writer and performer of political and folk songs, will give a free concert on the Colorado College campus Wednesday, February 18.

The 8 p.m. performance will be in the Packard Hall auditorium and is open to the public.

Small, 36, will also deliver a lecture at Packard Hall auditorium on Thursday, February 19, at 11 a.m. Entitled "Changing Men: Redefining Masculinity," It , too, is free and open to the public.

A topical songwriter in the tradition of Pete Seeger, Tom Paxton and Malvina Reynolds, Small has produced three albums: "Love's Gonna Carry Us" (1981); "The Heart of the Appaloosa" (1983); and "No Limit" (1985).

The songwriter-singer-guitarist has performed at concerts throughout the nation and last year participated at international folk festivals in Canada. His songs—often described as thoughtful, contemporary messages set to music—have been performed by several of his contemporaries in the folk music field, as well as published in magazines and anthologies.

A New Jersey native, Small is a Phi Beta Kappa graduate of Yale University. He subsequently earned a law degree and a Masters degree in Natural Resources Policy at the University of Michigan.

In 1980 he left his position as staff attorney at the Conservation Law Foundation to pursue a music career fulltime.

He has been quoted as saying that he sees music and law as "two different modes of doing public interest advocacy." And adds: "Plus, music is a lot of fun. I love it. It's magic."

Small frequently mixes love songs and humorous ditties with his messages about social consciousness and responsibility. His topics have ranged from unequal pay for women to supply side economics, and from themes of nature conservation to the value of human contact as therapy.

Fred Small's visit is sponsored by the Leisure Program of Colorado College, the Colorado College Campus Association, and the Great Performers and Ideas series of the Leisure Program.

Josh & John's

DELIVERS

ICE CREAM

632-0299

75¢ delivery fee • delivery on the hour • 1 qt minimum

11 am - MIDNIGHT

PLATOON: Oliver Stone Unsettles America's Conscience

The Vets' Reaction

Wednesday morning the local Vet Center received a call from the wife of a Vietnam veteran. Her husband, who had never spoken of his experiences with the war, was upset and for the first time in 20 years he was talking about it. The catalyst for this event was the Oliver Stone film "Platoon." This film is unsettling the conscience of viewers across the nation. For the Vietnam veteran the film hits closer to home, tapping into a collection of wartime memories that for some have not been confronted.

Terry McGuire served 15 months in Vietnam and deals with memories of the war every day. Here in Colorado Springs he is the "Team Leader," a social worker and counselor at the local Veteran Center. The film's impact upon Vietnam veterans is making headlines across the country and in an effort to learn more I spoke with Terry McGuire about how "Platoon" is possibly effecting some of the 22,000 Vietnam veterans in this area.

From the counselor's position the visible reaction to the film is rather mild as of yet, but he mentioned that "Platoon" is possibly effecting some of the 22,000 Vietnam veterans in this area.

From the counselor's position the visible reaction to the film is rather mild as of yet, but he mentioned that "Platoon" is still a new movie and the feelings of local veterans are just beginning to become evident. "It's going to be a slow wave," he said, "and people are going to need to digest it. I think more and more people will be coming around."

What the film is doing to many veterans he associated with a therapy technique termed "flooding." This method entails immersing the patient in his or her memories of a past trauma. The patient who has failed to confront the injuring event is literally flooded with past information in an effort to begin dealing with remaining problems. "Platoon" stimulates a revival of war-time memories for the Vietnam veteran. Depending on how they have dealt with these memories, the reaction can be overwhelming.

For the sake of simplicity, McGuire outlined the two "types" of vets who view the film. The first can be called the "non-talker." This individual has buried his memories of the war. For these vets, "Platoon" forces recognition of the past. As McGuire put it, "They come out with emotions that have been locked up for twenty years and cannot deal." Members of this group tend to react with anger and criticize the film's flaws. Those veterans who have already entered counseling or did not repress their recollections tend to understand feelings evoked by the film and though they are effected, can deal better with their reactions. McGuire is not expecting to see any new or unique problems emerge from "Platoon." His assessment is that the film will bring more vets "out of the woodwork" with a desire to speak with others about the war. The problems experienced by many Vietnam veterans are commonly listed under the term "Post Traumatic Stress Disorder." PTSD was existent before "Platoon" ever came out and will remain long after the film stops running. When asked whether the film will increase his list of clientele at the counseling center, McGuire presumed it would a bit, but added with disturbing frankness, "I have a guaranteed clientele already."

Regarding the quality of the film, McGuire praised its realism. He went on to say that comparing it to works of the past like "Apocalypse Now" and "The Deerhunter" is virtually impossible. McGuire feels that these earlier films were not intending to create an accurate picture of the war. Instead of recreating the actual scene, they relied upon bizarre behavior as metaphors, illustrating the intensity and terror of the Vietnam experience. "Platoon" in comparison is a less manipulated image of what the men in the field or the "grunts" experienced. He went on to say, "I'm careful not to ask people 'did you enjoy the movie?' It's not entertainment...it educates. It opens eyes I hope."

McGuire expressed a genuine interest in how the people of the post-Vietnam era are reacting. "I'm curious how CC seniors will view the movie. I'm real interested in how you will react. You will see a lot but I wonder, can you sort it all out?" McGuire viewed the film with a group of Vietnam veterans at a special showing. For him, the film was seen in a detached state. He claimed that his experience as a counselor of vets, kept him in an objective mode. In addition, the often heard comments of the film's shocking effect on viewers did not apply to himself. When asked why, he glanced around his office and said simply, "I listen to Platoon every day, every week."

LESLIE A. SCOTT

Americans in Hell

When I was a little kid and the six o'clock TV roared news of the war in Vietnam, my mom covered my eyes. She tried to direct my attention away from that box filled with horrible pictures to the nicer box of Cheerios in my lap. I sort of wish my mom had come with me to see "Platoon" last weekend. I would have liked a hand over my eyes or a nice box of Hot Tamales to distract me from the violent history on the screen. "Platoon" shows the experience of a twenty year-old soldier who chooses to fight in Vietnam. It shows the experience of marching as pointman on ambush. It shows the sweaty jungle three feet in front of your face, and a man behind it waiting to kill you. Behind him is another man and another jungle. "Platoon" shows you that you made a horrible, horrible mistake in coming here and you'll never survive the three-hundred fifty days left before you can go home to your Chevy, and your tennis shoes, and your dog. "Platoon" shows the deadly infighting between the two officers who decide what happens with your life. "Platoon" shows you war.

When I asked a friend if I would like the film, he said, "It's like taking a nice little visit to hell." I have grown up to be callous to arcade-style, machine gun killing, so it wasn't the violence that got me in this film. It was more the tense, palpable hat between Lt. Elias (Willem DaFoe) and Bonds (Tom Berenger). I could feel (Charlie Sheen) hate the Vietnamese in that village, and hate the war. realization that this same kind of hate lie coiled in the dark inside of somewhere; that's what got me. would I kill for? What would I survive The strength of this movie lies in the that it is not just the movie that you look You look at the forty year-old man you and wonder if he's a vet, if he has to hell. You look two rows up at the beautiful boys from your college imagine their guts spilled onto the You wonder if a machine gun weighs in your hands or in your mind. Not to that this isn't a five dollar movie, but calls on personal nightmares for its po in a way that leaves it still a movie screen. The strength of "Platoon" is subject matter. Near the end of the f the young soldier Chris, says that in a he feels like the child not of a mother father, but of the Vietnam War. This be how it is. A part of America came to its Chevys as a different child, a who knows what Death and Hate about. A child came back from a visit hell.

LAURA FINLE

Scarring Entertainment

This weekend, a "small" movie that was made for half the cost of an average current studio production took in more than 8 Million Dollars. That's just on the weekend.

The movie is Platoon. A single man's personal depiction of the twisted, horrific, soul-tearing time he had during the Vietnam conflict. Moviemaker Oliver Stone, has already been ruthless with his own memories of drug addiction in his script for the bizarre comedy 'Scarface,' made a film about an amoral crawling hand ("The Hand"), and done the drug dance again with his 'Midnight Express' screenplay.

Stone hasn't been doing a lot of children's movies, but he certainly has been pushing the most childish (as opposed to childlike) behavior of grown human beings as seductive, adroit, scarring entertainment.

Whether with War, which he whipped up into the internal action of year's 'Salvador', or with the rest of range of human cruelty, which he manag to condense into popularly access stories, Oliver Stone has got to be ultimate grinning Monk.

Without an overlong investment preachiness, this man leaves helpless y own mental morality processess, I W WRONG...YOU ARE WRONG...it doesn't stop happening...WE ARE WRONG.

It's not like you can walk out of theatre and say to yourself "Ahhhh..I not guilty...that was too bad..but, hec saw that flick...I'm absolved, whew."

Never has any viewer's punishment b this messy and been this just.

JILL MAZURSKSY & JU DEADP

Tulio on Tunes: The Social Virtues of Heavy Metal

Everyone's been to an exciting sporting event. Everyone's felt the intense adrenalin pulse-rush at that moment when everyone's on their feet yellin' like vikings: oh yea, yes! Yes!! YEEAAAAA!!!!! Whooo! Whooo! Yup, there's no substitute for that communal rush of pure enthusiasm. So imagine then a thousand people having that great experience and no losers, no competition, just winners. Now you're talking good times, now you're talking Maiden at McNichol's. But first let's just talk Metal.

Misconception #1) Heavy Metal is inseperably saturated with violence and most metalheads would love to splatter their concert T-shirts with your life fluid. This misconception comes from the fact that Heavy Metal bands like to write "adventurous" lyrics. Examples of Iron Maiden themes are a WWII dogfight, a Rennaissance duel, and a fourteen minute saga about an old sailor and an albatross. Sure, they've written songs about "The Number Of The Beast" and Bruce Dickerson has been known to laugh hysterically in several songs: so what? Stephen King writes about Occultism all the time. If morbid fascination is such deviant behavior why is there a Friday 13th part six? There's no enthusiasm actual violence, such as a bunch of bo with Millers in their paws and grins their faces as they watch a 260 lb. line flatten a quarterback. The infamous Oz Osbourne tells us "You gotta believe yourself or no one will believe in you Imagination like a bird on the wing fly free for you to use" Yow, that should ma

Continued on p.

ron Maiden: The Spiritual Event of the Semester

RON MAIDEN is a very special thing. e have all known this for a long time. ast don't ask them what time it is. When our life is good we listen to Iron iden on records and compact discs. hen our life is great we have managed to y in reasonable accompaniment to Iron iden songs on our guitars. When we are erwhelmed with emotion, we are seeing on Maiden live in concert.

A week ago, on Friday, February 6th, on Maiden brought a lot of fun stuff to Nichols Arena in Denver to play their sic. This is an objective review of that ncert.

Most people I spoke to felt as if every ternal organ of their body was carefully ren apart, washed clean by the love of d himself, and then put back together in der to see the last song.

The concert itself contained all the ments of a perfectly free and loving ciety, including some monsters. Even the e space inside the arena wasn't hostile, cause at the begining of the concert there ere about three different huge space ips flying around, sending off sirens and hts. (This might be compared to the ginning of Pink Floyd's Animals Tour ere they would release the helium Pit in door arenas. It wasn't a very nice pig, it was a big pig.)

Of course, Iron Maiden wasn't outside, d being inside a not-too-big arena with ace-ships flying around is not something u do every day. This was probably mething planned to help disorient the dience. This disorientation continued en the space ships went back to the sides the stage to land and Iron Maiden rged with the song with the same as the w album "Somewhere in Time."

Time was easily manipulated by the d. After opening the show in such a ace-Gig theme, I was wondering what e it was, but then the next song was "2 inutes to Midnight" from the verslave album. I didn't think that was bad, but then two songs later they ved the fourteen minute song "Rhime the Ancient Mariner."

The song is about many years ago when cient ships sailed the seas. For this song, th the help of rotating stage platforms, ferent artistic stage backdrops, and the ly pictured lyrics about a mariner who gets the gods by killing a albatross in e other gods will clear the deathly fog they can sail again, it was here that the dience lost all abilities to say they have n it before. In the middle of the song the s put a magic spell on the mariner, and n Maiden put a magic spell on the dience.

It was then I realized 'holy cow, not too long ago I was in a space-ship somewhere, and then it was almost midnight, and then I was a stranger in a strange land, and now I'm floating around in the middle of the ocean...this is great.' Even though the spell never broke for the audience, when the Magic Spell broke for the mariner, it happened in a shower of bombs, lights, and all sorts of other exploding stuff that happens when a magic spell breaks. This type of display of music, combining literature, music, art, and fun was an element of the whole show.

Besides the Ancient Mariner, other people were there too. There was the Phantom of the Opera, a Beast with a Number, Children of the Damned (this song hasn't been played on American tour for four years), some guy who thought Heaven Could Wait, and another guy with a Hollowed name. This is of course a short set list from the entire show. What a monster!

Speaking of monsters, this tour was not short in the appearances of Eddie. Eddie is the Iron Maiden mascot, a monster looking guy who most over-anxious and oppressive parents consider to be a representation for Satan and Satan worshiping. Iron Maiden says he is just your average ten-foot ghoul who runs around on stage during the songs. Let's hear it for your average ten-foot ghoul then. Eddie had two appearances. The first was when a easily twelve-foot space Eddie (was there a guy in there or was it a robot) came out and chased the lead singer around the stage, ending in a high-tec gunfight. During the last song, a huge blow-up Eddie body instantly was filled with compressed air, shooting his huge hands and arms over the first 15 rows of the audience, and his head looking down at the band from behind them.

Iron Maiden was no doubt the spiritual event of the semester. If you may ever wonder how it is that the world keeps turning, remember it has its sources. It was one year ago on Valentine's that RUSH brought their show to Denver, and two years ago that Iron Maiden was last here. This was a milestone show because the opening band was snowed out of Stapleton Airport so Iron Maiden played an extra hour. It was historic because the Denver audience was the first American audience to ever hear Bruce Dickinson sing old Iron Maiden songs "Phantom of the Opera, Wrathchild, Iron Maiden, and Running Free." They were starting to play these songs for a live album they released about six months later.

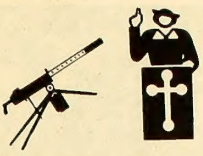
All in all, in man's continual attempts to be an intelligent, self-guiding human being, Iron Maiden represents progress rather than digression, and we are encouraged to continue experiencing the limits of happiness.

TULIO BROWNING

Tulio on Tunes

continued from p. 14

body want to blow their brains out fering to his current lawsuit case). I ld go on and on about misconceptions ut Metal, but that's not really what this ole's about. A lot of people will read this tell me "Yeah, what you said was cool I still don't like Heavy Metal." Of urse you don't, HM is basically olescent music and if you weren't tured on it you'll probably always ne it. It's one of those love/hate stions that we don't decide for selves. I don't care if you have gut-arching dry heaves after three notes of das Priest, I've felt that way about Cat vens on occasion. What I do care about the elitist, WASP, suburban attitude wards devout believers of the Metal th. Wise up hometowners; these people havin just as much fun as you; probably re. So how come you didn't pack your ncert T-shirts when you went off to CC? Ozzy Osbourne shirt is the most bellious thing you can wear at this school. you're into the Dead: "That's cool, that's mellow." Same story with Pychedelic revival. Avante Guarde or Hardcore may draw a few stares but it's still chic. Yet when you're proudly sporting a vintage tour shirt people will actually be openly offended; eyebrows will furrow in distaste and eyes glaze with a sudden disinterest. They're confused because they thought only degenerates and sub-humans listened to that aural abuse. Lighten up, if you don't, who will? Maybe I should take my own advice. And what better way than to the rockin' raps of the Beastie Boys tonight in Denver? Check your pockets CC; if you've got fourteen greens you're there. Com'on, you know you'll spend that much trying to keep from being bored tonight anyway, and when was the last time you did something on pure impulse? "So... understand; don't waste your time always searching for those wasted years/ Face up, make your stand and realize you're living in your golden years." Iron Maiden.



Experience is the best teacher.

BR

BRUSSELS SEMESTER ON THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

UK

LONDON SEMESTER ON BRITISH PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY

UN

SEMESTER ON THE UNITED NATIONS

DREW UNIVERSITY OFF CAMPUS SEMESTERS

Please send me information on the following international semesters:
☐ Brussels
☐ London
☐ United Nations

Name

Address

City

State Zip

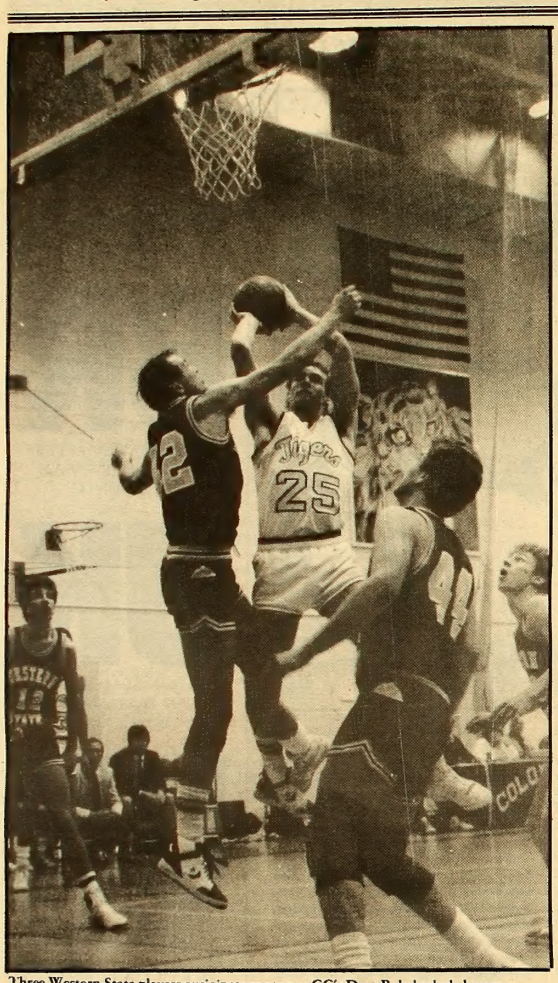
Please also send me information on:
☐ New York Semester on Contemporary Art
☐ Washington Semester on American Politics

Return to:
Director of Off Campus Programs
Drew University
Madison, New Jersey 07940

Or call: (201) 377-3000, ext. 438

DREW UNIVERSITY

CLD287



Three Western State players anticipate contact as CC's Dave Rakel calmly braces for some patented Mountaineer stiffarm defense. Photo by Bill Brangham

State Edges CC

Slice was nice, but no dice

When the Tigers took the court Wednesday night against the Western State Mountaineers no one really knew what to expect. No one knew which CC team would play that night: The one that had won five of their last six games, or the one that State clobbered by twenty points in their first meeting. Would the Tigers pull out an upset victory over the Rocky Mountain Athletic Conference leaders? Or would CC's recent winning be exposed as a mere fluke? The good news is that the CC Tigers are for real, and by all rights they should have won their game against State. The bad news is that they lost.

Despite shooting an awful 28% from the field in the first half, the Tigers managed to keep it close and trailed by only four at the end of the period. A Rob Bogue three-pointer gave the Tigers the lead with 7:00 minutes to play. State soon regained the lead, but Dave Rakel tied the game with a fifteen footer with 2:50 left. In the final seconds the Mountaineers found themselves up by four but with seconds left Chris Hardman cans three-pointer to pull the Tigers w one. CC called time out, but, alas, ha them all up. Had the Tigers not us their timeouts, and had they not sho 20 from the foul line in the second they would have likely pulled out the of the season. As it was State won

In the contest, Dave Rakel showe he is going to be CC's first ever NBA pick next year, scoring 18 points, ha down 13 rebounds and sending Mountaineer shots back into Mounta faces. In addition, Rob Bogue scored John Sacha had 15.

Fourth year Coach Jim Cros understandably happy with the way have been going for the men's squ late. "I'm pleased with everyone," say skipper. "We've been playing consistent basketball for two months That's something new for us." Cr especially pleased with the defens team has been playing. "We've been effective in the half court and m man," he emphasizes. Cross attribu good deal of his squad's defensive su to the "excellent" play of Junior for Dave Schroeder, who has been assig guard the opposition's primary from scoring threat in the last few games

> "I'm pleased with everyone," says the skipper. "We've been playing good, consistent basketball for two months now. That's something new for us."
>
> —Coach Jim Cross

CC has five games remaining fo year. If they win two of those next fiv Tigers will have their winningest se since 1960. Not too shabby for a team started the year at 4-10. This weeken Tigers take on University of Denver Colorado Christian College in Denver has already defeated Colorado Chri once this year, but in order to beat DU best non-Division One team in the they will, literally, have to play the gu their lives.

CC's final home game of the year i Wednesday, February 18th against a improved UCCS squad. The game, w will also be carried on Colorado Sp Cablevision, promises to be a good Tip-off is at 7:30 PM.

DAVID EVA

Women Take Turn For The Worse

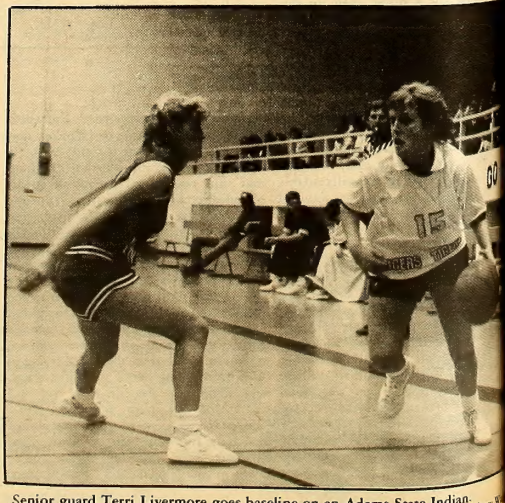
Just when it seemd like CC's women's basketball team was ready to travel the road to success, two giant potholes sidetracked the Tigers and sent them reeling to substantial losses. After dropping a 74-55 decision to the University of Northern Colorado in Greeley on February 6th, the Tigers returned home, only to be pummelled by Adams State, 95-64, on February 10th. The setbacks, coming on the heels of CC's second three game winning streak of the season, dropped the Tigers' record to 10-12 and severely damaged their chances at a winning season with only three games remaining.

Last Friday in Greeley, the Tigers shot poorly from both the field and free throw line in their loss to the Division II Golden Rams. Though UNC didn't shoot much better from the floor than CC (UNC shot 39.5% from the field, CC 38.6%), CC shot a miserable 45.9% (11-24) from the charity stripe. UNC out-rebounded CC, 55-43, had more steals, 15-10, and committed less turnovers, 22-15, in what turned out to be something of a rout. Even Sally Bush's solid performance (27 points, 11 rebounds, 4 blocked shots) was marred by a dismal 5-13 performance from the free throw line. No other Tigers managed to score in double figures, and only Chris Sanchez could manage more assists than turnovers (3 assists, 2 turnovers). Carol Franta led UNC with 17 points and 12 rebounds before fouling out, and five other Golden Ram players scored eight or more points.

CC returned home for a Tuesday night encounter with Adams down by eighteen at halftime, 46-28. Dreadful shooting again caged the Tigers as they could only manage to connect on 28.6% of their first half shots. Adams State shot almost twice as well (55.9%), including 12 points from Carol Barker and 10 points from Stephanie Mondragon, many on looping long-range bombs. Brenda Frihauf and Gail Burges kept the Tigers reasonable close with 10 and 6 first half points, respectively, but leading scorer Sally Bush could only heave up one shot from the floor and failed to score in the half.

Early in the second half, CC cut the Indian lead to twelve and had chances to further slice the Adams State advantage. But, after a few missed chances, CC just fell apart. The Tigers committed 10 second half turnovers (Adams State only 2), and again struggled from the line (6-13 in the second half, 10-17 for the game). Sally Bush again led CC with 16 points and 6 rebounds, but all came in the second half after the Indians began to run away with

Continued on p. 18



Senior guard Terri Livermore goes baseline on an Adams State Indian. Photo by Jerry W

Track Season Opens

ast Saturday, the mighty Tigers rolled Colorado School of Mines for the ual Mines Relay Meet. This years Track team, which features 9 shmen, 3 Sophomores, 2 Juniors, and 1 ior, is relatively short on experience. while this experience caused some ousness at the beginning of the meet, feeling soon wore off as the CC men on to place in every event they ered. Taking on tough teams like ern State College, University of ern Colorado, Colorado School of es and Northeastern Junior College, CC men took 1st in the Shot Put, 1st in Weight-Mans relay, 2nd in the 4x200 er relay, and 2nd in team Shot Put. The 00 meter relay consisted of sophomore an Thomas, freshman Steve Hauth, g Cochran and senior Captain T.J. Chuck Puga won the Shot Put for the nd straight week with a throw of 48'8" a couple feet shy of Nationals. The CC putters placed 2nd overall as a team, best they have done in years. They also e able to put together an awesome ght-Mans relay team, and glided into place. This team consisted of NAMITE Chuck Puga, FLEET FEET e "Greenie" Greenwald, Rocket Jim me, and Torre "Too Tough" Peterson. cording to Track Coach Frank Flood, CC community can expect great things this year's team, however, his main ls are to push each individual to do his onal best. "I rally get a kick out of ," says Flood. CC will be running at es again this week at their Invitational t.

UGS REMUS

Guess What

The one goal curse continues to haunt the troubled Tigers. The CC hockey team lost both games of last weekend's series to the University of Minnesota, the Western Collegiate Hockey Association's second place team. In Minnesota, Friday's contest was battled into overtime with the final score 4-3, while Saturday night a Gophers' goal with ten minutes left in the game halted the Tigers' hopes for series split.

It has been a long and frustrating season for the Tigers. They have come so close many times to victory, only to be denied by a one goal decision. These two defeats, the thirteenth and fourteenth one goal losses this season, dropped CC's record to 11-22-1 and the Tigers into the WCHA cellar with a seventh place tie with Michigan Tech. The Huskies swept their weekend series against Denver to move up in the standings. Denver is currently third but Norther Michigan and Wisconsin are only two points behind, tied in fourth place.

Freshman Doug Kirton started the team on the way to a win at 7:20 Friday night with a goal but that was the only time the Tigers were on top. Keith Hoppe and Dave Hardie got the assists on this goal, the only one for CC in the first two periods. The Gophers matched that score two minutes later and the first period ended in a 1-1 tie.

Minnesota took over the lead midway through the second period and then widened their margin to 3-1 with 22 seconds remaining in that frame. CC was unable to muster an offense in that twenty minutes only testing the Gopher goalie, John Blue, twice. Derek Pizzey, in net for the Tigers, played another great game keeping his team within reach of the win. He stopped 12 Gopher attempts in the second period, and came up with a total of 40 for the night.

CC rallied back in the third for two goals and the chance to escape with the win in overtime. A power play goal at 3:37 by the Tigers' leading scorer, senior Rick Boh, narrowed the Gophers' lead to one point. Seniors Scott Schneider and Rob Doyle set up Tiger tally number two. CC started up the offense that had been missing in the second period but with a little over a minute left in regulation time, the Tigers were still down by one. Pizzey was pulled for the addition of a sixth skater, Doug Kirton, who did his job and sent the game into OT. Kirton tipped in a Doyle shot from the point to tie it up, 3-3. It was the freshman's second goal of the night.

Doyle kept shooting in the extended play but the Tigers could only watch as one shot bounced off the pipes and the next ricocheted off Minnesota's netminder and landed on top of the net. Less than a minute later the game was over as the Gophers scored number four in ten minute sudden death overtime.

Saturday night Scott Schneider put away the rebound of a Doug Kirton slapshot during a first period CC powerplay, at 6:51. Neither team scored for the rest of that period and CC headed for the locker room with a slim 1-0 lead.

The Gophers capitalized on their power play opportunity three quarters of the way through the middle period to even the score. Holding CC scoreless once again in the second period, the Gophers took over the lead on a break away goal. Now it was Minnesota's turn to head to the locker room with the one goal lead.

Three minutes into the third period tri-captain Marty Ketola tied it for the Tigers at 2-2 when he tipped in a Mark Olson shot. But with 10 seconds left in regulation time, another Gopher break away goal ended CC's hopes for the series split.

Pizzey, again between the pipes for the Tigers, kicked away 42 shots in the second game for a series total of 82 saves. Pizzey has been a key factor in CC's close contests. The problem is at the other end of the ice where the puck is just not bouncing the right way for the Tigers.

This weekend the Tigers are at home hosting fourth place Northern Michigan. It is a do or die situation for the Tigers en route to the playoffs. CC needs to hold on to seventh place in which case they will go back up to Minnesota and face the Gophers in the first round of the playoffs. If they fall to eighth, the Tigers will face North Dakota in the Fighting Sioux's own territory. UND, 26-5-0, has already clinched the WCHA title and are only one win away from tying the WCHA record for the most wins in a season set by DU in 1977-78. Denver will attempt to keep their name in the record book when they travel to North Dakota this weekend.

K MAHONEY

Gadowsker says, "Get out of my way, you knob."

Photo by Jerry Wang

Win Some, Lose Some

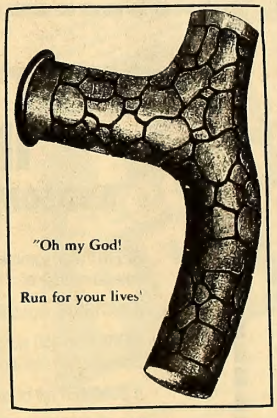
The Big Cat men's swimming team won easy one and lost a close one in mming action last week at the CC pool. e Cats continued their domination of er California opponents by defeating University of Redland's men's mmers 59-13 in a shortened meet on rsday. The Redland's team did not e enough swimmers to compete in all nts, so CC only swam against them in events they could.

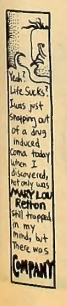
The next day NAIA national power DU e to town. The DU team was looking an easy win but the Big Cats refused to down easy. Led by sophomore standout n Hackett and divers Craig Clear and n Smith, CC made a valiant effort for ory but fell in the end 105-102. Divers er and Smith continued their successful son by taking 1st and 2nd, respectively, both the 1-meter and 3-meter petitions. Hackett came through with two great swims in the 200 yard and 500 yard freestyle events to claim 1st place in each of them. His performance showed that he is ready to help lead the Big Cats in their attempt to improve their standing in the ISL Championships next week. Last year CC placed 3rd.

Other swimmers showed they are improving just in time by their swims in the meet also. Fresh cats Guido Gottschalk, who is recovering from a shoulder injury, and John Dorfch, both swam well in helping the Big Cats to their near upset.

The CC men still have Metro State and Colorado School of Mines on their schedule before the Championships. Both meets should be close and exciting and the Cats will have to be at their best to defeat them. The competition should prepare the Big Cats for the tough Championships on Feb. 20 & 21. Come and support the Tigers!

KEVIN DIFFEE





Yeah? Life Sucks? Twas jst Sleeping out of a drug induced coma today when I discovered, not only was MARY LOU Retton Still trapped in my mind, but There was COMPANY

Beat it, Mary Lou! There's only room in this man's mind for One Olympian, and quite Frankly, You've lost that winning edge!
DAMN YOU, SCOTT HAMILTON! Larry was just starting to understand the satisfaction of good, honest competition... He was eating better and...
Get LOST!

BOY, am I glad you showed up. That hammering little bitch was really getting to me...
Its going to be nice to get close to you too, Larry. Lets find a YMCA and take a Long cleansing shower!
Scott Hamilton

ooooooooh! What a divine LOVE STORY! If I weren't dead from AIDS I'd climb right down from here and give you Hot BUCKS a Tumble!
HAA HA HA HAA HA HA HA HA !!
CONTINUED...

Dean's Drivel

Hockey's Rendez-Vous '87, a two game series between the Soviet Union's national team and a group of NHL All-Stars began Wednesday night with the NHL stars earning a 4-3 victory in front of a packed house at Quebec's Le Colisee. Philadelphia's Dave Poulin tipped in a shot by cross-state rival Mario Lemieux (Pittsburgh) at 18:45 of the third period to give the defenders of freedom a dramatic victory over the totalitarian agressors.

The NHL opened the scoring at 5:23 of the first period when Edmonton's Jari Kurri beat Commie netminder Evgeny Belosheykin (nice name) after assists by Oiler teammates Wayne Gretzky and Esa Tikkanen. Oiler goalie Grant Fuhr, the fourth Edmonton starter, kept the Soviets scoreless through the first period with a number of excellent saves.

Edmonton's Glenn Anderson upped the NHL lead to 2-0 at 17:00 of period two when he swooped out from behind the Ruskie net and stuffed the puck over Belosheykin's stick and through the keeper's legs for a goal. Mario Lemieux's assist, his first of two on the night, gave Anderson the half step he needed to put away the wrap-around blast.

Just over a minute later, at 18:42, the Reds halved the NHL lead to 2-1 as defenseman Kasatanov pounced on a helpful bounce and finally beat Fuhr. It was the only goal the vaunted line of Vladimir Krutov, Igor Larionov and Sergei Makarov (credited with an assist on Kasatanov's goal) managed to produce on the night.

Trailing 2-1 entering the game's final period, the Soviet's struck quickly to tie the score. At 2:03 Bykov converted assists from Khomutov and Starikov to pull Pinkos even. Four minutes later, however, at 7:03 of the third, former Denver University standout and now Hartford Whaler Kevin Dineen took a great pass from Winnipeg Jet Dale Hawerchuk and pushed the Good Guys back ahead, 3-2. Philadelphia's Poulin, who scored the gamewinner some eleven minutes later, also assisted on the goal.

After the NHL regained the lead, the Bad Guys began to dominate play. Paced by superior stickhandling and passing, the Soviets thwarted every NHL advance and didn't allow any serious chances against their goal for more than five minutes. During the surge, at 8:04, Semenov evened the score at 3-3 with a pretty goal from Tatarinov and Varnakov. Only tough forechecking by the NHL forwards and excellent defense, spearheaded by Washington Capital defensive stalwart Rod Langway, prevented the revved up Reds from racing into the lead, and Poulin's late goal iced the win for the civilized world.

As expected, production from NHL superstars Wayne Gretzky and Mario Lemieux (who combined for three points on the night) keyed the NHL victory. Although neither player dominated play as they are capable of doing on any given night in the NHL, their mere presences on the ice allowed lesser known players like Poulin and Dineen to share the spotlight. Not only did Poulin and Dineen match Gretzky and Lemieux's three point output, the also provided the essential harassment of Soviet power trio Krutov, Larianov and Makarov that held the most potent Red line to only one point.

Overall, the scoreline wasn't entirely representative of the play. The Soviet's seemed slightly quicker, more skilled and generally controlled the puck more effectively for longer stretches of time. Though this could be attributed to the fact that the Soviets have had time to adjust to each other and play together, a luxury the NHL players didn't enjoy. It seems that in a longer series, the Soviets would probably prevail. In any event, the fact that the NHL did come out on top is a great achievement and a tribute to their determination and pride. Though the NHL would certainly love to sweep the series, a split against the best single hockey team in the world would still be admirable (Should the Soviets win Game Two, the teams will be declared co-champions of the Rendez-Vous '87 Tournament).

Game Two of Rendez-Vous '87 will be broadcast live from Quebec on ESPN Friday night at 5:30. That gives all you non-cable viewers plenty of time to reacquaint yourselves with those old friends with cable and enjoy the best hockey in the world.

Sport Shorts

Junior setter Amy Smith (San Diego, Calif.) and freshman hitter Cathy Costello (Los Angeles, Calif.) of Colorado College recently have been named to Volleyball Monthly Magazine's All-America team (sponsored by ASICS Tiger), while sophomore goalkeeper Janine Szpara (San Jose, Calif.) has been selected to receive a Sportswomen of Colorado award for her achievements in soccer.

Smith and Costello earlier earned second-team CVCA (Collegiate Volleyball Coaches Association) All-America honors, sponsored by Russell Athletic. Both players plan to return to CC next season after leading the Tigers to a 23-10 record and NCAA playoff berth in 1986.

Smith, who also was a CVCA All-American as a sophomore, finished her junior season with 789 assists, 27 service aces and 171 digs in 33 matches. She was named to the ASICS third team.

Costello led Colorado College with a .341 attack percentage, was second on the team with 237 kills and had 34 blocks last season. She was one of six players in the natin named to the ASICS first team.

Szpara, who will receive her most recent award at a banquet in Denver on March 8, was named a first-team All-American for the second straight year after leading the Tigers to the NCAA championship last fall. Since she has been at CC, the has posted a 33-9-1 record and reache Final Four Tournament twice. In Szpara shut out the Universit California-Berkeley in the N quarterfinals and the Universit Massachusetts in the semifinals, le CC to a No. 2 finish nationally.

In addition to honoring Sz Sportswomen of Colorado also will pr CC soccer coach Dang Pibulvech wi award for achievement in women's s by a male coach.

Skiing: Junior Jim Grossman Valley, Idaho) captured fifth in the s and freshman Clay Colvig (Dur Colo.) took ninth in the giant sl leading the Colorado College men's to a solid third-place finish at the Bri Yound Invitational in Park City, Junior Peter Hudson (Waukesha, was 22nd in the slalom. The CC wor team wound up fifth in a field of s Sophomore Kim Kepner (Everg Colo.) led the Tigers by placing individually in the slalom and 14th i giant slalom. Coach Mark Rinehar praised the efforts of freshman Be Metcalf (Sewickley, Pa.), who was 1 the slalom at her first intercolle competition. Host BYU won both men's and women's teams titles.

Continued from p. 16

the game. Barker and Mondrag Adams State, combining for 43 poi 20-33 (60.6%) shooting, actually sh better from the floor than the Tige from the free throw line (58.8%).

After road games against February 14th and AFA February (both schools have Division II teams) Tigers return home Saturday, Feb 21st at 7:00 p.m. for the last game o 1986-87 season against Colorado Chri College. With a third three-game ning streak to end the season, CC reach its goal of a .500 season.

DEAN CAMPBELL

What if you don't get into the grad school of your choice?

Of course, you may get into another school, but why settle? Prepare for the LSAT, GMAT, GRE, MCAT or any grad school entrance exam with the best test prep organization— Stanley H. Kaplan.

For nearly 50 years, Kaplan's test-taking techniques have prepared over 1 million students for admission and licensing tests of all kinds. So call. Why go to just any grad school, when you can go to the right one?

KAPLAN

STANLEY H. KAPLAN EDUCATIONAL CENTER LTD.

DON'T COMPETE WITH A KAPLAN STUDENT—BE ONE

761-8904

or see Judy Gibson for info.

MCAT classes starting Feb. 14

All classes held in Olin Hall

SEVENTY DAYS OF SUMMER IN COLORADO

AND SOMETHING NEW TO DO EACH DAY.

SPEND your summer at the University of Colorado at Boulder, where you can take advantage of:

A NATIONAL reputation for educational excellence

MORE than 450 exciting courses, including special classes and seminars by distinguished visiting professors

A SUMMER full of world-class performing arts activities

ALL IN THE BEAUTIFUL SETTING OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS

SEND for our free course bulletin or

CALL (303) 492-4184 (24 hours)

CLASSES begin June 8, 1987

University of Colorado at Boulder 1987 SUMMER SESSION

Office of Admissions
Regent Administrative Center 125
Campus Box 7
University of Colorado at Boulder
Boulder, CO 80309-0007

Affirmative Action/Equal Opportunity Institution

CU Still Sucks

Julia Hansen withstands a horrible heinous hooking. Photo by Jerry Wang

The women's club hockey team broke one goal curse that had plagued them their last two games with a 5-4 victory by over the Denver Bandits. This win ised their record to 2-6.

The underdog Tigers overcame the ger Bandits with a win that was niniscent of 1980 Lake Placid miracles: Americans over the Russians.

Senior Sarah Flynn, in her second game e returning from the African Junior ional team, exploded for a hat trick in first period and it seemed like the Tigers had the game in hand.

Flynn beat Denver's goalie with a wrist shot in the upper right corner after receiving a pass from behind the net by senior Kathy Mahoney for goal number one. Four minutes later, Flynn pounced on a loose puck in the crease, pushing it over the goal line, amidst the bedlam in front of the Bandits net.

Junior Susan Deeds got into the scoring for Tiger goal number 3. All alone in the slot, Deeds took a centering pass from Mahoney who was tied up on the boards, and put it away upstairs. Flynn topped off her hat trick a short time later. Taking a pass at center ice, she beat the Bandit defender and unleashed a shot from the top of the circle to give the Tigers a 4-0 lead.

The Bandits kept their offense going but the strong play of Tiger netminder Dorothy Diggs denied them all but one and the first period ended with CC leading 4-1.

The second period passed with neither team lighting the scoreboard although both teams had chances.

The Tigers broke down at the beginning of the final twenty minutes. Denver beat CC to the puck and rallied back to tie the game at 4-4 with five minutes to play. The Tigers did not roll over and give up but fought back to gain the win that had eluded the team since mid-November.

With 2:40 to play, CC got the woman advantage when Denver was called for tripping. Coaches Dave Roe and Vic Sunshine sent in the seldom used special team with junior co-captain Sarah Meskin and rookie Martha Deeds at the blue line and Sarah Flynn, Kathy Mahoney, and Susan Deeds on the front line. With the face-off in the Bandits zone, CC had all the advantages and they used those advantages. CC controlled the puck and kept shooting; then finally at 1:26, Kathy Mahoney tipped in Susan Deeds' wrist shot from the top of the right circle. That gave the Tigers the lead.

It was a big win for the women who were coming off a 2-1 loss at the hands of CU the day before. Meskin scored the only goal for the Tigers with the assist going to Mahoney in that losing battle.

This weekend the team travels to CSU to take on the newest franchise in the league. Next weekend the Tigers head up to Aspen to face the always strong Motherpuckers.

QUINN TIKKANEN

Photo by Jerry Wang

INTRAMURAL INDOOR SOCCER: To facilitate the enormous popularity of indoor soccer at CC, Intramural Director Dang Pibulvech has organized an intramural indoor soccer league. Various members of both CC's men's and women's teams, and ordinary soccer playing civilians, compete in the turf room adjacent to the varsity weight room in the basement of El Pomar. The games consist of two twenty-five minute halves, and are played without goalies against goals approximately 4'x3'. Each team must be co-ed, with no more than two male players (out of four total) on a given team on the field at the same time. Games are played evenings, and are characterized by both excellent play and exciting action (one game last week ended in a 26-22 score).

Weekend Special
For Dinner
February 13 & 14

JOSE MULDOON'S
222 N. Tejon St. · Downtown
636-2311

Regular menus available
Plus these Dinners for Two:

Dinners for Two include:
Margarita, Sangria or Non-Alcoholic Beverage
Mushroom Con Queso & Chips
Salad Bar and Sopapillas

Choose From:
Fajita Fiesta Platter $18.95 For two
OR
Santa Fe Platter $22.95 for two

♥ AND ♥

OLD CHICAGO
118 N. Tejon St. · Downtown
634-8812

Regular menus available
Plus these dinner specials:

Dinner Specials include:
Wine or Non-Alcoholic Beverage,
Minestrone Soup or Salad
Garlic Bread & Cannoli's

Choose From:
Chicken Monterey $10.95 per person
Beef Tenderloin $12.95 per person
Shaped Seafood Calzone for two $13.95

Photo Special! Every Monday!
coupon
FREE
SECOND SET OF PRINTS
Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!
This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon. 819
Limited time offer.
Kodak Colorwatch System
WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!
College Pharmacy
833 North Tejon • 634-4861

ANNOUNCEMENTS

BIOLOGY SEMINAR — Tuesday, February 17. Dr. Leroy Eggleston, local veterinarian, expert on the treatment of injured birds and birds of prey will discuss Raptor Rehabilitation, 12 noon, Olin 100. Brown bag lunch and refreshments served.

NOTIFICATION OF LEAVE OF ABSENCE AND WITHDRAWAL DEADLINES. Applications available in the Dean's Office, Armstrong Hall, room 213.

The deadline for requesting a leave of absence is MARCH 1 for a leave which begins in the fall semester. Students are encouraged to apply for a leave even if they are awaiting word of their acceptance to a program. On formal application, a leave of absence will be considered for one of the following reasons: financial or personal emergency, ACM programs, the Washington Semester, or study abroad.

The withdrawal form must by submitted by MARCH 1. However, it may be considered "pending" up until May 1 if the student so requests. All students who decide to interrupt their education at Colorado College, and who do not qualify for a leave of absence, or who wish to transfer to another institution, are expected to withdraw formally from the College. Students who fail to submit an intention to withdraw by March 1 forfeit the general obligation deposit.

ACM COSTA RICA — Deadline for applying to the two Costa Rica programs is March 30. Fall semester consists of courses, with emphasis on the effect of multinational corporations on a Third World country, a home stay in the provinces, and a small research project. The fall is a CC Thematic Minor. Spring semester is research in biology, geology, and the social sciences.

See paul Kutsche, Palmer 11, for further information.

Note that deadline above is the final deadline for fall 1987, early decision deadline for spring 1988. CC's deadline for approving leave of absence is March 1.

START PRACTICING! If you like to sing, dance, act or play instrument, AUDITIONS for the Annual Student/Alumni Association Talent Show will be held march 3rd and 4th! More information will be publicized.

SEMESTER IN MEXICO — A slide show and reception for all students interested in the Guanajuato Program will be held on Thursday, Feb. 19 at 3 pm in Armstrong 302. Meet this year's participants and enjoy some Mexican refreshments. For more info. contact Kevin O'Connor, x624.

FEBRUARY 17th — MEDITATION — SHOVE CHAPEL, 8:00-8:30 a.m. Music, silence, mystical and/or other writings (enter by northeast door).

FEBRUARY 18th — Shove Council Meeting 12:00 noon, Shove Lounge.

FEBRUARY 20th — Worship Service, Shove Chapel, 12:05 to 12:40. Speaker: Denis Hines, former Trappist Monk.

COLLECTOR ITEM: original "Willy The Disc" T-shirt! Black, long-sleeve, 100% cotton, men's x-large. Mint condition, seldom worn. Bidding on this rare item begins at $25.00. Send bids or inquiries to Off-Campus Box #501.

MARCH PROGRAMS AT BEAR CREEK NATURE CENTER — March 7, 1:00 pm, The Prairie World, This interesting program features a slide show presenting images and stories of prairie pioneers, plants and wildlife.

March 14, 8:30 am -2:30 pm, Grassland Field Trip. Celebrate the last days of winter and discover signs of spring in the colorful geologic area of Calhan Paint Mines. A side trip will be made to search for migrating waterfowl. Bring a sack lunch and wear walking shoes. Reservations required; call 520-6387.

march 21, 1:00 pm, Kites and Wind. Learn about the sources and causes of wind, and then go the meadow to fly kites. Bring your own kite to this springtime event.

Sundays, 1:00 pm, Display Animal Close-up. Help the nature center staff feed the display animals and learn more about Colorado wildlife.

The Bear Creek Nature Center is located at 245 Bear Creek Road which is a southern extension of 26th Street. For information, call 520-6387.

"You Have Struck a Rock." A movie about the role women play in the struggle against apartheid in South Africa. Tuesday, Feb. 17, 7:30, Olin Hall. Co-sponsored by the Cc Community Against Apartheid and the Feminist Collective.

The purpose of a ROTARY FOUNDATION SCHOLARSHIP is to contribute to the furtherance of understanding and friendly relations between peoples of different nations by enabling a young man or young woman to study in an educational institution located outside his or her own country.

There are five basic types of scholarships: Graduate Scholarshps, Undergraduate Scholarships, Vocational Scholarships, Teacher of the Handicapped Scholarships and Journalism Scholarships. Each award includes payment of roundtrip airfare from home to place of study, all academic fees, essential books and educational supplies, room, and board.

Applications may be obtained from COLORADO SPRINGS, The Antlers, Pikes Peak & Cascade, 473-5600.

Completed applications are to be submitted to one of the local Rotary Clubs on or before April 25, 1987.

BB Bean COFFEE

"Brew the Best— Brew BB"

WHOLESALE/RETAIL COFFEE ROASTER

Featuring: Daily Roasting of the World's Premium Green Coffee

Student Aid: A La BB

Let us help you study with an easy stomach. BB Bean's varital roasts are notably smooth and gentle.

Experience the difference a quality bean freshly roasted to peak flavor can mean.

Brew the best for less... BB Bean offers specials discounts to CC students.

475-2236 334 East Colorado Ave. at Wahsatch

LIVE FOR BIG MOUNTAIN — Tonight! Friday the 13th! Get your ya yas out! In Cossit Gym the music, the dancing, the eating begin at 8:00 p.m. as the Leeches kick off the night with their unique sound. Then the Auto No takes over and goes until 1:00 a.m. to the tune of REM, the Violent Femmes, Buddy Holiday and The Rolling Stones.

Donate to raise money for the traditional Navajo families resisting relocation in Arizona. Both bands are donating their time and there is hope that you who come will donate what you can at the door for the people of Big Mountain. (suggested donation $2-$5)

The Pikes Peak area Big Mtn. Support Group has been working with traditional families throughout the year. Raising money is just one aspect of our work. We encourage you to come and dance and learn more about the situation at Big Mountain. It's a party! Bring every friend you have!

Spring Break Trip to South Padre Island from only $159. For information call Abby at 636-1022.

Boz: xxx000—Your Mexican lover.

NWACP Tee Shirts—Fun participants can pick up their tee from Adam Burke, Loomis 229, x24

FOR SALE —'72 2002 tii BM $3,500. Clean, runs well, must drive appreciate. Call Chris, 473-3723.

Josephine Lazar
Instruction in the Yoga

(303) 475-9721

FOR SALE —19" Hitachi color mint condition. $300, 4 yr. parts and warranty remaining. Sharp VCR wireless remote control, $200 or best Call Kevin, 471-3881.

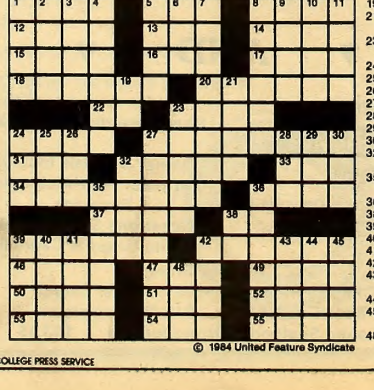
ACROSS

1 Paper measure
5 Insane
8 Indefinite amount
12 Solo
13 The self
14 Emerald isle
15 Poses for portrait
16 Measure of weight
17 Part of shoe
18 Pounding instrument
20 Repeals
22 Babylonian deity
23 Kind of collar
24 Mix
27 Wages
31 Vase
32 One of Three Musketeers
33 Lamprey
34 Number
36 Negate
37 Winglike
38 Symbol for tellurium
39 Antiquated
42 Lids
46 Landed
47 Couple
49 Mental image
50 Irritate
51 That woman
52 Transgressions
53 Native of Morocco
54 Deep yearning
55 Greenland settlement

DOWN

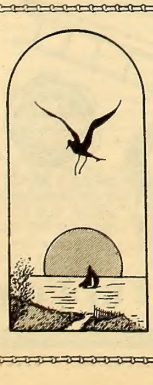
1 Grate
2 Great Lake
3 River islands
4 Expert
5 Apportion
6 Time gone by
7 Gift
8 Calm
9 Moroccan seaport
10 Intellect
11 Goals
19 Note of scale
21 Cleaning utensils
23 Chemical compound
24 Bright star
25 Prefix: three
26 Hostelry
27 Furtive
28 Born
29 Lair
30 Crafty
32 Husband of Gudrun
35 Christian festival
36 Invent
38 As far as
39 Cultivated land
40 Mixture
41 Farm structure
42 Grain
43 Prepare for print
44 Rockfish
45 Band worn around waist
48 Tiny

W	A	S	P		S	N	O	W		W	H
A	I	N	U		T	O	P	E		R	U
S	T	A	R	R	Y		A	T		E	L
			P	E	L	T		S	T	A	L
T	R	O	O	P	E	R	S		I	T
H	O	R	S	E		Y	A	M		H	A
E	L		E	L	K		D	I	M	T	O
N	E	W		S	E	W		D	O	M	E
		H	E		N	E	E	D	L	E	S
B	E	A	M	S		D	A	L	E
A	L	L		L	O		T	E	S	T	E
T	I	E		A	N	T	E		T	O	M
H	A	S		M	E	A	N		S	T	U



© 1984 United Feature Syndicate

COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE



GREAT SUMMER JOBS

IN NEW ENGLAND

Cape Cod and the Islands of Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard

Thousands of interesting and varied summer jobs are waiting to be filled. The acute shortage of seasonal workers has driven pay scales 35% higher than wages for similar work elsewhere in the country.

For immediate detailed information on the kinds of jobs being offered, housing availability, etc., send a LONG self-addressed STAMPED envelope to:

SUMMER JOBS PROGRAM
Box 594, Room 23
Barnstable, MA 02630

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 20 February 1987 Volume 21, No. 5

What are Ethics in Business?

Photo by Ginny Bunker

Nationally known financial consultant and writer, Madelon Devoe Talley, spoke on the issue of business ethics on Tuesday, February 16th. The Woodrow Wilson Foundation recruited Talley to spend a week visiting classes, giving lectures and sharing her experiences with students here at CC. This talk was co-sponsored by the business and economics department.

Talley has previously held such important positons as Director of Investments and Cash Management for the State of New York Controller's Office, Director of Business Advisors for the American Women's Economic Development Corporation and Vice President and Director of Foreign Investment Funds of the Dreyfus Corporation. A few of Talley's other involvements include being Chairperson of the Women's Economic Round Table, Vice President of Financial Women's Association of New York, trustee to the Industrial Development Board and a member of the Small Business Administration Task Force. Talley acquired her degrees at Harvard Business School and Columbia University.

Talley explained that the issue of business ethics has become important relatively recently. Many people hold the belief that in the business world people do whatever can be done to make a profit. Talley remarked that when she told a friend in New York about this lecture, her friend replied, "That will be a very short speech."

It is important to keep in mind, stresses Talley, that although business ethics are being focused on more in the media, these types of underhanded business dealings are by no means new business practices. Underhanded dealings of all types are reported to have existed as much or more so in the 1920s and 1930s.

Along with many unpleasant business practices in the world, however, Talley argues that business ethics can and do exist. Talley describes what people consider to be ethical behavior as a corridor that widens as an individual gains experience in the business world. Talley warns against judging others too harshly. She explains, "Everyone has a price—it's just that most of us are lucky enough never to find out what it is." Talley acknowledges that a dilemma exists between the capitalist ethic to get ahead and a basic sense of morality.

"Everyone has a price—it's just that most of us are lucky enough never to find out what it is."

Talley explains that most of us will be asked to do something at least slightly unethical at sometime in our lives. We must weigh the possibilities carefully. When faced with an ethical dilemma, Talley asks herself, "What would my action look like on the front page of the New York Post?" Then I ask myself: "Is it really worth the risk?" Furthermore, Talley stresses the importance of keeping good records to protect against scandal.

Talley feels business ethics of the future can be improved through informative discussions in the home and discussions in

Continued on p. 3

Baca Grande: CC's New Horizon

New branch campus offers unique opportunities

The Baca Grande is not a concept that easily be put into words. It is best erstood in the expressions on the faces e people who have been there, and it is ly reflected in visions of venison and o-lope blues.

here were eighteen of us in three cars ving down to the newest branch of the rado College campus on a nothing- ial Monday afternoon. It was a day like other day, except that there were six ple, five duffle bags, six napsacks, a pack, two cases of beer, a mandolin, guitars, and four pairs of snowshoes med inside my Volvo. It was a tight se, and Henry David Thoreau had to with the spare tire.

ike most CC students, we knew next to ing about the Baca Grande. As we left rado Springs, jockeying for shoulder e in the back of the Volvo, all we knew that we were spending a week at a o with papers to write and no word ssors. We were senior English majors to realize up close and personal the elying theme of our culminating sar, man's journey from civilization wilderness.

The Baca Grande lies in the San Louis Valley of Colorado, just south of Pancha Pass and just north of the Great Sand Dunes. It is composed of more hundreds of acres than I could imagine calculating, all at the feet of the Sangre de Cristo mountains. The closest town is Crestone, population, oh, about sixty-four. It is the realization of a dream of one family with a lot of money who are trying to create a "Refuge for World Peace."

The college was lured down there by the offer of our own seminar building and a three-year lease on three condominiums. The community hopes that CC's presence among them will help initiate more creative thinking in the Baca and expose its people to a variety of fresh perspectives. The college is equally interested in learning from the new perspectives of a community so uniquely removed from our own. It is also an ideal opportunity to utilize one of the school's most successful selling points, our close connection with the natural wonder of Colorado. It represents an opportunity to take Colorado out of the brochures sent to prospective freshmen and bring it into the classroom in an incredibly real way.

When we got down there Monday evening and settled into our deluxe condominiums, we had a pretty good feeling that we weren't completely immersed in the wilderness. But neither were we lounging in the luxury of civilization. We had electricity, but we didn't have T.V.'s. We didn't really have cars, but we had a liquor store within walking distance. We had some good tapes with us, but we didn't have any batteries for the tape player.

Our initial reaction to the fresh air and the star-lit sky was to start partying. I made my way to town partly to aid in the effort of continuing the party, but more out of a need to make contact, to say "We're here," and see how people reacted. I met Frank Snider, the owner of "Twenty-First Ammendment Liquors." He was glad to hear we were there, and offered to buy me a beer if I came back sometime. I bought a twelve-pack of Coors at his recommendation, assuming that my socially and politically conscious friends would refuse to support this product of the

Continued on p. 8

INSIDE

Television Ethics see p. 2

CC Senior Recalls Coke Rehab see p. 7

College Controversies see p. 10

The Dirt see p. 16

The Armadillo: Back in the Saddle see p. 23

What's News?

Analyzing Current Issues

Lately we've had the opportunity to hear some debates about television - what kinds of programs and advertisements the boob tube should send our way. Specifically, controversy has centered around the use of condom advertisements and the showing of the ABC film series Amerika. What exactly is it that we want in television - and where do we draw the line on what should and should not be seen?

To begin with, one begins to wonder whether such debate spurns action by the networks, as they have constitutional freedoms to display what they wish, with the exception of some things like pornography. Do the networks have ethical guidelines that must be adhered to? If Jesse Jackson or Jesse Helms bought ABC how would we react to their programming? Would we decide it was time to draw the line on T.V. then? How many Americans are willing to boycott safe sex methods.

The arguments ask which is more important: educating the public about ways to prevent the spread of AIDS, or exposing the public to what may seem to be a condoning of the sexual permissiveness found in our society. From an educational perspective, which method is more efficient: advertisements which reach many people and turn profits for the condom industry and networks, or the use of federal expenditures to set up educational programs in schools? The decision rests on whether the public can handle such ads or not.

The other controversy has been the showing of Amerika, a mini-series that depicts life in the U.S. after takeover and occupation by the Soviet Union. Many critics find the film promoting the right (i.e. conservative) perspective and sure to scare many Americans into a stronger television to force the networks to take responsibility or change policy, or do we want to delve into legislative restrictions and hear "freedom of speech and the press" declarations?

Condoms in Amerika

A House subcommittee has been the scene of debate over whether condom ads should be used to inform the public of their benefits in reducing the spread of AIDS. Surgeon General C. Everett Koop said "the growing threat posed by Acquired Immune Deficiency syndrome make such advertisements necessary." Dr. Koop, concerned with the disproportional rise of AIDS in minorities, proposed the advertisements as a good way to reach these groups and educate them on the need for "safe sex." Some members of Congress and representatives of the three major networks argued that such ads might prove offensive to some viewers who feel they advocate sexual permissiveness. Ralph Daniels of NBC said that advertisements for condoms "are unacceptable to a significant portion of our audience." Several members of Congress noted that constant use of sex appeal in programming and commercials, and found the networks hypocritical to then not inform people on "unnecessary" hatred of the Soviets. Do the networks as some argue, have an obligation t show the other side of an argument or situation - say a U.S. occupation of the Soviet Union? At a time in need of U.S.-Soviet compromise, many see this film as only creating more tensions between the superpowers.

Such a drama, however, can promote ideals beyond just patriotism for the American way. Perhaps the series helps us better understand the fears our nation harbors - fears that have been used, whether right or wrong, in dictating foreign policy for several decades. Furthermore, should we even be up in arms over a television program. Afterall, it's only drama and taken in that context should be entertaining and nothing more.

It all boils down to the question: Do we want to have shows like Amerika, and if so should there be condom ads to break up the drama? Television deserves our criticism - viewed over decades by many unquestioning Americans, it has had a numbing effect that too often places it outside the circles of debate.

NEWS EDITORS

News Briefs

College Hosts Renaissance Conference

The Rocky Mountain Medieval and Renaissance Association's annual confere organized by Prof. Carol Neel, will be held at CC April 10 and 11. A number scholarly papers pertaining to medieval and renaissance history will be presen by collegiate faculty and independent scholars from the region. The keynote addr will be by Caroline Bynum on women and religion in the later Middle Ages. T weekend will include an evening of medieval music by the College's Collegium Musicum, a performance of Provencal lyric by English lutenist Martin Best, an chamber theatre production of Canterbury Tales. Prof. Neel needs volunteers help with registration. Those interested in helping or needing more informa should contact her at x523.

Federal Loan Changes

What's in store?

Federal changes in the student loan program have led to concern among students.

President Reagan signed the changes into law in October 1986, leading many speculate on the effects they will bring to bear on higher education financing.

Among the changes are a new definition of dependent and independent studen that is more stringent and must be documented more fully than in the past.

All students applying for a Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) will be given universal needs analysis test to determine their financial eligibility. Previou students with incomes (or family incomes) under $30,000 were eligible for GS without demonstrating need.

"Those who previously qualified for a GSL may or may not qualify under the ne provisions," according to Robert Fomer, Director of the Colorado Student Lo Program, "New loans like the Supplemental Loan for Students (SLS) will b available to meet student loan needs previously met through the GSL Program Fomer pointed out that higher loan limits on GSL, PLUS and SLS, refinancing PLUS/ALAS/SLS loans and loan consolidation are also important featur designed by the new law to benefit students.

Fomer stated "The most important thing a student can do is apply early and t to the Financial Aids Office. Don't assume that you will or will not qualify."

Scholarships for Study in Germany Awarded

Two Colorado College students have been awarded one-year scholarshi (tuition and a monthly stipend) for study at a German university in 1987-8 William Campbell, a German/Economics major, will study at the University Regensburg and Richard Frohock will attend the University of Gottingen. Eac year CC awards two scholarships for study in Germany with one reserved for German major. A part of the exchange, CC will host two German students.

Lecture on U.S. Militarism

On Tuesday, March 3rd, at 7:30 p.m. in the Gates Common Room at Colora College, Harold Rickard will show slides and speak about "Okinawans: A Forgot Island People." Speaking from 35 years of knowing the people of Okinawa, Har will describe the effects of continuing US militarization on a peaceable peo living on 70 islands in the Pacific Ocean, the nonviolent movement of Okina farmers to regain their land from the United States military, and the significanc May 15, 1987, when land contracts between Okinawans and the US government due for renewal. There will be opportunity to talk together about how we express solidarity with the Okinawan people in their nonviolent struggle.

Harold Rickard, presently of Golden, Colorado, is a retired United Metho minister who spent 30 years as a rural missionary in Okinawa and main Japan. was a consultant on peace and disarmament with the National Council of Church USA, and is the transaltor of the book, The Island Where People Live, by Shi Ahagon.

The event is sponsored by ASIA (Association of Students Interested in Asi CC and by the Pikes Peak Area Big Mountain Support Group. Please call Ch Weaver at 635-4429 for more information.

Hertz

You don't just rent a car. You rent a company.™

Call for Weekend Rate and Eligibility

315 N. Weber
473-2444

8-6 Mon-Sat

Appointments possible at any other time

5% discount with Ad

What if you don't get into the grad school of your choice?

Of course, you may get into another school, but why settle? Prepare for the LSAT, GMAT, GRE, MCAT or any grad school entrance exam with the best test prep organization— Stanley H. Kaplan.

For nearly 50 years, Kaplan's test-taking techniques have prepared over 1 million students for admission and licensing tests of all kinds. So call. Why go to just any grad school, when you can go to the right one?

KAPLAN

STANLEY H. KAPLAN EDUCATIONAL CENTER LTD.

DON'T COMPETE WITH A KAPLAN STUDENT—BE ONE

761-8904

or see Judy Gibson for info.

MCAT classes

Still enrolling

All classes held in Olin Hall

This Weekend...

PLEASE DON'T DRINK & DRIVE

From the Catalyst Staff

Latin America: A Head Case?

The Latin American condition is a sequence of traditional Hispanic ture," said Lawrence E. Harrison, hor of Underdevelopment Is A State Of nd: The Latin American Case. Harrison oducted the February 18 discussion to plain this new thinking which he hopes l better direct development efforts ward their goal. The Political Union, nsor of the lecture as part of its Block 6 matic focus on Latin America, hopes t it will aid in the understanding of the ontroversial issue of Latin America."

"On hears today two very different planations for Latin America's derdevelopment," began the current e president for International velopment at the National operative Business Association. They are e dependency theory, a conventional nking which places the blame on nkee imperialism and the cultural ferminism theory, which points to the nsequences of Hispanic culture as the se of the Latin American condition.

"Culture does change, but it has to come principally from within."

The dependency theory, held in Europe, anada and even the US, states that Latin merica is suffering because the US is mpering. This argument is rooted in conomic determinism, Marxism and eminism, he continued. Harrison entioned some of the allegations this eory makes: "International capitalism, largely guided by Wall Street, has depressed the prices of what Latin America produces while charging Latin America exorbitant prices for what it imports from the United States and other developed countries. US corporations that invest in Latin America are both bleeding it dry and conspiring to install or shore up right-wing dictatorships. The United States government supports rightist dictatorships and opposes truly popular movements to perpetuate its privileged imperialistic position." Harrison listed the US's near self-sufficient economy, its greater trade trend with developed countries, its small investment in Latin America and its record of support of democratic causes as sdestabilizing factors of this argument. Dependency theory both patronizes and paralyzes Latin America.

Photo by Anne Basting

"It's in here somewhere..."

Cultural determinism, the second school of thought and to which he belongs, originated from Max Weber, he explained. It holds that the Hispanic culture, "which still profoundly influences a Latin America culture that is anti-democratic, anti-social, anti-entrepreneurial and anti-work," has shaped Latin America's system to incongruence with successful development. He stressed that this thinking is non-racist, that in fact the elements of success, on which it strongly depends, are conditions learned rather than genetically inherited.

"I believe that the creative apacity of human beings is at the heart of the development process," said Harrison. He added that this can be encouraged in an environment having seven ingredients. They included fair treatment, education, a health system and encouragement of experimentation and criticism. And for these to exist, Harrison expressed the need of nationalism, an ethical system and good attitude toward work. He summarized by saying that where the "Dependency theory implies that Latin America is impotent, the course of its history determined by outside forces," the cultural determinism thinking believes "Latin America can determine its won destiny." Concluding the point, he said, "Culture does change, but it has to come principally from within."

AKLILU DUNLAP

Talley continued from p. 1

school stressing good business ethics. Classes should discuss hypothetical dilemmas and possible solutions. If young business people have a strong ethical education they will be better prepared to challenge the age-old justification, "everyone's doing it."

Talley stresses that individuals can make a difference if they strive for leadership positions in the business world while maintaining high ethical standards. "Leadership for a good cause is never out of date." When feeling pressured into an unethical situation, Madelon Talley sticks by Mrs. Reagan's catch phrase, "just say no!"

MARGO LEVI

LATE NIGHT SPECIAL!
One 12" two topping pizza
for only $4.99 plus tax!
(After 9 pm)

Now from Domino's Pizza, it's the late night special. Any night of the week beginning at 9pm, you can get a 12", 2-topping pizza for only $4.99! (tax not included) Just $4.99 for a fresh, custom-made, 2-topping pizza delivered hot to your door in 30 minutes or less—guaranteed! So when you get the late night hungries—no problem! Just call Domino's Pizza. One call does it all to make your late night special.
Offer expires February 28, 1987.

All Pizzas include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.

Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95

Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers,
Extra Cheese (1 item)
Double Cheese (2 items)
Thick Crust, Extra Sauce
Each Item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19
Coke Classic® 12 oz. cans

$3
If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes, present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off that order—right then.
For safety reasons, if roads are icy, snowpacked, or flooded, please add 15 minutes to our guarantee.
One coupon per pizza.
30 minute guarantee good with any offer.
Fast, Free Delivery™
Good at listed locations.

DOMINO'S PIZZA DELIVERS®

©1986 Domino's Pizza, Inc.

DOMINO'S PIZZA

$4.99
Order a 12" two-topping pizza for only $4.99 from 9 pm until closing, any night of the week!
Offer expires February 28, 1987.
No coupon necessary.
Fast, Free Delivery™
Good at listed locations.

TWO 12" PIZZAS FOR $9.14
ONE TOPPING
(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.

One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!
For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same!), and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings.

Two 12" pizzas for the price of one 16" pizza!

Superb Cheese	$7.95
1 topping	$9.14
2 toppings	$10.33
3 toppings	$11.52
4 toppings	$12.71
5 toppings	$13.90
6 toppings	$15.09

Twice the pizza for one low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minute or less, GUARANTEED!
Offer may expire anytime
Limited delivery area.
We accept checks.
Prices do not include tax.
Our drivers carry less than $20.00.

635-1511

Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.

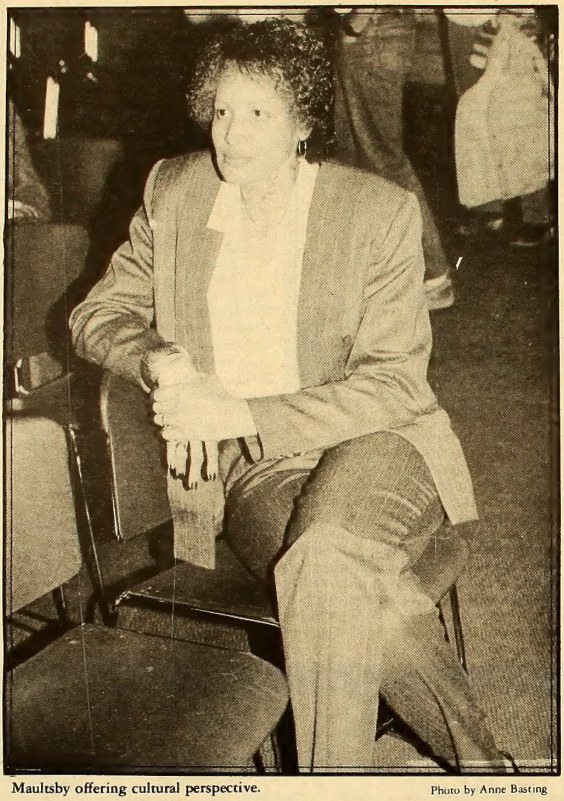
Black Music Reflecting Black Culture

Dr. Portia Maultsby Traces Trends in Black Music

"Black music has a history of white exploitation," said Dr. Portia K. Maultsby at Monday night's lecture sponsored by the Black Student Union in clebration of Black Awareness Month. Dr. Maultsby's extensive knowledge of music (she holds degrees in music, musicology and ethnomusicology) combined with her life-long interest in black music—"I used to go see James Brown for a quarter"—contributed to her entertaining and informative presentation on "Tradition and consciousness in Black Popular Music."

Dr. Maultsby's presentation, which derives from her book in progress with the same title, primarily focused on the relationship between Black secular music and Black popular music. She explained that Black music since the 19th century has been commercially exploited by Whites. As the recording industry came into being, White musicians recorded Black music as their own. Whites labeled any Black music that didn't seem to be commercially useful as simply a passing fad that had no value—illegitimate music. Maultsby theorized that this White view of Black music as merely trendy probably derives from the continuous evolution of Black music. Because the music is always evolving, it doesn't maintain the stasis expected by whites. Black music is typically functional, serving the purpose of addressing specific social, cultural and aesthetic situations; as these situations change, the music changes.

Dr. Maultsby's main concern was to investigate how cultural and social forces influence Black popular music. By playing recordings of early Black church sermons, pointing out the important characteristics and then comparing them to the characteristics of early Black popular music, Dr. Maultsby underscored continuity. Both forms feature a prologue spoken in a deep monotone serving as an introduction, references to daily experiences, in creating intens repetition of phrases, and, as the pe reaches a climax, variety in inflectio rhythms and pitches of the "performe voice.



Maultsby offering cultural perspective. Photo by Anne Basting

Dr. Maultsby mentioned Sam and Da who wrote the song "Soul Man" which Blues Brothers re-popularized in th movie, as prime examples of the synthe between the church and popular music. played a recording of Sam saying, "Wh we perform, we have church," and point out that they measured their success by amount of audience participation th could stimulate, much as Black preache did.

Maultsby stresses that this tie audience participation is reflected in t Black idea that music making involv movement. As church choirs move up aisle to their risers, they don't march, th "step." Maultsby moved from behind podium and demonstrated what meant. She swayed as she moved towa the audience and ended with a twirl.

Maultsby ended the formal part of presentation by discussing Rap music its ties to the social, cultural and aesthe events in Black life today. Rhythm rhyming speech, audience participatio and large instrumental breaks are based traditional Black music. She explained h the audience break dances in response good rap music. She also related brea dancing to the church dance called Shout, which is spurred in the Black churc by a good sermon and good church musi

Dr. Maultsby then answered questio from the audience. She explained her vie of Jazz history and the recording indust her ideas of MTV, explained that electronic sounds of contemporary Bla music are, perhaps a closer approximati of the aesthetic ideal of African musi which is the basis of Black popular musi

CHRIS BEL

Sibeko Cites History of Apartheid Oppression

On Sunday evening, February 15, Elizabeth Sibeko spoke on the topic of South Africa in the Gates Common Room. As a former resident of South Africa, and as a representative of the PAC (Pan Africanist Congress), Sibeko expressed her views on the Apartheid government in general, on its policy of youth internment, and on the need for international divestment from South Africa.

Sibeko noted that the Apartheid government came to the spotlight in 1984, when government troops went into the ghettos to repress residential uprisings. But, she explained that the discriminatory policies that we associate with the South African government did not begin with this administration. Instead, their origins lie back in the 1500s, when the British colonized South Africa in search of gold and diamonds. The natives were enslaved and put to work in the mines. Sibeko targets this enslavement as the beginning of foreign exploitation in South Africa.

Sibeko believes that exploitation has increased over time. She stresses that today, native South Africans are faced with a struggle for the right of national self-determination, and that, the opposition has the upper hand. She cites the Apartheid government's extensive measures to solidify their holdings as evidence of the turmoil. Sibeko pointed out that 50 million blacks have been hearded onto 13% of the land, which is more or less infertile, while 4.5 million white people bask on the choicest 87% of South Africa. The ghettos, she explains, are surrounded by the military, and anyone who tries to leave them is gunned down. Black families being forced to live on these wastelands has caused South Africa to be marred by the highest infant mortality rate in the world. Sibeko describes the situation as being one in which "Mothers and their infants sit on the infertile land and wait day by day for their death."

Sibeko stressed the history of exploitation saying, "As people, we think of ourselves as having human and civil rights. In South Africa, we don't even dream about that, because we are not, and never have been, treated as human beings."

Sibeko describes the Apartheid government's repressive policy of youth interment. She explains that the government kidnaps children only five years old and does one of two things with them. They are either thrown in jail, or sent to camps where they are "reeducated." Children of that age are easily influenced, especially when held at gunpoint. The kids are then returned to their families, where they work to oppose traditional values and ways. According to a parents organization in South Africa, over 10,000 children are presently "missing." With reference to these tactics, Sibeko said, "We are looking at a regime that has gone amuck, it has gone crazy."

Sibeko advocates international divestment from South Africa. Japan, Germany, Great Britain, France, and the United States have all invested heavily in the South African economy. Sibeko views the extensive foreign investment of countries such as Japan, Germany, Britain, France & the U.S. in South Africa as direct aid to the government and its repressive policies. She says that, IBM has provided the computers that monitor every movement in the ghettos and that General Motors has provided cars and trucks that are converted into military vehicles and used to contain the blacks. Sibeko believes that divestment would aid the natives' cause in two ways. First, it would prevent tools such as military vehicles and computers from so easily being obtained by the government. Second, because the South African economy is largely supported by foreign investments, she believes that international divestment would cause general instability in an economy that is dominated by exploitive industries. Sibeko also observed that divestment has been proven not to hurt the investing countries, as they may simply make their investments elsewhere.

Sibeko believes that nations such as the US do not seem to be jumping onto the divestment bandwagon. Sibeko explained that, "Members of the United Nations are happy to verbally condemn South Africa, but they refuse to take positive action such as divestment." Public support, she says, may make the difference between whether or not the US divests. "Public opposition helped to bring on the withdrawal of troops from Vietnam. The same will work for divestment.

JOHN DUNCAN

Women's Concerns Committee Seeks Child Care Center

The Women's Concerns Commit headed by Prof. Carol Neel, has b lobbying for a proposed child care center be run by the school. The Board of Trust will decide on funding the center dur their next meeting in March. If appro the center will provide child care faculty, administration, support person and student-parents. The center would housed in the present student center Nevada Avenue.

The committee has also been helping selecting faculty for tenured positions examining each candidate's dosier conducting interviews, the commit recommends candidates to the hir board. The committee looks for candida who have previous experience promoting women's concerns or sh interest in doing so.

Anyone with concerns involving wom should contact either Prof. Neel or Ar Walls, the committee's stude representative.

Education in China: A Comparative

Monday night at 8:15 PM in the Loomis Lounge, Professor Li of Changsha University from the Peoples Republic of China lectured about education in China. Dividing his talk into three parts, Professor Li first noted the "invisible influence" of traditional Chinese arts such as music, literature, and painting on the education of the Chinese.

Next, Li discussed the code of behavior in Chinese schools. Classes lasted approximately 45 to 50 minutes. A two bell system signaled the beginning of class; the first bell summoned the students and the second bell summoned the instructor. During the arrival of the instructor the students were required to stand. The teacher might then question the students about the previous night's assignment. Unlike the American practice the teacher would conduct class from a sitting position using notes carefully inscribed on the blackboard. However, the greatest difference between the American and Chinese systems centered on class discussion. Chinese students were not allowed to ask questions during class. Instead, the teacher would ask the students questions either at the beginning or ending of class. At the conclusion of class the students were once again required to stand to pay their respect to their teacher.

According to Li, the teacher traditionally held an exalted position in Chinese society. However after the ascension of the Communists in 1949, teachers and other intellectuals were looked upon with suspicion. During the Cultural Revolution 1966-1976 radicals wrought "unprecedented" damage on the Chinese educational system. Like many others Professor Li was stripped of his position and required to serve as a janitor, a foundary worker and a carpenter. After the demise of the Gang of Four in 1976 the educational system began to recover and by 1980 it had recovered its vigor.

Professor Li Photo by Anne Basting

In the third part of his talk, Li outlined the three levels of the Chinese educational system. The first level was six years of primary school. The Chinese primary school experience was much more arduous than the primary years in America. The school year was 42 weeks long not including 4 weeks of review. Only ten weeks of vacation remained. The 24-27 hour course load of the Chinese primary school student was much more difficult than the load of his American counterpart. The curriculum consisted of Basics, (roughly analogous to Civics) Math, Geography, History, Music, Fine Arts, Physical Culture, and Chinese. Li believed that this load needed to be lightened.

The secondary level is split into three years of junior high school and three years of senior high school. In the former, the course load was 30-31 hours per week and the curriculum added Foreign Languages, Political Science, Chemistry and Biology. In senior high Music and Art was not offered and the work load was only 29 hours per week. Alternative secondary education included technical and professional schools. Continued on p. 6

BB Bean COFFEE

WHOLESALE/RETAIL COFFEE ROASTERS

Featuring: Daily Roasting of the World's Premium Green Coffees.

Student Aid: A La BB

Let us help you study with an easy stomach. BB Bean's varital roasts are notably smooth and gentle.

Experience the difference a quality bean freshly roasted to peak flavor can mean.

Brew the best for less... BB Bean offers specials discounts to CC students.

"Brew the Best: Brew BB"

475-2236

334 East Colorado Ave. at Wahsatch

Thanks CC For Your Great Response

Go CC DU ————!

Two For You™
FREE FLAVORED PIZZA CRUST
Original, Sesame, Buttered, Rye, Poppy Seed, Garlic

PIZZA	2 SMALL	2 MEDIUM	2 LARGE
Cheese Only	5.24	7.23	9.44
1 Item	6.07	8.17	10.48
2 Items	6.90	9.10	11.52
3 Items	7.73	10.04	12.56
Extra Items	.83	.93	1.04
Extra Cheese	1.46	1.88	2.40

– Pizza by the Slice ¼ of Medium Pizza 99 –

—ITEMS—
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Green Peppers, Onion, Bacon, Ground Beef, Italian Sausage, Black Olives, Mild Peppers – We Use 100% Real Mozzarella Cheese!

The Hungry Howies Special 8.51 10.76 14.12
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Green Peppers, and Onions. No Substitutes

Howie BREAD $1.04 Topped With Melted Cheese $1.61
A generous portion of Hot Buttered Garlic Bread topped with Parmesan Cheese

HOT SUBS

	Reg 6"	Large 12"
Meatball Sub With Melted Cheese, Parmesan, Special Sauce.	2.10	3.68
Pizza Sub Pizza Sauce, Pepperoni, and Cheese	1.73	3.10
Pizza Sub Deluxe Pepperoni, Ham, Mushroom, Mozzarella Cheese and Pizza Sauce	2.10	3.68
Pizza Sub Special Pepperoni, Ham, Mushroom, Onion, Green Pepper, Mozzarella Cheese, and Pizza Sauce.	2.21	3.89
Deluxe Combination Pepperoni, Sliced Ham, Mozzarella Cheese	2.10	3.68
Steak & Cheese	2.21	3.89
Steak, Cheese & Mushroom	2.36	4.15
Ham & Cheese	2.10	3.68
Cheeseburger Sub	2.10	3.68
Italian Sausage & Cheese	2.21	3.89
Vegetarian Sub	2.10	3.68

All Subs Listed Above include Lettuce, Tomato, Onion and Mild Peppers Italian Dressing on the Side

SALADS
Your choice of French, 1,000 Island, Buttermilk, Creamy Italian or Italian Dressings

Chef Salad Sm. 1.84 Lg. 2.99
Fresh crisp Lettuce, Tomatoes and Onions topped with Diced Ham, Mozzarella Cheese and Black Olives

Tossed Salad Sm. 1.25 Lg. 2.09
Lettuce and Tomatoes topped with a Black Olive. Your choice of Dressings.

Antipasto Salad Sm. 3.15 Lg. 6.04

Prices Subject to Change Without Notice

Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS

Hungry Howies

FREE FLAVORED PIZZA CRUSTS
• Original • Sesame Seed • Rye
• Buttered • Garlic • Poppy Seed

So Delicious You'll Be Tempted To Start Where You Used To Leave Off!

FREE PIZZA
BUY ONE — GET ONE FREE
of equal or lesser value
ALL PIZZAS COME TWO-FOR-YOU
PICKUP or DELIVERY
WITH THIS COUPON
Not Valid With Any Other Coupon
-ID • CC1

1625 B. W. Uintah
(Uintah Station)

--ATE --TWO --FOR --ONE
475-8 2 4 1

HOURS
MON thru THURS– 11 AM til 11 PM
FRI & SAT– 11 AM til MIDNIGHT
SUNDAY– 11 AM til 11 PM
Deliveries Start at 11 AM. Minimum Delivery Order $6.00 Limited Delivery Area

ASK FOR SPECIAL CC OFFER
Free qt. of pop with any order over $10
Expires 3/5/87

CCCAA Update

The Colorado College Community Against Apartheid is sponsoring a series of films that will be shown in the near future. These films are The Discarded People, to be shown on Monday, February 23, Crossroads/South Africa, to be shown on Tuesday March 3, and Witness to Apartheid, which will be shown on Thursday March 5. Each film will be shown at 7:30 pm in Olin 1. All are welcome to attend these events.

Last Tuesday the CCCAA and the Feminist Collective sponsored the film You Have Struck A Rock. This film focused on the resistance of South African women to the extension of the "pass laws," leading up to the year of 1962, with the Sharpeville massacre, the banning of political organizations, and the final imposition of the pass system on women. The Discarded People looks into the situation of the bantustans, or so-called "independent states" or "homelands." This film depicts life in these "reserves," showing the results of the forced resettlement of black people to the barren, overpopulated and disease-ridden homelands. Crossroads/South Africa provides an excellent historical background for the events of May 1986, when the homes of 60,000 were burned down and the remnants of the city of Crossroads demolished. Crossroads is an illegal squatters city that grew to at least 60,000 and possibly to an estimated 120,000 before its destruction in May 1986. Witness To Apartheid takes us into the townships to see the school children who face the violence of the South African system.

Heightening the awareness of the campus to the tragedy of the Apartheid system is one step towards the goal of the CCCAA, the total disinvestment of all of CC's funds which are currently invested in companies which do business in South Africa (about $12-16,000,000) The CCCAA has prepared a position paper outlining its position on CC's investment in these companies, and it will present this paper to the Board of Trustees of the Colorado College during their meeting on March 13 and 14. If anyone is interested in finding out more about the CCCAA they are welcome to attend our meetings, every Thursday at 6:00 pm in the upper Loomis lounge.

Photo of the Week

Photo by Ginny Bunker

Senior Events Slated For This Weekend

Seniors—mark your calendars for two great senior class events.

The February Senior Mixer will celebrate the final CC hockey home game of the season. The festivities will start at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 20th at the Red Lion Inn. (It's right off the Circle exit of I-25. Go west, and look across the street from Denny's.) We're even inviting the seniors from DU (cough, cough). So join us for drinks, pom-poms, and a great PRE-GAME WARM-UP PARTY!

From the Red Lion Inn we will travel straight to the Broadmoor Ice Rink. We've arranged for a special Senior Section in the stands. Face-off is at 7:35 p.m. Come show your senior and your CC spirit.

Another senior class event will remind us of four years ago. Do you remember Major Barbara? I'm sure that you recall the book we all read and discussed during our freshmen orientation. Well, it's time to reflect upon this great literary work again. Although we will not be able to organize the exact discussion groups that we had four years ago, we will have a similar organization. Don't worry Summer Starts and Transfers. There is a place in the groups for you too.

In addition to these discussions, we will also be viewing a slide-show called "A Place To Begin." The evening will be an opportunity to reflect on years past and to look forward to the future. All seniors are invited to partake in the activities, which include a free dinner, on Thursday, March 5th, at 5 p.m. in Gates Common Room.

ANITA WALLS

"Let's conduct ourselves Rekow."

What is the Political Union?

The Colorado College Political Union was organized several years ago to promote discussion and debate of current political issues. In true Liberal Arts spirit, we try to cover the full range of prevelent topics and to present various view-points. We achieve this by having weekly discussions and speakers. Meetings are normally held the first three Wednesdays of each block in Palmer 120, but to keep everyone on their toes this often changes. A typical block consists of one speaker, one intra-campus discussion, and one discussion with Air Force Academy cadets. First semester our speekers ranged from a representative of the ACLU to five experts on different areas of U.S.-Soviet relations as part of a week-long symposium. We also organized a trip to the Air Force Academy to hear Edwin Meese talk. Topics of discussions have ranged from the new tax bill, to terrorism, to Reagan's Iran-scam problems.

China continued from p.)

Nation wide entrance examination regulate admissions into China's 80 universities. Approximately 10% of hig school graduates are permitted to ente These students enjoy free tuition an room; they only have to provide for the food and books. In some universities eve these minimal costs are paid for by th government. China's upper educatio includes institutions specializing Engineering, Agriculture, Forestr Medical, Teacher Training, Busines Administration/Economics, Politica Science, Physical Culture, Arts, Foreig Languages, Minority Education, an Community Colleges.

Professor Li has been a frequent guest Professor Finley's Comparativ Communism class and he hopes partipate in Professor Cooks America Foreign Policy class and Professo Clauvel's Business Ethics course. Li is eage to meet students and he can be contacte through Professor Finley. He will be o campus until the end of March.

CHRIS MCNABB

Senior Recalls Drug Rehabilitation

Myths of rehab process dispelled

"Unquestionably, the scariest part for me was leaving." When CC senior Garth Fitzgerald left the Betty Ford Center for treatment of cocaine dependency in April, 1984, he realized that his biggest test was still ahead of him. "Once you stop using drugs you must learn to face your problems sober...and that's scary." Garth's stay at the center was merely the first step in a continuous process of self-realization. The story of his ongoing treatment for drug and alcohol dependency is an honest, enlightening account which clears up many of the common myths regarding the process of drug rehabilitation.

At one time or another in life everyone tries to escape from unpleasant reality. For many, drugs and alcohol offer an easy way out, a sort of artificial security which pushes aside the problems of life. For these people, escape takes the form of a good flash, followed by a hard crash. For some, the inevitable crash becomes so frightening that staying high begins to be the major priority in life. For Garth Fitzgerald staying high had gotten out of hand. "I know it sounds generic," he says, "but my life was falling apart."

To avoid his personal problems Garth was, during his Sophomore year, doing well over $100 of cocaine a day. He became detatched from his friends and family and would frequently lie to his parents. At the same time his relationship with his girlfriend was deteriorating. "I would be with her and realize that I would much rather be in my room doing lines," he remembers. Eventually he failed a class, a shock which was, in his words, "the culmination of a declining existence." "School has been my main priority in life," he states, "and suddenly I failed at that." This failure was the straw that broke the proverbial camel's back, and made Garth realize that he was no longer in control of his situation. And that he needed help.

The Betty Ford Center in Palm Springs, California has recently received much notoriety for having more celebrity guests than a two-hour Love Boat. Yet the "glamorous" image of the center belies the very serious ethic behind the treatment and the rehabilitation philosophy itself. Contrary to popular belief, drug rehabilitation is not a "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest" purgatory. There are no pills, brainwashings or shock treatments. The major therapeutic concept is interraction and discussion between patients and counselors, a process of dealing with problems which takes the place of deferring them through drugs. Every activity in the process is voluntary and there is no force implied whatsoever. Garth admits that he, too, was a little scared by the common misconceptions of rehab before entering the clinic, but that he had an even greater fear of not going: "I was more afraid of myself than the treatment," he claims. "I knew that facing myself without drugs to hide behind would entail a really big commitment." And it did.

Garth's daily routine at the center began with breakfast at 7:00 a.m. followed by hall clean-up and then a period of group meditation and relaxation. Afterwards came exercise (swimming, aerobics, etc.) followed by lectures from psychologists and doctors. Lunch at noon was followed by one hour of free time. Then from 2:00 p.m. till 5:00 p.m. the patients met in small discussion groups of 8. It is in these groups that the majority of the therapy takes place. "The theory is that you're there for other people and they're there for you," Garth says. Nothing is forced, but any kind of individual or anti-social behavior is actively discouraged. In fact if a patient refuses to talk or participate in the group sessions he might be asked to leave, as the principle of interaction between all participants is the crucial element in the success of the treatment.

"Being there was an incredible relief for me," says Garth. "It was a very clean, relaxed environment, and I was never forced to do anything I didn't want to do." There were basically only two rules of behavior at the center: Be everywhere on time and don't leave the grounds. If one does leave the premises they are advised not to bother coming back, as self-determination is the starting block for the process of treatment.

"The major therapeutic concept is interaction and discussion between patients and counselors."

Garth's 35-day stay at the center cost in the range of $150 a day, a reasonable rate considering other clinics, for example the facility on the 8th floor of Denver Mercy Hospital, costs in the neighborhood of $350 per day. There is a huge waiting list for admission to the center and, yes, movie stars do go there. "Tony Curtis was in my discussion group," says Garth. "He was really wrapped up in his image and didn't talk during discussions. I eventually asked him why he refused to talk and he gave some sort of evasive answer. I don't think he got anything at all out of the program."

During his stay at the center, Garth admits that he never felt better in his life. "I was living every day," he recalls. "I was eating well and exercising. I basically felt really alive." That feeling was enough to keep him totally sober for seven months. But when his problems eventually became too much to handle, he occasionally reverted back to drugs as his "savior." Strangely enough, such reversion is not at all uncommon. In fact, statistics show that only 1 in 50 rehab patients will never take drugs or drink again. Garth emphasizes that there are no cure-alls, and that the problems don't disappear when one stops doing drugs." Actually, they are there more than ever," he says, "in that one has to face them sober."

"Statistics show that only 1 in 50 rehab patients will never take drugs or drink again."

Yet one of the most important things which Garth realized in treatment is that drugs and alcohol aren't the problem, but rather they are the symptom. In rehab one learns an alternative process of dealing with problems, a process which acts as a substitute for drug usage. What the individual does with this knowledge after he/she leaves depends solely on that person's will to remain sober.

Jumping from the detoxified atmosphere of treatment into the CC environment and its inherent temptations presented an incredible change and an even bigger challenge for Garth. "At the center, you have friends who unconditionally love you and want to listen to your problems. That kind of relationship," he says, "is very rare here [at CC]." He states that the adjustment is much easier if one has something to supplement life with. For Garth this supplement has been attending NA (Narcotics Anonymous) and AA (Alcoholics Anonymous) support group meetings on a daily basis. The open discussions of these meetings act as an outlet for the emotions which would otherwise be dealt with through drugs. As with all rehab, nothing at AA or NA is forced, and the only requirement for membership is a "desire to stop using."

What one gets out of drug rehabilitation depends entirely on how much one is willing to put in. It's not a magic antidote which instantly relieves the problems of reality. For Garth the road to dealing with his problems and eventual recovery has been a long, ongoing process, but not one that has been without progress and valuable insight. "I'm at peace with myself now," he comments. "And that's where it all starts."

DAVID EVANS

the Stagecoach Inn
702 Manitou Avenue
On Fountain Creek in Manitou Springs

 A Special Offer **

25% off any dinner for two to six
Sunday through Thursday
Must bring in advertisement
Expires February 28, 1987

Reservations 685-9335
Banquet Facilities
On All Occasions

SKYWAY VIDEO
Rentals & Sales
577-9047
Hours:
Monday-Thursday
10:30-7
Friday & Saturday
10:30-8
Closed Sunday

- Foreign Films (Excellent Selection)
- Classic Films
- Operas
- Musicals

As well as an extensive selection of

- Current Releases

— No Club Or Membership Fees —
Tuesday Special - $1.49 Rentals
Sunday Rentals - Free

Skyway Plaza • S. 8th & Arcturus
(feel free to call for directions)

Check out
The MATHIAS
MINI-MART
NOW OPEN
Sunday-Thursday
7:00 PM-11:00 PM
Next to Mathias Desk

Living the Baca Grande Experience Cont.

Continued from p. 1

devil, leaving all that much more for me to drink. But since Adolph Coors already had my money, my friends seemed to agree that the damage was done and we shouldn't worry about it any more. By the time I finished my first beer, the rest were gone.

After class Tuesday morning, we decided it was time to officially begin our exploration of this new world. Reyes Garcia, a CC professor, inhabitant of the San Louis Valley, and on location coordinator of the CC Baca Grande campus, piled us into his jeep and took us deep into Baca land to the Lyndisfarne Spiritual Retreat. At this early point in the week, it was still a mystery to us that there was a very strong and very real spirituality throughout the valley.

"The central force at Lyndisfarne is their Temple of Peace...it has attracted spiritual leaders from as far away as Tibet."

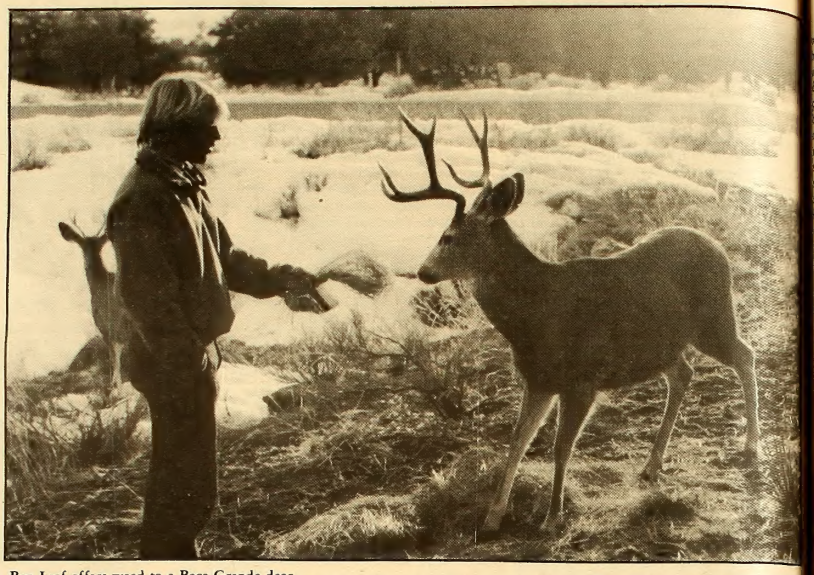
Lyndisfarne is higher up in the mountains than we had been, and there is a beautiful view from the house of the Sand Dunes dwarfed beneath Blanca, Elingwood, and Little Bear, three of the seven fourteen thousand foot peaks in the area.

The central force at Lyndisfarne is their Temple of Peace. A series of architectual workshops were held at the retreat to construct the temple in the form of a Pythagorean Sphere. The chapel consists of the wooden dome over the earthen floor, a circle of contemplation and peace lit by a sky-light from above and the flicker of the Hiroshima Flame from its center. It has attracted spiritual leaders from as far away as Tibet to come and meditate in the chapel. There is a deep inescapable understanding of peace as the silence of the chapel fills the valley. You could stay there forever.

It was getting late as we left Lyndisfarne, but we thought we'd drop by the Carmolite Catholic Monastery on the way. As we drove onto the property we saw a sign that very clearly indicated this was not a visiting hour, but we didn't see the harm in driving through to take a quick look.

We saw the chapel from the parking lot, and it offered us another spectacular view of the San Louis Valley, rolling like Kansas seventy-five miles across to the mountains and one hundred and fifty miles up and down between mountains. I had no sooner cautiously raised my camera to get a picture than a monk came bounding over the hill on his snow-mobile. We were all a little nervous, none of us being experienced with monks in the mountains, but he turned out to be very friendly and invited us to go inside and see the chapel. His name was Father Dave.

We finally headed home, hungry for dinner, but were stopped on the road by a vision of venison. We quietly slowed the car down and took a picture of six deer on the side of the road getting a bite to eat in the early evening. We bravely stepped out of the car to see if we could get a closer picture, and through a series of maneuvers we found ourselves surrounded by deer.



Ben Leaf offers weed to a Baca Grande deer.

There were six of them. There were six of us. We had spent the day in one chapel or another, but nothing could touch so deeply within us as the acceptance reflected in the eyes of the six.

Wednesday was the day we finally began to settle in at the Baca. The surge of energy we had felt with the release of the pressures we dealt with back in Colorado Springs had quieted down a bit and we were more able to relax and savor the environment. We took walks into town and visited Crestone's only other business establishment, the grocery store, giving them more business in fifteen minutes than they were probably accustomed to having in a week.

I took Frank Snider up on the beer he had offered me. He was working when I found him, trying to put into place his new hundred gallon fuel tank. He told me that he had never had a problem with his car running out of gas, but there was always somebody in town on a Sunday night trying to get to Denver by Monday morning looking for a 7-11 on an empty tank with a wife that just couldn't warm up to the idea of getting on the horse and riding forty miles to Alamosa to pick up a few gallons.

"There is a deep inescapable understanding of peace..."

The snow came down from the mountains that night, and we walked out into it looking for the top of a hill we never found. By the time we started back it was already getting hard to see the tracks we had left behind.

The sun came back on Thursday, and there didn't seem to be anything better than sitting on the deck of the condo in a t-shirt and sunglasses listening. I really don't know if I'd ever been anywhere so quiet. Even the mountains have the music of the water and the trees in the breeze. But the only sound to hear in the valley was the faint echo of the snow melting in the sun.

A few of us grabbed the snowshoes and headed up into the mountains north of town. It was late in the afternoon, and we were running out of sun. We went as far as the sun lead us, looking for a spot out of the trees to sit back for a while, finding it at the base of a great rock mountain. Something seemed to be pulling us upward, and had it not been that we were holding on to the last fading rays of warmth, we might have kept on going. We sat for a bit, not saying much, and then walked back down the mountain into the cooling shadows.

"...the only sound to hear in the valley was the faint echo of the snow melting in the sun."

We got back in time to see Bill Russ Lee, a Navajo artist who had come to talk to our class about his work. He spoke of the strong connection his people had with the land. As he talked about the power that his art drew from that land, I realized that it was this same power that had pulled me up that mountain and filled me full with its energy as I came back down.

"I left with a feeling that I had done more in that past week than I generally ever did in a week."

It was hard to leave on Friday. There was too much inertia to overcome. We stayed around hours after we were supposed to leave, lingering in the sun, considering leaving an open window we could sneak back in through for the weekend.

I left with a feeling that I had done more in that past week than I generally ever did in a week. It was hard to put my finger on just what had been accomplished, but it was a feeling that grew with every passing mile marker.

We drove for an hour and a half before seeing a single car traveling in our direction, and that car was turning around in Salida when we saw him. The further we went the more traffic we saw and the more invaded I felt. The realities of leaving our retreat and heading back to civilization pierced my vision with every pair of headlights splattered in my face.

"A peace greater than the mountains and more powerful than the desert."

I don't know if any of us really realized we had been gone until we got back. It showed on our faces. We came home wearing shock on our faces, but it was a shock of laughter, not of fear. The sudden outlet of a peace we had found. A peace greater than the mountains and more powerful than the desert. As deep as the eyes of a curious young deer. And as sensitive as a jack-a-lope hidden in the snow, his nose twitching with a tell-tale breeze.

OWEN PERKINS

Speakers Condemn Modern Technological Progress

Students attend Meadowcreek Project

Rarely is the introduction of a new technology questioned. Oddly enough even high-risk technology is thoroughly accepted. After the Bhopal and Chernobyl disasters, experts laid blame on certain policy decisions or specific design failures but nobody questioned whether we really need the kind of technologies that were responsible. The explosion of the space shuttle Challenger has become a tool for symbolically rededicating ourselves to the same technology. Over and over we read or hear people say, "It was horrible...but we must go on." The next shuttle launch was scheduled to have a substantial amount of plutonium on board.

The nightmarish consequences of dangerous high-risk technologies as well as less news worthy consequenses of modern technology such as CO^2 induced climatic change, ozone depletion, soil loss, ground water contamination, massive de-forestation, etc. have led many to reconsider the visions of modern technology. A profusion of technology crisis, as well as appropriate and alternative technology theorists are beginning to seep into the political arena. Alternative technology projects with roots in sustainable energy systems and organic agriculture, are popping up around the country. One such facility is the Meadowcreek Project located in the Ozark mountains of Arkansas. This January, Meadowcreek sponsored a seminar entitled "Technology and the Human Future." Undaunted by the immensity of the subject or the overwhelming importance of many of the speakers involved, three CC students made their way to Arkansas, two with the help of the Venture Grant Committee, for the first three weeks of Block Five.

Meadowcreek Project is situated in a small temperate Ozark valley. It is surrounded by short, rounded, heavily forested mountain with high sandstone chimneys crumbling down onto the flat farm land. A short hike up any of these mountains exposes a small winding creek lined by red oaks and the patchy patterns of the rotated grass and crop land. There are grassy benches halfway up the sides of the slopes where blackberries and grapes are grown. The conference center and dorms are beautifully designed, light brown, wooden buildings. The buildings are made of simple materials but stick out in complex symmetric shapes to gather the sun's light. Black passive solar pannels cover large areas of the roofs. The buildings seem wedged into the landscape. Rows of garden vegetables, dormant berry bushes and grape vines run all around the buildings and straight up to the panes of the conference center's entrance and greenhouse where tropical plants grow year round. The inside of the buildings are colder than most people are used to—except in the afternoon when the sun is out in full force. It has large, rough stone walls and fireplaces near the windows to retain heat. The walls and partitions are gapped to allow air and consequently noise to flow throughout.

We arrived at Meadowcreek the first Sunday of January. In the afternoon we were introduced to the permanent staff headed by David and Winston Orr, ex-political science professor and ex-electrical engineer respectively. In attendance were about twenty-five other students, mostly from Oberlin. That night we discussed Marlowe's Faust and Mary Shelley's Frankenstein. Our schedule for the next three weeks was regimented into morning and evening discussions, reading hours, and afternoon workgroups. Meadowcreek is located ten miles from Fox, which has a population of 200 and is in the middle of Stone County, one of the few remaining dry counties in the country.

The first speaker was Langdon Winner, ex-Rolling Stone reporter, professor in the Department of Science and Technical Studies at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, and author of Autonomous Technology and The Whale and the Reactor. His presentation was on "Progress and Frontiers." Winner's first discussion was about a uniquely American aspect of progress. Winner argued that Americans have a psychological dependence on "frontiers." The idea began with the Puritans who preached that their followers would be re-cleansed or redeemed by relocation to new, uncorrupted lands. The idea carried over in the "conquest" of the West. Continental frontiers disappeared and in this century have been replaced by the "Frontiers of Science." This last frontier has no boundries and excludes limitations. Winner said, "It's like a prolonged childhood." The most recent frontier is in war technology. The real name for "Star Wars" is the "New Frontier." The most horrific "frontier" is the military's real-life pursuit of Frankenstein's monster. Winner stated that military research in artificial intelligence and genetic engineering is trying to merge machine and human in order to develop the most efficient attack systems. They have reduced humanity to a set of laws. Winner disparingly concluded that "humanity and technology are becoming merged. At last we are both the pioneers and the frontiers!"

Winner talked in depth about the possibilities for a new understanding of progress. He proposed, in very vague terms, that there are ways to turn "good ideas on the abstract level into good structural designs which can reflect those philosophies in aesthetic, timeless and appropriate forms." Winner said these forms should be part of everything from political structures to specific engineering methods. He introduced his own proposal for a new understanding of progress and technical development. He calls it the "Discipline of Political Ergonomics." Simply stated, it is a theory of action based on classical democratic values designed around people and providing limits when necessary. The term ergonomics comes from an engineering method used when designing technological components that are built around the human frame, like a chair or keyboard.

Another noted speaker at the seminar was Jack Doyle from the Environmental Policy Institute and author of Altered Harvest. Doyle focused on genetics and agriculture. He said that the development of genetic engineering has been haphazard. In the early 1970's, when the potential for genetic manipulation was newly discovered, many scientists agreed to take part in a voluntary moratorium on research until some of the obvious health risks could be assessed. In 1975 at the second Asilomar Conference the moratorium was dropped in favor of a loose set of containment guidelines. The more profound political questions connected with bio-technologies were left more or less untouched. Doyle asked, "What happened to the question of whether we should even allow a techology which has the capability to change the physical structure of the living world?"

In 1980 Boyer and Cohen cloned interferon. The same year the Diamond-vs-Chakerbady case decided that everything from plants to specific DNA could be patented. This allowed Cohen and Boyer to patent their biological creations and set up the world's first genetic engineering company. On the first day of Genetic Co., stock sales netted record profits. The future direction of biotechnology was put in the hands of competitive, profit—oriented business. Forms of life became a commodity.

Today a myriad of bio-technological products are becoming available to farmers. "Ice Minus" which lowers the frost point for plants, and the "Bovine Growth Hormone" which increases the productivity of a cow's milk production are two such products. Doyle said that the introduction of some of the more potentially destructive products are being fought in court, but that it is only making a dent in the industry. Large companies like DuPont and Monsanto are now part of the race. Doyle believes that new bio-technologies will only intensify "centralization, dangerous chemical use, monoculture, and long-term damage of the Green Revolution." Doyle said, "It's insane to develop a very dangerous high-tech hormone, like the Bovine Growth hormone, to increase a cow's milk production when there has been a milk surplus for years."

"Americans need to re-arrange the nation's priorities, not shove computers down kids' throats."

Richard Harwood from Windrock International discussed some of the more successful organic agriculture and perma-culture projects which Windrock sponsors around the world. Charles Perrow, sociologist at Yale University, discussed his book Normal Accidents which uncovers the systemic reasons for the use of "high risk" technologies.

One of the most popular speakers was Joseph Weizenbaum from the Dept. of Computer Science at M.I.T. and author of Computer Power and Human Reason. Weizenbaum believes that computers are having an adverse impact on the mindset of our times. "Computer illiteracy," he said, "is thought to be a mental deficiency but has really been invented by 'medicine makers' with huge stocks of medicine." Weizenbaum argued that there are questions science cannot and should not attempt to anwer. "Knowledge is not always better than ignorance." Even the greatest mathematical models, like his own artificial intelligence program, leave out most of reality. Weizenbaum insisted that the more we rely on computers the more they will become a logical straightjacket and the less we will understand what it means to be human.

One of the most interesting topics discussed with Weizenbaum was computers in education. The education system is pushing computers down students' throats. Weizenbaum believes it is just as wrong to push computers down children's throats as it would be to push pianos. Only a very few people will ever be creative programmers and these few will be primed for MIT and go on to work for the military. He said that computers do more to passify and homogenize children then empower them. Weizenbaum believes that there is no reason to have to know how to use our program computers because computers are becoming components of everyday life. Humans have no need to know how to program a computer to start a microwave or use a wordprocessor. Weizenbaum pointed out that there are more electric motors than people in the world and only a small amount of people design and fix them.

Weizenbaum dismissed IBM's Write to Read program, which teaches young people to read and write with computers, as a slick motivational device or technological fix. "It's not the motivation we need to fix...we could do that with cocaine!", he said sardonicly, "...it's how we make the underlying reasons for learning to read and write." Weizenbaum believes there is an intimate relationship between Military spending and 'why Johnny can't read.' He said Americans need to rearrange the nation's priorities, not shove computers down kid's throats.

Ex-ad man Jerry Mander, made famous by his book Four Arguments for the Elimination of Television, came to talk on his new work about the cultural destruction caused by the recent introduction of TV to Indians in the Northwest Territory.

John Todd, founder of New Alchemy and Ocean Arks International illustrated some of the "soft" technology projects he has been developing: From solar heat storage tanks, which also serve as high yield fish nurseries with vegetables growing on top, to sewage purification facilities that mimic the natural purification systems of marshes.

Gary Coate from the Dept. of Architecture at KSU and author of Resettling America showed up to talk about the possibilities for culturally meaningful and ecologically efficient architecture. Pat Norton the recently ousted head of the Louisiana Department of Environmental Protection was the last speaker at the conference and talked about political involvement and environmentalism.

The last couple of days at Meadowcreek were spent reviewing each speaker and trying to draw some kind of synthesis. We decided that most of the speaker's specific criticisms of technology contained an extreme sense of urgency. Every speaker had a powerful and disparaging critique of modern "technological progress." The criticisms ranged from obvious condemnation of war technology or socially destructive everyday technology like television and computers, to capital intensive high-risk technology like nuclear energy and chemical agriculture. The prescriptions for change ranged from esoteric hopes for "new awakenings," "political redirections," and "paradigm shifts," to possibilities for individual political action. Langdon Winner told us that "the field is open, you all might have a good book in you." He also acknowledged that criticism is not much better than apathy. Even the most hopeful of, the speakers recognized that real change will take a major redirection in our understanding of technical progress.

In the end we took refuge in an idea Wendell Berrey wrote about in his short essay called "Solving for Pattern." In very simple terms he proposes that problems must be solved in ways which do not bring about even more complex problems. He believes we employ too many "quick-fixes" or, in more relevant terms, "tech-fixes" which proliferate underlying problems and set the pattern for the introduction of endless technological remedies. Berrey proposes a simple and seemingly logical goal: solve for pattern by making decisions about which kinds of technologies and systems could sustain themselves and adequately provide for peoples' needs. More than simply being a support system for people who leave the mainstream, the Meadowcreek Project and similar organizations, provide the arena for making the kind of "sustainable" policy decisions that are needed to begin "solving for pattern."

PATRICK LEDGER AND MARY BARTOS

A Nice Place to Visit, But . . .

A Tale of Two Cities

Sioux City: "Can't knock it too bad."

Sioux City, Iowa—Most of the people I've talked to haven't the slightest idea of what Iowa is like or where it even is. I have been asked (many times!) what state Iowa is in! I think I have heard all the Iowa jokes there are! In case you are wondering, NO- I DO NOT live on a farm and I DO NOT drive a pick-up truck! Believe me, there are many places in Iowa like that (a lot of farm country!) but Sioux City is an actual city.

It is definitely not the hot spot of America for night life, or anything else for that matter. Nevertheless, I have managed to have some fun, great times there. One thing Sioux City has got going for it is a bar called The First Edition—it has the best Long Island Ice Teas I've ever had the nightlife is not really happening. Really the only thing to do is go out to the bars. The few that my friends and I from home frequent are pretty much dives. They are comparable to Murph's (a couple don't even measure up to Murphs!) but can be a great time with a fun group of people. I could easily go out at 8:00 and stay out till the places close and only spend about ten dollars. Things just aren't that expensive.

Sioux City is not an industrial city either but it is the home of Jolly Time Popcorn (check the bag!) and it has one of the largest beef packing plants in the country. (Yea!) Also, the Taco Johns there is the highest profitting Taco Johns in the country. (Strike up another one for Sioux City!)

The best thing about Sioux City is that that is where my family and Golden Retriever are. There are also a group of people I went to high school with that I keep in pretty close touch with that are great. The people there are generally pretty nice and friendly. At the end of this summer I was out for brunch at the country club (yes, we do have one of those) and Gopher from the Love Boat was at the table next to us. He was super nice. It is hard to believe that he is a Congressman from our state! He lives in Sioux City about a block down from our house.

The summers in Sioux City are HOT! It can get up in the nineties and hundreds with eighty percent, sometimes one hundred percent humidity—NOT too comfortable. The winters get cold, and usually snows a lot. One of the things used to do in the snow was get a bunch people and a car and go screechin (midwest term for grabbing onto a bumpe and sliding down the street on your feet

There's not a whole lot to say abo Sioux City. It's definitely not a place yo want to vacation at and I personally would not want to live the rest of my life the but it was a great place to grow up and it home so I can't knock it too bad!

D. HEIDMAN

Colo. Spgs: Gen. Palmer, rocks and 29¢ burgers

Colorado Springs — the city, the people, the "image." Land of passion, glamour and 29¢ hamburgers. We have seen the best minds of our generation degenerate in front of auto-tellers and Slurpee machines. AWAKEN! AWAKEN! come along friends and step inside Palmer's Playground.

Historical Note: In the 1870's General William Jackson Palmer founded the metropolis of Colorado Springs. His gaze still rests upon the proud inheritors of the Palmer legacy. He sits atop his trusty horse, Norad, on the renowned lanes of Nevada Avenue.

Let us go then, you and us, while the daylight is spread out against the bus...behind the vivacious veneers of Colorado Springs. INQUIRING MINDS WANT TO KNOW!!!

Find your social activist self at Mostly Skin's (a name that sounds vaguely pornographic and visceral). Clad in red suede jumpsuits, protestors chant daily, "Naughty, Naughty Capitalists" from behind a makeshift beaver dam.

Colorado Springs is also home to the Jinx Cocktail Lounge Hall of Fame.

Hmmm, wonder who won all those trophies? The Jinx Cocktail Lounge football team—"Jinx's Sphinx's?" You can often times spot a veteran wide receiver weaving his old pass pattern—down and out. Ooops—diving catch over a park bench.

If you think the Albany Hotel clientel is bored, look again! For just next door, furry Alpacha cone-heads come and go, speaking of Giardia at the Mountain Chalet.

Camera pans to the Garden of the Gods. Our heros, clad only in Patagonia windbreakers and purple shoelaces, are locked in desperate, orgiastic struggle with the giant red rocks—Unngh!

Hang ten you pavement poundin puppies! The next wave is Wave Rave. It's tidal, it's tough! These Tejon tykes put Dweezil Zappa to shame, mind you. Watch our Mark Goodwin and Martha Quinn.

And what about Fulla Ballooney? Is it really a front for the Mob and/or Manitou Springs Satanists?

And don't forget to visit "The International Cafe" where one can enjoy green vinyl swivel stools and ponder the extensive menu—SALAD.

Of course there's the ever-popular Mikael's (roses, balloons, bagels and more!) situated conveniently by the College Shoe-Time-Drug Store and Funeral Home.

Aaah Yes! The Spirit of Palmer!

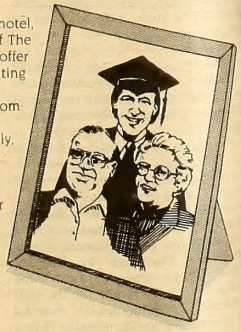
Stay tuned next week as we venture into the bowels of "The House of Guns."

SAND SHEFF AND LISA BETTY

Photo Special! Every Monday!
coupon
FREE SECOND SET OF PRINTS
Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!
This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon.
Limited time offer. Offer in effect Mondays only.
819
Kodak Colorwatch System
Kodak Ektachrome Film 200
WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!
College Pharmacy
833 North Tejon • 634-4861

THE ANTLERS HOTEL
Colorado Springs, Colorado
Picture yourself at The Antlers Hotel for graduation.
Colorado Springs' finest...for only $60!
The Antlers...Colorado Springs' only Four-Star, Four-Diamond hotel, located just nine blocks south of The Colorado College, has a special offer for families and friends of graduating students.
- Single or double occupancy room rate of only $60
- A portrait of graduate and family, compliments of The Antlers
- Complimentary valet parking

Call Cynthia at The Antlers for reservations...we'll make this special event picture perfect!



4 S. Cascade Avenue
Chase Stone Center
Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903
(303) 473-5600
(800) 232-2323
Operated by The Broadmoor Management Company
Mobil Travel Guide 1986
Four Diamond Award 1986
©1987 The Antlers

Editors Note—

Through my 2½ years at this college, a great change has been taking place. No longer is this school filled with individuals who enjoy learning in a growing intellectual climate; rather it has became a haven for those searching for a degree rather than an education. Activism at Colorado College spurns conscientious debate to focus on hollow gestures which fail in activism's most important responsibility: education. Why is it that most of the responses this section receives from its readers are with the exception of letters from Inger Thompson and Toby Abel who continue to engage in an increasingly interesting debate with Victor Greto) promoted only by cynical stabs from a columnist or the ratings of a fame hungry senior. This week a letter demands that the Catalyst restrain from printing an article that compromises our commitment to quality. But how, I answer, can you expect me to NOT print the article that is by and above motivates the brain-dead mass of this college to pick up a pen and respond? Where, Sir, is your response to Dave Makerechian's article on "Radical Environmentalism and Radical Libretarianism," or Michael S. Mehan's fine column? As the role of this section is to provide an open forum for opinions of the CC community, your criticism of the Catalyst is unwarrented, while intelligent criticism of the articles is welcomed.

I do not claim that this section is the only open forum on this campus, there is also the Disparaging Eye. The Eye was founded by Jim Lasko and Dan Engster with assistance from Liz Cheney, Peter Scott, and myself. It originated with a purpose. That purpose was to provide an alternative forum for political discussion not given proper attention by Cutler Board's two existing periodicals. Through the last year and a half the Eye has stressed quality, attempted to maintain ideological balance, all while fulfilling our original objective: to stimulate political thought on a campus that has become increasingly dichotomized between activists and apathetics.

An Associate

Editor insists that a sports page is essential in a journal of social thought. I disagree. Yes sports may be essential in a journal of general interest, as the Eye is now called; but what the present editors fail to understand is that the Eye has a specific function for which it was chartered. Movie reviews and "the hype of yet another big event" have no place in such a periodical. The Eye should not become an alternative Catalyst for an exclusive group of Greeks. Diversity is the key to success for the Eye, but it seems that the present editors have yet to reach out for alternative viewpoints. The criticism of a newspaper filled with "stuffiness, dryness and overall dullness" is well taken. But our goal was not to entertain, but to inform with different perspectives on specific issues of immediate importance.

Munir Meghjee

Peter Scott Alec Rekow

Kathy Mahoney Dean Campbell Mike Fraterelli

Honor Code Revisited

To the Editor:

Having recently read the Catalyst article entitled "The Honor Council: Some Misconceptions Cleared Up," we feel that having been tried it is our duty to inform the student body of how the Honor Code and Honor Council really work. Although we were not convicted, we were extremely disheartened when we were exposed to the inner workings of the Honor System. Our malcontent stemmed from the manner in which the professor handled the situation to the way in which the Honor Council treated the case. The following is an account of what happened. Bear in mind that the Constitution of the Honor System does not allow us to reveal anything about the actual trial.

On the first Friday of fourth block we were told by our professor that we were being referred to the Honor Council for alleged cheating on a homework assignment. That afternoon, not exactly sure what the implications of this were, we met with our professor to discuss the allegations. At this time we talked with the professor at length, explaining how we had obviously misunderstood how the Honor Code applied to these particular assignments. Our professor acknowledged that a misinterpretation of the syllabus could have occurred, however, we were still referred to the Honor Council.

Our professor informed us that the Honor Council would contact us within a few days. For the next two and a half weeks we waited and waited and waited . . . During this time we had a chance to review the Constitution of the Honor System and learn Article IV, Section 1, Paragraph B. There it says, "The accused student will be notified of the charge in a letter delivered in person by the investigating member of the Honor Council." This letter never arrived. A second meeting with our Professor left us with the impression that the Honor Council would not be pursuing this case. Fourth block ended and Christmas break began, and we had yet to hear from the Honor Council.

Fifth block began and there was still no word from the Honor Council. On the second Sunday, during the AFC Championship game, the phone rang. Much to our surprise, it was a member of the Honor Council informing us that we had a meeting the next day. But where was our leter? Is this Article IV, Section 1, paragraph B? On Monday our questions were answered. We were separately notified that we had a choice of pleading guilty or not guilty. We chose to plead not guilty. At that time we were each handed half a sheet of loose leaf paper with the official charge handwritten on it. This was our letter. Three more days passed until the trial. Unfortunately we cannot tell you about the trial, since it was truly an interesting experience. The verdict of not guilty came through two hours after the trial. Six weeks after our ordeal had begun, it ended.

The most disturbing part of this experience is the lack of organization and communication in such a serious matter. After all, each time a student is brought to trial, that student's future is on the line. This was a case of a Professor not understanding the principle workings of the Honor Coucil, the Honor Council not acting promptly and in accordance with their own constitution, and a lack of communication between the Professor and the Honor Council. If this is the way the Honor System is going to operate at the Colorado College, then we feel the need for the Administration to seriously investigate the value of the Honor System. Frankly, we feel the Honor System (as it operates now) is a farce.

Signed,
Michael Borchetta
Paul Marsilio

Not a Good Issue

To the Editor:

Occasionally, I send an issue of The Catalyst to our friends and colleagues at the Hochschule Luneburg in Germany to keep them abreast of ongoings at CC. Also, eight of their students and two staff members will be at the College during Block Seven, so The Catalyst should be a good introduction to CC. But I will not send them your February 13 Valentine issue. That issue contains, together with some very good opinion and feature articles, the grossly vulgar and juvenile Valentine "centerfold." To send it to Luneburg would be personally embarrassing to me and it is not, I'd like to think, representative of CC. Or is it? Is the Valentine issue characteristic of a double identity at CC: for some a serious academic institution that promotes intelligence and good taste, but for others a playground at which spoiled adolescents practice their mistaken notions of freedom? Does The Catalyst really need to play both sides? What do you think the CC image should be, and how will it be reflected in future issues?

Sincerely,
—Dirk Baay
Professor of German

To the Editor:

Remember Mark Thesing's column last semester telling us which sororities' members were bitches? Truly offensive, wasn't it? Well, Mr. Thesing has done it again, this time by perpetrating false myths about gay people and contributing to homophobia in today's society. Thesing's statement to his grandmother in last week's column suggests that gays tend to favor orgies as a means of sexual interaction with others. This is no more true of gays than it is of straights. It is particularly disappointing to see Mr. Thesing mention that the "Colorado College Homosexual Collective" sponsors these orgies. It seems that, through insinuation, he's taking a potshot specifically at Out and About, the gay rap group at CC.

Mr. Thesing may claim that the kind of statement he made was intended only as humor. It's hard to take it lightly, though, when that kind of "humor" perpetrates myths that encourage discrimination against fellow human beings. The kind of humor used by Mr. Thesing last week does real damage to the lives of a lot of people.

Not only does the article offend, it shows a serious lack of quality in the Catalyst. If there's nothing better to print, shorten the newspaper instead of wasting resources and giving space to such garbage. What kinds of standards, if any, does the Catalyst have? Will Mr. Thesing and the Catalyst begin to think about what they print, or will they tell themselves that it doesn't really make any difference?

Last week the editors apologized for errors made in a news article the week before. Something similar from Mr. Thesing and the editors is appropriate in this situation:

"We sincerely regret the damage done by the article. We have no excuses for this blatant lack of concern for others in the community and complete lack of quality in our journalism. We will make sure that this does not happen again, especially with respect to an important issue like this."

How about it, Catalyst?

Sincerely,
Eric S. Johnson

The opinions of the columnist are their own, and do not necessarily reflect those of the Editorial Staff. Therefore we feel no such apology is necessary.

—The Editors

THE COLORADO COLLEGE

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETE LOACH, News Editors
DAVE EVANS & ANNE MANHART, Features Editors
MUNIR MEGJHEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
•
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETE SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
•
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
•
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Cutler Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 extension 675. The Catalyst is published monthly from September to May, except during holiday periods.

Colorado College affirms its policy that does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its education programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local law.

Editorials appearing on the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 100 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Russell Center, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

A work of considerable length may be submitted as a guest commentary. Persons interested in submitting commentary should contact the Catalyst at 632-4990 or 473-2233 ext. 675.

The Catalyst reserves the right to edit or cut letters to the editor and guest commentaries.

OPINIONS

Hockey Defended

To the Editor:

Mike Fraterelli's commentary on the frustrating Tiger season ("On Hockey," 13 February) raises a very troubling question: How is it possible for a team — any team — to lose so many close contests? One feels compelled almost to return to Greek myth for anything remotely comparable: How many times did Sisyphus get within a goal of reaching the mountain top, only to watch the puck roll back down again?

But the commentary draws some conclusions to. which I would take exception. CC does not win, we are told, because it "lacks a winning tradition." How then, one wonders, do teams like Rensselaer Polytechnic and Harvard get to the NCAA Division I finals and (in the case of RPI) win the national championship? N — "lack of tradition" just doesn't wash.

What then of the "lack of personel(sic)" cited as another factor in the team's difficulties this year? Were NHL coaches collectively hallucinating when they drafted some of this year's Tigers (Rob Doyle/Red Wings; Marty Ketola/Penguins; Scott Schneider and Gord Whitaker/Jets; Cal Brown/Whalers; Doug Clarke/Canucks; Doug Kirton/Devils)? And how about the Tigers who were named WCHA "Player of the Week" this season: Defenseman Scott Campbell and netminder Derek Pizzey (twice)? The commentary did correctly point out that "every CC hockey player is...a competent Division I player," however it failed to add that some are among the best, and made no mention of the group of superachievers who have played way beyond themselves in contributing to some of the team's memorable victories.

The frustration for this team is that they are good and anybody who watched them beat No. 1-ranked North Dakota and Wisconsin at the Broadmoor knows just how good they can be. So talk of switching divisions in the case of a team that has played head-to-head with the best teams in the country (don't forget those last two scintillating periods against Hockey East leading Boston College) seems, at best, premature.

The problem, of course, is that, while this team has indeed beaten the best, they have also been hit over the head with that one-goal 2x4 a few times too often. No team deserves that. And this year's players certainly didn't.

But the question now should not be which division to run and hide in, but rather how the Tigers can become the hockey team they are capable of being. In my judgement, there is a place for the pursuit of excellence in many endeavors at a liberal arts college. And I would find it deeply disappointing that aspiring to excellence as a college athlete would come to mean accepting the status of "meat on the hoof" at a mega-university. At a time when the ethical responsibility of major academic institutions to their athletes is being more carefully scrutinized than ever before, liberal arts institutions like CC have an obligation to continue to promote the sana in corpore sano. It is heartening to note, in this regard, that last year 8 of the 15 players on the team were named to the WCHA all-academic team (3.0 GPA with participation in 50% of games scheduled).

The classical ideal, though, does include a pursuit of excellence on the playing field as well as in the classroom. And what should be asked is: What will it take to have Tiger hockey players join their women's soccer counterparts in a national championship?

More support from the college community might help. Even at the Wisconsin game ("spirit night"), there were times when one could have sworn that the Broadmoor was in Madison. Of course, that is the catch-22 of every athletic program: How to fill the seats when the team is losing. But I have no doubt that a winning Tiger team will fill the World Arena.

One important observation made in the editorial is that the hockey program does provide "significant contact" with the Colorado Springs community. With the growth of youth hockey programs in the Pikes Peak region (YAL, PPAHA), it is difficult to predict just how great an impact a winning Tiger team could have on young players in the area. It might eventually even help eliminate the handicap of being in a "state short of hockey talent."

I don't know why the Tigers experienced the frustration they did this year. Some point to the heartbreaking OT losses in Madison which seemed to crush the spirit of a team that had begun the season so well. I don't know. But I do know that individuals can be inspired or challenged to achieve beyond even their own expectations, and that, for example, magic was once worked to transform a losing Green Bay team into a football legend.

So, rather than dwell on this year's frustations, or use them as a basis to propose sweeping and unwarranted changes in what is, after all, a fifty year-old CC tradition, it may be time to ask: What will it take to enable these fine athletes/liberal arts students to reach the goal of excellence?

Finally, as the playoff season gets underway, one hopes that the sweep of Northern Michigan last weekend can give the team the momentum to reach down and get that one goal which has eluded them so often.

Kevin J. O'Connor

Dead Morality

To the Editor:

Last Friday I sat down at my desk, picked up a Catalyst turned to Mr. Nice Guy and started reading. I laughed. Then I scanned the rest of the opinions including "Breathing In The Dead" and "Wayne v. Mr. Nice Guy." Don't CC students have a sense of humor? Sure I'm a Dead fan and I've had the "true Dead experience," but I don't bum out about anyone poking fun at me or the group of people that enjoy the same things I do. Obviously Rick Goldstein feels so strongly about the Dead that he can't laugh along with Mark Thesing.

There are, of course, right times and places for different kinds of humor. But let the Catalyst writers enjoy enough freedom to satire the many varied lifestyles of Colorado College without student uproar. I am not asking you to cast aside your morals for some cynic to stomp on without defence. (Dead morals etc. hmmm) Who would ever preach spinelessness? But, I think there are far more controversial things to express opinions about than Mark Thesing's weekly social criticism. Think about it CC, to respond to one author's comic narratives with such fervor is ridiculous! This, of course, is what he has always wanted to happen. Sorry Mark.

Please, think of some less predictable opinions to submit so I don't yawn everytime I read your letters.

Then there is Wayne. You, of course, have as much freedom of speech as anyone, but spare us all any further information about your campaign. Who cares? You aren't a symbol of America, but rather a student latching on to a T.V. talk show for an identity. Dave Letterman won't make a fool of you, he'll let you do it by yourself.

Please don't call me a Russian or Liberace's lover in print, I might cry.

Pete Hudson

Mark Thesing

No More Mr. Nice Guy

Olin and Liberal Arts

Who are these Olin geeks? And why are they trying to ruin Colorado College?

As a senior I am taking my first Olin science class, Science for Poets and Artists.

Every morning and afternoon I have to see these geeks. Where do they come from? Outerspace, it seems.

Why aren't they at the frat parties getting drunk every night like me and my buddies.

They are too busy learning. This is outrageous. Don't they know that they are at a liberal arts college?

These pompous geeks are learning things that will enable them to better our society. In a few years these geeks will be healing the sick and advancing science.

This is a liberal arts college we are here in order to contemplate the nebulous, the esoteric, and the unimportant. When we graduate we are supposed to know and understand less than when we entered.

For example, in my last History colloquium, Revolution, we read seven books and wrote a 25 page paper. The course was taught by two of CC's most respected profs. We students were poised and the discussions were intense.

Yet I really have no clue as to what happened in the class. I didn't even understand the first day's discussion. Revolution remains more of an enigma to me now than before I took the class. And I wouldn't want it to be any other way.

You're not suppose to learn anything through a liberal arts education. I hope that someone tells those Olin geeks to stop undermining the purpose of Colorado College.

P.S. I enjoyed last weeks fan mail. Thanks to the few conscious Dead Heads on campus.

Don't Worry,

Hip Liberals

When the going gets weird, the weird turn pro.
—Dr. Hunter S. Thompson

As I was contemplating the insightful innuendos of Mr. Nice Guy's article on that skull of contention, The Greatful Dead, I was aghast when I remembered the editorial responses. Expect it when you least expect it! It's the return of the hip-liberals from Hell! Run for your lives!

Sorry, bad tangent. However, there is something in it. As you might know, this month is "Black Awareness Month," which, in and of itself is most certainly a laudable goal. I would assume that this period of "heightened awareness" is inextricably tied with racism, which ultimately leads me to the erection of the anti-Apartheid shanties. I remember that they "stormed the Dean's Office." Well, violence is the protest of the weak. Were these actions sponsored by the Feminists Collective? Who are these people? A bunch of heavily armed women farmers? Where are the rest of the hip-liberals? Did they trek back to Dartmouth?

T.S. Elliot once said that the worst crime in the world was to do the right thing for the wrong reason. Yes, you people stand accused. Of the people I talked to, an inordinantly small proportion had any inkling as to what was really going on in that miserable part of the world. I would ask, "Did you know that P.W. Botha, and especially the police (which I'm pretty sure is thirty to forty percent Black), can almost be seen as a moderating force between radical Whites and Blacks?" How about some of those quasi-Neo-Nazis? Yes, its true. They seem to have this Calvinistic-like faith that God meant them to oppress Blacks. Oh yeah, then there's the Blacks themselves. How 'bout those Blacks that mutilate other Blacks because they might conceivably have been a tad too cooperative with the Whites? What do you think would happen if these people got control after this embittering and attricious struggle wound out its course? Do you think they'd create a real oppressed minority, or would they be able to get that far, being that they have no real leaders except those created by the Western Press (Tutu) and a patron saint (Mandella) who in all likelihood will never have any really tangible influence except in spirit, as opposed to political reformation? Oh, come now, let's be pragmatic about the Black National "Congress"; there's just as much division there as there is anywhere in that vortex of a nation. Oh, divest? OK. Why don't we have the College reallocate any and all funds that are tied up with U.S. companies in South Africa. Do you know how to spell fiscal nightmare?"

Alright, enough is enough. Granted, the above diatribe did not take place verbatim. That is because I wasn't normally able to get past the first question. The construction of a few paltry shacks on the Green is nothing more than a monument to confusion. What more can divestment be than a statement of national futility, duplicity, and even schizophrenia? Don't you worry hip-liberals, your shanties will go down in the books as a superfluous, almost pointless moral stand in a racial civil war in which thousands of people have a will die.*

Thus, we are brought to the current activist scene. Why are the fliers promoting "Black Awareness Month" embellished with only the African continent? Why don't you take a chance and throw North America on there? Want some targets? Why is there such a low percentage of minority students and faculty on this campus? How can we make sure that we get the TRIBES Program back? Oh, and don't even think about entering the Publisher's Clearing House Sweepstakes, because I may have already won!

This is Fletch Neeley signing off from the NATIONAL Affairs Desk. Adios and Viva La Revolucion.

*Besides which, don't we have enough of that here on the home revolutionary front for you people? Why don't you get a clue and start aiding the Black Student Union.

Victor Greto

I have often wondered what it would be like to be colorblind. The sensation I tend to imagine is akin to that of blindness: I remember those classes in junior high school when the teacher would, as a surprise, blindfold us all and then ask if we remembered what was around us in the classroom. Most of us could not. I remember seeing the swirling blackness, feeling and hearing the twisting images I could discern if I closed my eyes tight enough. It was a test, the teacher told us, to show us how lucky we were to be able to see, to have a greater modicum of compassion and empathy for those who were literally blind.

But how about those who were figuratively blind? How forget my use of the past tense. What about those who are figuratively blind and wish the rest of us to be? What about those (like the present Reagan administration) who wish us to be a colorblind society so that we all may live fairly under a great and just shade of gray?

The image nauseates. I imagine, when I think of such a prospect, the old, ailing fuzzy black and white television that were never black and white, but varying shades of sickening gray. Even under the law, is this, the colorblind society, the correct way to solve the racial problem, to destroy racism? Should we ignore the myriad of colors around us (in the cities, folks, certainly not at Colorado College) and rub their obtrusive, blaring colors into a dull, soothing gray?

The question, perhaps, one should ask is: Who exactly is doing this figurative rubbing into gray? The answer: the old, staid Republicans, embarrassed now by those films of old segregationists like George Wallace with whom, during those tumultuous times, they silently and collectively cheered; the old Republicans who laughed at the statement "Black is beautiful," or at any assertion which held itself independent and outside their white male dominated system. Now, in our more enlightened age, we are all to be rubbed graywhite in their new vision of egalitarianism, our colors to be subdued and standardized (how wonderfully American!) into the backwash of a decaying order.

To wish all to be, even under the veiling guise of law, one color, is to deny the diversity of what it is to be in America. It is a way not to solve the problem of racism (which does still exist in this country, not only in those counties of Georgia, but more subtly in our cities and in our own shallow liberal minds). We cannot simply, after all we have gone through in our Civil War, the Civil Rights movement, the painstakingly long "graduation" of particular ethnic groups into the so-called mainstream, place a gauze of gray over all our offending and obtrusive colors. This way of combatting the problem is understandable, but, alas, typically pragmatic, and serves as only a band-aid to the problem. It is also a way to avoid wrestling with ourselves over how we think and the ways we are reared in our society. I'd like to go out on a limb and use myself as an example.

I remember the tightness of feeling I would get when, walking through Philadelphia, I would see a gang of Black men coming towards me. My throat would dry, my hands would suddenly feel moist. Over and over again I'd repeat my liberal maxims to myself, plowing through the men with a nodding head, acknowledging their existence, my eyes hugging the pavement for support. And when they passed, more often than not giggling at my obvious nervousness, I would note within the shallowness of my liberalism, the fear which my society (and this includes portions of my family) instilled in me regarding Blacks, Hispanics and so on. Would placing a rheumy film of gray over my eyes have solved my problem for me? Would obviating that group's "Blackness" have solved the inner problem which, then seemingly involuntary, made me sweat, stutter and look away?

Of course not. Only by appreciating "Blackness" for what it is (or if not understanding it, letting it be without imposing upon it), as I had later to appreciate my own ethnic backround for what it is (my Italian-ness, I guess you could call it), could I dig the "natural" fear out of me and toss it into the trash where it belongs. The point is there is no true "mainstream" in America and there never should be. It is of course obvious that the U.S. is a white-male dominated system — and Protestant (I almost forgot.) Its government was created by rich white men with one eye on their property (which included slaves), and one eye on the idealism of their Age of Reason. Fine. But it is time to realize that the melting-pot image of America is a myth, for white-male dominated culture is no longer taken for granted; there is no one legitimate pot for our diversity to melt into anymore. We no longer assume Jefferson's and Locke's ideas of life and liberty (that is, what they seemed to mean by those terms), the rigid inalienability of their premises, and Locke's ludicrous obsessiveness with property. We no longer believe that democracy must be based in capitalism, that the two are inseparable, "natural." But it is all very frightening to recognize and glory in the diversity which should be this country and which doggedly is not. We cling desperately and shake at the thought of disagreeing with the Founding Fathers' assumptions, those ten-foot gods who laid their reasoned and experienced foundation for a country. But it is less frightening when one recognizes that the Founders were not gods but men, products, exeptional products, of their times.

We are products of our times and must implement what we think is best, not blind ourselves to the world around us, not continually utilize terms such as "colorblind" or "communism," words which shroud and deter us from understanding, hinder and obstruct our vision. If America is to have a future we must move forward in terms of our own century, erasing prejudice in all fields, not by glazing it over with rhetoric and leaving its tangling roots alone, but be recognizing and feeling comfortable in our diversity, by truly being a liberal democracy, in spirit and action, as well as in rhetoric.

Imagination and Social Change

I have with deep interest followed the public debate between Inger Thomsen and Victor Greto. I have been curious indeed, to discover what exactly is the liberal opposition. In fact, I too have attempted to address this issue in articles written last semester. But I toiled in vain, for Mr. Greto, a self-proclaimed liberal, has come forth with a quite straight forward statement of "the liberal view" in his February 13, 1987 article, and has delivered it from speculation. It is true, Mr. Greto has espoused his view, but has buried it under talk of the "self-satisfied middle class," "social realities," the "unnecessarily binding" chains of the past, "American symbols" like the Declaration of Independence and "Capital"; padded jeans, PBS, and potato chips. But his view was perhaps illuminated in such phrases as, "Morality is . . . an amorphous, protean code of ethics we choose for ourselves . . .", ". . . stripping away all the facades of society . . .", "I long for our downfall . . . for the end of ignorance." Finally though, Mr. Greto has stripped away most of his own symbols and given us a few distilled morsels of liberalism. (However, the latest piece is couched vaguely in an article about education and is a disguised response, it seems, to Ms. Thomsen's most recent criticism. This only proves the futility of trying to escape any contextual orientation, which Mr. Greto calls "facades.")

Mr. Greto tells us, "I believe in no metaphysical truth . . . outside . . . history . . . (and) in no transcendance of history to something more 'basic.'" In addition, Mr. Greto "takes issue with the way our society interprets the events of the past and portrays us as some 'inevitable' result of the struggles of our ancestors." Thus, Mr. Greto has eliminated every possible source of truth.

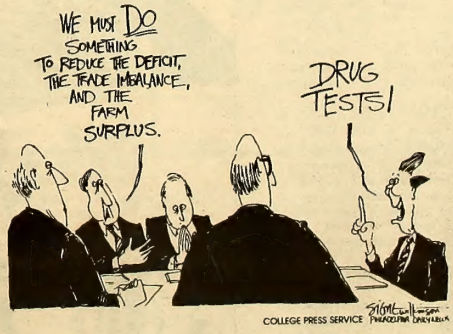
Mr. Greto wants not to be lumped with those who reject the past, whether in part or in whole, and if the above points are adhered to it is reasonable to conclude, as Mr. Greto does, that ". . . all elements that are in history have their meaning only in history, in their present and historical consequences." But if history alone provides meaning, and if it does not progress toward some particular preconceived goal" then we are left with the question of the manner in which we perceive and justify change in society, and political activity in general.

Happily, Mr. Greto next turns to this question. He tells us in plain terms why he "questions;" an activity he has earlier proclaimed the mainstay of his intellectual diet. "My reasons (for questioning) are the social conditions which our society allows to exist . . . bourgeois values . . ." Already it is hinted that something is wrong. Four points need to be made here.

First, Mr. Greto proclaims that "we and our values are products of the past." He has not called us inevitable products, so he has not yet contradicted himself; but he soon does, attempting to dodge the keen criticism of Ms. Thomsen. If we are "products of the past" and our endeavor is to question society and ourselves, then we are, by implication, questioning the past, particularly if it is history alone which provides meaning. In questioning ourselves, and our 'meanings' we are questioning our past, according to Mr. Greto's definitions, since it is out of the past that we are derived. The underlying assumptions, the roots, are in the past, and when questioning becomes "stripping away all the facades" it becomes so extreme that no reasonable argument can be made which would prevent questioning from being rightly called a "rejection" of the past. Mr. Greto is entangled in a blatant self-contradiction if he claims not to reject the past.

Second, it is erroneous for Mr. Greto to assert any grounds of right or wrong. He has expressly rejected metaphysical Truth, a transcendence of history to something more basic (by which I suppose he could mean "general laws" of social change, or rationally understood "principles" such as natural right, etc.), and historical inevitability. Then, though denying it, he has rejected his own and society's meaningfulness and its history. There is no source of value to be found; Mr. Greto has brashly created a void for himself. He claims, however to be acting on behalf of "social justice." Where, I ask, does this value originate? Where does any value originate for Mr. Greto? The answer, if we adhere once more to Mr. Greto's stated tenets, is that the values come from Mr. Greto's imagination, from his storehouse of private dreams. His demands for social change are no more and no less than demands to impose his will upon the entire society. There is no compulsion for me or anyone else to respond to Mr. Greto's wishes. If we all behaved as he suggests our condition would be bellum omnium contra omnes—a war of all against all.

A third self-contradiction leaps from the pages of the Catalyst and offends the sensibilities of any intelligent reader. Our author attacks the portrayal of our society and its conditions as "inevitable." He then informs us



OPINIONS

Michael S. Mehan

The Bottom Line

Hysterika: The Year of Invasion

For the conservative, fascist minded types, it was hysteria, the thought of the Soviet Union invading the United States, or the "Sovietization" of America. For those of us with a more realistic, liberal mind, it was hysterical, how the hell would the Soviets ever be able to invade the United States? Expecially in the Reagan era, why we could use the combined hot air of Jerry Falwell, Ed Meese and Pat Buchanan to blow them away! Thus the final result is a show called, "Hysterika," or "Silly T.V."

The only humorous part of the show is the fact that all internal exiles are sent to Nebraska, a miserable state if you have ever driven across it. However, a state nontheless, and if I were from Nebraska, no matter what my political persuasion, I would be pissed!

Not only is the idea of an invasion of the United States by the Soviet Union incredibly silly, and logistically impossible, but the portrayal of it in the series, "Amerika" is worse than a trip to the dentist. It is a painfully slow, actionless series boring to the point of making the most dry PBS documentary seem like "Miami Vice." If I was the man responsible for it, I would be quietly sneeking out the back door at ABC.

It is now 1987, the year of the invasion, and what are those crazy commiers up to? They are bogged down in Afghanistan, still shakily holding onto an economically hurting Eastern Europe, and trying to cope with a floundering economy that would not sustain and invasion of Bulgaria, much less an invasion of the United States. One would need a lobotomy, or a severe overdose of hard drugs to take the series seriously. An invasion by desperate Mexicans fleeing a collapsed economy would be more realistic.

"Amerika" tries to portray subtly an America that has been Sovietized, that is, where food is scarce, freedom non-existent, and people complaining that their land has been taken. It does not take Russians to steal farms, the Russians in "Amerika" are only finishing the job that the Reagan Administration started. I mean, Russians, Reagan, what is the difference? The poor farmers still get stiffed on their land.

The subtle approach only leads to tearfully boring scenes and tryingly dramatic dialogue. In short "Amerika" forces it, the show tries too hard to be meaningful, hard hitting and dramatic. The result is a lobotomized Kris Kristofferson staring blankly, scenes with corny music in the back ground, and KGB men who look like stock brokers, and whose accents sound like a perverted hybrid of Mikhail Barishnokov and Mr. Scott from "Star Trek." At least ABC could have mixed the boredom of "Amerika" with a dose of action from say "Rambo" or "Red Dawn."

During one episode I spoke with my mother on the phone for about forty five minutes, when I hung up the phone, I casually asked a buddy of mine if I had missed anything. He said, "Yeah, the 'Equalizer,'" and grabbed the TV control. Basically, watching "Amerika" is like watching a test pattern, time goes by but nothing ever happens.

Mr. Van Gordon Sauter, former president of CBS said in an article in the latest "US News and World Report," that "'Amerika' is excellent television." Maybe he has not watched much of it, say more than ten minutes. It is not good television, it is not even mediocre television. The dialogue is ridiculously slow, the plot is dubious at best and unfolds slower than a turtle with a hangover and the acting is marginal.

The political message unnecessary at this time, when arms control is virtually in the dust and the Soviet Union is trying its best to improve relations and reduce the threat of war. In general the series makes Americans look like passive wimps, who somehow let a little coup topple their nation like some peon Latin American dictatorship. Americans would fight. I pity the poor Russian soldiers who had to take over the South Bronx or Bedford Sty in New York, or the "Combat Zone" in Boston, or the south side of Chicago, not to mention all the crazy yahoo regions down south, where, I am sure, more than a few "good ol' boys" would just love to punch some lead into a commie or two. The show is silly television, not "excellent television."

Internationally, the series may be seen as another attempt on American's part to play war, and act out the tantilizing, yet unknown terror of invasion. We have an obsession with the idea of making shows about it. Not that we should be invaded, but we must stop dreaming about it, it only makes us look silly and puerile in the eyes of the world's eyes.

ABC has surely generated the attention and hype they wanted, and maybe it will help them in the ratings. In general, I think they tried to cash in on the "New Patriotism" of the 1980's a little too late. We have had enough Rambo's, the Reagan years are waning in the face of scandal, and "Platoon" is trying to show Americans what our glorious crusade against communism in Vietnam was really like. "Amerika" is a pathetic attempt at flag waving, it does not catch the imagination, but lulls one to sleep. In the end of each show, after the "dramatic" conclusion, it says, "To be continued," all I can say is, why?

Abel from pg. 13

that "To question our assumptions is a prelude to necessary changes in the social order, a social order that allows blatant injustices to exist." (italics added) I shall not belabour the point for even the least informed reader will recognize that to be "necessary" is to be "inevitable." Thus, Mr. Greto has reversed himself, and makes his argument by the very notion of inevitability that he "takes issue with." Again, his only grounds for claiming change to be necessary, is that Victor Greto says so.

Fourth, in his examination of the present (and the past implicitly connected with it), which he wants to strip of its so-called facades, or pretensions, Mr. Greto is attempting to get to something "more basic." He has denied that his values represent a "metaphysical Truth . . . primary to history." Our present is a product of the past. To strip away the "facades" of society means to strip away what is unreal and wrong. "Reality," therefore, must lie somewhere other than in the apparent social conditions as perceived by us. Therefore the unreality of the present is rejected, and along with it, the past which produced it. History is rejected in the search for "reality." By implication then, a truth is sought which is outside or prior to history—to deny this is to leap into a void once again, where truth consists only in the ability of one to assess their views on all others.

Mr. Greto's questioning is no more than a quaint euphemism for the activities of the dangerously self-deluded. He is not stripping away society's artificiality, or its binding traditional chains, and he cannot. The meanings he attaches to are found in society, the same society he is claiming to reject, and the tradition of that society informs his judgement. They are not at all false, binding, or ossified, but real, flexible and continually changing. This is not to speak on behalf of determinism or any inevitability—only to suggest that the conscious choices of any individual are made and can only be made within the context of society, if they are to have any relevance or meaning at all. If Mr. Greto's calls for social justice have any appeal it is because he and his listeners are responding to a commonly understood situation in a similar way.

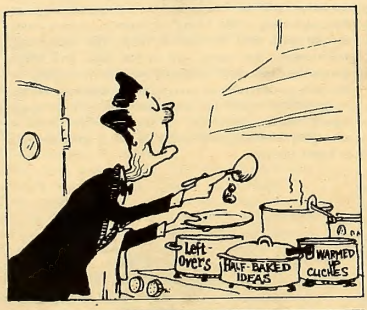
One central characteristic of our "liberal society" (as it is ironically called) is freedom. If some group is perceived to be wanting in freedom, the response is to "liberate" them. We understand the idea of freedom not because we have rejected everything around us and have discovered an absolute truth, but because we understand something of our society and the values which characterize it. Social action, such as "liberation," is the attempt to bring the world into congruence with our conception of it; it is motivated by a perceived discrepancy in the condition of society and its underlying ideas.

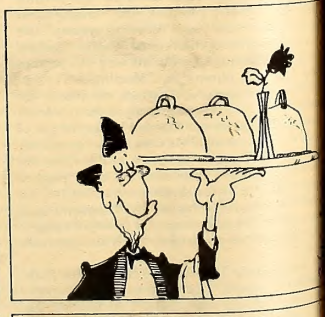
Three things are dangerous about the liberal approach to political and social change. First, it fails to recognize that the particular perception of society is individual, ". . . a prelude to necessary changes in the social order . . " But there is nothing necessary about such changes unless the society itself has changed and in changing has created the need to change the "order" of society, its laws, customs, and "arrangements."

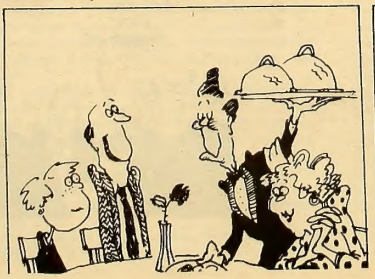
The conservative argues for "calmness and moderation in political affairs" because he or she recognizes that government's activity should reflect the society's conceptions of itself, not attempt to impose a view on all the members of society. The aforementioned dangers of violating people's rights in the process of trying to insure them, of acting under the self-delusion of an attempt to "found society anew," and of rigidifying the living, continous ideas of a society and creating a frozen, formalized ideology prevent me from accepting Mr. Greto's claims. It seems his view leaves him with two choices: an outright arrogant assertion of his view on all of us, or a self-deluded attempt to find and act upon an abstract principle. In either case, his view implies a dangerous political scheme of imposing one view on society, and thereby subverting the very essence of the society out of which the view was drawn.

and may not be held in common. If it is not widely believed, and has not already assumed a place in the culture's self-understanding at large, then it would be highly inappropriate to assert it in action. To assert a personal view of freedom, for instance, would violate the freedoms of others. It would also violate a related principle, democratic politics. Second, the pursuit of such principles invariably contradicts itself, and violates other principles of society. This is because it roots out some fundamental social proposition by closed examining the already existent and traditional social practices, and then turns that idea into a rigid, formalized, and absolute doctrine. This is what is referred to as an ideology. Third, the ideologue fails to recognize that the particular understanding of society which is reflected in the ideology is neither absolute nor necessarily correct. Believing himself or herself to have stripped away the muck of society and to have discerned some truth, the only sensible justification is to then claim absolute extrahistorical right. In this fashion, the ideologue prepares to make the claim that questioning is

BY COREY ABEL







David Makarechian

Lessons from the Scandal

's not sticking.
Democratic Congress poised for the jugular, a mittee headed by a veteran Nixon-buster, a special ecutor, high ranking officials pleading the fifth, a ie media drooling to crucify a popular inistration, and it's still not sticking. It doesn't even e a name. Irangate, Iranscam, IReagan-gate — ever you want to call it — is having a disturbingly
r effect on the administration.
uthy has replaced the Capital beltway as the er around Washington. Rather than vigilantly ing justice to make a corrupt administration unable to the people, the nation is continuing about siness as usual. The United States has become a on of moral cowards.
o as news of Dennis Connor's victory in the erica's Cup receives more attention than the pre-mony suicide attempt of former National Security sor Robert MacFarlane, and as pollsters advise the ident that less than ten percent of the voters care ut the crisis, it's time to review some of the ways the rnment has prostituted the country's morality, and e of the lessons the country should be learning from fiasco.
Do the facts of the Iran case bear out the nation's ality?
No.
ax dollars were used to fuel the bloody war that has ed thousands of Iranian and Iraqi lives. Officials have used proceeds from our tax dollars to break rnational law through slush funds financing covert rations all over the world. The President misled the on about U.S. policy in the third world while ching the virtues of neo-conservative morality.
ical higher-ups may have impeded the due process
w so the Reagan administration could save face.
his is serious stuff, and stuff that society has taught o recognize as wrong.
ut even more serious looms the specter of moral udice — Reagan disciples across the United States fear opposing evil because it is evil. To the voters ld Reagan is still the good guy that brought erica back, not the bad guy who has scoffed at values are firmly rooted in society.
ot cringing in the face of the administration's blatant espect for traditional values limits the degree that ons from the crisis can improve future policy, and allow the administration to remain unaccountable s crimes. Instead the nation must meet the crisis ion — we can start by outlining four key lessons that crisis should teach.

sson 1: Heed Washington's Words. The first dent advised us to avoid entangling alliances. We
t. The result: U.S. foreign policy initiatives ghout the world are being discredited.

sson 2: Trust the Constitution. The U.S. foreign y machinery is a huge bureaucracy that lacks tion, management, and control. The nation's ers had the foresight to avoid ineffective, ntrollable organizations — we should try to ture their vision.

sson 3: Political parties must change. Leadership in established political parties has offered us no idates with truly new solutions. Rather than seeking vation men in smoke-filled rooms preserve the s quo — and keep U.S. policy running in circles.

sson 4: Trust Government officials no further than an throw them. (This includes the President) We slipped in the last six years — does the country now incidents such as the Iran crisis to remind us that it g to the people to protect the government from rupting our values?
essons of the Iran Crisis clearly have a consistent
e. Effective, accountable foreign policy requires a derstanding of the American creed. A clear sion without entanglements, accountable rnment and political parties, and a vigilant eye on ucans — these values have made the American tion unique, and these are the values that we can no r afford to keep latent.

No Hope for 1988

If you are truly loyal to your political party, vote for the opposing party in the next presidential election. A Republican in the White House during the next term will be the best thing that ever happened to the Democrats, and vice-versa.

Most economists agree that Reagan's buy-now-pay-later economic plan will create fiscal chaos in a few years. Whoever is president will be blamed for the mess — not Reagan. The same happened when Hoover was unlucky enought to be president during the Stock Market Crash of 1929.

Because Hoover was a Republican, Americans usually elected a Democratic president for at least a generation after the Crash. The converse would have happened had a Democrat been in office in 1929.

A similar phenomenon happened to Jimmy Carter. His deathbed was prepared by the Johnson Administration's refusal to raise taxes to pay for the Vietnam war. Those deficits contributed to double-digit inflation a decade later. Carter received the blame.

But Johnson's deficits were petty cash compared to Reagan's. Borrowed money, not taxes, is financing the current increase in consumer spending and the arms build-up — the two primary ingredients to our fastest growing national debt in post war times, now over $two trillion. Each year we pay $139 billion in interest alone on this monster, up from $53 billion in 1980. The interest costs are rising faster than tax revenues, making the debt increasingly difficult to tame. It can't go on like this forever.

So far the economy has remained stable largely due to low oil prices. However, portending signs are beginning to show. Real estate values are soaring. Restaurant prices are on the rise, as are clothes and shoe costs. The dollar value has plummeted 40% over the last two years, while the Stock Market has skyrocketed 40%. Economist John Kenneth Galbraith sees too many similarities to those days preceding 1929.

So far Reagan has had great luck with the economy. Shortly after he came into office, oil prices went from $35/barrel to $10/barrel as Iran and Iraq increased production to pay for their war. This oil price collapse, not Reaganomics, produced our low inflation. Hence, if oil prices go back up, our precarious economy will pay dearly.

The day of reckoning is two or three years away, say the economists. Should the Democrats hold office, Americans will attribute the crisis to them, not to Reagan, and will thereafter vote as Republican as possible. Imagine the next generation's Congress made up of 535 Ronald Reagans.

BY PATRICK CHISHOLM

Ellipses and Hyperbole

The uncanny thing was that I stood in line for it. I stood in line for my chance at the ice cream bin. Like all-star wrestling fans, other SAGA patrons stood about the ice cream tub and cheered me on.

"Go for it; don't let it get the better of you," they yelled as I tried to scrape some vanilla from the rock hard tub, using a tiny scoop that looked like it was meant to make carrot balls.

I was sweating, already sticky up to my elbows; I could tell this was going to be a long battle. I was growling, my feet were sliding on a thin chocolate film that coated the floor, and the front of my entire body was sticky.

I heard a scream from behind and jumped out of the way, just as a wild eyed student dumped a mug of hot chocolate into the bin. She started to yell, "it's chocolate now, soft chocolate, har, har, har." Then she started to scoop ice cream gook with a soup ladle.

I wiped chocolate sprinkles from my brow and headed into Bemis lounge, without my ice cream. "What is the origin of this ice cream ritual?" I asked the stern portrait of Alice Bemis.

Myth shrouds that Bemis lady — myths of her decreeing from her death bed that no sorority girl will ever live in a sorority house; Bemis had strict standards of proper lady-like behaviour that did not include sleeping in sororities.

In her portrait she poses with a baby, they say, so ladies could see what comes from sorority houses with beds. Bemis also dictated that there should be ice cream at every meal, to placate disgruntled ladies. Ice cream soothes the savage breast.

Her words seem to echo through the building: "The flesh is weak, so indulge yourself with ice cream. Eat until your body is bloated and your passions frozen. Then eat some more. Eat, vanilla, rocky-road, frozen yogurt, or sherbet, just don't sleep in your own house."

Alice Bemis is still with us. You can see her above the fireplace where her portrait is hung; you can see her under the table where her gum is stuck; and you can smell her when students sweat over a sticky bin.

She's even entered into the world of slang. Apparently, whenever someone goes on an ice cream binge it's called "pulling a Bemis." She is a permanent facet of the school, like the many other myths that decorate the campus.

People still talk about the Death Room, a sealed room almost directly beneath Alice's portrait. They say there was a multiple murder committed in that room in the '60's. They say two young ladies were bludgeoned to death with a scoop, ooooweeeeoooo.

And then there is the labyrinth, the myriads of winding passages that lie beneath the campus. Oh yes, the catacombs are awesome, or so they say. Just about every drunk freshman sets out on a quest for the "maze of tunnels."

Somehow, I think demure Alice would be pleased at the myth that makes drunk freshmen who hope to find a maze, crawl under ground and out of sight.

BY AARON SHURE

ANNIVERSARY SALE

1st Anniversary at our Southgate store!

Perms • Perms • Perms
Any Perm
$18.95
*complete
*includes shampoo, cut and style
(Save up to $24.00!)
(Reg. $19.95 - $42.95)
20% Off All Other Services
(with ad)
-coupon- Expires 2/28/87

NO APPOINTMENT NECESSARY
GREAT EXPECTATIONS
PRECISION HAIRCUTTERS
6 Southgate Road (Southgate Mall) 520-9957
Mon. -Fri. 8-7
Sat. 8-5
Sun. 11-5

Family Hair Care with the Personal Touch

	Regular Price	Your Price
Shampoo, Cut & Blow Dry	10.95	8.75
Shampoo & Cut	6.95	5.55
Just-A-Cut	5.95	4.75
Colorings ..... (from)	24.95	19.95

THE DIRT

This school is so small. Right? Everybody knows everything about everybody; or they thought so until now. Can We Talk? I mean, let's get it out in the open once and for all. Everybody loves a little juicy tidbit now and then. Not you, you say? Well then stop reading now, if you're content with your version of what's going on in your life. Our version is either going to ruin you or make you the campus hero. Still not interested? Tell it to the editor.

Word has it that a short haired bopster is still hot on the trail of a rather buff would be athlete/thespian; he reportedly had a hard time escaping the grey Golf course this Kappa had planned for him after the Saturday night sorority soiree. However with the help of some admiring God from the heavens, our athlete backflipped his way to safety.

Speaking of Kappas, a certain deactivated, darling dancer has been frequently seen on the arm of an avante garde physics major/choreographer. Will gravity be enough to keep this pas de deux firmly on the ground?

Back at the castle, we understand that there is tension in the court. Is the King losing popularity? Or will the family jewels finally be heading back to Disney Land for good? Who'll be left to record the court's life on polaroids?

On the stable side of CC life, a favorite little rock climber returned from England to fall straight back into the passenger seat of the cleanest Snob Turbo on campus. While the art majors are still trying to find the invisible boyfriend of one funky little print maker, a blond house mother is nobly hanging on to the aforementioned print maker's ex. And the lingering campus opera maestro is still faithfully in the arms of that enviable blue eyed, blonde bombshell.

Speaking of eyes, a swarthy sophomore and his sought after queen of smiles have made like a banana and split - for good. And unfortunately, political ties were not enough to keep two particular long legged lovers in the same party. On the more dubious side of breakups, a body building Phi Delt and his bodacious beauty have reportedly called it quits. That remains to be seen, as does the seemingly permanent parting of a certain dancing, freckled groovy and her long time, snake owning love.

Just friends, hmmm? It would seem that's no longer the case between the west coast jungle woman and her handsome (if remote) long haired gentleman.

Keeping it all in the family, who's Subaru has been frequently spotted parked in front of the residence of a bar hopping Catalyst editor?

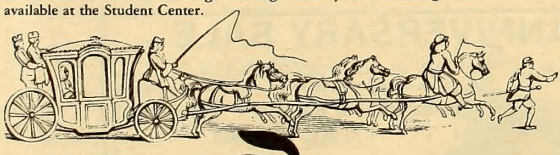
Oh Pia, who's that boy????????? understand it's all part of the jou Speaking of journeys, been to Mex lately?

Eat your heart out, fellas. A new priest breezed into town this weeke tighten his hold on the heart o beloved, blonde and (need I say) swe major/ex-theta.

AND it seems a certain history has been trying to show his facts t loveliest groovy on Cache La P motorcycling buddy of his has appa had more success with earthy women late.

Did we miss anything? Just drop yo items by the Catalyst office. Any submitted will be kept confidential don't gossip.

See Welcome to the Line tonight through Sunday at Armstrong. Tickets available at the Student Center.



What's On Your Turntable

Shannon Absher Senior Drama
Joan Armatrading, "Whatever is for Us"

Mark Thesing Senior History
The Grateful Dead, Live at the Greek 3/17/82

Helmi Shepard Sophomore Linguistics
The Tournai Mass, A Choir Practice Tape

Betsy Biggs Junior English
Mixed Tape, "Lost But Now Ours Mix"

Joanne Klein Asst Prof Drama & D
Jeanette MacDonald sings "San Franc & Other Silver Screen Favorite

President & Mrs. Gresham Rile
Garrison Keillor, "Lake Wobegon D

Josh & John Ice Cream Shop Ow Nutrition
Credence Clearwater Revival, "Chronicles"

UCCS Theatreworks

THEATREWORKS at the University of Colorado, Colorado Springs has announced the winners of its 1987 Playwrights' Forum competition. The two winning one-act plays, selected from over 400 entries from around the world, are PHOSPHORUS by Doug Grissom of St. Augustine, FL and TRUE BRUNETTES by Adriana Trigiani of New York, NY. The two plays will receive their world premiere productions at THEATREWORKS.

THE SEVENTH ANNUAL PLAYWRIGHTS' FORUM will be presented April 10, 11, 17 and 18 at 8:00 p.m. in Dwire auditorium on the UCCS campus. For advance reservations and information phone THEATREWORKS at 593-3232 in Colorado Springs.

THEATREWORKS at the Univers Colorado, Colorado Springs will hold auditions for its SEVENTH ANN PLAYWRIGHT'S FORUM on Satu March 7 from 1:00 p.m. to 5:00 p Dwire Auditorium on the UCCS cam The PLAYWRIGHTS' FORUM present the world premiere productio two new one-act plays, PHOSPHOR Doug Grissom and TRUE BRUNET by Adriana Trigiani. Roles are availab 6 women and 2 men. No prepared ma is required.

For further information p THEATREWORKS at 593-323 Colorado Springs.

Take a Study Break
And Tour the World
Bring Souvenirs Home
Send Cards to Your Friends
From Exotic and Foreign Ports
Without Leaving Colorado Springs
All At . . .
Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm Sat. 11-5 pm
THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE
Downtown on Platte Between Tejon & Cascade
phone: 635-2118

LIFE AT C.C. WITH
Cornbread trys to call off campus
Augh! I hate that noise! I'm just trying to get off-campus
Try again. Hang-up, then dial 9.
Here we go. What is it doing? This piece of trash!
Be patient here. I'll try again
LATER
AHH!
LATER, in the Dean's office.
What do you mean it's a hall sport violation to throw the phone down the hall?

OOPS! We forgot to put JOE LEONARD'S

Tulio on Tunes: Psychedelic Ska Bone

...ter under the bridge; Beastie ...Fishbone at Mammoth Events ...t last Friday. Fishbone is red hot. ...t for emphasis: FISHBONE IS RED

...e men, yes, I think it was five; hard to ...the frenzy that is Fishbone. They are ...ew ska beatmasters. The pychedelic ...f the eighties. Very tight; percussion ...ercussion, whippin' bass line, snappy ...verall dance frenzy. Of course they ...far from their element in the brutally ...ented atmosphere of the Mammoth ...s Center. But we'll deal with that ...ous power-mad establishment later.

Beastie Boys delivered the goods. Seeing them live one realized that they are living proof of the American dream; you can make money doing anything. Three young men, fresh out of high school making buckets of money for an hour of swilling brews onstage and rappin' to the beat.

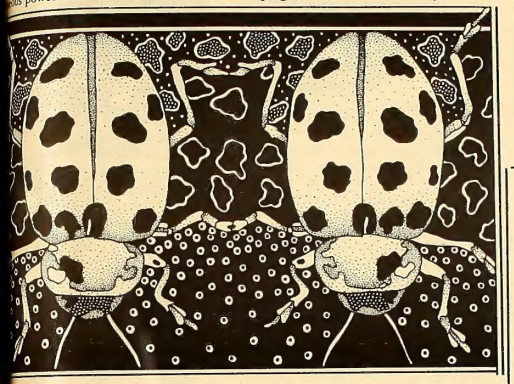
If you take away the fifteen foot Budweiser six-pack and the go-go dancer in the cage what you had was a high-school talent show. You remember when the most "ragin' dudes" would get hammered and lip-sync to the most abusive song available until the administration pulled the plug? Well, these homeboys wrote their own words and cranked them louder than Iron Maiden. I had a grin on my face the whole time. Except of course when I was getting herded out of the concert the minute it was over by quasi-human bouncers.

Sure, they were wearing shirts which said "usher." Sure, they wanted to help you find your seat. And if you didn't want to go to your seat at that particular moment they were more than willing to throw a half-nelson on you and toss you out on your ass. These might-make-right goons get adrenalin pumping through my veins like nothing else.

Why should their job include intimidating and threatening you if you aren't a good herd animal? I couldn't even talk to a friend between bands because we were being "ushered" back to our seats. I've had friends who worked in bars and heard enough stories about six dudes dragging troublemakers into the back alley and working them over. Anybody who could take turns kicking a downed and helpless man is an atrocity. Wow. I'm really going off on extremes here, aren't I? Not really. The whole mentality of bullying and regimenting with strength in numbers and size (these dudes were big) leads to the aforementioned harshness.

So, what can you do? Not much. 1) Do exactly what they tell you and convince yourself "they're just doing their job"; 2) Don't go to the show; 3) Keep givin' them lip to make yourself feel better and if you get kicked out, mace them and run for your life. I dunno, you decide. Burning Spear plays in Boulder tonight. There's some show billed as "four hours of solid trash" for three bucks at some club I've never heard of this weekend as well. Pretenders and Iggy Pop were rumored to have played a house—rockin' show at McNichol's, with the princess of post-punk and that "Real Wild Child" it could have been no less. So, until the hurley burley's done, til' the battle's lost and won; hang loose, step tight, stay free.

TULIO BROWNING



Miles Tries to Rap

...into something comfortable:
...d tweed jacket, an armchair,
...er perhaps.
...lights are out.
...ting but the pulsating glow
...Chesterfield.
...ness.
...vinyl's smooth and black like Miles'
...on the cover. Smells new.
...is my religion. Miles is my god."
...ently set the album. Send it spinning.
...ah, that's good java."
...ng down.

...is not cool jazz you sap
...e Miles playing rap

...K, I'll be the first to admit it's not ...I expected from the master of ...ssionistic, cool jazz. I was weened on ...s earlier, blusier stuff. "Kind of Blue' ...touchstone. So when I heard Miles' ...ing trumpet soloing to Marcus ...r's synth rap beats (complete with ...chin drum machine beats), I was alot ...sed. This does not necessarily mean that Miles Davis' latest album "Tutu" is bad....but it is.

There are some redeeming qualities however. Miles shows a remarkable adaptability in soloing to street music. He adds sophistication and mood to the repetitive and tiresome themes layed down by Marcus Miller (with cameo appearances by George Duke and Omar Hakim). It's also the best work he's done in the past decade...but keep in mind his last album "You're Under Arrest" which included such pop hits as Cindy Lauper's "Time After Time."

Now don't get me wrong. I'm not knocking pop and rap (not now anyway), but for one of the greatest jazz trumpeters, these genres, rather than give him yet another musical arena to conquer, stifle his brilliance. Although I admire Miles' courage and fear of stagnation that breeds this "renaissance," it would be nice to see him leave the prerecorded synthesizer and return to where his greatness brews...with a live, breathing, spontaneous band.

BILL REEDY

Film Series

Sunday, Feb. 22

All About Eve

A story of theatrical ambition, deception and hypocrisy. Bitchy Bette Davis stars as a powerful aging actress at the apex of her career doing battle with calculating newcomer Anne Baxter.

Director: Joseph L. Mankiewics. Cast: Bette Davis, Anne Baxter, George Sanders. 138 min., USA 1950. Olin Hall, 7 & 9:30.

Friday, Feb. 20

What's New Pussycat?

Paris fashion magazine editor Michael James (Peter O'Toole) consults psychiatrist, Fritz Fassbender (Peter Sellers) about his love life. Unfortunately the doctor's own unfulfilled desires are compounded when he hears of Michael's conquests. Fassbender's wiking wife Anna (Edra Gale) attempts to keep him from extramarital lapses. Michael's friend Victor (Woody Allen) is concerned because he can't attract women, even though he is an 'undresser' at a striptease club.

A wild sex comedy featuring great stars and a raucous bedroom chase scene. US/France, 1965, 108 min. Olin Hall, 7 & 9 p.m.

State of the art equipment
for the backcountry connoisseur.

Mountain Chalet
CC's Outdoor Connection
226 N. Tejon
Downtown •633-0732

A Renaissance

Jazz music is the most influential art form that has been exported from the United States to the rest of the world. What started as Afro-American spirituals during the slavery period developed into the Blues and Ragtime by the turn of the century, and continued to expand into Dixieland, Stomp, Swing, Bebop, Cool, and eventually Modern Jazz by the late 1950's. As early as the 1920's American Jazz reached Europe and has since attracted a large audience overseas. Ironically, jazz is one of the least appreciated musical genres in its home country.

By the late sixties, the era of Bebop, Cool, smokey bars and clinking gin-filled tumblers was effectively over. Jazz forms from Swing to Modern, known now as "Historical mainstream," gave way to a fusion of jazz and rock music. Trumpeter, Miles Davis developed Fusion in the late sixties as a response to the advent of sophisticated electronic instruments and the popularity of funk and rock among the urban black population. At the time of its inception, Fusion was a powerful and creative art form. Record producers soon realized that because of its rock beat and catchy rhythm, Fusion was more marketable than purist jazz. Consequently, Historical Mainstream artists such as Freddie Hubbard, Wayne Shorter and Joe Zawinul made accessible, almost poppy albums throughout the seventies and into the eighties.

Ten to fifteen years ago, most young musicians believed that Fusion was the natural outgrowth of Hard Bop, Modern, and Avant Garde Jazz. But by the late 1970's, the jazz scene was virtually stagnant, and both younger and older musicians saw Fusion as a dead end. Fusion is still more popular than traditional jazz forms, but it is starting to lose ground to purist (or real) jazz.

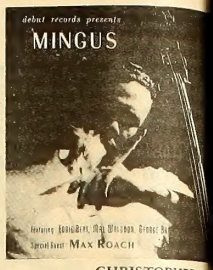
A new generation of jazz musicians has emerged in the last five years who are going back to Historical Mainstream forms. Dave Severson, the Jazz Specialist at The Prelude Record Store, explains, "it's not that jazz musicians are simply reverting to old forms, they are going back to the old feeling behind the music." Once again, jazz musicians are producing the kind of soulful sounds that one can only create using acoustic instruments. Yet, jazz musicians today are not merely imitating traditional sounds, they are experimenting and creating within the context of Historical Mainstream Jazz. Music Director of KRCC, Lenny Mazel believes that "by going back, they're going forward." Trumpeter, Wynton Marsalis clarified this paradox when he noted that traditional jazz forms are so rich and diverse that musicians can go back and explore pre-Fusion genres endlessly without stagnating.

Young notables who are creating new music with profound respect for the roots of jazz include saxophonists, Branford Marsalis and Scott Hamilton; vocalists, Bobby Mcferrin and Laurel Masse; and pianist, Michel Petrucciani, only to name a few. Two recently formed groups, "Out of the Blue," and "TRPTS" have also revisited the world of Mainstream and Cool Jazz. These musicians have been performing as well, which has contributed to the revival of the jazz club scene.

Severson noted that during the seventies, jazz artists, club managers, and retailers had to struggle to keep jazz alive. Many people lost money in order to bring jazz to the American public, and many musicians emigrated to Europe where they found more appreciation for their music. Today, more Americans are interested in jazz, and have begun to support it emotionally and financially.

The renaissance of Historical Mainstream Jazz coincided with a recent movement in the record industry to reissue old albums with original covers and liner notes. Jazz labels such as Blue Note, Prestige, Riverside, Fantasy, Verve, RCA, MCA Impulse, Capitol EMI, and Columbia have invested millions of dollars to reissue classic albums that had been out of print for over twenty years. Japanese and European companies had been reissuing classic jazz albums for years before these American firms caught on and began their own reissue series. American reissues are anywhere from half to a fifth of the cost of Japanese discs. Some of these companies are also opening up their vaults and pressing previously unreleased material from the fifties and sixties.

If you are already an old hipster, or would like to aquaint yourself with America's greatest art forms you ou check out The Prelude, Inc. (f amazing selection of reissues) at 1 Tejon in Colorado Springs, and th Record Revival (especially for first and rarities) at 2015 Broadway near in Denver. Also, tune into Col College's own KRCC (91.5 FM) fro PM and 7-12 PM during the week best in all forms of Jazz.



CHRISTOPHER D

UCCS Sales Power and Self Confi Workshop: "Sales Power and Confidence" will be offered by University of Colorado at Col Springs Division of Continuing Educ Friday, February 21, at the Embassy Hotel, from 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.

The workshop concentrates increased effectiveness in sales, instruction given in the use of the po the subconscious mind toward confi and comfort in sales situation. Also discussed are persuasive communic self-motivation, sales ethics, management, and time control.

Jeremiah Johnson, M.A., with 15 experience in sales and sales manage will teach the workshop.

Tuition is $65.00, lunch refreshments included.

For more information, call 593-3

Disney

Audition Tour '87

Two Exciting Entertainment Employment Opportunities

1. WALT DISNEY WORLD Resort, near Orlando, Florida, is casting for PROFESSIONAL DANCERS, SINGERS AND MUSICAL THEATRE PERFORMERS. Excellent salary and benefits provided.

   Requirements:

   - 18 years of age by June 1, 1987.
   - Bring current resume and non-returnable photo.
   - Must show movement ability. Everyone may be taught at least one dance/movement combination. (Bring dance attire.)
   - Singers: Memorize short vocal selection (ballads and up-tempo). Bring vocal sheet music in your key. Accompanist provided. (Dancers are encouraged to sing.)

2. Promising DANCERS and SINGERS will also be auditioned to intern in the new EPCOT Institute of Entertainment Arts at the same time.

AUDITION SITE:

Denver, Colorado
February 26 (Thursday)
The Little Auditorium
Loretto Heights College
Administration Building
3001 South Federal

AUDITION TIME:

Call is 11:00 a.m.

If you need more information on the above or on Disney college instrumentalist auditions, call Monday–Friday, 10:00 a.m.–4:00 p.m. EST: (305) 828-1576.

Walt Disney World 15 YEARS

CAFE BIJOU

DINING (& SPIRITS

• serving • lunch & light dinners, exquisite desserts & coffees
• first floor •
jazz, cocktails & hors d'oeuvres
• second floor •
Trip the night fantastic in a turn of the century hom
411 East Bijou 632-96

Bring in this ad for a free specialty drink with your lunch or dinn

izzey & Co. Sweep

weekend's sweep of Northern gan at the Broadmoor World Arena king awaited and well deserved one Colorado College hockey team. The turned the tables beating the ans by one goal Friday night 3-2, and scoring three goals, including two net ones, in the last ten minutes of game Saturday night to post a 6-3 phomore Derek Pizzey once again rned exceptionally and earned WCHA "Player of the Week" for econd time this season. Pizzey ed 96 of 101 Wildcat shots in the two series, 49 Friday night and 47 in day night's contest.

zey is not shocking the team or the commented Head Coach Mike n. "He's playing with confidence thusiasm and it's the right time of r to have a goalie playing well, going e playoffs. The backbone of a team is altending. It's often said that you a team from the net out and it's good ow that Derek will be around for er two years."

the other end of the ice CC has also working well in goal production. ugh tied with UMD, the Tigers have a total of 131 goals in 33 games ured to the Bulldogs 111. The Tigers ave scored more total goals than place Wisconsin (123) and fifth place tern Michigan (125). Rick Boh leads Tigers with 54 points, (20 goals and 34 ts), while Rob Doyle follows him with als and 32 assists for a total of 46 ts.

h scored two goals, including the winner Friday night, and had three n Saturday night in the Tigers' sweep. day night, CC came out cautiously in rst period and allowed a Northern gan shorthanded goal at 2:22. A big the blue line by Scott Campbell got ction going in the middle of the first d and a powerplay goal by Rookie of the Year Candidate Cal Brown at 14:26 evened the score. Brown took a pass from senior defenseman Dave Hardie at the red line and sakted down the right boards. He cut to the goal and forced the puck past Northern Michigan's 6'3", 195 lb. goalie Mike Jeffrey.

Boh put the Tigers on top with less than two minutes to play in the first period. Freshman Doug Kirton kept the flying puck in the zone then pushed it over to Boh. The senior calmly took control and walked in for his fiftieth point this season.

Both teams had power play opportunities in the middle frame but Pizzey and Jeffrey stood strong in the new keeping the score 2-1 at the start of the third.

NM capitalized on their first powerplay of the third period to tie the game but CC countered that goal on their only man advantage situation of the last 20 minutes. Doyle sent a blistering slapshot towards the net. Kirton jumped on the first rebound. Jeffrey stifled that attempt but was unable to control the puck. Boh at the left post picked up the loose puck and put it upstairs for the game winning goal and his second of the night.

CC held onto this precarious one goal lead through a 5-3 Wildcat powerplay during the last ten minutes of the game to post their tenth victory this year.

Penalties ruled the first period of Saturday night's game with each team receiving 5 two minute minors. Both teams scored a powerplay goal for a 1-1 game at the end of the first.

Doyle opened the scoring at 8:26 with a slapshot from the top of the right circle that went right between Jeffrey's legs. Cal Brown and Boh got the assists. NM matched that goal at 17:07.

The second period belonged to the Tigers and Pizzey. At 5:36, sophomore Guy Gadowsky took a drop pass at the blue line from fellow classmate Tim Budy.

Photo by Ernie Ferguson

Pizzer robs some stupid Wildcat who has too many consonants in his name, anyway.

Gadowsky headed for the net and let loose a shot while being tripped for goal number two. The Tigers took a 3-1 lead at 13:06 after killing a 5-3 Wildcat powerplay. Junior Doug Clarke deflected a Rob Doyle slapshot widening the margin. Pizzey was in control between the pipes making 23 saves in that 20 minutes.

The Wildcats came out fighting at the start of the third and evened the score at 3-3 by 7:44 of the period. A rebound off Pizzey's face was pounced on for number two while the third goal came amidst a mass of bodies in front of the net.

CC's game winning goal came at 10:08 when freshman Chris Anderson battled to keep the puck in the zone. He took it towards the right corner then laid a perfect pass across the front of the net. Junior Keith Hoppe was standing at the left post all alone and put that one away. Two empty net goals padded the Tigers' lead, the first by Doug Kirton and the second by Tim Budy. Budy sent the puck from behind the far blueline, around 150 feet, to the open net.

The two wins lifted the Tigers to a sixth place tie with Minnesota—Duluth with 11-21-1 records. This weekend the Tigers face archrival Denver in a home/away series. Tonight's game will be at the Broadmoor, 7:35 and Saturday night's match is at DU. Tickets for Saturday night's contest are on sale at the student center.

KATHLEEN MAHONEY

DU Sucks

kiers Go Up and Down Hill

Photo by Mark Rinehart

r Michele Fisher gasps, finally remembering that she left the cat inside out its litterbox.

The Colorado College Ski Team's performance was mixed at Purgatory Ski Area in Durango this past weekend.

The CC women's team came through with a great result in the slalom on Saturday finishing second behind Western State College. Combined with a fourth place finish in the giant slalom, the CC Lady Tigers were third for the weekend.

The women's slalom efforts were led by Kim Kepner, third place, Michele Fisher, fifth place, Cara Fleckenstein, tenth place, for the scoring positions. The rest of the squad finished in close pursuit - Julie Miller 12th, Brooks Metcalf 14th, Millie Gwiazdon 16th.

"Considering the adverse conditions of the day, 12 inches of new snow fell the night before made for real snow-bowl hill conditions and the women's second run was the men's first run course since we were pressed for time, the team did a super fantastic job in getting everyone down in the top 16." Mark Rinehart, head coach said.

The giant slalom on Friday was held under sunny skies and the women finished with a fourth place, BYU was first, Colorado Mountain College was second, Western State third and CC fourth. Top finishers for CC were Julie Miller 10th, Michele Fisher 13th, Kim Kepner 15th, Brooks Metcalf 16th, and Millie Gwiazdon finishing 26th.

The men's squad had an up and down time in Purgatory finishing third on Friday's GS and bottoming out in 8th with only one finisher in 36th place in the SL on Saturday. In the GS Durango natives Geoff Craig and Clay Colvig both Frosh, did a great job, finishing 5th and 12th respectively, Jim Grossman was 18th followed by Matt Trokel 38th and Dan Kim 44th. Kim was the only finisher in Saturday's slalom at 36th place.

"This wasn't a qualifier, so I would just as soon have an off day now and focus on doing well at Regionals in Beaver Creek this coming week." Rinehart said. "Saturday's course was sorta brutal and took forever to run, it was hard for each competitor to get up since there was so much course repair between each racer."

After two national qualifiers and two non-qualifiers, the Men are in fourth place. BYU is in first, Western State second, Colorado Mountain College third and CC. The womens team is in third behind BYU 1st, Western State 2nd.

The final qualifier is Beaver Creek Feb. 20 and 21. This race stands alone in determining the first, second and third teams overall for the season. It is also the final event for qualifying for a spot at nationals, held this year in Crested Butte March 2-5.

The top individual outside of the top two teams is CC's Jim Grossman, only four points behind Brian Olsen from CMC.

The Rocky Mountain Collegiate Ski Conference takes the top two teams to Nationals and two individuals, the top man and woman skier outside the two teams qualifying.

JOE SKI TEAM

Tigers' Last Stand

Women's Hoopsters Look to End Four Game Skid

The CC women's basketball team extended its losing streak to four games with two losses last week that dropped the Tigers' season record to 10-14. On Saturday, February 14, CC lost 76-62 at Regis, and on Thursday, February 19 at AFA, the Tigers fell to the Falcons, 72-63.

Valentine's Day was not a very merry occasion for the Tigers as another poor shooting first half doomed their quest for victory against Regis' Rangers. CC shot only 33% from both the field and the free throw line (Regis shot 52.8% from the floor and 63.3% from the line) en route to an insurmountable 40-22 halftime deficit. The Tigers got killed inside as twenty-seven of Regis' thirty-six first half shots came from eight feet or less. For the game, the Rangers amassed twenty-three offensive rebounds on the way to a 51-30 total rebounding advantage. Regis also enjoyed a tremendous advantage from the free throw line, shooting thirty-nine free throws (making twenty) to only fifteen (making eight) for CC. Overall, CC was whistled for twenty-nine personal fouls, with Kitzie Pettersen, Chris Sanchez, and Sally Bush each getting disqualified with five.

CC was again paced by Sally Bush who managed 21 points (only three of nine from the free throw line) and 8 rebounds, with Terri Livermore the only other Tiger scoring in double figures with 14 points to go along with 7 assists. Regis was keyed by Mischelle Brown, who scored 22 points and yanked down 19 rebounds (10 offensive), Tammie Brethower, who netted 20 points, and Tamara Clair, who chipped in 15 tallies.

On Thursday, CC stayed close throughout before getting zapped by the Zoomies in front of a crowd of 135 at the Academy. CC shot 35.3% from the field in the opening stanza but weren't awarded a single free throw as they fell behind, 33-24, at intermission. For the game, CC could only manage 40.6% shooting from the field, and only slightly better, 41.2% (seven of seventeen) from the line. Although AFA's free throw shooting wasn't much better (twelve of twenty-six, 46.2%), CC can't realistically expect to win too many games when they shoot that poorly.

Sally Bush gave another outstanding performance with 20 points (two of eight from the charity stripe) and 21 rebounds, both game highs. Kitzie Pettersen, Brenda Hull, and Paige Lorimer helped the CC cause with 8 points each. AFA was led by Amanda Williams with 14 points, Ashley Thorpe with 9, Dayl Ragon with 9, and Raegan Roach with 9 rebounds.

CC's final game of the 1986-87 season will be Saturday, February 21 against Colorado Christian College at El Pomar Sports Center. Despite flattering of late, the Tigers have had an excellent season, so come and cheer them on to finish the season on a high note. Tipoff is set for 7:00 p.m.

DEAN CAMPBELL

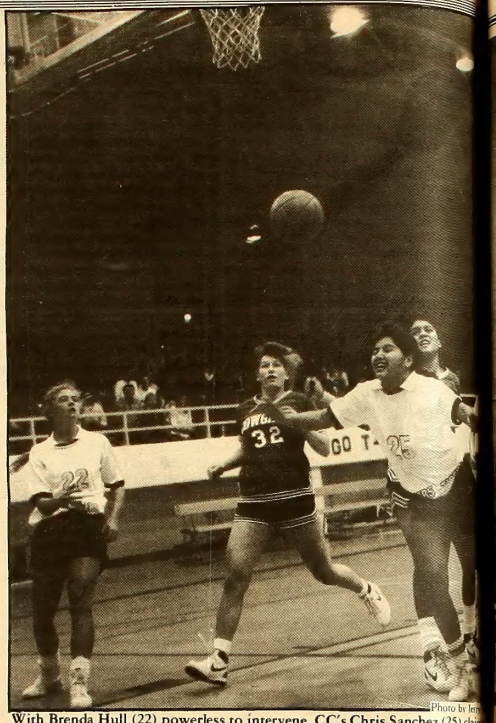

Photo by Jer

With Brenda Hull (22) powerless to intervene, CC's Chris Sanchez (25) claim blindness as the ball flies out of bounds.

Dean's Drivel

Last Tuesday, Major League baseball's best player, New York Yankee first baseman Don Mattingly, won a one year contract worth $1.975 million for the 1987 season, the largest award ever in the thirteen year history of salary arbitration. The award, which exceeded Mattingly's 1986 salary of $1.36 million and Yankee owner George Steinbrenner's offer of $1.7 million, surpassed the previous record of $1.85 million set just days earlier in the case of Detroit Tiger pitching ace Jack Morris. Though Mattingly lost the 1986 American League Most Valuable Player award to Boston Red Sox pitcher Roger Clemens, his statistics certainly were awesome: .352 batting average, 31 home runs, 113 runs batted in, 258 hits, 53 doubles, and a Gold Glove at first base. Citing the New York Mets' high priced acquisition of Gary Carter and subsequent trip to the World Series, Steinbrenner openly expressed his opinion that Mattingly's salary should necessarily elicit the same end result for the Yankees.

With the Mattinglys and Morrises of the league set to rake in such huge salaries in 1987, the question arises: Where will it all stop? If Mattingly, or anyone else, hits .360 with 50 homers, 150 RBI's and a Gold Glove, will they be paid two million or more a year? Or are the arbitrators assuming that, by paying pitchers similarly exorbitant salaries, no batter will be able to exceed the statistics, and therefore the salary, that Mattingly posted? And how does the arbitrator justify that $1.7 million for one year of service is not enough? Apparently, they continue to increase accordingly, and perhaps, indefinitely.

This idea of progressively more lucrative short-term contracts for strictly individual excellence (neither Mattingly nor Morris was able to lead their respective teams to postseason play in 1986) has dangerous implications. First, placing such a premium on individual performance will now, more than ever, serve as a source of dissension within professional teams. With individual statistics at stake, players under pressure to produce will be less likely to sacrifice their potential well being for the good of the team. So, the sort of dual ultimatum that Steinbrenner presented to Mattingly (besides getting the Yankees to the World Series, he practically demanded that Mattingly at least match his 1986 statistics) will make individual performance and team success increasingly more mutually exclusive. Though individual performances are certainly pivotal to a team's success, today's salary policies could further dismantle the already crumbling athletic team ideal of one for all and all for one.

While even more strongly emphasizing short-term success will detract from team loyalty, it will also increase the already high turnover of personnel between teams, further damaging any semblance of team loyalty. Failure to produce statistics commensurate with salary will accentuate the pressure of being released, and owners will be happy to unload overpaid players that don't live up to their salaries. Though it's pathetically idealistic to assume that any professional player really cares about his team anymore, the recent salary arbitration escalations make it even less likely that this will ever change.

Ultimately, the potential these arbitration decisions have for destroying all the positive ideals associated with athletics is frightening. While Mattingly's obvious disappointment at not being named AL MVP last year is compensated by becoming the Major League's highest paid player, 1986 World Series MVP Ray Knight's frustration at only earning $475,000 this year certainly tarnishes his personal appreciation of last year's achievement. So what will young athletes think of these role models? Will they emulate a Roger Clemens, who relatively humbly accepted an MVP award that was based not only on his personal success but his contribution to the team's success as well, or will they look up to a Mattingly, who, though undeniably excellent, seems most concerned with his own material well being? While everyone squeals about the dangers of drug using athletes as role models, what about the way we seem to justify developing a bunch of selfish and materialistic brats that can't conceive of the once noble and respected virtues of sportsmanship or teamwork? Though professional athletics has long since strayed from innocence as a positive model for these ideals, the ridiculous escalation of salary arbitration and its subsequent effects don't bode well for the future image of professional athletes.

Swimmers End Season

The final two weeks of the women's swimteam dual meet season proved very beneficial, as the Big Cats racked up 4 wins to bring their season record to 6 wins 7 losses. The Tigers topped California-Redlands, Metro State, Regis College and the School of Mines while falling to powerhouses UNC and Northern Arizona.

On Feb. 5, the women faced Redlands, and as the meet was expected to be relatively easy, many of the swimmers had a chance to try different events. Senior tri-captains Alex Trovas and Cynthia Surrett and senior Traci Telander combined forces in the 200 I.M., while Freshcat Joy Hanks turned in a respectable 100 fly in the 400 Medley Relay.

The following day, the Tigers headed up to Greeley to face the Bears and the Northern Arizona "Jacks." NAU is a very strong team, and UNC put their strongest swimmers in each event, leaving the Big Cats floundering in their wake. Di Olsen took the only Tiger firs leading teammates Marrion Lee (1 meter debut) and Kath Camp meter).

After recovering from the UN drowning, the Big Cats bounced soundly defeat Metro and Regis Feb. 12) and Mines (Sat., Feb. 14).

On Thursday, the Schmedley Re of Denise Collins, Cynthia Schmann Walsh and Chris Lutteneg off the meet with a victory, paving for 11 out of 13 first places. Robinson won the gruelling freestyle (12:15.19) while sprinte Luttenegger took the 50 free followed closely by Joe Hanks Denise Collins flew (ha! ha!) thro 200 fly (2:38.1) followed by S Walsh in her first ever 200 fly free was won by—you got it, sp queen Chris Luttenegger in an a 57.8 with Michelle Skeels takin (59.7). Trish Franciosi placed firs 200 breaststroke (2:42.04) while Alison Wolfinger placed fourth event (2:59.5). The 400 free relay Skeels, Luttenegger, Liz Stroh and Robinson wrapped up the m winning the final event of the da

On Valentine's Day, the Tigers to Golden to continue their winnin Once again the Big Cats won 11 events. Senior Tri-captain Carla R closed out her swimming career b third in the 1000 free (13:04) leading off the 2nd place 400 fre team with Tri-captain Alex smiling Becky Warren and Joy Ha to go, CARLA!

This week the Big Cats wrap season with Conference which is the Air Force Academy. For seni Trovas, Traci Trelander and Surrett, this will be their last ch collegiate competition. We hope Big Cat fans with some spare time in at the Falcon pool to cheer us on for your support, and Schmooo Schmats!!

CYNTHIA SUR

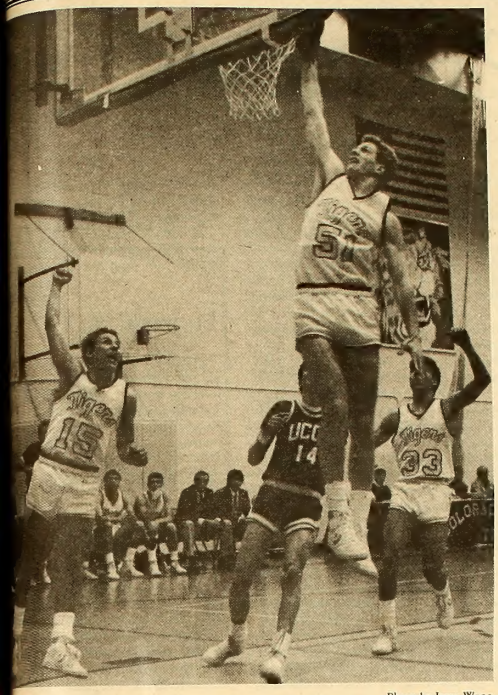

Photo by Jerry Wang

Josh Childs dunks, Jim Grantz (15) and Tom Slocum (33) raise their hands se their sure.

Big Cats Host Conference Meet

The Big Cats overshadowed the America's Cup victory this Saturday as they defeated the Colorado School of Mines at home for the first time in CC history. This spectacle came after the Tigers popped Metro State College like a zit at Schlessman pool earlier in the week, bringing their season record to 7-2.

In Thursday's meet against Metro, the CC strokers rallied to sweep the top three places in four events. This resounding defeat came as a sharp contrast to the narrow victory CC gained over Metro earlier in the season. Senior Captain Kevin "The Snake" Diffee lead the Cats with victories in both the 200 Yd. Individual Medley and the 200 Yd. Breaststroke. Roger "Perkin's" Denny flew with gossamer wings to win the 200 Yd. Butterfly, as did Freshcat Tyler "Condor" Mingstinks in the 1000 Yd. freestyle. Jay "RPM's" Latrine also rolled to an excitingly close win in the 50 Yd. Freestyle. Stellar performances were also turned in by authors Brandon Sheafor and Tom Shimotake.

At School of Mines the Big Cats started things off with a win by .63 seconds in the 400 Yd. Medley Relay (Goatchuck, Diffee, Denny, Griggs). Due to the Mines prehistoric timing system, and the severe thickness of the official's glasses, the Tigers were robbed of three first place finishes by Kevin Diffee in the 200 Yd. Individual Medley, and Tom Hackett in both the 200 Yd. and 500 Yd. Freestyles. But these unfortunate events could not deter the Big Cats from top three sweeps in both the 100 Yd. Freestyle (Levine, Griggs, Surbeck), and the 200 Yd. Breaststroke as (Diffee, Van Metre, Hulings).

Jay "RPM's" Latrine also rolled to an excitingly close win in the 50 Yd. Freestyle. Steller performances were also turned in by authors Brandon Sheafor and Tom Shimotake.

The Big Cats hope to end their season in fine fashion with another history making finish in the Intermountain Swimming League Conference Championship this Friday and Saturday at our own Schlessman pool. The schedule of events will be as follows:

Friday, February 20, 1987

2:00 p.m.
#4, 1-Meter Diving Prelims and Semifinals

Semifinals
5:00 p.m.
#6, 400 Yd. Individual Medley
#7, 100 Yd. Butterfly
#8, 200 Yd. Freestyle
#9, 100 Yd. Breaststroke
#10, 100 Yd. Backstroke
#4, 1-Meter Diving Finals
#11, 400 Yd. Medley Relay

Saturday, February 21, 1987

9:00 a.m.
#17, 3-Meter Diving Prelims and Semifinals

11:00 a.m.
#12, 1650 Y.d Freestyle (Prelims)

1:00 p.m.
#12, 1650 Yd. Freestyle (Finals)
#13, 100 Yd. Freestyle
#14, 200 Yd. Backstroke
#15, 200 Yd. Butterfly
#16, 200 Yd. Breaststroke
#17, 3-Meter Diving Finals
#18, 400 Yd. Freestyle Relay

Bogue Sets Record

Wednesday night was a record-breaking ening in many respects as the CC Tigers ddily defeated the University of orado. Colorado Springs 110-79. First all, the win marked the Tiger's 11th ory of the season, a plateau which n't been achieved by a CC men's squad ver 25 years. Second, senior Rob Bogue ed 25 points to put him in the record ks as CC's all-time single season ing champ. Bogue, who transferred two years ago from Sue Bennett Junior ege in Kentucky, has led the Tigers the ire season in scoring, averaging over 20 nts a game. In addition to leading the ver offense, the 6-2 guard has also been minated for the honor of NCAA demic All-American.

In the victory, the Tiger's second over CS this season, Bogue received ellent support from junior guard Rob mminger. Hemminger played the best ne of his career thus far hitting for 17 nts, dishing out four assists and coming with a CC single game record of 7 steals. Dave Rakel and Dave Schroeder scored 16 and 15 points respectively in the win. As a team the Tigers shot an excellent 53.8% from the field and burned the UCCS squad in virtually every statistical category. The game was CC's final home court contest of the season. The team wraps things up this weekend when they travel to Kansas to take on Sterling College tonight, and Friends Bible College on Saturday. If the Tigers win both these games they will have a .500 record for the first time in Milleniums.

The previous weekend, the Tigers split a two-game series in Denver, losing to DU Friday night 91-64, and defeating Colorado Christian College for the second time this season 107-79. In the loss to DU, Rob Bogue scored 21 and Dave Schroeder had 20 points. Against Colorado Christian, Dave Rakel hauled down a single-game record 19 rebounds while scoring 15 points. However it was, of course, Rob Bogue who set the scoring pace with 30 points.

DAVE EVANS

Date Bar
a Restaurant
UNIQUE HOMEMADE RECIPES
10% off with CC ID
Serving
Breakfast & Lunch
Mon.-Sat.
7 am - 4 pm
24 E. Kiowa
578-5693

Up a tree over airfares?
LEAF it to us...
We'll find the LOWEST rates available.

"Your Campus Travel Agency"
818 N. Tejon 636-3871

Spring Previews

Baseball

With improved hitting and consistent pitching, Head Baseball Coach Steve Mandel and Assistant Coach Dean Yost look for a big year from the 1987 CC Tiger baseball team. After losing three starters to graduation, CC will rely on a young team that boasts only five upperclassmen on its sixteen man roster.

Co-captains Kevin Larabee and Dana Rademacher will be pivotal to this season's success. Larabee, a senior from Neenah, Illinois, will anchor the Tiger infield at third base and will look to improve on last year's .326 batting average. Rademacher, also a senior, hails from Englewood, Colorado, and will again be the Tigers' stopper starting pitcher. He will try and match a freshman year performance that got him named to the NCAA Division III All-Regional team.

Other important Tigers will be catcher Mike Yost, first baseman Charley Carrel, utility infielder Scott Robertson, and pitchers Todd Meisinger, Charles Ficco and Alex Contreras. Yost, a Colorado Springs product and the team's only junior, led the Tigers in hitting last year with a .340 average. Carrel, a sophomore from exciting Birney, Montana, has improved his strength and should provide CC with some offensive power. Robertson, also a sophomore and an Arvada, Colorado native, will also be looked upon to beef up CC's power arsenal.

The pitching staff, after Rademacher, will be headed by sophomores Meisinger and Ficco, from Littleton and Denver, respectively, but a key to success this year could be the return of senior hurler Alex Contreras. Contreras, who has been bothered by a bone chip in his elbow suffered last season, has been unable to regain complete confidence in his arm since the injury. Though Coach Mandel claims "it's all mental with Alex," he admits that Contreras' return to form could be pivotal to the Tigers' success in 1987.

Overall, improved team strength and experience should guide the Tigers past last season's 10-19 record. The team's eight sophomores now have a year of experience under their belts, and increased strength should bolster the team's hitting performance.

This season, CC will be a part of a new conference, the CIBA (Colorado Intercollegiate Baseball Association), that will include CC, Metro State University, University of Denver, Colorado School of Mines and Regis college. Each team will play each of the conference's other teams five times during the course of the season to determine the conference championship. Last season, two CIBA teams, Metro and DU, were selected for the NAIA Division II Regional Playoffs, so a third place finish in the conference would be an excellent accomplishment for the Tigers. (All of the other CIBA schools have specifically baseball scholarship players that give them an obvious advantage).

CC will open the season with a doubleheader at Metro State on Sunday, March 1st. Their first home games will come Sunday, March 15th, with a noon doubleheader against Mines at Memorial Park. Come watch the CC baseball team batter the Orediggers and help cheer the Tigers on to a successful 1987 season.

DEAN CAMPBELL

Men's Tennis

Freshmen will be stepping into key roles for the Colorado College men's tennis team this year. With two returning lettermen to the squad, fifth year Coach Ken Bartz is counting on the performance of his rookies to fill the voids when the Tigers open the 1987 season, March 3, at home against the Colorado School of Mines.

Veterans Kyle Fedler and John Oscherwitz, this year's co-captains, have lettered for two years and will provide leadership for the young team. Fedler, a senior from Atlanta, GA, will be playing number two singles for the Tigers at this early point in the season. The number one spot is held by a freshman from Seattle, Bill Poll. Another freshman from the Emerald City, John Duncan, will be in the number three position. A few more challenge matches will determine where the rest of the team plays and with this week's weather, the matches have been delayed.

"Both Kyle and John played pretty well last year and I expect they will be solid for us this year. They have both inproved quite a bit," commented Bartz. "I definitely see a winning season. We have a stronger team than last year with more depth. But a lot will count on the freshmen and how they turn out, how tough they will be in a match. If you lose a couple of matches at the start it can be tough to come back."

Two more freshmen are expected to contribute to the 1987 campaign. Denver's John Born will be in the top six for CC but has been sick and unable to challenge his way in yet. Charlie Lombardelli, a California boy, also shows potential to play for the Tigers. Sophomore George Wilmer from Virginia, will also be battling for one of the six or seven spots on the team. Double teams have not been set yet, so at this point Bartz is planning on six or seven of his top men for the first match against Mines.

History shows opening against Mines should prove to be a positive experience for the Tigers.

"In the four years that I have coached, we have never lost to Mines. There have been some close matches but last year they were weak and we had no trouble with them twice," said Bartz.

Mines has two good returning players but will be also counting on their rookies.

The men's schedule this year includes the traditional bigger Division I and II schools but also the Tigers will play some of the NCAA top ranked Division III teams. Over spring break the team travels to Phoenix to play California's Redlands, teams always ranked in the top ten.

"We have everything to gain and nothing to lose by playing these teams. We should be competitive with them and should be some good matches," he commented.

If the weather clears up, the season will get under way for the tennis team right after block break.

K. MAHO

Lacrosse

Forget about the snow and cold wea... get out your shades, shorts and cold b... and get ready to come down and w... some thrilling lacrosse. This year pro... to be a victorious and exciting one fo... men's lacrosse team at Colorado Col... With twelve returning players and s... experienced freshmen and newcomers... team will be one of the most talented ... at CC.

The scoring machine will be comp... of Robbie "Duckwalk" Schwartz, ... "Little Man" Quirk, Guy "Field ... Pope, Will "2 Beers" Trousdale, ... "Stork" Anderson, Arnie "Spin" S... Ross "Let's Run" Dohrmann, and ... "One Eye" Byron, which will tabula... impressive amount of goals.

With Devin "Standstill" Standard ... goal and Jack Foster, J.B. Behring, ... Cramer, Dave Fitzgerald, Chris Be... John Hite, Andy Constan and C... Blumenschein playing defense, ... backbone of the team will halt, shut d... and damage any pursuing opponent.

The increased support from the co... and new talent brought on by freshm... Eric Petersen, Chris Allison, Seth M... Mike Alkaitis, Matt McMahon and tra... student Brian Brophy will defin... increase the number of victories fo... Tigers. Apart from the players, with ... enlightening and supportive leadersh... coach Tom "Woody" Kay and ... assistant coach Eric Sanford, how cou... tigers come close to losing a game!

The first regular season home gam... Monday, March 9 against Den... University at 3:30. Come check it out, th... sunny afternoons will be exciting and ... spent down by the lacrosse field. Also ... will get a chance to see Anj "Heist... Gardner in action.

JIM CRA...

YAKITORI

Sushi Happy - Hour

Saturday's 5 - 7 pm

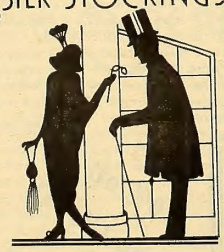
Most Pieces of Sushi $1.00 a piece*

* Some are more.

Downtown
16 E. Bijou
578-0915

Yaki-Doodle

SILK STOCKINGS

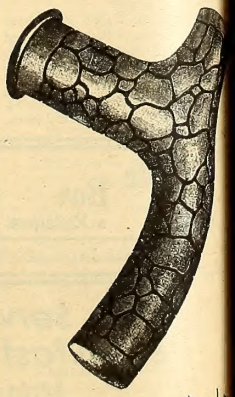


A NOSTALGIC BOUTIQUE

Antique Costume Jewelry
Equisite Clothing
Unique & Fun Accessories

126 N. Nevada Ave.
636-9640

Use this for 10% off



Just when you thought
It was Safe...

The Return Of Armadillo's Alley

Will you please welcome live from the pths of a warped mind...Iron rmadillo!!!!!...How y'all Devil rshippers doing? I think y'all are gonna possessed by this month's issue of Hell's adbangers. Coming at ya are exclusive otos of Eddie (Iron Maiden's eight foot mascot) during his appearance on the wrence Welk Show, a review of otorhead's Orgasmatron album and a life e Scratch and Sniff poster of Ozzy bourne.

What's that Dave (Dave Letterman is agent)—I'm supposed to be writing my orts column? I thought I was holding out big bucks? wait a minute, run that by again. I signed to write this column for pint of Josh and John's Ice Cream and a e's supply of Big League Chew? eeeeet. You're outa here Dave and take r dadgum Sky Cam with ya.

Actually the reason I've been gone so ng is the involuntary hibernation that k place during the Donkey's drive to the per Bowl. With each Denver win my dy's vital signs slowed and if the Donk's d won I would have been a gonner. kily they didn't. Nice job Giants.

Did y'all read about Don Mattingly ining his salary arbitration? He will ke $1.975 million to swing his big stick xt year. These big contracts are getting a le excessive. Couldn't we just pay them cha shakes?

It is pretty obvious America's newest orts hero Dennis "Quadruple Chin" ner has consumed an Indian Ocean nth of Mocha shakes. The entire erica's Cup competition was a nseating display of American notism. The emphasis placed upon a ere rich boy's sailboat race is disturbing. ge be becoming a nation of insecure flag vers? Our victory was hailed as an ample of American desire and chnology. Wait till the Japanese enter the mpetition, who knows what they will me up with?

The Hoops scene is heating up and on e college front North Carolina is the am to beat. The Tar Heels have it all, ey are a blend of experience and youth d can take it to you in the paint or sink ng range bombs. The only thing that uld keep them from winning it all is the ck of a three point line. It has got to be oved back to a more challenging distance. is so close Dick Vitale could can em. rry, gotta run, the pro bowling tour just me on and I wouldn't miss that citement for anything, not even merica's Cup.

Intramural Basketball Standings

Men's A League

NBA East
Phi Slamma Jamma	6-0
Death Zone	3-0
Dynasty	2-4
Lay It In There Bro	2-2
Chuck & the Dunkin Dogs	1-2
The Joepa's	2-3

NBA West
Guests	5-0
Sky-Dowgs	3-2
Larrabeeeee	2-3
Syzygy	2-3
Faculty	0-4
Mike Evans & Co	0-5

Men's B League

G.P.D.A.	4-0
Head Busters	3-0
3-Pointers	3-1
Iron Wooglin	1-0
Sigma Chi	2-1
Enola Gay	2-2
McGregor	2-2
Rockem-Sockem	1-1
KGB	1-2
Run-Ya-Ragged	0-1
Spander Lust	1-3
Schlav	0-3
Scrawg-Dawgs	0-4

Freshmen

Ernie Grunfeld Fans	5-0
Short and White	4-1
Hardcore	4-2
Jammasters	4-2
Nedimis Hoops	2-3
Social Pros	0-3
Teenage Mutant N.T.	0-4
Naked Wing	0-4

Women's Basketball

Just Awesome	2-0
Hot Shots	1-1
Jungle Women	0-2

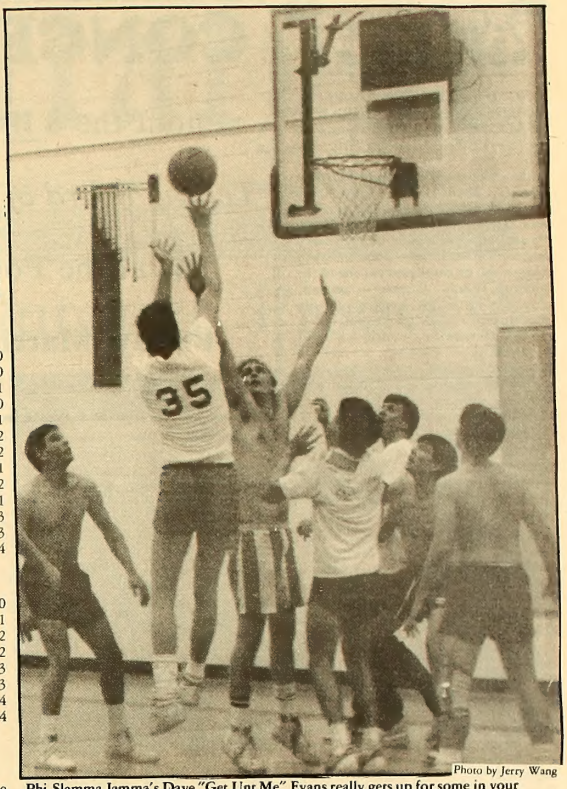


Photo by Jerry Wang

Phi Slamma Jamma's Dave "Get Unt Me" Evans really gets up for some in your face defense as Mike "Lance" Casper (extreme left) and Ron "Some" Warner (extreme right) stand around stupidly.

SKI CONDITIONS AS OF 8:00 AM, 2/19/87

ARAPAHOE BASIN	1"	48"P-PP
ASPEN HIGHLANDS	2"	51"P-PP
BUTTERMILK	T	35"PP
SNOWMASS	1"	48"PP
ASPEN MOUNTAIN	1"	58"PP
PURGATORY	T	77"P-PP
BEAVER CREEK	1"	39"P-PP
COPPER MOUNTAIN		42"PP
CRESTED BUTTE	T	48"PP
KEYSTONE-NORTH PEAK	1/2"	48"P-PP
LOVELAND BASIN	2"	53"P-PP
MONARCH	2"	73"P-PP
PURGATORY	T	77"P-PP
SKI COOPER		28"PP
STEAMBOAT	T	48"PP
SUNLIGHT		46"PP
TELLURIDE		70"P-PP
VAIL	2"	43"P-PP
WINTER PARK		40"PP
MARY JANE	T	55"PP
WOLF CREEK	11/12"	104"P-PP

Sport Shorts

The men's club hockey team travels to Vail this weekend for a weekend series with the Vail Men's team. The first game will be Friday night at 8:15 with another game Saturday night at 7:30. The men are looking to hold onto their winning record of 5-4. So if all this snow has you heading for the mountains this weekend, apres ski, head for the ice rink at Vail right near Lion's Head and support the Tigers.

This weekend the women's hockey club is also heading for the mountains. The team travels to Aspen to face the Aspen Motherpuckers in a two game series, Saturday night and Sunday morning. The Tigers coming off a big 5-4 upset against the Denver Bandits, are looking to extend this winning streak to two or maybe even three games.

Hair Designers for Men & Women

RAPUNZEL

Style cuts, Cellophanes, Perms & Color.

Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.

Stop in or make your appointment:

827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

ANNOUNCEMENTS

"AT CC"

NOTIFICATION OF LEAVE OF ABSENCE AND WITHDRAWAL DEADLINES. Applications available in the Dean's Office, Armstrong Hall, room 213.

The deadline for requesting a leave of absence is MARCH 1 for a leave which begins in the fall semester. Students are encouraged to apply for a leave even if they are awaiting word of their acceptance to a program. On formal application, a leave of absence will be considered for one of the following reasons: financial or personal emergency, ACM programs, the Washington Semester, or study abroad.

The withdrawal form must by submitted by MARCH 1. However, it may be considered "pending" up until May 1 if the student so requests. All students who decide to interrupt their education at Colorado College, and who do not qualify for a leave of absence, or who wish to transfer to another institution, are expected to withdraw formally from the College. Students who fail to submit an intention to withdraw by March 1 forfeit the general obligation deposit.

START PRACTICING! If you like to sing, dance, act or play instrument, AUDITIONS for the Annual Student/Alumni Association Talent Show will be held march 3rd and 4th! More information will be publicized.

General Studies 109—Creative Speaking—will be offered as an adjunct course from the beginning of March until the beginning of May. The course will include presentations by Colorado College faculty and visitors. Various topics including critique abilities, argumentation and debate, legal communication, and political communication will be covered. Requires consent of Professor Cronin, Palmer 211, or Professor Johnson, Armstrong 221.

Josephine Lazarus
Instruction in the Yogas
(303) 475-9721

MOUNTAIN BIKE FOR SALE. Panasonic ATB 19 inch. Price negotiable, call 473-5831 evenings.

Theme house aplications will be available the week of February 23 in the Office of Residential Life. Applications are due April 7, 1987.

CONCERNED

about the 8 BLOCK PLAN?

Let the Board of Trustees know!

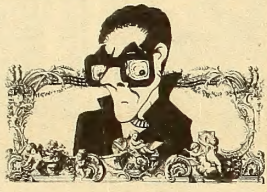
Be at the Football Field

Friday, March 6, 12 Noon

-- (Sponsored by CCCA) --

All Interested In Jazz: Cleo Parker Robinson Dance ensemble is coming to CC to do a jazz workshop, compliments of Dance Workshop. Sunday, March 8, 1:30, Cossit. Be there and share the fun!

College Students earn $6-$10 per hour working part time on campus, for more information call 1-800-932-0528.



Tutt Library Power Outage—Saturday, Feb. 28 & Sunday, March 1—Change in Block Break Hours: Wednesday, Feb. 25, 8:00 a.m.-Midnight; Thursday, Feb. 26, 8:00 a.m.-Midnight; Friday, Feb. 27, 8:00 a.m.-Midnight; Saturday, Feb. 28, NO POWER, 9:00 a.m.-5:00 p.m. Books only will be paged from the stacks and charged out. No in-building use of library materials; and Sunday, March 1, IF NO POWER, Book paging, Noon-5:00 p.m. IF POWER RESTORED, regular hours, Noon-Midnight.

Spring Break Trip to South Padre Island from only $159. For information call Abby at 636-1022.

There will be a meeting of all students interested in the French Program in Perpignan and Paris. Former participants have been invited to speak about their own experience. This is the time to ask important questions regarding all aspects of the program, as well as about the town and surroundings from a true native. Dominique Chaminaud, French House Head Resident and French Adjunct Instructor. Place: Haskell House; Date: Thursday, March 5, at 3:00 p.m. Refreshments.

At Shove this week:
February 24th - MEDITATION — 8:00 8:30 a.m. Music, silence, mystical and other writings (enter by northeast door)
February 24th - 12:00 (noon) Shove Chapel Lounge. Meeting with Rabbi Rosengarten, representative from University of Chicago Divinity School. All students interested in graduate theological education, especially Comparative Religion, are invited to join. Lunch will be served. R.S.V.P. x638 (by Monday noon)

The Weekly Crossword Puzzle

ACROSS

1 Indefinite number
4 Backbone
9 Recede
12 Native metal
13 Singing voice
14 Type of cross
15 Climbing palm
17 One who shirks duty
19 Encourage
21 Symbol for tin
22 Lean
25 Cover
27 Sharpen
31 Slender shoot
32 Arguments in writing
34 According to 35 By way of
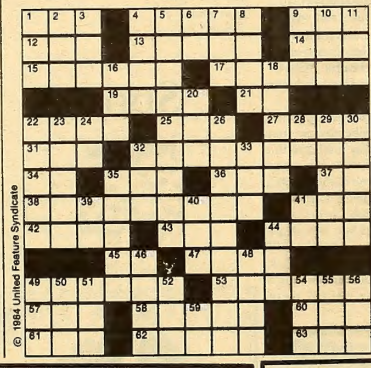
36 Parcel of land
37 Ancient Roman weight
38 Forced delay
41 Hailf
42 Verve
43 Shade tree
44 Winter vehicle
45 Article
47 Animation
49 Posted
53 Announcement
57 Lubricate
58 Deep sleep
60 Beam
61 Inquire
62 Plague
63 Female sheep

DOWN

1 In honor of
2 Period of time
3 Damp
4 Pierce
5 Enter into
6 Surrounded by
7 Negative
8 Transgresses
9 Greek letter
10 Prohibit
11 However
16 Make into leather
18 Insufficiently adapted
20 Pedal digit
22 Barter
23 Hostelry
24 The same: Latin
26 Cream-colored Arabian horses
28 Exists
29 Depart
30 Ancient chariot
32 Metal
33 Measure of weight
35 Open to bribery
39 Symbol for tantalum
40 Sick
41 Indian mulberry
44 Deposit
46 Bird's home
48 Golf cry
49 Extinct flightless bird
50 Three-toed sloths
51 Kind
52 Female deer
54 Anger
55 Cry of crow
56 Organ of sight
59 Parent: colloq.



© 1984 United Feature Syndicate

"You know, I have a confession to make, Bernie. Win or lose, I love doing this."

"Doing what you like is freedom Liking what you do is happiness"

Apply for the best job on campus:
Be a Student Career Advisor in 1987-88

Being an SCA provides an opportunity to learn about your own personal and professional goals while assisting other students with theirs.

Pick up an application from
THE CAREER CENTER
Ticknor Hall, South 473-2233, ext. 426

323 N. Tejon
The Kennel Club
Where all the topdogs are Jumbo chairbroiled dogs
Daily homemade specials
Soups and Chili
Customers say "Great food at reasonable prices!"
323 N. TEJON 473-7405
50% off with coupon
Good Feb 8 through Feb 28

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado March 7 1987 Volume 21, No. 6

Tigers, Pizzey Outduel Pioneers

been a long time coming but the ndo College hockey team is in the d round of the Western Collegiate ey Association playoffs. Not since the ing upset of Wisconsin in 1981 have Tigers advanced in post-season play. the sixth seed knocked-off number Denver University in last weekend's goals series 4-2 and 3-2.

th the two victories over the ers, CC raised its overall record to 16- The Tigers have won five of their last mes and seven of their last 11. They ed the WCHA regular season with a 2-1 mark in league play, good for sixth before eliminating defending erence champion Denver from post- n action. DU finished third in the HA standings this season.

phomore goalie Derek Pizzey brook, B.C.) was the hero both nights weekend, making 35 saves Friday and ore in Saturday's triumph. Pizzey ed three DU breakaways in the d period Saturday when CC rallied to tome a 2-0 Denver lead.

e Tigers came from behind in both s. On Friday, senior winger Gord aker's (Edmonton, Alb.) second goal econtest tied the score at 2-2 with 6:59 in the third period. Senior center Rick (Kamloops, b.C.) and junior seman Doug Clarke (Weston, Ont.) d tallies at 8:28 and 10:10, giving CC goals in a span of 3:11.

The Pioneers jumped out to an early 2-0 lead Saturday, tying the series at 4-4 while outshooting CC, 12-2, inthe first period. Freshman right winger Doug Kirton (Elmvale, Ont.) negated the two goals by scoring twice for CC in the opening five minutes of the second frame, and Pizzey blanked Denver the rest of the way. Sophomore center Guy Gadowsky (Edmonton, Alb.) notched the game's winning goal at 4:40 of the third period.

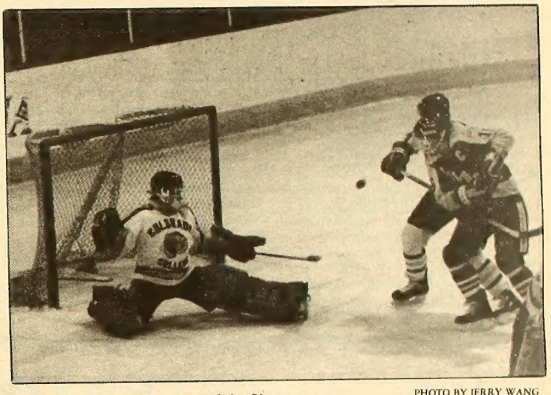
Boh, the Tigers' leading scorer this season, picked up four points (one goal, three assists) in the series to improve his season total of 62. Clarke had three points (one goal and two assists, all in Friday's triumph) while four other CC players chipped in with two each for the weekend.

Now with a three game winning streak, the team travels to North Dakota this weekend. The fighting Sioux are in first place in the WCHA and have held the number one ranking in the country for most of this season. UND only lost six games out of a forty-one game schedule. One of those losses was handed to them by the Tigers at the Broadmoor World Arena back in December, a 3-2 decision.

In the other meetings between the two teams this year, the Sioux won a close one at the Broadmoor in overtime but in North Dakota it was all the home team.

Last weekend the Sioux eliminated last

Continued on p. 17



Pizzey and crew off to land of the Sioux. PHOTO BY JERRY WANG

C Grad Published

lum pens Newsweek cover story

here do we go from here? A 1976 CC duate has taken one route that has ed him Newsweek's longest-ever r story. Gregg Easterbrook's recent, nsive article on "The Revolution Medicine" runs twenty-six pages, ng a Newsweek precedent for such in- h coverage of a topic. How did erbrook make the transition from CC Newsweek? In a recent interview, erbrook shared his story and his views how students can break into the petitive field of journalism.

asterbrook graduated from CC in 1976 a degree in political science and a ster of experience as Catalyst editor. then spent a year at Northwestern versity's journalism school in Chicago re he earned a Master's degree. erbrook stressed the importance of a d liberal arts education as the best kground for journalism. He questions importance of graduate study, ever. "There's a debate about whether ple should go to journalism school. I up taking a year of journalism ol...and I have mixed feelings about ther that was really necessary or not. I d say that the majority of journalists editors that I have come into contact are against journalism school. Some them actively avoid journalism school graduates. They say that they would much rather have somebody with a basic background in political science, English, American Civilization or any of the kinds of prime liberal arts fields because general knowledge of society is more important preparation for a career as a journalist anyway. The rules and basic procedures of journalism you can learn pretty fast if you're a smart person."

Easterbrook underscores the need for students interested in journalism to get constant practice in writing. He found his job with a trade magazine helpful in honing his writing skills. For a couple of years after journalism school, Easterbrook worked for Waste Age, a trade magazine on the toxic waste industry. He identifies trade magazines as the "starting point" for many young journalists today, citing the decrease in the number of daily newspapers around the country as a reason for the shift to trade magazines.

"In retrospect, it was worth the time," commented Easterbrook about his experience with Waste Age. "I know a lot of people who are deeply shocked at starting as anything less than the editor of the foreign affairs section of the New York Times, but it's actually not so bad to work for a specialized publication as long as you

Continued on p. 8

Faculty Favors Divestment

In a 60 to 8 vote (with four members abstaining), the faculty voted in favor of a resolution to divest CC's stock held in companies that support Apartheid in South Africa. The faculty debated divestment and held the vote by secret ballot at the February faculty meeting on Monday, February 23rd.

The resolution asks the College's Board of Trustees "to divest, with all deliberate speed, the Colorado College's stock from all companies that have operations in South Africa or maintain franchise agreements with South African management teams."

According to Tom Wenzlau, the College's Vice-President of Business and finance, "Seven of the 42 companies currently in the college's $90 million equity investment portfolio do business in South Africa."

The trustees agreed at their November meeting to review the matter of investment with U.S. corporations doing business in South Africa during their March quarterly meeting.

That decision to review stemmed in part from the fact that several U.S. institutions were exiting South Africa. Other considerations included: the concern demonstrated by CC students, about 25 of who led an anti-apartheid demonstration on campus in November; and Rev. Leon Sullivan's announcement last summer that he was dissatisfied with the effect of the Sullivan Principles which he had formulated.

Sullivan, who has been on the board of directors of General Motors since 1971, had suggested some general guidelines—for non-discriminatory hiring and for integration of workplace facilities—for corporations doing business in South Africa. Sullivan has announced his intent to withdraw support of those guidelines in May if more significant reforms in the structure of Apartheid are not made.

Jeff Livesay, sociology professor and CCCAA member, spoke at the meeting in favor of the resolution. He noted that in 1978, when the Board decided to use the Sullivan principles as a guideline for investment policies, it recognized that ethical considerations were important

Continued on p. 2

INSIDE

Groids on the Rack
Page 3

Scandalous Social Behavior Continues
Page 9

Hendrickson Questions Divestment
Page 13

Furs Pelted
Page 15

Women's Basketball
Massacres Opposition Page 17

Vintage Bemis Poem
Page 20

What's News?

Analyzing Current Issues

The Tower Commission's report on the Iran-contra scandal has dominated the news this past week. Reactions to the document have been as diverse as its readers. Predictably partisan responses have emerged from both Democrats and Republicans. The consensus among almost all, however, is that President Reagan made grave mistakes, whether he actually sanctioned the illicit activities or whether his removed leadership style encouraged such irresponsibility.

In a speech Wednesday night, March 4th, Reagan admitted that he is fully responsible and accountable for the scandal. Yet, by the time he had finished his speech, he was asking to move on, to put the scandal behind him. He had identified three areas where he intended to make changes in order to restore order in his "household": personnel, national security policy, and the process by which decision making is made. Most commentators recognized a sincerity in Reagan's words. But what will the long-term affects of the Iran-contra affair be? Soothed by Reagan's rhetoric, can we so easily move on, leaving unanswered the innumerable questions that have arisen as the U.S. has been forced to critically assess itself?

Most persistent among the questions this past week is how the appointment of Howard Baker as the new Chief of Staff will affect the last two years of Reagan's presidency. Can Baker help restore integrity to the Presidency which many, both in the U.S. and abroad, now view with some cynicism? Beloved on the Hill, Baker is known for his ability to compromise. As a report in the New York Times says, his life "has been devoted to narrowing differences, not dramatizing them." Most agree that Baker is a strategic choice. His popularity with Congress will help bridge an ever-widening gap between the White House and Capitol Hill. But does the appointment of Baker solve the problem that led to Reagan's faux pas? How easily can Reagan readjust the process by which he governs? Even in his speech, Reagan clung to the idea that his leadership style has served him well over the years. Does a change in personnel guarantee a change in the process of decision making?

Predicting how Baker's appointment will affect the 1988 presidential campaign has intrigued many as well. Does the elimination of Baker from the field of potential Republican candidates merely enhance the chances of other Republican front runners, such as Bush and Dole? Or will the Democrats, as many believe, ride the wave of Reagan's scandal right into the White House. Speculation has focused in the past few days on whether Reagan can restore the momentum of his presidency, with the appointment of Baker, that he can help pave the way for a Republican in '88.

Reaction in Europe and in the Soviet Union has raised some less amusing questions. Has the scandal made such a farce of the presidency that as some reports indicate, most Europeans now think that Gorbachev "has the edge over Reagan?" What is the price of such a loss of credibility? Will the international reverberations of the Iran-contra affair have a pronounced effect on future arms control negotiations?

And what about Nicaragua? As investigations continue, the possibility remains that more embarrassing facts will surface about the still cloudy contra connection. How will these revelations affect the already pronounced rift between the U.S. and Nicaragua?

Does Reagan's speech and the initiation of changes at the White House constitute a resolution to the Iran-contra affair? Or will Reagan continue to run a "hands-off" presidency?

NEWS EDITORS

Reagan Faces the Nation

Faculty Resolution for Divestment

Continued from p. 1

factors in investment practices. "It has become clear that the Sullivan principles don't work," Livesay said. He and others who support the resolution perceive an inconsistency in a Board policy which abides by the Sullivan principles when even Rev. Sullivan, himself, has threatened to withdraw his name from the Principles. Livesay believes that there is "no foundation of ethical legitimacy" in the Sullivan principles and that the current investment policy of the college is therefore unethical.

Livesay cited the impressive list of colleges and universities throughout the U.S. who have already decided to divest. Among the 125 are Carlton, Georgetown, Amherst, Duke, Harvard, Williams and Yale. Livesay believes that it is hypocritical for the College to teach leadership, but not to take an active leading role in the decision to divest. Livesay believes that the College's "failure to act breeds cynicism" and undermines the efforts of teachers who try to teach values that Apartheid shatters.

Of the 72 faculty members at the meeting, most who spoke up supported the resolution. History professor, Bill Hochman noted, "We are not a political body, but there are some issues that transcend our normal limitations. We should be able to make a statement on extreme issues." Dean of the College, Glenn Brooks, had raised the question of whether divestment should be more a matter of "individual conscience." He couldn't remember a time when the faculty considered such a public policy issue.

Faculty members debated whether support of the resolution would be a symbolic act or whether the members would be willing to back up their support with potentially lower salaries as a result of the possible financial risks of divestment.

Joe Pickle, religion professor, noted the lack of any kind of faculty statement concerning South Africa. "When are we ready to say something?" said Pickle. "Do we really expect the Board to say something if we have not already made a statement?"

Reaction to the vote varied. President Riley spoke after the vote stressing that "the Board's position on divestment is separate from its position on Apartheid. The Board has always thought Apartheid to be indefensible," said Riley. If they reaffirm their current investment policy, the decision shouldn't be interpreted as CC's sanction of Apartheid, said Riley.

Sociology professor, Margie Duncombe, commented that "the vote says that this faculty is willing to vote decisively against Apartheid. The vote indicates the depth of support for the resolution. I can't think of a vote that has had this margin of support." Duncombe hopes that given its commitment to the Sullivan Principles, the Board will see the contradiction in the

Continued on p. 4

News Briefs

BACCHUS Receives Award

The 1986 Colorado College Alcohol Awareness Week, which took p November 3-7 of last year, was selected as one of five winning programs for National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week Awards. The Inter-Association T Force on Alcohol Issues judged CC's program to be one of the five best in country based on the type of activities sponsored, the level of participation, use resources, and impact of the week's activities.

National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week is an annual event sponsored BACCHUS on the CC campus. As a result of the group's work and the high leve student and staff participation throughout the week, the College will receive $1 for its scholarship fund at the National Association of Student Person Administrators Conference in March.

Federal Reserve Governor to Speak

Wayne D. Angell, a member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Rese System, will speak at Colorado College at 8:15 p.m. Thursday, March 12th in Ga Common Room. The talk will be on the outlook of the national economy for 19 and the priorities that should be considered as to monetary policy. It is enti "The Federal Reserve in the American Economy: Monetary Policy Priorities."

He is coming to give the H. Chase Stone Memorial Lecture, established by a g of the First National Bank. The H. Chase Stone Memorial Lecture allows Color College to bring distinguished members of the banking and financial communit the campus on an annual basis.

Senior Class Events

Hello seniors! In keeping with our monthly tradition, we have a great ev planned for the month of March.

The first event is coming up real soon. We have planned a SENIOR MIXER Wednesday, March 11 at E. Rigby's. For those of you who don't know, it's located the Pioneer Plaza near Circle and Uintah, behind the Cheer's Liquor Store A regulars of E. Rigby's might notice that the place is usually closed on Wednesd Well seniors, they are opening the doors just for us; you got it—CC exclusive! T festivities start at 5 p.m. and last through 7 p.m. We have arranged for free lo (Chinese is the rumor) and reduced drink prices. Come on out for a great stu break!

Did you know there are presently 468 members in the Class of 1987?! T makes us bigger than the normal graduating class. So let's ALL get to this ne mixer. If you haven't been to one yet, try it. I'm sure you'll like it. For you regula bring a friend. The more the merrier!!

ANITA WAL

Lecture on California Condor Announced

Dr. Noel Snyder, an internationally-known ornithologist, will be speaking on th California Condor project at 8 p.m. Wednesday, March 11, in Packard Hall.

Snyder, head of the Condor field team from 1980-86, will be discussing federa policies of endangered species management, using the California Condor as a foc point.

A former professor at the University of Florida, Snyder has appeared on Pu television in broadcasts about the Condor project as well as his current work wi thick-billed parrots in southeastern Arizona.

The talk will be free and open to the public. In addition, there will be a vide presentation detailing the field team's efforts to save the Condor to be shown in th basement of Tutt library at 7:30 p.m. on Tuesday, March 10.

Student Special

NO APPOINTMENT NECESSARY

GREAT EXPECTATIONS PRECISION HAIRCUTTERS

Hair Care with the Personal Touch

20% off all Services (w/Ad or ID)

	REGULAR PRICE	YOUR PR
Just—A—Cut	5.95	4.7
Shampoo & Cut	6.95	5.5
Shampoo, Cut & Blow dry	10.95	8.7
Shampoo & Set	7.95	6.3
Colorings	(from) 24.95	19.9
Perms	(from) 24.95	19.9

CC

6 Southgate Road (Southgate Mall) 520-9957

Mon. - Fri. 8 - 7 Sat. 8 - 5 Sun. 11 - 5

Family Hair Care with the Personal Touch

Saudi Arabia: A Moderating Force

Last Wednesday at Palmer Hall, noted Middle Eastern scholar Joseph Kostiner lectured about Saudi Arabia's dwindling influence, its role in the Iranian arms scandal, and its response to the American bombing raid on Libya. Kostiner, whose credentials include a Ph.D. at the London School of Economics and a stint with the Harvard Institute for International Affairs, gave the lecture as part of the American Professors for Peace in the Middle East' circuit of U.S. colleges.

Kostiner opened by pointing out that the Saudi political stance should not be viewed in reference to superpower relations, but in reference to conditions in the Middle East. Chief among these conditions are Saude Arabia's small population (8 million), its resulting inability to protect its borders, and its proximity to the trouble spots of Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, and marxist South Yemen. Because of these conditions, the Saudis believe that direct invasions, terrorist acts, and political subversion would be difficult to repel, and instead have concentrated on moderating conflicts before they spread into the country.

Kostiner reviewed Saudi Arabia's success as a moderating force in the Middle East during the 1970's, noting that "During this period, the U.S. viewed Saudi Arabia as a moderate force helping to spread a pro-western aura over the Middle East." Saudi Arabia acted as an intermediary between the West and Middle East, assisting U.S. political initiatives as well as acting to hold down oil prices within OPEC.

Continued on p. 4

Kappa Sig's Under Fire

On Friday, February 20, CC hosted DU at the Broadmoor World Arena, in what turned out to be a depressing loss to the Pioneers of Denver. More disappointing to long-time CC hockey fan, Vice-President of Student Life Max Taylor, was the inter-period Kappa Sigma initiation show. The Kappa Sigma action (having the pledges line-up and parade around the arena in solely their boxers) brought stern, accusing looks Taylor's way. Many recognize his loyalty to the team and affiliation with CC, and "held me personally responsible," said Taylor.

In the late 1970's, public support for the hockey program was low, due to excessive antics by student fans. This detracted from the game, and became too offensive for fans in the community. By curbing such conduct, Taylor, Dick Taber, and others, have brought renewed interest in the team from the community. "Dick Tabor and I have worked for many years to build up the hockey program, To amass city-wide support and respect." Taylor feels the Kappa Sigma action flew in the face of that positive progress he helped produce.

At a meeting between Taylor, Bob Pelley (Assistant to the DEan, and Hall Director at Mathias), and the Kappa Sigma leaders, Taylor conveyed his approval of the fraternity system and their support of the hockey program. However, he also strongly criticized the actions at the Broadmoor as clearly tarnishing the reputation of the college and the hockey program, as well as violating the new hazing laws enacted a year ago. The Kappa Sigma's added, that they "did not intend to offend anyone," but hoped only "to get the fans excited." They offered an apology to anyone who took offense. Nonetheless, as a result of Taylor's humiliation, and initiation of disciplinary measures, the Kappa Sigma's have been put before the Student Conduct committee.

The Committee is made up of both students and faculty, and the reviewing of the actions at the Broadmoor is confidential. The Committee will review not only the actions in their public context, but also whether or not they violate the new CC hazing laws. This review will be the first since the enactment of these laws, and many recognize that there's a fine line between what is and is not hazing. "I am all for activities that promote group cohesion and solidarity," explained Taylor, "but when the pledges feel humiliation or physical discomfort, then we have hazing." The Committee's decision will help the fraternities define, for themselves and the Administration, where this line should be drawn.

Taylor feels the decision for disciplinary action will be more justly served by the Committee than by any personal action he could take. He stresses that he is "perfectly willing to accept the decision of the Committee." The Kappa Sigma's "have taken seriously the comments that have been made," but stress that they want "to make more public the more positive and constructive activities partaken" by the fraternity. They feel its "too bad that an event like this gets so much publicity and other things go by without notice." The Student Conduct Committee's confidential meetings begin today (Friday, March 6), and their decision will be forthcoming.

PETER LOACH

CCCA Update

Council Business

The student rally for involvement in the academic programming process (8 block year plan and alternatives) is ready for March 6. The council worked out some advertising details. The council then voted to begin a petition drive for the March 13th meeting of the Board of Trustees Student Affairs Committee.

CCCA voted to join the CCCAA in calling for the divestment of CC-held stocks issued by companies doing business in South Africa.

The CCCA officers and Student Concerns Committee chairperson are preparing a presentation for the March 13th meeting of the Board of Trustees Student Affairs Committee.

CCCA meets in AH 259A on 1st and 3rd Tuesdays at 3:30. The meetings are open to all.

JON-MARK PATTERSON

PIZZA SHUTTLE
Open Daily at 11:00 AM
$2.00 (Plus Tax) Six Pack 16 Oz. Drinks Of Your Choice
578-8686
Coupon Expires 4/10/87
One Coupon Per Order • Road & Weather Conditions Permitting

DOMINO'S PIZZA
TWO 12" ONE TOPPING PIZZAS FOR $9.14
(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.
Continued By Popular Demand
DOMINO'S PIZZA DELIVERS FREE.
All Pizzas Include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.
Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95
Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers, Extra Cheese (1 item) Double Cheese (2 items) Thick Crust, Extra Sauce
Each Item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19
Ask about our Group Discount (on 5 or more pizza orders).
We accept checks.
Prices do not include tax. Our drivers carry less than $20.00.
Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.
One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!
For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same!), and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings.
Two 12" pizzas will only cost you:
Superb cheese $7.95
1 topping $9.14
2 toppings $10.33
3 toppings $11.52
4 toppings $12.71
5 toppings $13.90
6 toppings $15.09
Twice the pizza for one low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minute or less, GUARANTEED!
Offer may expire anytime
635-1511
Limited Delivery Area
Our drivers carry less than $20
AVOID THE NOID CALL DOMINO'S PIZZA
30 minute guarantee
If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes, present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off your order.
One coupon per pizza.
Fast, Free Delivery
Good at listed locations.

Focusing on U.S. Exploits in Okinawa

It's a matter of ordinary people — not the military, not politicians — just ordinary people trying to change a situation," began retired United Methodist minister Harold Rickard in his presentation "Okinawans: A Forgotten Island People" last Tuesday, sponsored by A.S.I.A. and the Pikes Peak Area Big Mountain Support Group. He was referring to the exploitation of this Japanese island by the United States Military since 1945. Rickard and his wife spent thirty years working with the National Council of Churches on Peace and Disarmament, in Okinawa until 1981.

In his talk, Rickard kept the emphasis on the plight of the Okinawan people and their fight against this exploitation, by handing out information and urging participation in a postcard campaign. In addition to the discussion, he also showed a series of slides tracing the American military buildup on the beautiful subtropical island.

So what's going on down there, anyway? Despite its significance as the location for the last and bloodiest battle of World War II, most people's knowledge of Okinawa extends only as far as what was revealed in "The Karate Kid, Part II." As it turns out, the island has been the center of a very real post-war drama of its own. Following the War, as Japan was forced to destroy all its armed forces, the United States began its occupation of Okinawa. At first, the American soldiers were seen as liberators of a war-torn island which had seen one-third of its civilian population killed. However, with the onset of the Korean conflict, Washington's policy of peaceful occupation changed drastically. Arriving in 1951, Rickard claims "we watched a reservoir of hope dry up before our very eyes." As he witnessed, farms and villages were taken by the U.S. military at gunpoint to make room for expanded military bases. Gradually, nearly half of the island, including acres of prime farming land in the South, was simply stolen away from the people. This process has continued with support from both Washington and Tokyo, destroying the small island's self-supporting economy of farming and fishing. "Three words should serve as a basis of everything we think about tonight. To the Okinawans, "land is life." But today, Rickard noted, "[Okinawa's] main importer is the United States, and the main product is War." Despite the fact that the island was given back to Japan in 1972, the American bases remain. One student noted that were the island liberated from its strategic status, the burden would only be shifted by the US to another nearby island. Rickard agreed, and added "[the military presence] has gotten out of hand. It has become so entrenched there that it's going to be very difficult to get rid of."

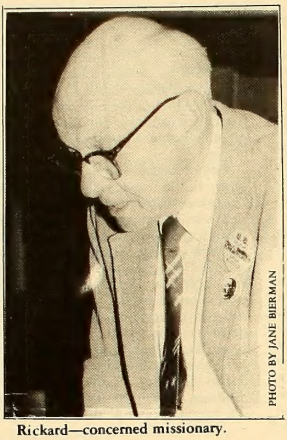

PHOTO BY JANE BIERMAN

Rickard—concerned missionary.

Japan's principle not to produce, store, or introduce nuclear weapon onto their national soil has been defied on the island by the U.S. military. Though the presence of nuclear arms on Okinawa has been denied by both Tokyo and Washington, Rickard claimed he had encountered workers who were building military storage units in a confidential project. Also, he and many of the people he had worked with had made a collection of the used mock nuclear weapons they found around the many target ranges on the island, and he questioned the use of these models by a base not intended as the site of a nuclear offensive.

Today the Okinawan people put up with the exploitation of their land as best they can. Rickard and his wife report school children studying with the continual noise of low-flying jets as a background. A sacred mountain is used for target practice. Farmers collect grasses from other firing ranges when those ranges are "cold:" When they are "hot," it is not unlikely for a nearby house to be demolished by a stray shot. But Rickard also spoke of progress being made towards demilitarization: the Okinawa Anti-War Landowner's Association has refused to accept any new offers of money to rent the land for militaristic purposes. A campaign is also being organized to protest the United States' contract on the island which will be up for renewal this May. The opponents of American occupation fear that if the contract is renewed, especially upon the Reagan Administration's recommendation of twenty years, the island will be as good as lost. Rickard sees it as his responsibility in this dilemna to educate as many people as he can about the issue, and as a project towards this goal he has translated the Japanese book The Island Were People Live by Shoko Ahagon, which he is currently trying to get published.

JULIE INGWERSEN

Faculty Supports Divestment

Continued from p. 2

current policy.

Livesay was surprised and gratified called the vote a "resounding sho support for divestment." He notes frustration with President Riley's re to the vote saying, "What bother about the President's statement is th seems to be an attempt to undermin significance of the vote." Some repo the vote have stressed that only 72 o faculty members were present for the Livesay counters such a charge, noting at any given time several faculty mem are on sabbatical, are teaching off ca or have the block off. He believes tha attendance at the meeting was norm

Assistant Dean of the Summer Se Barry Sarchett, reacted saying, "I am proud of the faculty."

Adrienne Seward of the Eng department reacted saying, "I think vote today clearly should be read as the possible position for this faculty to However, I believe that Apartheid in S Africa is not the real issue. The issue i determination. The reluctance on the of this government to make an aggres and unilateral stand for comp divestment in South Africa rests wit inability to confront the consequences democratic South African state, that is person, one vote."

KATIE KERW

Saudi Arabia from p. 3

In 1979, the Camp David Accords between Israel and Egypt divided the Arab world and precipitated a decline in Saudi political influence. Although the country has attempted to regain influence in the region, "Saudi Arabia's strategies since then have not been well executed or planned," said Kostiner. This situation has been compounded by the growing power of radical elements such as Syria and Iran, the "uncontrollable" war between Iran and Iraq, and the U.S. failure to back several key Saudi peace initiatives.

Saudi Arabia probably assumed a role in the Iranian arms deal as part of an attempt to regain influence in the area, according to Kostiner. "The Saudi role in these negotiations is not very clear, but it seems likely that the government was involved in the early stages and was aware of Israel's role in the negotiations. It is known that Saudi officials visited Iran last spring in an attempt to appease influence Iran," said Kostiner. Kost also cited Saudi governmental knowle of arms merchant Adnan Khashi contacts with CIA director Ro McFarlane and Israeli premier Shim Peres as evidence of an unoffi acquiesence to the deal, although government has issued repeated denia Kostiner also observed that the Sa were probably in favor of the U.S. bomb raid on Libya. While the raid was offici condemned in the Saudi government media due to a desire to present a uni Arab front, "The Saudi government wa reality probably pleased with the ra results because the Libyans had g them problems in the past. Qudhafi not been pleased with Saudi Arab moderate stance and has tried to subv the government on numerous occasio Kostiner said.

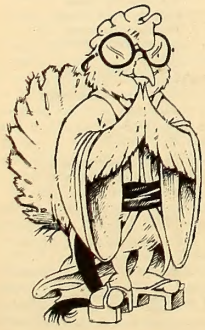
DON SILV

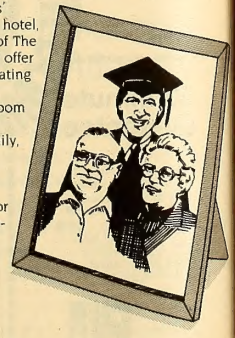
YAKITORI
Sushi Happy - Hour
Saturday's 5 - 7 pm
Most Pieces of Sushi $1.00 a piece*
* Some are more.



Downtown
16 E. Bijou
578-0915
Yaki-Doodle

THE ANTLERS HOTEL
Colorado Springs, Colorado
Picture yourself at The Antlers Hotel for graduation.
Colorado Springs' finest...for only $60!
The Antlers...Colorado Springs' only Four-Star, Four-Diamond hotel, located just nine blocks south of The Colorado College, has a special offer for families and friends of graduating students.
- Single or double occupancy room rate of only $60
- A portrait of graduate and family, compliments of The Antlers
- Complimentary valet parking

Call Cynthia at The Antlers for reservations...we'll make this special event picture perfect!



4 S. Cascade Avenue
Chase Stone Center
Colorado Springs,
Colorado 80903
(303) 473-5600
(800) 232-2323
Operated by The Broadmoor Management Company
© 1987, The Antlers

CCAA Publishes Position Paper

The Colorado College Community ainst Apartheid (CCCAA) has publicly ued its letter to the Board of Trustees erning CC divestment. The letter was o board members around February 15 anticipation of the March Trustee etings. The letter will first be reviewed the Investment Committee on rsday, March 12, and then discussed by entire board during the morning of urday, March 14. The CCCAA hopes to llowed to attend the Investment mittee meeting and have extended an invitation to committee members for informal discussion on Friday noon. The letter is as follows:

The increasing brutality of the South rican regime has led to growing concern campus about the role of Colorado lege's investments in supporting artheid. In 1978 the Board of Trustees ognized that limiting the school's folio to companies that adhere to the ivan Principles was the ethically most ponsible course of action. It is the belief the CC Community Against Apartheid, f half of the student body, and a large mber of faculty that the Sullivan nciples no longer fulfill the College's mitment to social responsibility. Full estment is the only way that the Board remain responsive to its constituency loyal to the College's tradition.

Advocates of the Sullivan Principles and corollary, "constructive engagement," ntain that the only way foreign porations can play a positive role in uth Africa is by providing a moral example and improving the position of the Blacks within their businesses. But there is increasing evidence that foreign businesses have only played a minimally constructive role in South Africa and have more importantly simultaneously bolstered the strength of apartheid.

During the era of constructive engagement South Africa has entered a state of virtual civil war with the government declaring a "state of emergency" in August of 1986. "Unrest related deaths increased from an average of 1.23 per day in 1984 to 5.23 in 1986. (The Nation, Nov. 22, 1986) Twenty-five thousand South Africans, including thousands of children, have been detained under the present security and emergency laws. Sixty percent of these detainees were later released without charge. (The Detainees Parents Support Committee of Johannesburg, Gazette Telegraph, Feb. 7, 1987) Foreign media coverage of the violence created world-wide outrage until the government placed a ban on any dispatches concerning security actions, protests, detentions, or "subversive statements." The US Senate overrode by a vote of 78-21 President Reagan's veto of economic sanctions against South Africa in October of last year. In fact, a blue-ribbon panel appointed by the Reagan Administration itself has declared the policy of constructive engagement a failure and has called for a concerted international effort to isolate South Africa economically. (New York Times, Feb. 11, 1987)

The fundamental flaw of the Sullivan Principles is that although they may slightly improve the working conditions and opportunities of a few Blacks, they do not affect the basic structure of apartheid. Signatory companies employ less than 1% of the Black workforce in South Africa. As soon as Black workers leave their jobs, they still have no vote and are considered subhuman in the eyes of apartheid — regardless of the non-discriminatory employment practices of their employers. Elizabeth Schmidt has argued that the problem with the Principles is that they "address corporate employment policies as if they occur in a vacuum, as if the bottom line is the desegregation of toilets...rather than the US corporate support of apartheid structures." (American Committee on Africa)

US corporations, which make up 20% of all direct foreign investments in South Africa, have played an important role in maintaining the apartheid system. As in any country, foreign investments and trade are vital stimulants of economic growth. In South Africa, US corporations are crucial in three key industries: oil (three US companies control almost 40% of all South African petroleum sales), computers (75% of all sales), and the auto industry which is dominated by GM and Ford. (The Insight Study of the South African Divestment Movement, July 1986) In addition, companies doing business in South Africa contribute to the financing of

Continued on p. 6

AIM HIGH
PUT YOUR COLLEGE DEGREE TO WORK.
Air Force Officer Training School is an excellent start to a challenging career as an Air Force Officer. We offer great starting pay, medical care, 30 days of vacation with pay each year and management opportunities. Contact an Air Force recruiter. Find out what Officer Training School can mean for you. Call (303)528-1722 Collect
AIR FORCE

PIZZA SHUTTLE
Open Daily at 11:00 AM
$5.00 (Plus Tax) For Any 14" Single Item Pizza (with this coupon) After 8 PM
578-8686
Coupon Expires 4/10/87
One Coupon Per Order • Road & Weather Conditions Permitting

Looking for a few ~~good~~ photographers need experience . . . we will PAY!

(Call Heidi Dond x 282 for info)

Attention SENIORS!!

We need all kinds of pictures of seniors for the 1987 NUGGET . . . please submit any photos you may have and print the names of the people pictured on the back in pencil . . . put in Nugget box at the STUDENT CENTER . . . deadline April 6th

A Call for Divestment

CCCAA continued from p. 5

state deficits and must orient their production for the needs of the state during times of extreme civil unrest as mandated by the Key Points Act. A 1978 US Senate Subcommittee report stated that "the net effect of American investment has been to strengthen the economic and military self-sufficiency of South Africa's apartheid regime." (The Insight Study of the South African Divestment Movement, July, 1986)

In addition, evidence concerning the actual implementation of the Sullivan Principles suggests a variety of problems. All signatories are supposedly "rated according to their performance" twice a year by the Arthur D. Little consulting firm. Figures concerning the implementation of the Principles are reported by the companies themselves and must be filed with the South African government as mandated by the Protection of Business Act. Companies pay up to $8,400 to be ranked in one of three categories: "making good progress," "making progress," or "needs to be more active." These categories, however, are at best ill-defined and are open to a broad range of interpretations. For example, to qualify for the first category, a company must show that it is "committed to major facility modifications to implement integration." There is no public, standardized definition of what these modifications should be and no required schedule for their completion.

The Arthur D. Little firm itself revealed in The Ninth Report on the Signatory Companies to the Sullivan Principles that the percentage of whites occupying supervisory positions in signatory firms rose from 51% to 58% in 1985, while the same figure for Blacks declined from 5% to 4%. Overall, US companies adhering to the Sullivan Principles increased their net employment of white workers by 4.5% in 1985 and decreased their net employment of non-whites by 8.4%. Nevertheless, US companies have stuck with the Sullivan Principles as they have proven to be a useful public relations tool. Rev. Leon Sullivan himself, however, has expressed disappointment with the limited impact of signatory companies on South Africa and has said that if apartheid is not ended by May of this year, his principles will be abandoned. Without the severely flawed guidance of the Sullivan Principles, the College's policy of investing in firms doing business in South Africa will lose its last vestige of ethical legitimacy.

DIVESTITURE

An alternative strategy to effect change in apartheid is for companies to close down their operations in South Africa and no longer provide the regime with their economic support — to disinvest. The aim of the divestiture movement is to convince the South African government that economic security and growth is dependent upon their initiating serious dialogue with legitimate Black leaders concerning the dismantling of apartheid and the implementation of power-sharing mechanisms.

Despite the fact that it is high treason in South Africa, punishable by a minimun sentence of five years, to support disinvestment, numerous Black leaders and organizations within South Africa have advocated it. United Democratic Front leader Rev. Alan Boesak, Nelson and Winnie Mandela, African National Congress President Oliver Tambo, Bishop Desmond Tutu, Nobel Peace Prize winner Albert Luthuli, and the largest non-white trade union in South Africa, COSATU, have all called for economic sanctions. The polling evidence is mixed because of the illegality of supporting disinvestment, but several polls have found that over 70% of South African Blacks support disinvestment. (For example, The Sunday Times (London) and a Gallup affiliate, Markinor group, survey as well as the Case/IBR survey) Dr. Nthato Motlana, chairman of the Soweto Committee of Ten, stated in 1978, "If I said that the only way to bring change would be total economic sanctions, I would be liable to go to jail. So let's just be cagey. Let's just say that I support 'pressures,' and leave it at that." Southern Africa Perspectives: "Voices for Withdrawal," The Africa Fund)

Especially within the last year, the divestiture movement has grown rapidly, and there is evidence that it has had an impact on South Africa. It is estimated that between 1977 and 1986, over $230 billion of capital was affected by the South African investment restrictions enacted by municipalities, churches, universities, and individuals. Since January 1984, 18% of US companies in South Africa have withdrawn, and no US companies have entered (The Insight Study of the South African Divestment Movement, July, 1986). Divestment, combined with drought and three years of recession, have reduced the growth rate of the South African economy to 0.6% in 1985.

Many analysts believe that the economic toll exacted by disinvestment has resulted in some small political changes. The government has loosened its controls on Black trade unions and the passbook system, while President Botha's popular support has slipped from a high of 80% to 55%. John Chettle, director of the South African Foundation, which represents South African business, religious, and labor leaders in the US, stated in a 1985 speech, "The divestiture forces have already won because they have prevented billions of dollars from being invested in South Africa...the economic failure of apartheid has led to its political failure."

There are two methods for stockholders like Colorado College to influence companies to leave South Africa: proxy votes and divestment. The former method is impractical because of the time and effort necessary to coordinate proxy votes against management policy.

The alternative method is for the College to divest from stock in companies that do business in South Africa. The isolated effect of the College's divestment might appear to be negligible. But the College's voice would be added to the collective statement already articulated by 19 states, 63 cities, 9 counties, more than 114 colleges and universities (including "comparable colleges" such as Carleton, Colby, Grinnell, Knox, Oberlin, Whitman, Swarthmore, Wellesley, Williams, Franklin & Marshall, Brown, Amherst, Bowdoin, Brandeis, Bryn Mawr, Connecticut College, Mount Holyoke, Lawrence, Smith, and Lake Forest—see Appendix A for a complete list of universities and colleges that have divested), one US territory, and the Congress of the United States. The Colorado College would do well to join this rapidly growing display of concern and lend its good name to the world-wide effort for a more just South Africa.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST DIVESTMENT

Many arguments have been raised against divestment by the South African government, involved companies, and invested individuals and institutions. Some raise legitimate concerns about the effects of divestment, and we feel they are worth addressing.

Won't disinvestment harm the Black South Africans it is aimed at helping?

It is clear that disinvestment of foreign capital will cause the unemployment of both White and Black South Africans. However, the response to this prospect consistently heard from South African Blacks is that they are prepared to endure any hardships which will result in the dismantling of apartheid. As slain student leader Steve Biko said in 1978, "We Blacks are perfectly willing to suffer the consequences [of disinvestment]! We are quite accustomed to suffering." (Southern Africa Perspectives: "Voices for Withdrawal," The Africa Fund) The divestment movement has been continually inspired by the call from Black South Africans to cease our support of apartheid.

Isn't South Africa immune to economic isolation?

The South African economy is currently in shambles and more vulnerable than ever to foreign economic pressures. Average returns on investments declined from 31% in 1980 to 7% in 1983, and some companies have left for purely economic reasons.

In addition, South Africa would be forced to find substitute (and often higher-priced) products in the areas where US influence is the strongest: energy, automobiles, and computers. For example, the expensive coal-to-oil conversion program designed to reduce reliance on imported oil has resulted in petroleum costs twenty percent higher than those on the international market. This is just one example of the high price exacted by sanctions.

Is it proper or fiscally wise to use moral criteria for deciding investment policies?

The Board itself set a precedent for using such criteria in its investment decisions in 1978 when it decided not to invest in South Africa-invested companies that did not adhere to the Sullivan Principles. In light of recent developments in South Africa, the imminent demise of the Sullivan Principles, and the requests of the Shareholder Responsibility Committee and other important campus constituencies, we believe that all companies with investments in South Africa are now outside of the boundaries of what can reasonably be considered ethical investments.

Won't disinvestment diminish our influence in South Africa?

Recent experience has shown that foreign investors can have little effect on the transformation of the structures of apartheid. Many people falsely assume that disinvestment is a one time gesture that irrevocably ends our influence in South Africa. However, just as disinvestment is a disincentive to the maintenance of apartheid, the prospect of reinvestment can serve as an incentive for positive change in South Africa.

Won't Colorado College stand to lose money if we divest?

Since the college community does not have access to information about the investment portfolio, only the Board of Trustees can accurately estimate the opportunity costs that would be incurred as a result of divestment. Although many studies have investigated the financial consequences of divesting, there is still no agreement on whether a South Africa-free (SAF) portfolio performs better, worse or the same as a South Africa-Invested (SAI) portfolio.

Favia Hill Associates, an affiliate of Chemical Bank, found that there is no difference in the rates of return or relative risks and liquidity of both groups of stocks. The Investment Responsibility Research Center concluded that divestment will have a detrimental effect on portfolio performance over the long term. (The Impact of South Africa-Related Divestment on Equity Portfolio Performance, South Africa Research Service, Jan. 1985) The Boston Company, a subsidiary of American Express, found that SAF stocks outperformed SAI stocks by 17% annually from 1973 to 1983. (The Insight Study of the South African Divestment Movement, July, 1986) It seems clear that colleges and universities that have divested have not incurred substantial losses. We believe that the risk of marginal losses is more than warranted by the moral repugnance of the College benefiting from the apartheid system of racially-based labor exploitation.

THE COLORADO COLLEGE

The Board established an important ethical precedent in 1978 when it endorsed the Sullivan Principles. Unfortunately, evidence has grown that the Sullivan Principles are ineffective means of expressing our moral sentiments about apartheid. We are once again faced with glaring inconsistencies between the College's investment policy and the values it is attempting to inculcate in its students. These inconsistencies inevitably undermine the College's mission by breeding cynicism and apathy among the very students it is striving to empower. It is hard to reconcile the school's values, which attempt to "inculcate in students an awareness of others, a feeling of mutual obligation" (The President's Report, 1985), with the fact that it makes money from the oppression of another people.

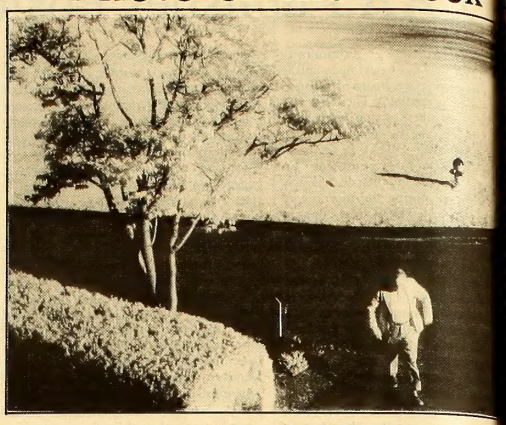
Our request for divestment grows out of what this College has taught us—to take ethics seriously and to act in socially responsible ways. We are asking the Board of Trustees to live up to their own high ideals and those of our College.

Therefore, we call upon the Board of Trustees to divest, with all deliberate speed, the Colorado College's stock from all companies that have operations in South Africa or maintain franchise agreements with South African management teams.

Respectfully,

The Colorado College Community Against Apartheid

Photo of the Week



Examining the Role of the Trustees

...who are these people?

...th the amount of talk and general ...n surrounding this month's Board of ...es meeting, the time has come to ...st who are the Trustees, what is the ...on of the Board, and how does it ...ion?

...ere are a total of 23 Trustees. Fifteen ...C graduates, and 4 have had sons or ...ters attend here. Several others live ...lorado Springs, taking an interest in ...on recognizing the College's abilities ...ntributing to the community. The ...ees are all volunteers - meeting four ... a year (September, November, ...h and June) without any financial ...ensation. The occupations of ...ees range from careers in business, ...uction and realty, to education (one ...rticular is the head of the ...lopment Office of the Medical School ...nford) and others.

...e Board of Trustees holds the title as ...owners of CC. They are responsible ...l actions the college takes - officially ...fficially. The by-laws and charter ...ll final decision-making powers to ...Board. Thus, while legally the Board does not have to consult students, faculty or staff, the Trustees have always given strong consideration to the opinions of these groups.

There are four categories of Board membership. The largest group, Charter members (17 of 23), serve 6-year, renewable terms. They receive nominations from the Nomination Committee, and are then elected (or not) by the entire Board. The Nomination Committee constantly searches for future replacements. Distinguished alumni often stand out, as do colleagues of present Board members. The long reigning Charter members act as a core on the Board, as other members tend to come and go more often. Vice-President of Student Life, Maxwell Taylor emphasized that "it is hoped Charter members remain on the Board for many years to provide continuity and committment."

The second category consists of the Alumni Trustees. These members (currently four) are elected by a popular vote of the Colorado College Alumni Association, and serve a single 6-year term. The President of the Alumni Association is also given a position on the Board, for one two-year term. Finally, the President of the College, for as long as he/she remains in that position, sits on the Board.

The two most common items on the Board's agenda are the approval of the budget, and consideration of recommendations for tenure and promotions. The approval of the following year's budget consists mostly of decisions on salary increases, tuition, and fees. President Riley makes recommendations for the granting of tenure and promotions, which then come to the Board for a final vote. Over the years, these two categories have consistently consumed most of the Board's time.

The Board conducts its business through five main standing committees. The Academic Policy Committee, the Student Life Committee, the Investment Committee, the Buildings and Grounds Committee, and the Development Committee. All issues must come through committee, and while several other smaller committee's exist, they meet much less frequently. This committee system has worked well over many years, and represents the core of the decision-making process for the college. It is in committee that many student groups approach the Board. The CCCA usually submits a report on student concerns, including recommendations. The Honor Council, for another example, recently began considering some reforms, and thus some Council members will attend a committee meeting to inform the Board of the new ideas and changes. Students play an important role in conveying information to the Board about student and campus concerns, as their experience is steeped in a more day-to-day life at the college.

In continued coverage of this month's meeting, an article next week will cover the specific issues confronting the Board during their meetings which start Friday, March 13.

PETER LOACH

ODN: "Education in Development"

...udent-run group addresses Latin American problems

...odent activists beware! An innovative ...gram in third world development is ...ping across the nation's campuses. ...student run Overseas Development ...work (ODN) has grown to encompass ...forty national campuses, providing ...o thousands of people in developing ...ons.

...The idea of a student run international ...lopment organization is the brain ...ld of two students from Bangladesh, ...ir and Kamal Ahmand. Upon their ...val in the United States, the Ahmand ...thers were struck by a great interest in ...d world development, an interest ...ch was nonetheless hindered by two ...imental modes of thought: 1) ...blems involving third world countries ...so overwhelming, little can be done to ...t real change, and 2) any change which ...occur is left ultimately to the resources ...d the expertise of Americans ...mselves. Nazir and Kahmal responded ...these sentiments, and overcame the ...acies, by organizing the Overseas ...elopment Network.

...The student run Overseas Development ...work directs its energies in three main ...ections: partnership in development, ...ucation in development, and ...portunities in development.

...Partnership in development is, no doubt, the program's most unique and powerful tool in achieving the goal of third world development. Each campus ODN establishes a "partnership" with an underdeveloped community in either Asia, Africa, or Latin America. When an ODN campus affiliate decides to sponsor an underdeveloped community they not only commit themselves to raise the funds necessary to complete the proposed project, but also to establish channels of communication with the community. In this way the students are able to see exactly how their hard earned dollars are being put to use by monitoring the project as it develops, while simultaneously establishing close ties with the community who's efforts they are supporting.

"Education in development" involves a concerted effort to sponsor speakers and guest lecturers, as well as films and other campus educational activities. Community outreach is encouraged to involve, not only college students, but the entire surrounding population as well.

The ODN program goes one step further in the educational process by providing members with a number of "opportunities in development." Each year, many students are able to directly participate in development internships located in Appalachia, Bangladesh, and India. Several more internship opportunities are being developed in Latin America, where students will be able to experience third world development first hand.

Just last summer, ODN sponsored its first national "Bike Aid" tour which was a great success! The eighty people who participated in Bike Aid rode across America, in a coast to coast tour. The participants in Bike Aid not only were successful in educating themselves and a significant portion of the American public, they also raised $100,000!

At a recent Regional ODN Conference, Kamal Ahmand summed up the importance of ODN supported projects by making reference to community service which he had provided in his home country of Bangladesh. Of the improvements which were made he said, "They were not small differences because I could see the faces . . . Each individual, each grateful face, who's life has been improved by the aid of such programs attests to the virtue and the necessity of their existence.

For more information, contact; Chris Ruskey at x269, or Rebecca Knight at x305.

CHRIS RUSKEY

The Lotus Eater Boutique
is in the process of moving to 311 North Tejon
(across from Poor Richards)
Visit Both Stores Until Our Move Is Complete!
Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm
Sat. 11-5 pm
THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE
Downtown on Platte Between Tejon & Cascade
phone: 635-2118

Downtown 226 N. Tejon 633-0732
Mountain Chalet
19th ANNUAL SPRING SALE!
Monday, March 2ND 7-10PM.
HELP US KICK OFF OUR SALE AND Save
10 to 50%
On ROCK CLIMBING SHOES, CARABINERS, SHORTS, GORE-TEX JACKETS SUNGLASSES, SKIS, TELEMARK BOOTS, HIKING BOOTS, SWEATERS, VESTS, HATS, AND MUCH, MUCH, MORE!
Hi-Tec Windy Pass North Face Asolo Karhu
Sierra West Wilderness Experience
Walrus Patagonia

Grad Tackles Medicine for Newsweek Cont

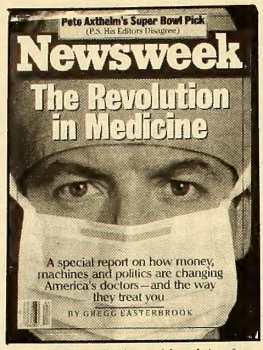
Continued from p. 1

don't have to stay in it very long." Although Easterbrook believes that some specialized publications have "editorial integrity," he thinks that most do not. "It's okay to work for them for a couple of years, learn what they have to offer, and get some experience in the field, but if you stick with them you have to be a whore...Most people who stick with them become that."

Easterbrook took a risk in landing his next job. He had written a piece for the Washington Monthly, (a political magazine) on the Deep Tunnel Project in Chicago while still working for Waste Age. Interested in a job change, he applied to the Washington Monthly. Editor, Charles Peters, "seemed interested in hiring me," said Easterbrook, "but he would not make up his mind. So I quit my job at Waste Age, packed all my stuff in my car, and moved to Washington, D.C. I showed up at Peters' office and said, 'now you have to hire me.'" The gamble paid off; Easterbrook became a contributing editor at Washington Monthly, what he calls "one of the few serious publications in the world that gambles on people with no credentials." Easterbrook then moved on to a position at the Atlantic Monthly. Writing for both magazines, he developed an interest in public policy issues. "I cover just about anything that has to do with public policy: defense, the budget, Congress, medicine, agriculture. Those are the things that interest me most."

Easterbrook developed such a solid reputation in his field that Newsweek courted him. Seeking a writer who could concentrate on serious, in-depth stories, Newsweek hired Easterbrook for a unique position. He works six months each year for Newsweek and spends the other half of the year doing freelance stories and writing for both the Atlantic Monthly and the Washington Monthly where he still holds titles as a contributing editor.

Easterbrook describes his job at Newsweek as one that is born out of a new theory about the function of weekly news magazines. He says, "If you think about the



Pete Axthelm's Super Bowl Pick
(P.S. His Editors Disagree)
Newsweek
The Revolution in Medicine
A special report on how money, machines and politics are changing America's doctors — and the way they treat you
BY GREGG EASTERBROOK

news magazine business, it's a dying form to summarize what happened last week. Television is so good that you get the visual part of the news instantly now. And twenty years ago in America, very few cities had good newspapers. There were the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times and the Chicago Tribune. But today most big cities have pretty good papers. So, if you want to find out what happened that day, most American citizens can get a pretty good source. They don't need to read a weekly review on news events, so the long-term theory on the marketing of weekly news magazines is that they will die out unless they can provide some form of news analysis that daily newspapers and television don't provide. They wanted me to focus on in-depth coverage and I guess that I have a pretty good track record for guessing events correctly, so I think that is why they hired me."

Easterbrook emphasizes what a luxury it is to have ample time he now has to work on a story. He worked on "The Revolution in Medicine" article for almost five months after having probed the issue for about a year prior to that. He is currently the only writer at Newsweek who works in this manner. Easterbrook researches and writes his own stories while other Newsweek articles are usually put together with one group of people doing the research and another doing the writing. Easterbrook thinks that committee writing results in weaker articles." My feeling has always been that that results in the classic problem where the writer seems to have all the facts, but not to know what he's talking about. I think that one person has to interview everybody, see everything for himself, mull it all over and then see if he can write it. That's how I've always done all my stories."

Easterbrook attributes Newsweek's willingness to publish his 26 page, thorough article on medicine to the fact that Newsweek editor, Rick Smith, was interested in the subject, "but also that it was a subject that everybody else was messing up on. Even if you are writing about an important subject, if everyone is covering it (as the case is with the Iran-Contra scandal), there is no way you can justify that article length...But I felt that other people had either not written about it or had missed the point by such a wide margin that an in-depth treatment would be justified." Easterbrook covers a wide range of subjects related to medicine, including how technology is affecting medicine, how spiralling health care costs are affecting Americans, the poor and the elderly, for example, and how modern medicine is grappling with tough ethical questions including how long to prolong life with machines.

Easterbrook is pleased with the way the story came out. When asked how much editing his story was subjected to, he remarked, "Well, [the story on medicine] as you can see, wasn't torn apart. It's mostly the way I wanted it. I got constructive editing. Everybody needs it, but the wording was my own. It read the way I wanted it to."

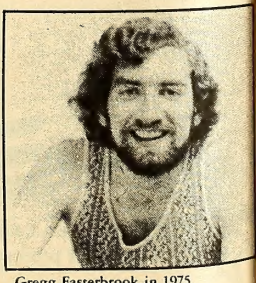
Reaction to the article was mostly positive, which is remarkable considering how controversial the topic of medicine is these days. The letters that Newsweek got in response to the article were about 5 to 1 in favor of the article, while those responses that Easterbrook himself received, primarily from doctors, were roughly 6 or 7 to one favorable. Easterbrook says he is used to adverse reactions from people who take offense to his articles. "When you write articles that have to do with industry, you know the trade associations of any group that you criticize will scream bloody murder and you know that any company that you cite by name will be berserk and will have a lawyer read it to try to find any choice of wording to object to. That's something that I'm really used to, especially having done defense related stories and that doesn't bother me at all."

Easterbrook became interested in writing about medicine when he realized that "there were a million things going on in the field and I didn't understand them and the times that I tried to read about medical stories in the business section of the big newspapers, I always felt that I understood less about the subject than when I began. There were all these conflicting claims about funding and doctors and quality and I just couldn't seem to make heads or tails of it all. I figured that if the careful reader of the nation's major newspapers couldn't figure it out, then there had to be millions of other people out there who couldn't figure it out either."

In describing the potential paths that students interested in journalism can follow, Easterbrook said, "I am totally convinced that there are two main things to successful journalism. The first is to have a wide range of interests in the world. You have to have a catholicity of taste...because at some point all the seemingly unrelated events of the world are going to intersect and a good journalist, a person who is standing there at the intersection and can draw it all together. The second thing," he continued, "is to write like crazy. There is absolutely no substitute for practice in writing. People who think they are going to sit down at a typewriter and receive inspiration can go jump in a lake."

"Because of the current situation in journalism, which is basically a glutted profession (not so bad that you should give up), it's hard to break into. Getting that practice often entails taking gopher type jobs for low pay. I don't see much of a way around that. Journalism is basically at its best, a moderate paying occupation, even if you do well in it."

Easterbrook describes the most oppressive barrier he has faced as "getting people to believe that I knew what I was talking about." He doesn't believe that in order to become successful in journalism, people necessarily have to be aggressive and obnoxious, although he concedes that "there are some fields where that is true. Unfortunately it is the best paying fields. For television reporters to make it, they do have to be aggressive and obnoxious, not all of them of course, but most of them. The best paid American journalists, with the exception of newscasters, are the people who will stand on the White House lawn and as President Reagan walks to the helicopter and the blades are chopping away and nobody can hear a thing, screams Mr. President, 'What about Iran?' The President cups his hand over his ear and says, 'What, what, I can't hear you.' And you scream, 'What about Iran.' And that's the best paying job in American journalism."



Gregg Easterbrook in 1975.

"To be a serious reporter, though, you don't have to be a jerk. And with the form of writing that I do, when I'm reporting I try to work more by just calling people up and saying, 'can I hang out with you and follow you through your day,' and I just try to be as unobtrusive as possible, watching people to see what they do and just gradually drawing them out. I can do that because I have the luxury of having time to work on a story."

Gregg Easterbrook currently lives in Arlington, Virginia. As a hobby, he has written a novel.

KATIE KERWIN

Photo Special!
Every Monday!
coupon
FREE
SECOND SET OF PRINTS
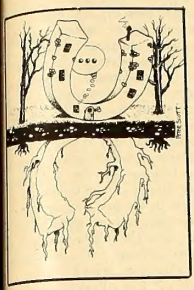
Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!
This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon.
Limited time offer. Offer in effect Mondays only.
819
Kodak Colorwatch System
WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!
College Pharmacy
833 North Tejon • 634-4861

Ellipses and



Hyperbole

went home for block break, Denver is, Brown Town they call it, the rest cultural center north of lewood, south of Broomfield, west of ora and east of Lakewood.

Yearning for advice, I went to see my father who is usually full of good ve. He has conveyed such sagacious ms as "don't do karate in the rub," "don't urinate whilst using an nic razor," and "don't suck on nium."

I was expecting more of the same, but had metamorphosed. I found him ulating in the manner of a Buddhist. n he told me he was trying to reach ghtenment through meditation on the d of one hand snapping, I realized my er had become stupid.

"Do you remember that person's me?" he asked me. "Be more specific," I gested. "You know," he replied, "that with the forehead." As people grow their vocabulary diminished to an rtment of words about food and pain. icken hurts me," is a typical phrase ng the elderly.

Dad's case, however, was more serious than the mere dimming of a vocabulary. He kept referring to me as "hey you" and calling water "that stuff that comes out of the doohicky." I never suspected it would happen, but he had become a victim of the Brown Cloud.

The chemsitry escapes me, but I am sure something in Denver's most polluted air destroys the mind. It starts with the memory. Nobody is noticing the damage because the gas destroys everyone's mind at the same rate, so the mental hierarchy among Denverites is maintained.

The whole city is gasping its way into stupidity and no one notices. Denver Mensa members are operating on the same level as Wally and the Beaver, and I am sorry to say the other end of the bell curve is full of people that are just barely in control of their bodily functions.

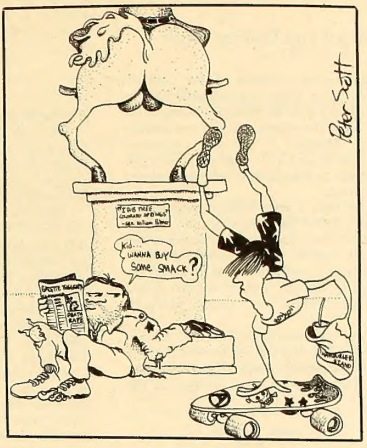
We here in the Springs are not much better off. Don't be surprised if you've forgotten the quadratic equation, don't understand papers you wrote in high school; and don't be surprised if you return to your clean air community and find that your dog is much smarter than you remember.

There is, however, a glimmer of deranged hope. Under the Uintah bridge lives a hermit, Mel Ariah, who has devised a clever plan of conquest. Mel spends his time breathing bottled air. He breathes and waits for the front range to toxify itself into a state of numb obsequiousness.

Mel will emerge from under the bridge like the Overman and rally legions of barely functional Springs' residents to his cause. First on the agenda, the undersides of bridges are going to be made more comfortable (he just recently added that item to the agenda).

And then Mel and his followers are going to construct the largest dome in the world, to encompass the entire city. Colorado springs will sit in its newly purified air, waiting for the world to slip into historically unprecedented ignorance. Eventually, Colorado Springs will become the home of the wisest people in the world. Just imagine the possibilities.

AARON SHURE



...And Here's The Dirt

No names, just innuendo

Well, well, we certainly did manage to set a few tongues flapping didn't we? It's always good to know that your little minds are grinding away at something. Anyway, we would like to begin this week's grime by apologizing to anyone who feels that their emotions and privacy were hurt, invaded or otherwise molested by our premier edition. You've surely been on our conscience all week.

In the "just when you think you know someone" department, we've heard from reliable sources that the two hottest Phi Delts are actually into something other than sorority row, namely EACH OTHER. But don't tell them we told you—wouldn't want them to think they've lost that machismo touch with us.

Mother Nature went to work this block break, piling on the snow so students would pile on the layers—or is it pile off the layers? One dusky junior vamp managed to snag the business-like beau of the schools notorious femme fatale; all's fair in lust and warmth. Speaking of heat, they may not use cigarettes, but these two Josh & John's loving granolas sure have been smoking lately. And though frost is supposed to send birds south for the winter, back at the love nest it seems incest is best for insulation.

We've got to hand it to you kids. Even we, used to scrounging through the utmost (or should we say lowmost) in dirt, were shocked by news that we know will set ol' General Palmer to turning in his grave. A few of our favorite couples, block breaking in a familiar ski town, surprisingly turned an innocent weekend into a sixties-style swapping session; so much for wholesome living among the beautiful people.

Thus ends this week's rag session with a bang (or several). And for all those folks whose feathers we ruffled, just remember this: the time to worry is when people AREN'T talking about you.

Love and Kisses,
Edith Champagne

It's the luck of the Irish
...and the Tigers
CLASS RING SALE
March 9 - 17
$15 Off - 10k Gold
$30 Off - 14k Gold
$40 Off - 18k Gold
Colorado College Bookstore
McGregor Hall

Catalyst and College Ideals

To the Editor:

We, the undersigned members of the Colorado College community, are shocked and repulsed by the column "The Schmack is Back" by Mark Thesing in the February 13 Catalyst. The reference to gays was tasteless and insensitive. "Humor" of this sort encourages discrimination against gays and promotes stereotypes which are contrary to the ideals of an open-minded liberal arts education.

Catalyst editors have a responsibility to publish a newspaper that reflects the ideals of this college. Derogatory "jokes" about gays or others do not reflect these ideals and should not be printed in CC's newspaper. If Catalyst contributors want to discuss gay issues they should be welcome to do so, but they should present their views explicitly in a rational article or column.

We demand a printed apology, in the Catalyst, from the editors and Mr. Thesing, and we demand that the Catalyst staff take the necessary steps to make sure that discriminatory "humor" doesn't get printed in the Catalyst again.

Sincerely,
David Slater
Kristen Hyde Chick
Melissa Driscoll
Chip Shoak
Pascal Gasirabo
Jan Patrick Oppermann
Victoria Sweet
Lynn Menefee
David Slater
Jorge Hinojosa
Imran Hussain
David Williams
Greg Gale
Catherine Houck
Chris Propst
Jeff Livesay
J.P. Lowenburg '85
Betsy Smith
Joanne Barker
Shannon McGee
Greta Hanson

The opinions of the columnist are their own, and do not necessarily reflect those of the Editorial Staff. Therefore we feel no such apology is necessary.

The Editors

THE COLORADO COLLEGE

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETER LOACH, News Editor
DAVID EVANS, Features Editors
MUNIR MEGHJEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
•
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETER SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editors
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
•
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
•
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Cutler Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 extension 675. The Catalyst is printed tri-monthly from September to May, except during holiday periods.

Cutler Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its education programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local laws.

Editorials appearing in the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 400 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Rastall Center, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

A work of considerable length may be submitted as a guest commentary. Persons interested in submitting commentary should contact the Catalyst at 632-4999 or 473-2233 ext. 675.

The Catalyst reserves the right to edit or cut letters to the editor and guest commentaries.

The Honor Code and The Honor Council

To the Editor:

This is my first letter to the Catalyst, so bear with me. This letter is in response to the article and letter that appeared consecutively in the last two issues of the Catalyst concerning the Honor Code and all the events surrounding it.

One of the reasons I picked CC was the Honor System. The idea of students signing an honor code to prevent cheating appealed to me. I hated the Proctor System. If you talked during a test you were automatically convicted of cheating. You could not take the test anywhere but the assigned room and the teacher had to watch you take it. Most of the tests were timed and in computerized form. The teachers walked around our desks to make sure we didn't cheat. This never stopped people from cheating. The Honor Code sounded like an ideal solution.

When I came to CC last year and listened to all the information concerning it, I doublechecked my sources and made sure I followed it to the letter. I never saw anyone cheat. Most students joked about it. It wasn't until the end of my freshman year that I actually heard of someone being thrown off campus for cheating. She was guilty.

The Honor Code seemed to be working for everyone, or so I thought until I came to school this year. At the beginning of the school year a close friend of mine was convicted of breaking the Honor Code. She appealed the case, the first appeal in approximately fifteen years. Because of the way the Council badgered her and the way her professor treated the whole thing, she struggled in all her other classes that semester. She is no longer at the school, no—she was not expelled. She withdrew and it is not my place to reveal the details of the case or her name. Those involved already know them. She would have remained at this school if the Honor Council had treated her case differently. But that is not the issue here. The issue is that the system is not perfect and should be reviewed. I feel that what happened to my friend and the two young men who wrote the letter in the Feb. 20th issue of the Catalyst could have been avoided if this system was reviewed earlier as well as the people who run it.

The Honor Council and the school made the mistake of assuming that the Honor Code was a flawless system. We all did. It is not. Sometimes there are exceptions to the rule and we must not ignore those exceptions. If there is reasonable doubt then that doubt should not be ignored. I realize that this is not an easy job.

I wish I could be certain that the members of the Honor Council felt the same way. Unfortunately I have reason to believe they do not. Earlier this year during my friend's ordeal, I overheard several council members talking to their friends. They enjoyed being on the council. It was "fun" meeting new people. They also enjoyed the prestige of being nominated. I only wish they could take it seriously. I actually heard someone congratulate one member on his excellent job of cross-examining my friend during the appeal.

I realize the council members are only human and have faults. But so do the students and we also have rights. When a professor brings a student up on charges, the student's rights should also be considered. He/she should not be found guilty before they are even tried.

Perhaps one way of settling this issue is to change the amount of time the members stay on the board. Also, perhaps the status of an honor council member should be up for review each year they are on the board. The nomination process should also be made clearer to the student body. I did not know very much about it last year. Nor did I know the people who were up for positions. Or the reasons they were nominated. I have not read the constitution and I believe that I speak for the majority of CC when I say that they really haven't looked at it either. That is the responsibility of those who are guided by its rules. If the members of the Honor Council have not read the constitution and do not follow it then what use is the constitution anyway?

All I know is that a system I once trusted and admired now frightens me and makes me extremely angry and ashamed of the school and the people responsible for it. I'm not saying I know the answers. I'm saying that the answers must be found in some way and that it is time to change the system to fit the needs of the students not the needs of the institution. I am not placing nor do I intend to place any blame on anyone. I just want to avoid another situation like the ones previously cited from reoccurring. That's all. If there is any way I can help, let me know.

Thank you,
Christine Lloyd

Let's Plan Graduation

To the Editor:

We would like to submit to the Colorado Colle community a letter which we have sent to th Administration. We welcome any response.

As graduating seniors, we are extremely concerne about out upcoming graduation ceremony. Aft witnessing last year's fiasco, when rain forced the 19 graduates to receive their diplomas in the inadequate small El Pomar gym, we are wondering if a simil occurrence can be prevented for the Class of 1987 June 1st. After years of our parents' large monetar investment in our educations, not to mention our ow hard work and dedication to our school during our tim here, we and our families deserve and expect graduation ceremony fitting of the Colorado Colle tradition of excellence. In the past, the ceremonies Armstrong Quad have definitely met this high standa and we hope that we too will be able to participate in outdoor commencement. In case of rain, however, thi must be a far better alternative than El Pomar.

For instance, both the Pikes Peak Center and th Broadmoor World Arena would seat everyone desiri to attend the commencement exercises. Furthermor we would be surprised if either the Pikes Peak Center o the Arena would be occupied at 8 a.m. on Monday, Jun 1st. We do realize that consideration of costs is a important factor in this issue. However, in awareness o CC's very good rapport in the past with both of the institutions, we think the chances of arranging for one o these as a back-up location for graduation are bot strong and logical.

We are willing to work in order to make ou graduation a special and memorable one. We trust tha you will agree with out concerns and will expedientl look into this matter for us. Thank you.

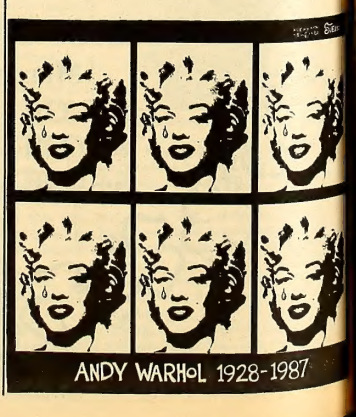
Monica J. Nitte
Susan O'Hanle
Carey Ewing

"The Dirt"

To the Editor:

The Catalyst is becoming more and more unprofessional. We understand that we are not dealing with professionals, but with college students. Even so, last week's Catalyst seemed to be put together by gossiping junior high school students. "The Dirt" column is uncalled for and offensive. Our school is indeed small and this tasteless article may have caused a lot of unneeded pain to the students involved. True, a minute number was mentioned, but the fact that even one person may have been hurt makes the article offensive. "The Dirt" is not a part of the Opinions section of the Catalyst, so we are surprised it was allowed to be printed. A newspaper is for news, opinions on related news, and entertainment; it is not the place for the entertainment of a few writers at the expense of others. By the way, a curly haired Beta from the beltway of our nation's capital disagrees with us.

Sarah Warner
Betsy Mitchell



Honor Council Defended

To the Editor:

In response to a letter from Paul Marsilio and Michael Borchetta printed in the February 20 issue of the Catalyst, I would like to clarify a few points. Paul and Michael were distressed at what they felt was a very lengthy delay in the handling of their case, and this is understandable. The notification of a possible Honor Code violation is undoubtedly an unpleasant experience for Colorado College we believe that questions of academic honor should be handled by a student-run council. This means every Honor Council member is a student first and a Council member second. In addition to this we often deal with as many as four or five cases each block. It is our responsibility to hold these trials in the order in which accusations are brought to us, and this often means cases must be delayed a block. This was the situation fourth block when the Marsilio-Borchetta case was brought to our attention.

When I spoke to the professor who accused Paul and Michael I explained to her that we had a heavy case load that block and would have to wait until fifth block to hold this trial. In what appears to have been a misunderstanding, the professor first told Paul and Michael that their case would be heard immediately and later that the case had been completely dropped. This was done without the notification or knowledge of the Honor Council.

Michael and Paul are correct in quoting Article IV, Section 1, Paragraph B of the Honor System Constitution concerning the delivery of a "letter of accusation." It appears that they are confused about the logistics of such a delivery. Before an Honor Council member can meet with the accused to deliver a letter in person, a telephone call must be made to arrange a meeting. Michael and Paul received such a call. The next day I delivered "a letter of accusation in person." The Honor System Constitution was followed exactly. I do apologize for interrupting their viewing of the AFC Championship Game. I suppose we each have our own list of priorities.

The Constitution was also followed exactly at the actual hearing. Michael and Paul have, however, misinterpreted the confidentiality clause. Only the Council members and witnesses are bound not to discuss the hearing. Michael and Paul are free to discuss their trial if they so choose.

The gentlemen do make an important and valid point concerning professors and the Honor System. The lack of cooperation with and understanding of the Honor Code by some members of the CC faculty is indeed a serious matter. The Honor Council recently dealt with two professors who "chose not to be involved." If our Honor System is to work, profesors must understand that involvement with the Honor Council is not a "choice" because academic honor is not a choice. It is a necessity.

I regret that Paul and Michael consider their experience with the Honor Council an "ordeal." Although unfortunate, it is a fact that trials must sometimes be delayed due to Council members' heavy course and case loads. Paul and Michael's disillusionment seems to stem from a professor's misunderstanding of our procedure and their own misunderstanding of the Honor System Constitution, and should not be seen as an indictment of the system as a whole.

Sincerely,
Liz Cheney
Honor Council Chairman

A Lack of Responsible Journalism?

To the Editor:

A column last block by Mark Thesing concerned me enough to write a letter to the editor. The editor's responses to my letter, both in a paragraph following the letter and in the "Editor's Note" of the same week, have disturbed me enough to write again. The responses only confirmed my belief that there was/is a lack of concern for the issue discussed, or at least a lack of responsible journalism. Yes, those are the same charges I made in my letter in the last Catalyst, but this week I'm going to explain my views more thoroughly. I also would like to respond to some other points made by the editors.

The editors state that since Mr. Thesing's opinions are his own, no apology about the article is necessary. i partially agree. When I discussed the article with Catalyst Editor Alec Rekow, he made the point that keeping opinions out of the paper is probably a form of censorship. I acknowledge that Mr. Thesing has the right to have whatever opinions he wants, and even that he has as much right as anyone else to get them in print. However, the way in which Thesing presented his opinion about gay people (or the way in which he presented his "humor") is completely inappropriate and is something about which Thesing and the editors ought to have thought twice.

I wonder if the editors would have allowed a tasteless racist joke about blacks into the Catalyst if someone submitted that kind of column. I think that because homophobia and discrimination against gays are not viewed negatively by society as widely as is other discrimination (like racism), the editors and Mr. Thesing did not consider his statements about gays to be any problem. It's clear, though, that the kind of myth perpetrated by Mr. Thesing's article is very similar to racist stereotypes which almost all of us would condemn.

If Mr. Thesing or others want to let their views about gays (or blacks or feminists or...) be known through the Catalyst, fine. They should be welcome to do just that. They should present their views explicitly in a rational and coherent manner. They should not resort to discriminatory "jokes" that promote stereotypes, and they should attack people or groups directly instead of using innuendo. The idea that a group of gays on campus sponsors orgies goes far beyond humor; whether or not intended, it is really quite mean.

This is where journalistic quality comes into the picture, and where I believe criticism of the Catalyst is warranted. The editors of the newspaper of a liberal arts college like CC should ask several questions before printing an article. Does the article attack persons or groups falsely, even in the name of humor? If so, does the attack do damage to the person or group by perpetuating myths and stereotypes which run counter to the idea of an open-minded liberal arts education? If the person is writing about a controversial issue, are his/her views presented explicitly so that they will not be misunderstood, and is it explicitly clear that the writer takes full responsibility for the writing as her/his own opinion? While it is not the job of an editor to censor, it is certainly the job of an editor to make sure that what gets printed is done in a responsible way. In the case of the Catalyst, this includes being responsible for putting out a newspaper that reflects the ideals of a liberal arts college. I think that it can be done without trampling anyone's first amendment rights through censorship.

It is seems like I want all humor edited out of newspapers, be reassured that that's not my message. I only think humor should be done more sensitively, without the damaging kinds of things that Mark Thesing had in his article. And, for the reasons presented above, I still think that some kind of apology is appropriate.

There are also several points from the "Editor's Note" to which I would like to respond:

I strongly disagree with the idea that Thesing's article should have especially been printed because it "motivates the brain-dead mass of this college to pick up a pen and respond." Instead, I think that the article provided support for the stereotypes about gays that are prevalent on campus, and subtly reinforced the opinions and ideas that those stereotypes promote. Would the editors have recommended that Germans of the late 1930's and early 1940's write articles condemning Jews? I doubt it, although the situations have some similarities. Widespread homophobia means that gay "jokes" are usually laughed at, serving no positive function in the struggle to motivate "brain-dead masses."

The editors ask why I had no response to a couple of other articles in the Catalyst with Thesing's column. The question is silly if directed specifically at me. I agree with the editors' opinion that the campus is apathetic, but I can't personally fix the situation by responding to every decent guest opinion in the paper. Activist work presently takes up four or five hours of my day, and I'm not ready to accept assignments in activism from Catalyst editors. However, the editors' point is a good one if directed at the campus as a whole. Participation in discussion of important issues has dropped. It's my opinion that this void helped allow irresponsible aspects of writing from the Fun Team ("quotes are for fags...") and mark Thesing (sorority "bitches" and "Homosexual Collective orgies") get into the Catalyst.

The editors think that the most important responsibility of an activist is education, and so do I. Perhaps, in my disgust at the content of Thesing's article, I neglected education in favor of angry reaction when I wrote my letter. I do think some valid points were made, though, and I hope that the editors and Mr. Thesing don't consider this more careful response to be writing that "spurns conscientious debate to focus on hollow gestures." I'd say that this is exactly the sort of debate that should be happening in this section of this newspaper. I'm sorry if they are disappointed by yet another response to cynical stabs from a columnist, but the issue at hand is an important one, and should not be shoved aside.

Eric Johnson

David Makarechian

The Politics of Apathy

Are you a Conservative or a Liberal?

You probably shouldn't bother to think about that too much, because nobody really cares anymore. During the Reagan Conservative revolution, that question sparked most of the political debate on Campus. Vocal hard-liners from both factions tirelessly advertised their opinions on any one of a host of controversial issues. Since then, the cancer of apathy has invaded almost all sectors of the College—the issues are no longer controversial, and nobody gives a damn.

How did the larger portion of the CC community become narrow minded, selfish, and thoughtless? Individuals are only partly to blame. The cause of the growing silence between Conservatives and Liberals also lies in the rejection of the firmly rooted, backward philosophies of the nation's political parties.

The Conservative revolution inaugurated by the Reagan administration through the GOP is over, and its message discredited. But it didn't take the Iran affair to prevent the Republican conservatism from taking a firm hold on the grassroots level. Yes, their were some who supported a military build-up and a hard-line foreign policy after the embarrassments of the Carter years, and yes, there were many who supported a reduction of the size of government. But especially in the days of Reagan and the New Right, the Conservative movement has been rejected as emotional and intellectual fascism.

A vigilant, passionate support of today's Conservative creed cannot be expected of individuals who control their own thoughts, and control their own spirit. By definition, today's conservatives counter intellectual growth. Advocating a return to traditional standards simply because they are traditional values is a degradation of faith in the ability of individuals to solve problems for themselves. Moreover, today's Conservatives still seek to legislate particular characteristics of man's spirit. Issues such as abortion and school prayer change private, individual matters into items of government dictum, scoffing at individual liberty. Individuals must act as the majority expects them to act, and must think as the majority expects them to think.

The Conservative movement faced a crossroads during the Reagan presidency—and support for it has come and gone. Today's apathy witnesses the waning moments of that failed philosophy.

But the Liberal cause is waning also, and its upturn in 1986 through the Democratic Party is regarded by most as purely reactionary. Admittedly, grassroots America has harbored liberal tendencies—and has demonstrated a commitment to the poor (if not a middle class guilt) since the New Deal. But the message is getting tiresome. The same shop-worn catch-phrases, the same unsuccessful, knee-jerk programs, and the same pandering to special interests are again being expressed by politicians trying to some how appear distant, different, and new.

One cannot expect a fervent commitment to today's liberal doctrine by anyone who can see beyond the immediate moment, or by anyone who has the slightest respect for individual liberty. The Liberal agenda championed again and again by the same coalitions of Democratic Congressmen are short-term highs to please voters. In a classic example, Democrats failed in their attempts to pass a reactionary, expensive jobs program during the recessions of the early 1980s as a quick fix to pacify voters while placing the nation's fiscal status in jeopardy. And the Liberal tendency to fiscal irresponsibility additionally strangles individual's material freedom. Costly regulations and transfer payments restrict activity in the private sector and allot benefits that can be regarded as questionable at best.

The nation is tired of big liberal government, with big government favors, crowding out individualism and the private sector. Today's apathy witnesses the exhaustion of a worn out, fallacious, liberal philosophy.

Given the shortcomings of today's political movements, arresting the growth of apathy requires a rejection of the established political structure, and the birth of a new philosophy that can again spark the interest of the nation. Conservative's control of the spirit, and Liberal's control of the material will no longer do. The American political machine will rust with apathy if individuals do not re-affirm their intellectual liberty.

OPINIONS

Victor Greto

The following abridged excerpt comes from Richard Wright's novel, The Long Dream. The novel concerns itself with blacks and their situation in southern America at or around the 1930's. In the lines which follow, a black man, Tyree, answers a charge made by an "honest" white official that he, Tyree, is "currupt":

Mr. McWilliams, I ain't corrupt. I'm a nigger. Niggers ain't corrupt. Niggers ain't got no rights but them they buy. You say I'm wrong to buy some rights? How you think we niggers live...if we niggers didn't buy justice from the white man, we'd never git any...If I'm corrupt, who made me corrupt? Who took the bribes? The law, and the law's white. I live...in Nigger Town...I didn't make Nigger Town. White men made it. Awright, I say, "Okay." But, ogddammit, let me live in Niggertown! And don't call me corrupt when I live the only way I can live.

The above passage addresses what I mean by my application of the terms "amorphous" and "protean" to bourgeoise, rigid strictures placed upon morality, terms which seem to frighten conservatives with visions of anarchy. I am also, in spite of wishing these articles to be projections and not simply defenses of my position, responding to Corey Abel's criticism of Feb. 20, a response filled with such condescension towards me that his article, for me, epitomizes what I have been arguing since I had been asked to write articles for the "Catalyst."

First off I must admit that one of the purposes of these articles was to "offend" his so-called intelligent sensibilities, to show how our sensibilities are so rigidly formed by our class and position in society. Again, as with Inger Thomsen, he insists I "reject the past," a nonsensical notion which the conservatives cannot step away from. There is no self-contradiction when I say that I reject the conclusions our present society draws from the past. But perhaps we should move on from this point.

It is amazing to me that conservatives insist that one cannot create value in history from the conditions one observes relative to oneself. To be relatively well-fed, to live in a nice warm house, to go to a decent school, and then discover, by opening one's eyes to one's surroundings, that one cannot create "value" from one's position and the suffering which abounds, is nonsense.

I see no reason to recognize the need to legitimate my values, either from a watered down Hebrew myth, or ideas of "universal" values which make the historical pain of others window-dressing and inconsequential. Where is the mention of poverty in Abel's article? For me this absence is indicative of the conservative state of mind, the mind which has the luxury to pretend it can detach itself from the present state of affairs in order to be "objective," perhaps one of the greatest self-delusions of the Western mind. People who exist homeless, for whom life, as Tyree in the quotation above is evidence, is a constant struggle, cannot pretend to disassociate their social reality with intellectual masturbation, and removed from social conditions. Morality is "amorphous" and "protean" because, as conservative strictures of morality apply themselves to different situations, situations different from the assumptions which middle-class values are created, they falter. Who is "more wrong": the man who kills his landlord because he could not pay his rent and was about to be foreclosed or kicked out without any compassionate consideration by men and women who measure another's worth in wealth only, and who (the man who killed) has no recourse left open to him in this society but desperation?—or the man who wheels and deals on Wall Street, buying and selling and manipulating millions of dollars in corporations, often "inside trading" these millions for the thrill of making more money, un-needed as it is—while others starve? Who is the "most responsible" for his actions? Who, according to the rigid strictures of middle-class morality, is the "real" killer? The answer is easy: the man who "actually" did the killing; my god, isn't it obvious? In a perverse way, I admire the dogged implications of middle-class morality—yet without compassion and wrapped so tightly and horridly in an "innocent" delineation of rights and wrongs? (In part, compassion here means the understanding removal of the luxuries of middle-class "givens" and "goes-without-sayings" which the poorer classes cannot assume.) Freedom without responsibility should not only be measured and exemplified by the old idea: "You can't yell fire in a crowded auditorium"—it should also apply to the very structure of our society, a society which allows the Boeskys of this country to uninhibitedly play with millions of dollars while the homeless and the starving roam for food, jobs and a modicum of self-respect.

In view of this, the Reagan Revolution is a pathetic misnnomer: it should be relabeled the Reagan Fear, the fear that the situation of the middle and upper classes will be upset by such un-American ideas as ungodly socialism, the revolt of the masses against an inherently unfair system which needs their drooling and silent approbation—and which, alas, the underclasses give them, through such capitalist amenities and "candies" as television, the myth of patriotism and the absurd belief that all may raise themselves by their bootstraps and become true and ambitious Americans. The shroud which Abel claims I cover my arguments with, my metaphors of padded American cells, of never attempting to touch the foundations of our society because our assumptions are so indelibly burned in our brains, lies at the crux of our differences. He speaks from inside the cell, his class, his inability and unwillingness to view more clearly the conclusions of the American Myth drawn and belived in religiously by his immediate ancestors.

The fact that I question the conclusions our society has drawn to justify its own existence hardly "implies" that my particular view must be engraved upon everyone's mind. When Abel claims that I "block" all roads to truth)I am happy that he is catching on. But the idea that I "block" truth is merely a perception, for there is no "truth" lying out there anxiously waiting to be discovered; there does exist a middle-class, and I'm afraid we all know too well what that is.

Because I cannot assume that God has given me values and that they (the values) are not driven by "universal" truths which underlie history, these assumptions do not "block" and undermine my values as I create them relative to my position in society—that claim is a metaphysical imposition upon my historical perspective. But, really, couldn't we go back and forth forever with this intellectual masturbation? What is at stake (and what Abel easily brushes aside in my article of Feb. 13 concerning education as a tool for social change) is our application of these musings to the social conditions of our fellow human beings, from which our position in society derives. We must not pretend to "detach" ourselves and delude ourselves into thinking we can be "objective," "transcendent" or our times and our human being, but must engage, apply and work for the social change which cries out to be done, cries out from the pain of the homeless, the starving, the people of the ghetto whose world is that of incessant poverty, degradation and hate. The "necessity" of social change is not an admission of "inevitablility" in history, but the wish and hope and action of one to relieve the pain of another, to strip away the myths and rhetorical absurdities of our justifications of the Poor who "mooch," to explode the grinning myth that those who live on welfare are "ones who'd rather laze about and not work." These assumptions are as false as the "rightness" of our own middle-class positions, as though we were ordained by God, mammon and Ronald Reagan. "The end of ignorance" is not rhetoric, but the beginning of understanding, compassion for the people who live in a system where, for them, wealth has no beginning and poverty no end.

Michael S. Mehan

The Bottom Line

Speech! Speech!

After three months of political turmoil and uncertainty, President Reagan went before the American public on Wednesday in an effort to cover his tracks in the Iran-Contra arms scandle. On the surface, the President did a good job of justifying his poor performance over the last few months and his losing control of the White House during the last year or so. However, beyond the wholesome, grandpa-like quality of Reagan that makes you want to believe him, the speech failed to answer the many unanswered questions or fill the gaps involved in the Iranian-Contra arms scandal.

Before watching the speech, I made a list of a few points that Reagan should address. One, he had to say once and for all, for the record, that the policy was a mistake and that he took full responsibility for all that has occurred. Two, he had to prove to the public that he was on top of things in the White House. Three, he had to give us not just an inspiring message, but a concrete blueprint for the next two years.

In order to fulfill these qualifications it would obviously require more than a quick fourteen minute speech, but it seems that that is all the President is able to give us. The White House knows not to tie up the air waves too long, let Ron get out there give ten or so quick minutes and bam, you are back to "Dynasty" before you know it! However, there is little you can say in fourteen minutes, as President Reagan proved the other night.

The speech hardly cleared Reagan of anything, since it left the initial questions of what he knew, when he knew it and who was really in control at the time, all unanswered.

His main emphasis in the speech was to take the responsibility for the whole ordeal involving the arms sales to Iran and the subsequent skimming of profits for the Contras in Nicaragua. Check off point number one mentioned above. This is no new development, of course he is responsible, he is the President. However, this does not clear him. What is he responsible for? For allowing incompetent aids to take over control of American foreign policy and to set up a sub-government while the President dosed comfortably upstairs. What good does sorry do after he lost total control of his government? Sure he is sorry, but it is highly unlikely that he will do anything about it, he will just delegate Presidential authority to more responsible men next time ie. Howard Baker.

He opened the speech by saying that the American public deserves the truth, and then turned around and told us that at no time was the policy of selling arms to Iran initailly an arms for hostage deal. However, in the Tower Commission report, there is substantial evidence, much of it coming from former National Security Advisor Robert McFarlane, who engineered much of the initial policy, that it was totally an arms for hostage plan. McFarlane even reported on Reagan's jubulation when the first hostage was released.

He totally shirked the question of when he knew, hiding behind his senility by saying, I did approve it, I just wish I could say when." What?! This raises serious questions in itself, "I did launch them, I just wish I could remember when." Somebody better keep a close eye on him. Reagan has once again avoided the truth.

Instead of showing us that Reagan was in charge of the White House, the speech showed quite the opposite. Reagan said he did not know what was going on, what ever the Tower report said was what happened, according to Ron, he does not know. If that is what they say, then it must be true.

His quaint quip at the end justifying his loss of memory and his basic cluelessness about what has been going on raises profound questions of Presidential accountability. Everyone does make mistakes, and "You learn to put these things in perspective...and then you move on." However, not everyone is the President of the United States, and outside of our personal lives, our mistakes have little bearing on the fate of the world. This is almost, but not quite, as ridiculous as his statement in which he asked how many people could remember where they were and what they were doing on August 8th, 1985. It does not matter what I was doing, or anyone else for that matter, we are not the President of the United States. If we forget that we were drinking beer at a soft ball game it is not the same as if we were all making decisions of national foreign policy!

Watching the speech gave the impression of watching Pee-Wee Herman running around in Cheech and Chong's movie, "Nice Dreams" yelling over and over again, "I'm sorry, I said I was sorry." If a President apologizes for actions that he is responsible for and yet cannot remember, do we hold him accountable or do we deal with him as we might deal with our senile grandfather who always forgets to raise the toilet bowl lid?

On the surface, we saw a humble Reagan trying to rebuild his presidency who spoke to America on Wednesday night. The speech was what we would expect from President Reagan, shallow and avoiding the issues and questions that have been repeatedly asked over the last three months.

Back to my points. Reagan did accept responsibility, he had to. He is ultimately responsible for any policies that come from the White House (Besides, Nancy made him). He did not show us he is in command. Instead he told us that he avoids problems, he finds a problem, finds the right man to deal with it, and lets them do their job, back to square one. He spoke boldly of moving forward, but he did not give any plan for moving ahead, all he said was he had faith that Baker and Carlucci could run the country. The lesson has not dawned on him that his very style of leadership is what sunk the last Reagan team. At least, out of necessity, he spared us the reiteration of his old positions such as in the State of the Union Address — that is one area he did not flounder on. As far as a final grade goes, he has dropped two out of three questions, therefore this professor has no choice but to give him the old Chinese A, an F, and that is the bottom line.

Act, Active, Activist

is easy to get caught up in debating political actors nservatives, radicals and everyone in between always omething to say about someone else. We are too n reacting, and seldom acting. We lose track of our ction and become too concerned with how others pond to us and how we respond to them. We need to show to "spond" instead of respond. We must begin ct upon our ideals, to create with our visions, and d with our beliefs.

The divestment movement on campus, like any ement for peace and justice, needs to be an attempt ajust that. If the movement is to last and have a more ntial effect on history, it cannot simply be a onse to the school's investments in South Africa. It st be an act. It must come from within.

We must understand that the divestment movement ist one effect of a certain way of perceiving the world.
an extension of a belief: a belief in ourselves, in each er, and in our ability to make our future. It is a belief e value of human life, in the interconnectedness of world, the right to self determination, and the portance of caring and supporting each other. It is a ief in community, understanding, respect, and eful co-existence.

This belief manifests itself in many other forms. The movement on campus, for example, is struggling for rights and respect of Gay people. They are working, e divestment movement is, towards a broader sense community. The movements for peace, the ironment, women, Blacks, Chicanos, and other "minorities" originate as well from a belief in the value and dignity of life and the struggle for peaceful coexistence.

This way of perceiving the world has effects in "non-political" scenarios as well. The care and support we show for our friends, ourselves, relatives, and our community has everything to do with these "political" movements. In the 60's they called it "making the political personal." The reason I am active in supporting the struggle of Black South Africans is the same reason that I care and support my friends and family. They come from the same belief—a belief in love and a belief in community.

I hesitate to write such words, as we have come to label them as "flaky." We all know that the flower child phase of the 60's has wilted under the acid rain of the 80's. But in our attempt to establish our own identity and either join or separate ourselves from what some consider a "fad" or a flash-back, we have lost track of what we do want to be a part of and what we truly do believe in. Anyone who disassociates themselves from a movement simply because they don't like its image or do not want to be considered as "joining the band wagon" is reacting in the same superficial way as someone that is just going along with a fad.

We must dare ourselves to be true activists and act upon our beliefs regardless of the anticipated reactions of our peers. We make history. We have the power to improve the condition of our world...our community. Not everyone has the resources that we are lucky to have here on campus. We have a responsibility to use these resources to advance the conditions of all people. But we must break-out of this constant mode of responding to responses or we will be forever caught in the present.

BY MATT CASE

South Africa and Divestment

(its latest meeting (February 23), the faculty passed near unanimity a resolution calling for the Board of stees to "divest, with all deliberate speed, Colorado ege's stock from all companies that have operations outh Africa or maintain franchise agreements with South African management teams." Only one faculty ber spoke directly against the question. Virtually yone else appeared to agree that divestment was an stically good thing, and the debate centered on the
that was likely to be incurred by the faculty itself.
ngely enough, the merits of the case for divestment
e not really discussed at all. They deserve, rtheless, close examination.

The faculty's action goes a step beyond the legislation Congress passed in 1986, over President Reagan's severely restricting trade with South Africa. While ping short of full divestment, the act "banned the rtation of South African coal, uranium, iron and agricultural produce, textiles and kruggerands; it bited new U.S. loans, investments, credits and the e of computer technology to the South African rnment and its agencies." The 1985 executive ctions, which affected mostly American exports to h Africa, were thus extended in 1986 to cover a d range of South African exports to the United es. American firms, faced with declining itability and hostile opinion in the United States, are ing the ruins, and will no doubt continue to do so e resolution of the CC faculty, like those of other eges and universities across the United States, icates the next logical step in this sequence — total stment.'

he purpose of the action is clear: it is meant as a ol gesture to demonstrate our repugnance to rtheid. The consequences of total divestment, wever, are much less clear. Assuming, as many ponents of sanctions do, that such measures will t real pain on the South African economy, it is still essary to ask what we can reasonably expect to ieve by doing so.

ere, I think, the prospects are uncertain at best, and e bleak at worst. South Africa faces a revolutionary ation, in which the government has been drawn easingly to measures of repression, the black osition to violence. To some, economic sanctions a way of bringing the pressure to a boiling point, which the Afrikaner government will concede the e of the conflict, abandon apartheid, and acquiesce in government controlled by the African National gress. This optimistic reading is almost certainly ong. Everything we know about the Afrikaners ests that they are likely to go down fighting; if they
to be dislodged it will be through revolutionary upheaval and sheer military power. What is worse, this upheaval may persist for a generation, destroying the economic base of southern Africa, and making of the region as a whole a Lebanon writ large, a scene of starvation, disease, and death on a scale we really cannot fathom.

It is a terrible thing to wish the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse on anybody. The fact that the leading black spokesmen of South Africa want to break the government at whatever cost doesn't mean that we are required to adopt their view. (We are under no moral obligation to push a man off a cliff, even if he has good reasons for wanting to jump.) Nor does it really matter that the collapse is probably inevitable anyway, irrespective of whatever economic sanctions are adopted in the United States. The intention itself is objectionable, since its logic is that of a protracted war that will create an economic basket-case in southern Africa to rival those found virtually everywhere else on the continent.

This fate probably awaits southern Africa irrespective of any economic sanctions adopted in the United States. Our impact, for good or ill, is necessarily marginal. Yet even a realistic view of what the impact of total divestment is likely to be at the margin offers little support for those who favor it. The departure of American companies from South Africa may not weaken the hold of the Afrikaners on the economy at all; indeed, it might on balance strengthen it. Divesting American firms have little bargaining power with those who seek to gain control over their assests, and therefore those businesses are being liquidated at bargain rates. More generally, there are plenty of ways to defeat the various import and export restrictions the international community has imposed on South Africa — at the least, the South African government enjoys the power of spreading the pain widely.

Under these circumstances, does it really make sense to destroy the last vestiges of the American business presence in the country? Even if we accept that the presence or absence of such companies will probably not have a decisive impact on the future of South Africa, there are still a few things to be said on their behalf. American firms do generally set a good example of non-discriminatory employment practices in a society where brutal methods are the norm. They consitute the main domestic base for whatever remnants of liberalism still exist in South Africa. And though they employ only about one percent of the black labor force, they play a role quite disproportionate to their size in training the black managers and skilled laborers who, whatever happens to South Africa in the long run, will be required to make of the South African economy a going proposition in the future. Destroying the presence of these companies may satisfy our own need to demonstrate outrage against apartheid. So far as I can tell, however, it otherwise serves no constructive political object.

I do not know how to settle the conflict in South Africa. Perhaps it is irresolvable. I do believe that if the United States has any constructive role in the area at all, it will consist of its willingness to broker the conflict and to bring the parties to a settlement short of revolution and war. That will probably mean some form of partition, in which the whites progressively surrender much in the way of economic resources and internal police power, while also retaining self government for themselves. Something along those lines, I think, is what the United States should support — a policy that requires the American government to disassociate itself from the demands of either side for total power. Since a peaceful settlement appears to be more likely in circumstances of lesser rather than greater economic deprivation, and since American firms on balance support those elements within South Africa most inclined to such a settlement, it is quite doubtful that total divestment would contribute to a peaceful agreement of any kind; indeed, it is far more likely to worsen the prospects for one.

In the debate over the faculty's resolution to divest, these considerations were not raised. Instead, discussion centered on the potential costs to Colorado College. Most of the faculty members who dealt with this question thought that the price might be substantial, and they declared that we should be willing to pay it. No one wants the good that we do here to rest on evil elsewhere. For those who believe that the college becomes complicit in the larger system of oppression in South Africa if it invests in companies that do business there, there really is no alternative but to take our lumps and get on as best we can, even if it does mean financial sacrifice. But the failure to force a divestment of American firms does not reflect complicity; at the least, the consequences of their leaving have to be weighed against the consequences of their staying. If we are morally culpable for the one, we are also morally culpable for the other. On those grounds, I think divestment is a mistake, and I hope that the Board of Trustees will reject the faculty's resolution.

BY DAVID HENDRICKSON

David Hendrickson is a professor of Political Science at The Colorado College

Mark Thesing

No More Mr. Nice Guy

The "Bogus" Plan

Despite the ineptitude of the Colorado College's administration, the college is excellent. CC's greatest resource is their faculty. The professors are excellent.

The education that we receive is enormously respected in American academic circles. A recent national poll of college presidents rated CC 14th among 788 small liberal arts colleges. Using statistical data showing the number of undergraduates who go on to earn graduate degrees, US News and World Report mentioned CC as one of the top liberal arts schools in the country. "Rugg's Recommendation on the Colleges," rated CC's history, English, biology, geology, political science, pre-law, and pre-med as the best in the state.

Harry Truman was not a genius but was wise enough to observe, "if it works, don't fix it." CC is on the upswing and many believe the college will soon be one of the most respected colleges in the country. Why then must we drop our academic standards to adopt the eight block plan? If it works, why fix it?

The supposed purpose of the "Bogus Plan" is to give the faculty more time to publish. The money collected by the successful capital campaign could easily pay for the addition of new professors. This would allow the other professors to take blocks off to write.

Despite his total aloofness from the students and lack of charisma, Greshie has miraculously raised millions. With some wise and profitable investment and successful begging for alumni money, the college endowment has swelled. Let us invest in our greatest resource, professors. A few million spent to hire some more profs is a feasible as me getting drunk on Friday night.

The "Bogus Plan" would mean that CC students would be exposed to four less blocks of education. Many students believe this will deprive them of the opportunity to be fully educated. What if I had not taken two blocks of Accounting or two blocks of Intermediate Micro and Macro Economics? Well I wouldn't have four N.C.'s on my report card. These N.C.'s have taught me to never take Economics and my life has changed for the better.

Students, combat the apathy in your lives and show up at the football stadium this Friday noontime to protest the "Bogus Plan."

CCCAA Organizes Divestment Drive

The Colorado College Community Against Apartheid (CCCAA) which demands that the College divest its stocks from companies that are doing business in South Africa, has been active since the last Board of Trustees meeting in November, 1986.

During fourth block, students taking an independent study each wrote a paper on a specific issue related to South Africa. Some of these include a Survey of the Sullivan Principles, Race Relations in South Africa, and Apartheid as an Economic System. Based on these research projects, the position paper of the CCCAA (published in the Catalyst this week) was drafted and sent to the members of the Board of Trustees in light of the fact that they will most surely vote on this issue during their March meeting.

Given that the Board of Trustees believes that the CCCAA is not representative of the College community, in spite of the 1,032 signatures of support gathered during November of 1986, the CCCAA has set out to prove the opposite. Many important college organizations have pledged their support for divestment. Among these are, the Faculty, voting 60-8 and the CCCA, voting 12-1. The organizations that have to this date pledged their support is listed below. Also a growing number of individuals have become active within the different committees of the CCCAA, helping to coordinate and plan activities for March 13 and 14, the meeting dates of the Board of Trustees.

March 13 and 14 are probably the most important dates for divestment at CC because the Board will be announcing their decision on Saturday after their last meeting. Because of this, the CCCAA is planning a series of events that will serve to show the College's support for divestment. A 24 hour teach-in/protest is planned for the 13th and 14th. On Friday the 13th at 9:00, students will be invited to attend an alternative class, APARTHEID 100. Guest speakers will include professors, students and community members. All questions will be answered. Following a break for lunch, a rally will be held at 1:00 on the west side of Armstrong featuring live music and speakers. At 3:00, a live band will be entertaining us until dinner, when we will have an all campus barbecue. If you would like to attend, please bring your own food. Starting around 8:00 THE LEECHES will rock to divestment. After a full day of activities, we will invite people to sleep out in tents and shanties. We will provide some equipment but if you have a tent or sleeping bag, please bring it. The following morning is the most important because it is when the Board will announce their decision. We will have another live band and a speaker from the ANC.

Please come and join us as we support divestment at CC. Keep your eyes open for updates and more specific information. If you would like to become more involved with the CCCAA, don't hesitate to call Jorge at 635-2318, Matt at 520-1580 or Raina at 633-7508.

Organizations Which Have Pledged Support For Divestment

The Faculty
Big Mountain Support Group
Black Student Union
CCCA
ENACT
Feminist Collective
French House
International Student Organization
Latin American Awareness
MECha
Native American Student Association
Nuclear Action Coalition
Out and About
Russian House
Shareholders Responsibility Committee
Spanish House
Circle K
Political Union
Theatre Workshop
ASIA

Friday's Schedule:

9:00 am-11:00 am—Teach-in (place unknown)

1:00 pm-3:00 pm—Rally (Armstrong)

3:30 pm-5:30 pm—LEECHES (N. side of Armstrong)

5:00 pm-6:00 pm—Barbeque (Armstrong)—Bring your own food.

6:00 pm—Overnight Vigil—Bring your guitars & sleeping bags!

Saturday:

10:00 am-11:00 am—Live band (to be announced)

11:00 am-12:00 noon—Rally to await Board of Trustees announcement.

This schedule is still being revised so please look for final announcements.

In Praise of Pragmatic Eclecticism I

Howard Baker has won the White House two years early. A Washington coup landed this unlikely '88 contender in the enviable position of puppet-master, and everyone should breath easier: the crazies are being eased out of Washington. Baker, an affable if uninspiring moderate, may possess the skills and respect needed to make the final Reagan years something other than political limbo.

Now perhaps I'm whistling in the dark, but it seems that the tired Iran-Contra-Fawn Hall scandal has come as a disguised blessing. Without it, Donald Regan's seige mentality, juxtaposed with a Democratic Congress, would surely have meant a very sour two years for the American polity. The Tower commission has mandated an executive cleansing, and with the purges should come a presidency more in touch.

Fate has conspired to save the Republican party from itself; the soul of the party is returning to the center. Whereas Regan accentuated the President's most damaging conservative notions, Baker should, like the Baker who preceeded him through Reagan's first term (he venerable James the Third), reconcile the positive points of the conservative agenda with political realities. The President is now surrounded by a Vice-President who once called his economics "vodoo" and a Chief-of-Staff who labeled them a "riverboat gamble." These economics remain a gamble—the deficit continues to sap private investment and threaten the nation's future—but a new realism may elicit executive-legislative cooperation in tackling this problem.

The careerist Carlucci at the National Security council, a trusted Webster at the CIA, and the ever-pragmatic Shultz at State should translate into fewer foreign policy blunders. Weinberger, of course, remains in power with his odd notions of deploying a half-baked strategic defense shield, and Ed Meese remains a frightening spectre of right-wing activism. The threat of overzealous conservatism remains, but the political climate has changed. And Reagan long-ago demonstrated that when push and shove come to compromise, he can indeed play the political realist.

Pragmatic policies, not ideological fanaticism from the right or the left, is the order of the day. In 1986 the people said "no" to the conservative agenda; it also seems clear that only a minority among the voters want a return to the bloated leviathan of big government. Neither laissez-faire nor state-strapped business. Neither a disregard for the poor nor the subsidation of poverty. And if not affirmative action then at least unequivical leadership on civil rights. I may be presumptious in linking our President's quiescence on civil rights with the ugly resurgence of open racism across the nation, but it is the task of any President, as the moral leader of a nation, to take a strong stand against injustice; activism must go beyond drugs and abortion.

Reagan's first six years at last gave a majority of Americans their "era of good feelings." Carter's presidency, for all its ideals, had only been more negativism; Reagan embodied a sentimental, comfortable notion of Americana. Vietnam and Watergate were at last put behind us. And then again, shades of Watergate, a presidency out of control, not through the guile of its leader but through his isolation, his excessive delegation of authority. The scandal, however, came at the right time. America has had its binge, its consumerism, its intoxicated pursuit of material/chemical happiness, its false years of ignoring the plight of those kicked off the social ladder.

We all know that Americans can get rich (Wall Street craps, complete with white collar criminals, remains the most popular means of creating wealth out of air). The new, persistent question is whether we can produce and compete. If the government continues unsound fiscal policies, remains committed to subsidizing a few military companies and decrepit, inefficient industries, then the answer will be no.

The first Reagan presidency has come to a close, but Reagan himself need not bow out. A rejuvenated administration might still govern effectively. The Reagan-Baker-(Nancy?) presidency can do more perhaps than keep a lid on things. And as 1988 draws near we will anxiously await the arrival of the greatest of pragmatists and his honourable running-mate (also our first woman vice-president). Yes, its Kansas all the way in 1988 with Dole-Kassabaum.

BY TED CRAIG

It is the long stated policy of the Catalyst to only accept signed letters.

CAFE BIJOU
DINING & SPIRITS
• serving • lunch & light dinners, exquisite desserts & coffees
• first floor •
jazz, cocktails & hors d'oeuvres
• second floor •
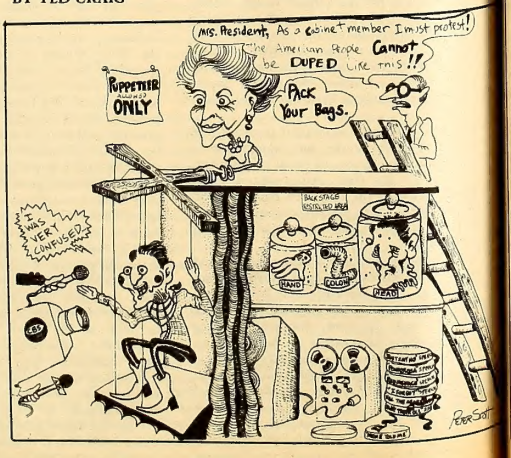
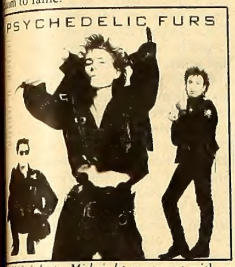
Trip the night fantastic in a turn of the century home
411 East Bijou 632-9640
Bring in this ad for a free specialty drink with your lunch or dinner



Trimmed Furs

One of my first introductions to The Psychedelic Furs came at a party a few years ago where I was acting as D.J. (I had the most tapes and was the only one sober enough to work the stereo.) During the course of the evening some guy came up and asked if I had "any furs." Excuse me? Finally he explained that he was talking about The Psychedelic Furs and rattled off a few of their more popular songs like "Pretty in Pink" and "Love My Way."

Anyway, since then I've become quite a Furs fan and their fourth album Mirror Moves soon became one of my favorites. Well, it's been a while but yes, The Psychedelic Furs have a new album out. I must say I'm rather relieved. I mean, I hoped that the title song for a Molly Ringwald movie wouldn't be their last claim to fame.



Midnight to Midnight starts out with an ostentious upbeat tune called "Heartbreak Beat." It's a little on the pop side but is none-the-less very likable and will no doubt be heading up the dance charts soon. From here, side one continues with more enjoyable songs such as "Shadow in My Heart" and ends with a song reminiscent of "Heaven," one of the bigger hits from Mirror Moves. "Angels Don't Cry" features Richard Butler's spunky vocals, melancholy lyrics ("if you want to see all my tears take a look in your eyes") and good saxaphone solos that have become one of the trademarks of Psychedelic Furs music.

Side two contains the title track from the album and I feel it's disappointing. It has a nice steady beat, but is rather bland and drags on.

Also on the second side is a cut called "Torture." With a title like that I was expecting maybe a return to a more punk sound found on songs like "Mr. Jones" from Talk Talk Talk. Well, a hard-driving beat and guitar licks point in that direction, but the mellow almost complacent vocals make the song fall short. However, rather kinky lyrics and occasional moaning in the background do liven things up a bit.

Overall, I like Midnight to Midnight but can't help feeling that some of the rough edges have been overly polished to produce a more pop sound. So, I'd have to say that I'm a little disappointed but not totally de-Furred.

KATIE DALSEMER

albums supplied by Budget Tapes Records

Plimsoul Makes A Case

Peter Case has a sort of folksy flavor to it. Technol-folksy, at times. There's quite a bit of acoustic guitar throughout, as well as some catchy harmonica. Tunes like "Three Days Straight" and "I Shook His Hand" are rich with this downhome rock and roll sound.

There is a variety of styles on this album. "More than Curious" has a definite Roxy Music sound to it. If Case had more of a Brian Ferry voice, in fact, this song could have been straight off Avalon.

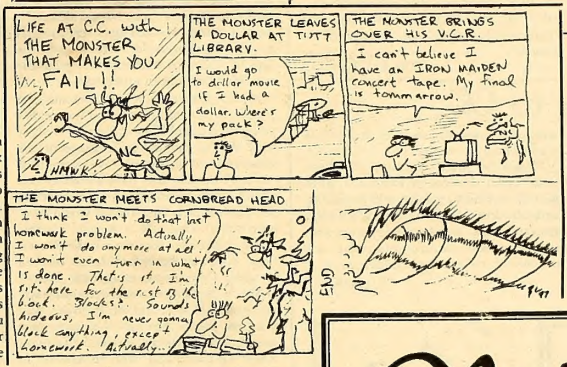
Case is also an adept storyteller. Several of the songs are interesting little narratives. "Small Town Spree" and "Walk in the Woods" discuss some unlikely crimes and mysterious happenings. Case's travels through the States are used quite often as subjects in his songs.

Peter Case is a good songwriter. He's a good musician. His voice leaves a little bit to be desired, however. There's nothing particularly striking about it; in fact it's rather run of the mill. But that's okay. The story behind the song is what's worth listening to.

Peter Case used to be the lead singer of the Plimsouls. If you ever saw the movie Valley Girl you saw them on stage during one of the bar scenes. They were best known for their song "A Million Miles Away."

Well, the Plimsouls are in the past, but Peter Case is still making music. He took his guitar on the road for a while, travelling the U.S. in an old car and playing at a variety of remote bars. Now his first solo album, Peter Case, has been released.

J. REED



LIFE AT C.C. with THE MONSTER THAT MAKES YOU FAIL!!
THE MONSTER LEAVES A DOLLAR AT TITT LIBRARY.
I would go to dollar movie if I had a dollar. Where's my pack?
THE MONSTER BRINGS OVER HIS V.C.R.
I can't believe I have an IRON MAIDEN concert tape. My final is tommorrow.
THE MONSTER MEETS CORNBREAD HEAD
I think I won't do that last homework problem. Actually, I won't do anymore at all. I won't even turn in what I is done. That's it, I'm sit here for the rest of the Book. Books? Sounds hideous, I'm never gonna look anything, except homework. Actually.
END

Does food control your life? You can stop abusing food but you can't do it alone.

If you have an eating disorder—anorexia, bulimia or compulsive overeating—it doesn't have to control your life. There is a way to fight the disease of food addiction...and win.

At the Medical Treatment Center For Eating Disorders, we will bring people into your life who are winners at recovery. People who can offer you not only medical expertise, but emotional support as well. People who will help you change the way you think about food, and the way you think about yourself.

The Eating Disorders Unit provides inpatient and outpatient care for adolescents and adults. And our program is covered by most insurance plans.

We can help you find a solution. Call us today at 475-2111.

MEDICAL TREATMENT CENTER FOR EATING DISORDERS

Summit Health Ltd. EISENHOWER MEDICAL CENTER
33 Barnes Ave. at Pikes Peak Ave.
Colorado Springs, Colorado 80909
(303) 475-2111

Michelle®
122 North Tejon

Everyday is Special at Michelle's

Mondays	☆	2 FOR 1	Ice Cream or Yogert Cone
Tuesdays	☆	FREE	Sundae with any Sandwich or Burger
Wednesday	☆	2 FOR 1	Hot Fudge Sundae
Thursday	☆	FREE	Petite Sundae with any Sandwich or Burger
Fridays	☆	2 FOR 1	Ice Cream or Yogurt Cone

For gift giving or any occasion don't forget a box of Michelle's chocolates or truffles.

CC ID Nights!

15% off ice cream & menu items Sunday thru Thursday
(does not apply to in store specials)

Michelle Homemade Ice Cream—Richest in Town & Made Fresh Daily with no Preservatives.*

Honig: Guitar Maestro

David Honig, CC's newest music faculty member, performed superbly February 12, in Packard Performance Hall. An unusually large number of students and faculty attended Honig's classical guitar concert. A few weeks prior to this he presented a concert for the Colorado Springs community at the Downtown Studio, Number 19, on North Tejon to a standing-room-only audience.

Honig's program presented in Packard Hall February 12, consisted of music by Scarlatti, Giuliani, Tarrega, Albeniz, L. Brouwer, Ponce, Bach, and two original pieces by Honig himself.

Mr. Honig, relaxed and at ease on home turf, played quite well. His technique and expression were excellent throughout. And he was able to command his listeners' attention with a dynamic and passionate performance.

Honig's original compositions, "Transitions" and "The Near Wilderness," composed as a "starving artist" shortly after his arrival in New York City, harmonious, and dynamic, were executed superbly. With the flavor of the city, these pieces are modern, passionate, quasi-tense, elusively frenetic, yet rich, complete—beautiful.

The program closed with Ponce's Sonatina Meridional, (Campo, Copla, and Fiesta). As a composer, Honig understands music, and his performances reflected this.

He executed the music strongly and passionately yet with great sensitivity.

Honig has become somewhat of a local celebrity after his recitals and the feature article the Gazette Telegraph ran on him Jan. 23.

He studied music at the Boston Conservatory, the Berklee College of Music in Boston, and other schools. Studying with one of America's best known classical guitarists, Eliot Fisk, he earned his master's degree in 1983 from Yale University.

Honig, 31, energetic and intelligent, brings to the Colorado Springs community and to CC an invaluable resource for music students with a sincere interest in studying the guitar. As well as being an outstanding performer, he is an excellent maestro.

Honig evidently pleased his audiences for he received standing ovations and encores at both of his concerts. Overall the programs were excellent. Mr. David Honig is proving to be an active, energetic, and valuable addition to the CC music faculty, and I for one hope and pray that he remains here at CC—at least until I graduate!

VICTOR ROCKWELL

Sculptures Come to CC

For those of you who are sick of all the lovely construction that is disrupting our beautiful campus—look forward to a big sculpture extravaganza at the end of this block.

Form Inc. is a group of nine contemporary artists who create large-scale sculpture that will be exhibited here on campus for a period of 6 months. CC's own art department professor, Carl Reed, will be among the 9 artists presenting a selected monumental abstract piece for the student body to admire.

"Public Sculpture" is a class offered this block under Professors Reed and Ruth Kilarik in which students will be dealing with the actual "putting up" of the large abstract works. So, keep your eyes open for some original constructions that will overwhelm the tasteless bulldozers.

T. GRIEZ

the Date Bar a Restaurant
Serving UNIQUE HOMEMADE RECIPES
10% off with CC ID
Serving Breakfast & Lunch
Mon.-Sat.
7 am - 4 pm
24 E. Kiowa 578-5693

SKYWAY VIDEO
Rentals & Sales
577-9047
Hours:
Monday-Thursday 10:30-7
Friday & Saturday 10:30-8
Closed Sunday
• Foreign Films (Excellent Selection)
• Classic Films
• Operas
• Musicals
As well as an extensive selection of
• Current Releases
— No Club Or Membership Fees —
Tuesday Special - $1.49 Rentals
Sunday Rentals - Free
Skyway Plaza • S. 8th & Arcturus
(feel free to call for directions)

Tulio on Tunes

Okay, new block. Back to the meat about music. At this moment I'm reading METAL magazine; the best metal 'zine I've read in awhile. This article on Manowar has some of the "choiceist" quotes: "I think a true Heavy Metal player sounds angry. He doesn't look happy onstage either. He does not smile, bounce around, shake his ass, that type of thing. Heavy Metal is a sound of anger, vengeance, might, and power." Even better: "We demolish, we kill and we leave. Remember, we always survive and we always win" (Joey DeMaio). Hey, these guys would be perfect for the next sorority formal. They also have the added bonus of wearing lots of furry animal skins to match their big, hairy chests. The far more modest Paul Di Anno (legendary ex-Iron Maiden vocalist) talks about his new band Battlezone: "We wouldn't like to ram anything down people's throats. We just had something to say. We're concerned about the way the earth's being used and messed up. Me and John both have kids." To finish up with metal; Metal gods Metallica found a new bass player to replace Cliff Burton, who died recently in a freak bus accident. His name is Jason Newsted and everyone says he shreds, but you'd have to ask the Japanese because that's the only place the new Metallica's been unleashed.

Moving from the sublime to the silly, the Beastie Boys next project is a movie. It's going to be called "Scared Stupid." Well, at least they're movin out of range of the music industry that would love to can them but can't because they have a number one record. If this was a completely free society the Beastie Boys first record would have been titled "Don't Be A Faggot." If this was a completely free society the Beastie Boys would probably be lifeless corpses hanging from some lampposts. Run—D.M.C.'s (has anyone noticed the only rap I write on is D.M.C. and the B-Boy's? Will someone please turn me on to some new jams?) new movie will be titled "Tougher Than Leather" and will be violent in nature. Run says "It will be the best movie ever. At the end we're all heroes and you're glad we're kickin' their butts." Anybody know any good shows this block? If you didn't go to the football field for the 8-block plan you derserve an involuntary front row seat at a Manowar show (or Stryper, depending on which you hate).

REGGAE

Now let's take a radical switch to world beat of Reggae. Black Uhuru, who going through many stylistic changes the past few years have always been fo on serious spleefers' turntab everywhere. "Brutal" is their first alb featuring their new singer J.R. Reed. Fr the opening cry of "dreadlocks" J.R. see pretty excited. So excited you start to w he would slow down a bit. This is rea noticable in the second cut "Fit You Ha Fit" which he reggae-raps faster than e can hear. Yet the next cut "Great Tr Robbery" is incredibly listenable. It's go smooth, steady rhythm chugging throu the whole song. Black Uhuru are masters of synthesized reggae. Their mu has a spatial quality to it which lifts breaks down and chills out the basic be Great compact Disc/Headphone materi If you're really into digital delays, ech and generally ear-tickling "seshing" tu check out the dub version of "Brutal." good album, a unique album. UB40's "K in the Kitchen" didn't quite cut the mus mustard with me. Of course I really do think they can ever match early materi such as "King," "Tyler," and "Burden Shame." It's by no means a poor album, b I still consider it uninspired. It probab should be taped from a friend instead bought. "Graceland" on the other hand an album you want to buy on CD ev when you don't own a disk player. I never a big Paul Simon fan, but this alb is an undeniable musical masterpiece. H of a lot of fun to listen to as well. By playi non-western music yet staying away fr heavy-handed political messages Simo has brought two great cultures a lit closer.

"These are the days of miracles an wonder/This is the long distance call/t way the camera follows in slo-mo/The w we look to us all/The way we look to distant constellation/That's dying in corner of the sky/These are the days miracle and wonder/And don't cry bab don't cry, don't cry.

"In the Top 40 half the songs are rec messages to the teen world to drop o turn on, and groove with the chemicals light shows at discoteques" —A Linkletter.

"Most people wouldn't know music came up and bit them on the ass" —Fra Zappa.

TULIO BROWNIN

Film Series

Annie Hall
Friday, 7 & 9, Olin

Woody Allen's classic look at relationships. Winner of Academy Awards for Best Picture, Best Director, Best Original Screenplay (all Allen's), and Be Actress (Keaton). Don't sneeze and don't miss it.

U.S., 1977, 93 min. Starring Woody Allen and Diane Keaton.

The Treasure of the Sierra Madre
Sunday, 7 & 9:30, Olin

Badges? We don't need no stinkin' badge Humphrey Bogart and Walter Huston st in this powerful exploration of the effec of greed.

U.S., 1948, 126 min. Directed by Joh Huston (Walter's father).

Hair Designers for Men & Women
RAPUNZEL
Style cuts, Cellophanes,
Perms & Color.
Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.
Stop in or make your appointment:
827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

Spring Sports Start

The Colorado College Women's sse Team looks very promising this
r. Entering its tenth season, the team ll be bolstered by a lot of interest and husiasm as well as talent and erience from last year's players and ny new faces.
led by tri-captains Katie McNitt and nie Alderson (who dominate the team fensively) and Jennifer Hendee (who s elected captain after only year of perience), the team is eager to get ether and have a winning season. With olid core of returning players, including ney Dundon and Gretchen Smith, and new strength of freshman Suzannah son (from Lincoln-Sudbury, MA), the ensive team will be extremely powerful.
ping Suzannah will be a number of shmen with previous experience,
ething the team has lacked in the past.
Coaches Michelle Giarratano, who plays the Denver Women's Team, and Tom
, coach of CC's Men's Lacrosse Team, invaluable to the development and provement of the team. Both CC duates and veteran players of CC sse, they are responsible for getting men's lacrosse established at CC.
CC expects challenging (and victorious)
nes against CU-Boulder and CSU wards the end of this block, and similarly iting contests against Colorado demy and the Denver Women's Team r this spring. The team, finally rid of hand-me-downs from the men's team, ll be outfitted with brand new shirts and s, so come down to Steward Field and e a look at the fun, fast moving game of men's lacrosse.

JULIE SLOTNIK

Women's Track

reshman Cross-Country standout Terri mbowski will spearhead Coach Bonnie ehart's Women's Track Team. She ks to have the best chance of advancing nationsl this year (also May 20-23 at ith Central College), needing a 2:16.1 meters to qualify. With a 2:18 under belt, Terri will also compete in the one-e event for CC.
Another excellent performer thus far in indoor season has been junior Diane k, a long and triple jump specialist. She finished in the top four in all her meets ivision I meets) this year, and should continue to excel in the upcoming outdoor season. Coach Everhart admits, however, that despite her early season consistency, Clark will really have to improve to qualify for nationals.

Senior Mia Cadmus, junior Paula Stokes, and freshman Karen Romme will add depth to the Tiger tracksters. Cadmus, who ran the two-mile event during the indoor season, will concentrate on the 10,000 meter race during the outdoor campaign. Stokes, like Clark a long and triple jump performer, hopes to improve consistently throughout the year. And Romme, a powerful addition in the shot put, looks to gain valuable experience in the course of the season.

The Tigers' first outdoor meet will be next weekend in Albuquerque at the University of New Mexico. CC will host its own invitational April 25 at the Olympic Training Center. Come watch the Tigers run (not walk) all over their opponents.

DEAN CAMPBELL

Men's Track

Men's Track Coach Frank Flood's 1987 distance running squad will again be led by the nucleus of CC's Cross-Country Team. With juniors Scott Kang and Erik Browning, sophomore Ben Harrison, and freshmen Ryan Shaffer and Paul Koch all running well early in the season, the Tigers hope to advance at least some of these hoofers to the National Division III Meet May 20-23 at North Central College in Naperville, IL.

Early on, Kang appears to be CC's most likely candidate to forge his way to nationals this year. He won a February 14 meet at the Colorado School of Mines with a 4:25 mile, rendering the 3:52 1,500 meters (Kang's concentration this year will be on the 1,500) he needs to qualify for nationsl entirely reachable. His season, due to the academic rigors of being a chemistry major, will be somewhat shorter and less intense than normal, giving Kang less time to reach his necessary goal.

Junior Erik Browning is another Tiger with a realistic shot at a late May vacation in Naperville. Although he hasn't been training exceptionally well due to early season snow problems, Browning hopes to advance in the 5,000 meter event. He'll get a good shot over 8th Block Break when he journeys (along with Kang, who'll run the 1,500) to his hometown of Austin to compete in the Texas Invitational. Competing with Division I runners from the Southwest Conference and elsewhere, Browning hopes the heightened competition will spur him on to the 14:42 he needs to qualify for nationals.

The remaining members of the team's long distance contingent, Harrison, Shaffer, and Koch, will rely on their cross-country experience to help the Tigers' cause. Harrison will run both the 1,500 and 5,000 meter events, Koch mainly the 5,000, and Shaffer will do the 800. According to a source close to the team, Shaffer could, with improved strength, utilize his excellent speed to become a definite threat at 800 meters.

DEAN CAMPBELL

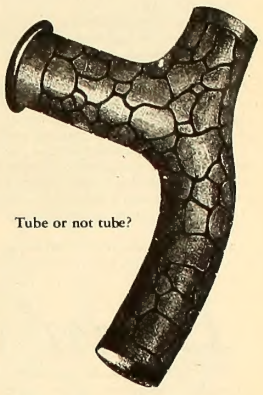
Women's Tennis

Fourth year Head Coach Erol Agnos heads a 1987 CC Women's Tennis Team that will rely on both experienced veterans and enthusiastic freshmen to try and make up for the loss of two stars, Karen Ruehl and Laura Hoeven, to graduation. The Tigers, who last year finished fourth in the NCAA Division III Tournament, and fifth in the final Division III rankings, will need all the help they can get to try and improve upon last year's 12-4 record.

Heading into the Tigers' first match (today at 3:00 against Kearney State (NAIA) at Lynmar Tennis Club), final playing positions have not yet been solidified. Although the top six will stay the same, snow has prevented sufficient challenges for making the decision that will dictate the remainder of the season. Here is the lineup for the Kearney State match: Junior Sara Ryan, No. 1 Singles; Junior Theresa Kuehne, No. 2 Singles; Freshman Stacey Wing, No. 3 Singles; Senior Melissa Forbes, No. 4 Singles; Junior Meredith Clark, No. 5 Singles; Freshman Josie Axt, No. 6 Singles; Junior Sara Ryan and Senior Melissa Forbes, No. 1 Doubles; Senior Kathleen Delaney and Freshman Stacey Wing, No. 2 Doubles; Freshman Min-Min Lo and Freshman Anchalee Smith, No. 3 Doubles.

The Tigers' next home match will be Thursday, March 12, when they will face Regis College (Division II) at 2:30 p.m. Wednesday, March 11, CC travels to AFA for a 3:00 p.m. match against the Falcons.

DEAN CAMPBELL



Tube or not tube?

Continued from p. 1

place Minnesota-Duluth in a two game total goals series, 13-4. UND has three of the top four scorers in the WCHA. In last weekend's games the Sioux's Bob Joyce tallied five goals. The two teams faceoff again tonight and tomorrow night in North Dakota for a two game total goal series. This will determine who goes on to the WCHA Finals.

LONDON

SUMMER INTERNSHIPS

Law/Accounting
Theater/Arts
Communications
Journalism
Computers
Languages

Earn up to 8 credits in these and other courses.

Apply Now:

Janet Kollek, Director
American Academy of Overseas Studies
158 West 81 St. – Box 112
New York, New York 10024
(212) 724-0804

A NOSTALGIC BOUTIQUE
Antique Costume Jewelry
Equisite Clothing
Unique & Fun Accessories
126 N. Nevada Ave.
636-9640

Use this for 10% off

Thank You

DIALogue Supporters

The Student Development Committee would like to thank all of those local businesses and individuals who supported DIALogue by providing food and prizes for 1987. Your generous contribution made possible a very successful DIALogue campaign!
A special thanks to SAGA - we couldn't do it without you!

Boulder Street Gallery
Bowl Mor Lanes
Broadmoor Hotel/Tavern
Burger King
CCCA
Chick-Fil-A
College Pharmacy
College Shoe Shop
Colorado College Administration
Audio Visual
Bookstore
Extra Curricular
Faculty
Leisure Program
Physical Plant
Colorado Springs Symphony
Colorado Travel Management
Copper Mountain Resort
Corner Pocket
Dominos Pizza
Fine Arts Center
Frame Factory
Games People Play
Gazette Telegraph Newspaper
Hamburger Stand
Independent Records of Colo. Spgs. Inc.
Jezebel's Market
Joe's Styling Shop
Josh & John's Naturally Homemade Ice Creams
KRCC Radio Station
C.J. Kard
Keystone Ski Resort
King Soopers
Knit One
Lane Sales, Inc.
The London Shop
McAllister's Tavern
McDonald's of Colorado Springs
McKenna's Pub
Jose Muldoon's Restaurant
Mostly Skins Leather & Fur
Northport Restaurant
Patsy's Candy Kitchen
Paul's Flowers
Plaza of the Rockies
SAGA
Silk Stockings
Taco Bell
Taco John's
Ute Lanes Bowling Inc.
Vail Ski Resort

Baseballers Barely Bumble

The Colorado College baseball team opened its 1987 season against Metro State in Denver last Sunday. Unfortunately, the Tigers came up empty as they dropped the first two games of the year. Even thought the Tigers' performance was not what Coach Mandel expected he states "there is alot of improvement and strength in this year's team. One thing that did hurt us was the weather, we have been in for the last two weeks and we weren't prepared as I would have liked.

The Tigers lost the first game 8-1, but despite the uneven score starting pitcher Todd Meisinger gave a strong performance. Todd admits that he was a little nervous going into the first game, which seemed true as the Roadrunners came up with seven unanswered runs in the third inning, but Todd promises to be a leading factor in the success of this year's team. Also showing a strong performance was ace relief pitcher, Charlie Ficco, who completely shut down the Roadrunners' offensive attack, giving up one hit in four innings of work.

In the second game of the doubleheader, CC's batting strength came though as the Tigers went through three Metro State pitchers. Four-year veteran Dana Radamacher started and completed the game for the Tigers. Radamacher was very impressive on the mound as he only gave up five hits in seven innings, but the Tigers fell, 5-4.

Even though the Tigers have an 0-2 record in the newly formed CIBA (Colorado Intercolligate Baseball Association), Coach Mandel feels that the Tigers can be competitive against baseball powerhouses, Metro State and Denver University. "We have the talent and the ability to win ballgames," says Mandel, but admits, "we need to keep our concentration throughout a game." Currently, the Tigers have only two pitchers (Radamacher and Meisinger), and Coach Mandel invites any pitchers interested in playing to talk to him.

The Tigers are in action again this Sunday at Denver University. CC opens its home season on Sunday, March 15 at Memorial Park against Colorado School of the Mines. Come out and cheer on the CC baseball team to a succesful season.

ALEX CONTRERAS

Dean's Drivel

Given the "death penalty" by the NCAA infractions committee for its seventh probation inciting impropriety, Southern Methodist University's Mustangs will be, effective for the 1987 season, the first school in history to have its football season cancelled. Although there was disappointment at the harshness of the penalty from SMU interim president William Stallcup and other Southwest conference officials, the NCAA's action against a scandal that extended all the way to Texas Governor Bill Clements certainly seems justified. Clements, former chairman of SMU's Board of Governors, admitted that the Board knew of payments to SMU players when the school was on probation in 1985. SMU will remain on probation until 1990, be denied live TV coverage or postseason appearances for 1988, and will not be allowed to give scholarships in 1987 (only fifteen in 1988). Even with a proposed seven game schedule for the 1988 season, SMU's program probably won't be able to regain competitive Division I-A status for anywhere from six to ten years.

The sanctions against SMU can't be easily argued against, if the cry that "well, everyone else is doing it too" is denied any creedence. Their program (specifically football) has been consistently documented as being riddled by corruption and illegal recruiting and booster involvement. Signing bonuses, other cash payments, and illegal job and rent arrangements were seemingly commonplace, continuing even after the school was initially placed on probation in 1985. Although the actions against SMU threaten the future of the program as a legitimate Divison I-A contender, the severity of these actions should serve as an effective deterrent to any other schools with similarly corrupt programs.

Unfortunately, the only apparent way to eliminate corruption in college athletics is to totally revamp recruitment policies and admission requirements, and reevaluate and more closely monitor school policies toward making sure athletes become independently functioning parts of their college community. Freshman ineligibility, though economically difficult, should be reinstituted so that athletes can first get acquainted with both school and schoolwork before dedicating all their time to athletics. More comprehensive counseling programs should be established so that athletes get the scholastic assistance they need to become viable members of the academic community. This counseling would help eliminate the phantom majors that some athletes earn just so that it can be said they earned a degree. Although these reforms may seem somewhat impractical in light of the sorry state of academics in Division I athletics, it is necessary to take steps to render the image of the dumb jock obsolete beyond a representative proportion.

Sport Shorts

Men's Club Hockey

On February 20 and 21 the Men's Club Hockey Team traveled to Vail for a weekend series against the powerful Vail Express. The Tigers were trying to maintain their winning record (which stood at 4 wins, 3 losses) by incorporating a strategy of letting the 'Express get confident with an easy win on Friday and then turning on the pressure for Saturday night's game to take the opposition completely by surprise.

Coach Eric Kahler's master plan was right on track as the Tigers dropped Friday night's game, 14-2, with both goals coming from two freshman recruits who must remain nameless. The Tigers' plan, however, did not work as originally planned on Saturday night. The Tigers came out sluggish in the first five minutes and allowed the Express to jump out to a five goal lead (the result of post game activities in Vail on Friday, and skiing during the day on Saturday). The Tigers were able to mount a comeback, led by Dean French's hat trick and player/coach Kahler's rebound goal, and played the Express evenly for the second and third periods. The Vail lead was too large, however, and CC ended up losing the game, 11-4, for a total weekend tally of 25-6 not in the Tigers' favor.

The men will try and get back to their winning ways this weekend when they play in the Air Force Junior Hockey Tournament at the Air Force Academy. The tournament will involve teams from CSU, DU, AFA, Minnesota, and CC. Games will be played throughout the weekend at unannounced times. Feel free to stop any of the CC lids to find out the game time so you can come watch, drink, and be merry.

GUY LE PUCK

Women's Club Hockey

The third weekend of last block the Women's Club Hockey team traveled to Aspen for a two game series. On Saturday evening, the Aspen Motherpuckers shellacked the Club team 4-0. Sunday morning the women fared much better, only losing 4-3. The Club team had hoped to extend their hard earned winning streak of one game (against the Denver R... to two or possibly three ... Unfortunately, their hard earned ... streak of one game (against the ... Bandits) to two or possibly three ... Unfortunately, their prayers ... unanswered.

Coach Sunshine attributed Sat... loss to the 5 hour ride to Aspen and ... his thoughts on the situation ... anticipated the effects of the long ... planned a stretching and jogging s... before the game in hopes of relaxi... players." The pre-game exercise ha... effect on the women and many play... their skates were laden with an ex... pounds each, perhaps it was the al...

On Sunday morning (8:00 a.m.), a... exciting night of carbohydrate cra... in downtown Aspen, the women ... gallantly, but dropped 4-3. CC took th... in the first period with a blazing sl... by Susan Deeds which sailed b... stunned Motherpucker goalie. Sarah ... scored next. Faking wrist shot, ... pulled the puck around and backha... into the depths of the net. Deeds ca... with another score soon after. D... waiting anxiously at the far blue ... caught a perfect pass on her stick ... exploded into the offensive ... unguarded. She faked a slapper, and ... the puck perfectly in the upper right c... of the net. In the meantime, Aspen ... four goals.

While the women dropped t... Aspen, all was not lost because the ... ended by 9:30 a.m. and Sunday provec... a beautiful day with a great base of p... powder on Ajax. As one of the ... members of the team said, "That's th... reason we all play hockey, anyway."

The women have a big month ah... them with home games the second ... third weekends of the block. They ho... establish another winning streak.

QUINN TIKKA

PIZZA SHUTTLE
Open Daily at 11:00 A...
COMING RIGHT AT YOU
For Any 14" Single Item Pizza
$5.00 (Plus Tax)
(with this coupon)
After 8 PM
578-8686
Coupon Expires 4/10/87
One Coupon Per Order • Road & Weather Conditions Per...

Think Spring!
"Your Campus Travel Agency"
Taylor Travel • 636-3871

The Guinea Pig
Ethnic Art
Clothing &...
Jewelry ...
South Americ...
Africa & A...
In Old Colorado ...
2510 W. Colorado ...
633-0584

Men Kill Friends

Tigers win eight of twelve to finish season

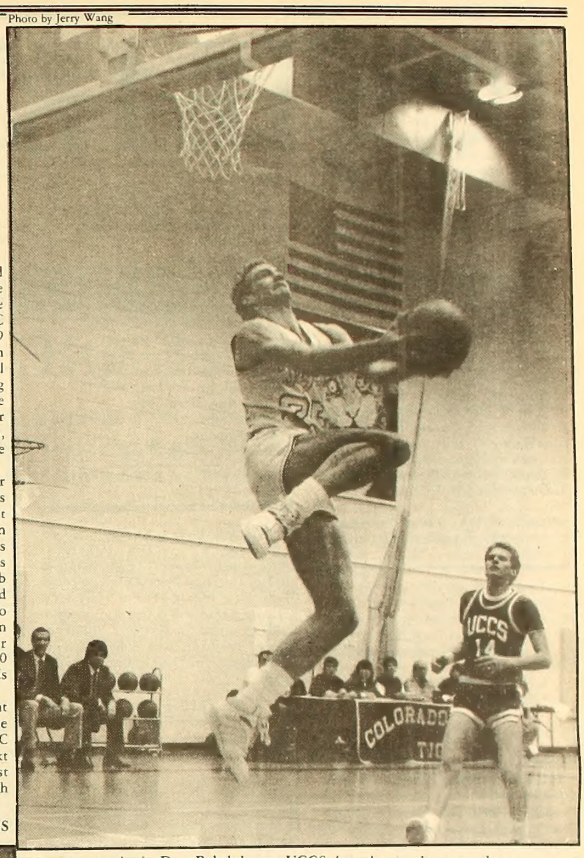
What started out as a disastrous season the CC men's basketball team ended on positive note with a 99-84 victory over ends Bible College on February 24th. e win gave the Tigers a 12-14 record for year. However that victory served as ely the exclamation point to a season of pressive achievements for the Tigers. it a team which found itself with a ntal mark of 4-10 in the middle of its edule was able to achieve respectability he second half of the season was a major mplishment. But the fact that they shed with the best CC men's record ce 1961 is nothing short of incredible. "I was very pleased with our season," head coach Jim Cross. "We could have shed it in when our record was at 4-10, we didn't." Cross was especially ased with the consistency of his team's during January and February, the nths during which Tiger play has ditionally gone down the tubes. After all s said and done, many of the 1986-87 gers found themselves high in the record oks. Senior Co-captain Rob Bogue shed the season with a CC single-son record of 559 points, and also shed 9th in NCAA Division III in 3-nt goals with an average of 2.7 per e. The squad's other captain, Senior ward Dave Rakel, finished his three-r career holding 7th place on the all-e career rebounding list with 511, 9th on the career scoring chart with 790, 2nd on the career steals list and ended up as the Tiger's all-time field goal percentage leader with 51.8%. Rakel also set a CC single-game rebounding record with 19 against Colorado Christian College. In addition, Rakel has been named the official all-time Tiger dunk champion, slamming down well over 40 rim-rattlers in the course of the season. The team's other graduating senior, forward John Sacha, finished in a tie for second place on the career scoring list with 1124 points.

It would appear that with three of their top four scorers graduating, that CC is destined for hard times next season. Yet the Tigers will return a solid nucleus in junior forward Dave Schroeder, the team's second leading scorer and rebounder this season, junior point guard Rob Hemminger (7.2 assists per game) and centers Josh Childs and Greg Fox. Also joining the picture will be 6-7 redshirt Lyn Cherapy from Wyoming. "We're stable for next year," states Cross. "We've got 8 to 10 players who can play." In addition, Cross is hoping to have a good recruiting year.

The 1987-88 Tigers will have a decent shot at reaching and even surpassing the mythical .500 mark, which has eluded CC basketball for the past three decades. Next year's schedule includes 10 games against Division III opponents, a factor which should facilitate the road to .500.

DAVID EVANS

Photo by Jerry Wang



Master contortionist Dave Rakel shows a UCCS clown how to throw one down.

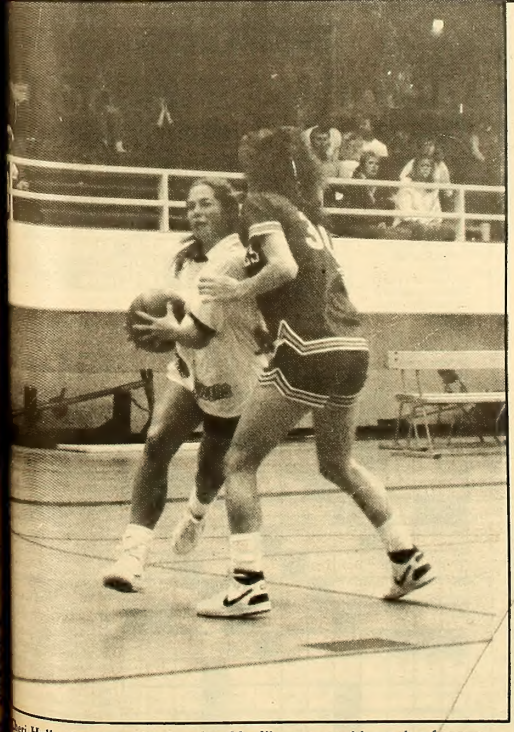


Photo by Jerry Wang

eri Hull grimaces at the thought of bodily contact with a rather fragrant pponent.

Women End Season With Record Win

Hoopsters nearly quadruple 1985-86 win total

The Colorado College Women's Basketball Team ended an up and down season with a 106-28 shellacking of Colorado Christian College February 21 at the El Pomar Sports Center. The win, coming on the heels of a four game Tiger losing streak, gave CC an 11-14 final record for the 1986-87 campaign.

CC completely dominated their Christian counterparts from the game's opening whistle, jumping out to a 44-9 halftime lead behind 46.7% (21-45) shooting and 11 steals. CCC, on the other hand, hit on only 3 of 25 (12%) first half shots, and turned the ball over 16 times. Brenda Frihauf and Sally Bush led the Tigers' first half onslaught with eight points each, and Bush and Paige Lorimer each hauled down five first half rebounds. Ten CC players scored in the first half, while only four CCC players managed any points.

The second half was more of the same as the Tigers shot 54.9% (28-51) from the field and 85.7% (6-7) from the line. CCC, meanwhile, continued to shoot miserably from both the floor (9-30; 30%) and the charity stripe (1-6; 16.7%).

For the game, CC shot 50% (49-98) from the field and a vastly improved 88.9% (8-9) from the line. CCC canned only 21.8% (12-55) of their field goal attempts and a dismal 40% (4-10) of their free throw shots.

The Tigers were led by 17 points and 11 rebounds from Sally Bush, 10 points and 15 rebounds from Paige Lorimer, and 12 points, 5 rebounds and 5 assists from Kitzie Pettersen in her last game in a CC uniform. All fourteen players on the CC roster played and scored, while only six CCC players tallied any points.

As a team, CC outrebounded CCC 62-23, handed out 35 assists to nary a one for CCC, and turned the ball over only half as many times (CC-13; CCC-26).

The win over CCC is an important turning point for the Tiger program after a horrendous 3-23 record for the 1985-86 season. Although CC will lose pivotal performers Kitzie Pettersen, Terri Livermore, and Brenda Brihauf to graduation, freshmen Sally Bush and Paige Lorimer have proven their ability and will only continue to improve next year. While the Tigers came up slightly shy in their bid for a .500 season (11-14; .440), continued hard work and determination could yield a similar improvement for the 1987-88 season.

DEAN CAMPBELL

"AT CC"

ATTENTION JUNIOR PRE-HEALTH PROFESSIONS STUDENTS. An important meeting dealing with the application to medical school will be held on: Thursday, March 12, 1987, 3:30 P.M., Olin 100.

All students who plan to apply for entrance into medical school in the Fall of 1988 should attend this meeting. A panel of several successful applicants to medical school will discuss the AMCAS application form, letters of recommendation, and the interview.

Important materials will be distributed at this time, and there will be a thorough discussion of the entire application process. If you plan to apply to any of the health profession schools for entrance in the Fall of 1988 make sure you register your plans with the Health Professions Committee at this meeting. Further questions should be directed to Dr. Eldon Hitchcock, Prehealth Professions Advisor, ex 436, or Mrs. Judy Gibson, ex. 429.

Spring Break Trip to South Padre Island from only $159. For information call Abby at 636-1022.

Josephine Lazarus
Instruction in the Yogas
(303) 475-9721

Ballroom Dancing Lessons - El Pomar Upstairs Hall. Get ready for the President's Ball and learn to Tango, Rumba, Cha Cha, Country Swing and Waltz. Two Arthur Murray Dance Instructors will teach the lessons. Wear slippery tennis shoes. Sponsored by CCCA. FREE! Sundays, March 8, 15, 22.

PI GAMMA MU Certificates can be picked up in Palmer Hall, Room 22E.

CPS

PIZZA SHUTTLE
OPEN DAILY
AT 11:00 AM
578-8686
Have You Seen Our Coupons In This Issue?

College Students earn $6-$10 per hour working part time on campus, for more information call 1-800-932-0528.

Recipe for Bemis Hall

Take some giggling, girlish noice,
Add discussion of the boys,
Some rooms, roommates
And pleas for dates,
Bemis Hall is made of this.
Don't forget the sharing clothes,
Swapping shoes for nylon hose,
A midnight snack,
Then hit the sack,
Bemis Hall is made of this.
Then add the telephone calls,
A gleeful shout through Bemis Halls,
"A date with Joe this very night!"
Stir carefully through the year
'Till the month of June is near.
These are the times that delight.
With study by each lass,
A hope that all will pass,
Alarm at four
To study more,
Bemis Hall is made of this.

Courtesy of Colorado College Tiger February 17, 1957.

Would it kill you to skip a meal at SAGA? Find our with ODN (Overseas Development Network) by partipating in our Fast For Third World Development on Wednesday, March 11. For every meal given up SAGA will donate the money to ODN to support a Women's Vocational Literacy Project in India. Sign up and get more details in Taylor/Bemis Dining Halls.

Save a Life! Kathleen Delaney (x266) has claimed that God will call her home if she doesn't sell 250 senior class pins. They only cost $2.50...a small price to pay to save a life.

INVITATION to attend a Talk by: The Honorable Wayne Angell, Member, Board of Governors, Federal Reserve System, Washington D.C. "The Federal Reserve in the American Economy: Monetary Policy Priorities." Thursday, March 12, 1987, 8:15 P.M., Gates Common Room, Palmer Hall on the Colorado College Campus.

H. Chase Stone served as eighth President of the First National Bank in Colorado Springs. Born in 1900 in New York, he attended Exeter Academy and Cornell University, where he graduated in 1924. He came to Colorado Springs soon after graduation and spent 10 years in the Cragmoor Tuberculosis Sanitorium. He worked for Boettcher-Newton Brokers briefly after his discharge before joining the First National Bank for a distinguished career in banking. Always active in community affairs, he served with distinction many institutions, including Colorado College as a Trustee. In his honor the H. Chase Stone Memorial Lecture has been established by a generous gift of the First National Bank, thus allowing Colorado College to bring distinguished members of the banking and financial community to campus on an annual basis.

BIOLOGY SEMINARS FOR MARCH. March 10, Tuesday, Ron Warner, CC Biology Major, The Role of Potassium in Renovascular Hypertension.

March 12, Thursday, Dr. Robert Ellis, Department of Microbiology and Environmental Health, Colorado State University, Epidemiology, Socieoeconomic Importance and Control of Alpaca Interotoxemies in the Peruvian Andes.

March 17, Tuesday, Randy Kochevar, CC Biology Major, Catamount Ranch Lakes: A Comparative Analysis of Aquatic Habitat Suitability for Brook Trout and Rainbow Trout.

March 19, Thursday, Greg Kazemi, CC Biology Major, Photosynthetic and Thermophilic Microbes From Several Colorado Hot Springs.

All seminars are to be held at 12:00 noon in Olin Room 100. Brown bag lunch and refreshements served.

THE GREAT STUDY BREAK. Come meet with 2 KRCC affiliates and discuss their contributions to Colorado College. See how they made things happen. march 11, at 8:30 pm in Slocum Lounge. Refreshments provided. Sponsored by Leadership 2,000.

At Shove Chapel:

March 10 & 12

Meditation—Shove Chapel 8:00-8:30 a.m. Music, silence, mystical and/or other writings (enter by northeast door)

March 10

Religion Majors Meeting—12:00 noon, Shove Chapel

March 10

Embodiment Series—Shove Chapel—7:00 p.m. Film "The Family Trap." This movie takes a look at one family with an addictive member and how the rest of the family become co-dependents.

March 11

Shove Council Meeting 12:00 noon, Shove Lounge

March 13

Worship Service, Shove Chapel, 12:05 to 12:40. Speaker: Kenneth Burton

FULBRIGHT FELLOWSHIPS 198[illegible]
89. IIE announces the opening of the 198[illegible]
89 competiton for grants supporting graduate study or research abroad und[illegible] the Fulbright-Hays Program. Applica[illegible] must be U.S. citizens and hold at least a B.A. or the equivalent. Proficiency in th[illegible] langauge of the host country is gener[illegible] required.

Grants include maintenance for th[illegible] tenure of the award, round-tr[illegible] international travel, health and accid[illegible] insurance and tuition wavers.

Applications and precise details will b[illegible] available in April; however, qualified C[illegible] students are urged to contact Pr[illegible] Wishard, Fulbright Advisor, AH 359, Ex[illegible] 520.

PIZZA SHUTTLE
Open Daily at 11:00 A[illegible]
$5.00 (Plus Tax)
For Any 14" Single Item Pizza
(with this coupon)
After 8 PM
578-8686
Coupon Expires 4/10/87
One Coupon Per Order • Road & Weather Conditions Permitting

All Interested In Jazz: Cleo Parker Robinson Dance ensemble is coming to C[illegible] to do a jazz workshop, compliments [illegible] Dance Workshop. Sunday, March 8, 1[illegible] Cossit. Be there and share the fun!

Tee Shirts—NCAAW Fun Ru[illegible] participants can now pick up their t[illegible] shirts from Adam Burke x243 (room 2[illegible] Loomis Hall).

Correction: The Latin phrase appearin[illegible] in Kevin J. O'Connor's letter Februa[illegible] 20th should have read "...promote th[illegible] classical ideal of mens sana in corpo[illegible] sano."

The Puzzle

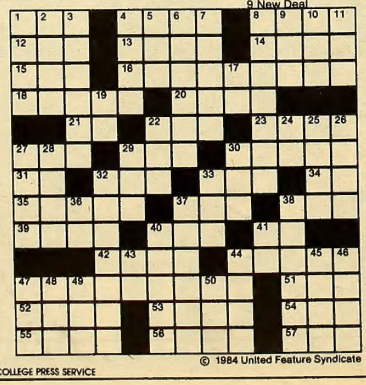
ACROSS

1 Macaw
4 Young salmon
8 Cuts
12 Take unlawfully
13 Butter substitute: colloq.
14 Semi-precious stone
15 Hall
16 Ephemeral
18 Chimes
20 Danish island
21 Babylonian deity
22 Abstract being
23 Memorandum
27 Aeriform fluid
29 Cushion
30 Last
31 Indian mulberry
32 Rodent
33 Moccasin
34 Exists
35 Scatter
37 Mournful
38 Guido's high note
39 Body of water
40 Hit lightly
41 Chaldean city
42 Imitated
44 A month
47 Gave a prior warning
51 Room in harem
52 Cry of Bacchanals
53 Lamb's pen name
54 Crimson
55 Small lumps
56 Fixed period of time
57 Declare

DOWN

1 Desert dweller
2 Wander
3 White poplars
4 Vessels
5 Pub beverage
6 Recommit
7 Lassos
8 Foolish
9 New Deal agency: init.
10 Armed conflict
11 Crafty
17 Owner's risk: abbr.
19 Note of scale
22 Dine
24 Attached to
25 Caudal appendage
26 "Lohengrin" heroine
27 Strain for breath
28 Choir voice
29 Animal's foot
30 Novelty
32 Tells
33 Soft food
36 Artificial language
37 Seat on horse
38 Mistakes
40 Doctrine
41 Above
43 Hebrew letter
44 The first man
45 Mental image
46 Wife of a knight
47 Church bench
48 Eggs
49 Land measure
50 Goddess of healing

F	E	W		S	P	I	N	E		E	B	B
O	R	E		T	E	N	O	R		T	A	U
R	A	T	T	A	N		T	R	U	A	N	T
		A	B	E	T		S	N
T	H	I	N		T	O	P		F	I	L	E
R	O	D		T	R	E	A	T	I	S	E	S
A	T		V	I	A		L	O	T		A	S
D	E	T	E	N	T	I	O	N		A	V	E
E	L	A	N		E	L	M		S	L	E	D
			A	N		L	I	F	E
M	A	I	L	E	D		N	O	T	I	C	E
O	I	L		S	O	P	O	R		R	A	Y
A	S	K		T	E	A	S	E		E	W	E



© 1984 United Feature Syndicate
COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 13 March 1987 Volume 21, No. 17

Board Confronts Big Issues Today

Photo by Jane Bierman

Visiting German Professor and Students (from top clockwise: Prof. Hans Joachim Schmidt, Jorg Hinniers, Eva Tumbrage, Kristina Sauer, Lelani Dies, Angela Niedenzu, Gundula Zickermann and Martina Heesen.

CC Hosts German Students

Seven students and a professor from the Luneburg Hochschule in northern Germany are with us at CC this block, taking classes and getting accustomed to life in Colorado Springs. The students are staying with local families who Kristina Sauer characterizes as "very nice and open."

The Block Plan has provided some challenges to the foreign students. Elke Koops, organizer of our own CC program in Luneburg observes "the Block Plan is good because you can study a subject intensively. You are more motivated—but there is a lot of reading." Despite the work load, Kristina, currently enrolled in Professor Yaffe's class The 20th Century Novel, claims "I like this system because I usually tend to put things off until the end of a semester, and you can't do that here." Some of their other classes include 20th Century Black History, Communist Systems II, Studies in Cinema: American Film, and Deviant Behavior (the last one undoubtably providing an interesting introduction to American life).

Horg Hinniers commented on the atmosphere in the classroom. "Americans say that Germans are reserved, but the same can be said of the Americans. When we sat in the classroom nobody came to speak with us. This surprised us because we had heard how outgoing Americans are," Jorg said.

Professor Schmidt is currently teaching a German intermediate course which is called "Conversations and Composition." He enjoys teaching under the block plan and likes CC hospitality. "It's just great," he commented.

As for Colorado Springs, Angela remarked, "It's very dangerous at night. You can't walk alone downtown, and it's not that way in Luneburg. Also, in Germany there are much more places to go; pubs and discos. Here there isn't

Cont. p. 9

Student Poll About Divestment And The Eight Block Plan

Students oppose passage of the Eight Block plan and support divestment, according to a recent poll. Between March 3rd and March 11th, the Catalyst asked students to express their views on two of the major issues that the College's Board of Trustees will be considering at its quarterly meeting March 13th and 14th.

The most pervasive view among the 365 respondents is that student views have not been taken enough into account in the formulation and consideration of the Eight Block plan. Seventy-four percent of those polled felt that although the plan would directly affect them, its supporters had failed to directly consider their concerns. A handful of students said that they would transfer if the plan passed, while 56% noted that they anticipate some difficulty in completing 32 out of 32 required units for graduation.

Of the 64% who felt that alternative plans had not been explored thoroughly enough, some commented that faculty members may be overworked, but felt that hiring more faculty and developing a 7/9 work year would be a more equitable solution to the problem.

Continued on p. 4

Items On The Board's Agenda

This is the second article in a three-part series surrounding this month's Board of Trustees meeting. This week's part will focus on the basic agenda and particular issues of these meetings.

The Board members received a detailed agenda, including reports concerning specific issues, about two and a half weeks ago. Being well read on the meeting's particulars, the Board members will handle their agenda in about one and a half days. Most of the work will be done in committee and final voting will come before the entire Board on Saturday.

The Capital Campaign Executive Committee (which has been meeting monthly) will hold a joint meeting with the Development Committee (a standing Board committee). These committees will review the progress of the Capital Campaign project. The project has been running smoothly, nearing the half-way point in its five year term. President Riley has emphasized that the project is "very much on schedule," and as such the review should be routine—without any need for strategy changes.

The Buildings and Grounds Committee will also see a quick, routine agenda. They will review the construction progress of the Worner Center, and Olin Extension, both of which are currently on schedule.

For the past year the Women's Concerns Committee has been doing a study on the possibility of a Children's Day Care Center on campus for faculty, staff, and students. Throughout the year the Board has been periodically updated on the progress of the study, and has continued to give the go-ahead for the completion of the study. Now completed, the final draft of the study, with President Riley's recommendation included, will be presented to the Board for a final vote. Riley feels the Center is now "quite feasible," and may be located at the current Student Center (931 N. Nevada) as early as this September (depending on how quickly the Leisure Office can be moved to the Worner Center in August).

The Academic Committee will discuss the possible grantings of promotions, tenure, and sabbaticals. Eleven promotions are up for consideration, along with six tenure considerations and nineteen sabatical proposals.

Several members of the CCCA will meet with the Student Life Committee. The student government conducted a poll to formulated an idea of student concerns and wishes, and from the poll results have prepared recommendations for the Committee. Among the recommendations to made is for CC divestment from South African corporations, as the CCCA has officially voted to support the Colorado College Community Against Apartheid (CCCAA). The student

Continued on p. 9

INSIDE

Time Runs Out On Cronin

Page 3

Thesing Offends No one

Page 11

Art Majors

Reach Point Of No Return

Page 15

Plug Pulled On Icers

What's News?

Analyzing Current Issues

Mikhail S. Gorbachev has taken a great step in US-Soviet negotiations for the reduction of nuclear weapons in Europe. The Soviet leader offered, on Saturday, February 28, to strictly negotiate for the removal of medium-range missiles from Europe. In Iceland last October, Gorbachev insisted that such negotiations include the halting of SDI research by the US. This recent proposal has "delinked" such an inclusion from the negotiating table in Geneva. Furthermore, by also suggesting the removal of shorter-range missiles, and the allowance of on-site inspections, the Soviets have indeed made a strong commitment toward a nuclear disarmament treaty. A myriad of questions come out of this new proposal as we revisit the complexity of these negotiations.

When President Reagan first proposed SDI or "Star Wars," many perceived its main strength as a bargaining chip to be used in negotiations with the Soviets. Representing a serious threat as the first step toward an arms race in space, the Soviets (confronting enough finance problems at home) immediately pushed SDI into the negotiating arena, making it a stumbling block against any real progress. Indeed, SDI became such a strong concern of the Soviets, that it was obvious the abandoning of it would bring great compromises from Moscow. With SDI now suddenly removed from the negotiations, several questions arise: Will SDI remain a national priority of the Reagan Administration? Or, did SDI stand out more because of Soviet objections to it? Finally if this second question is affirmative, will SDI now become a low-key item on the national agenda?

Again on the home front, many questions have been raised as to the political timing of the Soviet proposal. Do the Soviets think that Reagan needs a foreign policy breakthrough to save face? Do they feel, therefore, that Reagan is in a more compromising position—anything to get the American people behind him? There have already been questions directed to US head negotiator Max Kampelman, concerning possible orders from Reagan for a rushed agreement. What do the Soviets than hope to gain from this timely proposal? Again generally, will the present administration seize this opportunity in any fashion different from the way they would have before the Iran/Contra scandal?

A number of questions arise concerning the technical aspects of the negotiations. Can on-site verifications prevent secret violations of the treaty by either side? Considering both the US and the Soviets have "cheated" on other treaties, SALT II for example, many distrust the effectiveness of any verifications in catching willful violations. The Washington Post (March 3) quoted Senator Richard G. Lugar (R-Indiana) as finding "the verification discussions likely to take a while and be very tedious." Skepticism over this technicality is rampant.

The Soviet proposal offers that each side be allowed to keep 100 medium-range missiles. The US could deploy their 100 on their own territory, while the Soviets would place their's in Soviet Asia. Many officials, particularly in the Pentagon, immediately demand: What constitutes these "Asian territories?" And, how quickly, and secretely, can the Soviets move these weapons from Asian sites to East European sites?

In addition many officials on both sides continue to argue about the existence of aircraft with the capability of carrying nuclear weapons. With the introduction of smaller, more mobile cruise missiles and the planes to carry them, accurate number counts and the locating of weapons becomes difficult. How should the reduction of these aircraft and Cruise missiles proceed, and is verification possible? Thus, more bones of contention are thrown on the table in Geneva in the form of elusive technicalities.

Another issue of strong concern, is the effect of such a proposal, and the possible negotiating of a treaty, on Western Europe in general, and in their relations with the US in particular. The Washington Post (March 2) quoted the West German, Belgian, and Danish governments, and NATO Secretary General Lord Carrington, as saying "it opens the way for a pact embodying the so-called 'zero-option,' providing for the removal of all US and Soviet medium-range, nuclear missiles from Europe." Their reaction to the proposal is one of "encouragement." Yet, right off the bat, officials in Bonn and London also agree that there is some hesitancy to remove what took so much political effort to win support for in the early 1980s. This difference in reaction begs the asking of the fundamental questions: Will a US-Soviet resolution reflect European desires? And, have those desires been formulated in an environment of consensus from among all nations concerned?

While not stipulated in the present proposal, the reduction of French and British nuclear arsenals will become mandatory, in Moscow's eyes, to any US-Soviet agreement. Are the British and French willing to abandon these nuclear forces? How apt are they to think less in terms of their personal security and more in respect of the West European "community."

The Soviets have clear superiority in European conventional forces, and some claim that such an imbalance could be tolerated at the expense of eliminating the nuclear forces. NATO's commander, US Gen. Bernard Rogers claims, however, that the allies would be "mad" to negotiate the medium-range missiles without a similar reduction and stabilizing of conventional forces. (Washington Post, March 3.) There is an obvious disparity of opinion on how likely the Soviets are to invade conventionally in the first place. Without a consensus here, can an agreement on negotiation priorities be reached?

With the nuclear forces out of Europe, will the US and West European military ties remain strong? Will NATO still serve as a source of unity across the Atlantic, or will our diminshed role "over there" de-couple the West? Will West European conventional forces represent enough of a deterrence, or must American forces be employed in even stronger numbers than found at present? Are we Americans willing to go all-out to defend Western Europe either conventionally, or with Inter-Continental Ballistic Missiles, in case of an invasion across the Iron Curtain by the Soviets?

The new Soviet proposal seems at first glance to greatly simplify the negotiating process by including shorter-range missiles and the use of on-site verification while eliminating the SDI issue. A more accurate conclusion, however, is that the new proposal only slightly lessens the complexity of an intricate set of variables. Optimism must remain, however, for any progress toward a reduction of the threat of nuclear holocaust is a necessary step forward. Nonetheless, the bottom line is that all these questions, ambiguities, and complexities cannot be dismissed even in light of this new turn in the Geneva negotiations.

NEWS EDITORS

News Briefs

Lecture Series On The American West

"Was the West Won - or Lost? The American West: Past and Future II," a series of six lectures sponsored by the University of Colorado at Colorado Springs and the UCCS Office of the Chancellor, will be held at the Penrose Library's Davis Auditorium every Monday from March 30 to May 4 from 7:30 to 9:30 p.m.

The series, a continuation of the interdisciplinary lecture series begun last spring, is free and open to the public, and will consist of the following presentations:

—March 30, Michel Dahlin, UCCS history professor, will present "The West in Your Own Backyard: An Oral History of Eastern El Paso County."

—April 6, Jaquelyn Beyer, UCCS geography professor, will speak on "Western Water Resources: The Century-Long Happy Hour is Over."

—April 13, Ruben Martinez, UCCS sociology professor, will lecture on "The American West: Land of Many Cultures."

—April 20, Lora E. Dalton, of the Southwest Institute for Research on Women, will present "His Land/Her Land - A New View of the American West History."

—April 27, Jose J. Barrera, of the City of Colorado Springs Human Relations Commission, will speak on "Forgotten Heroes: Hispanic Frontiersmen of Colorado and New Mexico."

—May 4, Richard Beidleman, Colorado College biology professor, will discuss "Man's Impact on the American West."

The director of the "The American West" interdisciplinary lecture series is Inez Dolz-Blackburn, professor of foreign languages at UCCS. Further information is available from Prof. Dolz-Blackburn by calling 593-3138 or 593-3563.

Workshop On Soviet Union This Weekend

A workshop on "Learning and Teaching about the Soviet Union" will be held from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Saturday, March 14 in the Gates Common Room Palmer Hall on the Colorado College campus.

Participants can register at the door starting at 8 a.m. Saturday, or by contacting the Educators for Social Responsibility (ESR) organization at 594-0724 or 634-2305. The session is $10, or $15 with the Russian lunch included. The charge is $17 for those who wish to receive Colorado Department of Education in-service recertification credit of one-half semester hour.

ESR members receive a $5 discount and there is no charge to attendees with a Colorado College identification card.

Main speakers will be ESR official Steve Weimar of Philadelphia and Elise Turner of Operation Crossroads in Santa Fe, N.M. Both have traveled in the Soviet Union and have worked with educators to develop classroom curricula. They will discuss materials available for learning and teaching about the U.S.S.R. and provide a take-home resource packet.

The workshop is co-sponsored by the Pikes Peak Chapter of Educators for Social Responsibility and the Russian Theme House at Colorado College.

Internships In Latin America

The Overseas Development Network announces a new six month internship opportunity with development projects in Latin America.

Interest and Commitment Wanted. If you've been searching for an opportunity to live and work in the Third World, you may have been frustrated. ODN internships fulfill a special need. They target students with strong development interests but little technical expertise. If you are fluent in Spanish, have a strong interest in learning about Third World development, and have background knowledge in Latin American politics and culture — apply! Programs run from July 1 - December.

Positions are voluntary, so the average cost to the student (incl. airfare, room, and board) is $2,000. The Overseas Development Network will distribute some fellowships based on need. Application Deadline is April 6, 1987. For an application and further information write: Latin American Internships, Dept. N, ODN P.O. 2306, Stanford, CA 94305 or call: 415-725-2869.

CC contacts: Chris Ruskey x269, Rebecca Knight x305.

Hair Designers for Men & Women

RAPUNZEL

Style cuts, Cellophanes,

Perms & Color.

Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.

Stop in or make your appointment:

827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

Cronin Offers Advice: How To Milk CC For All Its Worth

Sunday night in Loomis Lounge, olitical Science Professor Tom Cronin overed his "last hour" lecture before proximately 100 students in Loomis unge.

In conjunction with the "last hour" es, Cronin raced the hourglass' trickle sand as he addressed "Learning as a ocess" or "Learning as a Liberal Art." His speech consisted of vice he would give students if this were last hour.

"This talk is mostly aimed at you eshman and sophomores," Cronin gan. "Plan now how you will spend ur time here."

Cronin then quoted Oscar Wilde: Truth is rarely pure and never simple; vice is much the same."

Cronin's advice covered different sources CC offers and how students ght make the best use of these sources. "College requires changes m all of us. These changes can be ainful and frustrating," Cronin ntinued. "But we've all got to be epared—in the next 20 years the world d you will change remarkably...As homas Jefferson said: 'I like to dream out the future rather than dwell upon emories of the past.' Here at CC we can epare for the future."

"Students usually come to CC for four ars," Cronin went on. "All of you ould try to get the most out of the chool in order to help yourselves...The rson with whom you will spend more me for the rest of your life is you; so you ve it to yourself to be as interesting as possible."

Where does one begin? Well, Professor Cronin had some advice to give... "Experiment, become involved in a variety of activities and classes. Don't be afraid to make mistakes—poor decisions lead to learning experiences that lead to good decisions."

"Regarding academics, consider staying at CC for five years so you can take a wider variety of classes... Hone your writing skills; get in the habit of writing several drafts for papers. Use the Writing Center to improve your writing and speaking... Make use of your professors; they're hired to help you... Ask questions; you won't learn unless you ask. Use the library and its interlibrary loan system; you can obtain books from any library in the country within four days' notice."

"At least half of what you learn at this college will occur outside the classroom; take advantage of the people who attend CC. Diversify your friendships to find others whose interests differ from yours."

"Discussions and arguments held among friends often prove more mind expanding than the facts you'll learn in the classroom. You may spend 14 to 15 hours each day with friends; learn from them. Make a friend who speaks another language or comes from another country. Try to perfect that foreign language."

Cronin also spoke about preparation for post college careers and goals. "The old cliche about luck really applies here. Luck is when preparation meets opportunity. Luck comes to those who prepare for it. Create your own opportunities."

"Go to the Career Center and set up a file. Begin this file your sophomore or junior year. Put together a resume and get some professors to write recommendations that you can store on file."

"Pay attention to your own needs. The world is full of technological invention, but in your lifetime you will never know anything as wonderful as yourself. Develop a sport, learn to dance. Take piano lessons or Karate. Go to the Colorado Springs Symphony. Sign up for an ORC ski trip to the Crags."

"Encourage your professors to use the CC cabin and Baca Grande. You've got a tremendous chance to visit these facilities, make use of that chance; treat yourself."

"At the same time it's extremely important to help others. Remember that college can as easily destroy as well as build confidence. Strengthen people's strengths, minimize their weaknesses. Encourage risk taking."

"Become active in areas of social concern and social activism. Fight for the right to protest and dissent. Volunteer for a charitable organization."

"Volunteer to help improve CC. If you care about quality of education, then help improve it. Work in Admissions or raise money through DIALogue."

"If there is something you want changed, protest against it. Active rebellion is very American. Learn to protest at age 20. It becomes much more difficult as one grows older."

"Again, use the resources available. Apply for a venture grant so you can pursue an independent project. Use the audio visual equipment to make a film. Become a research assistant. Consider writing articles for the Catalyst or Leviathan."

"Keep in touch with your family. Surprise them with a ten page letter that doesn't mention money."

"And remember, it's a crime not to subscribe to an out-of-state quality paper such as the New York Times or the Christian Science Monitor. Colorado Springs can be a terribly isolated place and reading the Catalyst or Gazette Telegraph won't do much for your international awareness."

ALEC REKOW

PIZZA SHUTTLE
Open Daily at 11:00 AM
For Any 14" Single Item Pizza (with this coupon) After 8 PM
$5.00 (Plus Tax)
578-8686
Coupon Expires 4/10/87
One Coupon Per Order • Road & Weather Conditions Permitting

DOMINO'S PIZZA

TWO 12" ONE TOPPING PIZZAS FOR $9.14
(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.

Continued By Popular Demand

DOMINO'S PIZZA DELIVERS® FREE.

All Pizzas Include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.

Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95

Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers,
Extra Cheese (1 item)
Double Cheese (2 items)
Thick Crust, Extra Sauce
Each Item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19

Ask about our Group Discount (on 5 or more pizza orders).

We accept checks.

Prices do not include tax. Our drivers carry less than $20.00.

Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.

Limited Delivery Area
Our drivers carry less than $20

AVOID THE NOID CALL DOMINO'S PIZZA

30 minute guarantee

If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes, present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off your order.
One coupon per pizza.

Fast, Free Delivery
Good at listed locations.

One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!

For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same!), and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings.

Two 12" pizzas will only cost you:

Superb cheese	$7.95
1 topping	$9.14
2 toppings	$10.33
3 toppings	$11.52
4 toppings	$12.71
5 toppings	$13.90
6 toppings	$15.09

Twice the pizza for one low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minute or less, GUARANTEED!

Offer may expire anytime

635-1511

The 8 block plan does not take into consideration the needs of the students. It was a faculty designed proposal to benefit the faculty. The contrived "benefits for the students" were developed in order to make the proposal easier to swallow.

Many students have not taken the time to explore the options and opportunities that will open up for them under the 8-block plan. Instead, they choose to remain ignorant and complain about a plan that they don't understand.

Poll Analysis

Continued from p. 1

Many of those who responded that the Eight Block plan would insignificantly affect their education qualified their answer with the comment that the plan would not affect them personally because they were graduating before the plan would go into effect.

Respondents in Slocum, however, more vehemently oppose the Eight Block plan. Many of them are first year students, and would be juniors during the first proposed eight block year. They are more opposed to the Eight Block Plan than the students as a whole are. In Slocum, those who oppose the plan outnumbered its supporters by over three to one, while the overall figure was closer to two to one.

Some of those who support the Eight Block Plan cited benefits such as lengthened summer and Christmas vacation time which one respondent felt would increase his/her job opportunities.

Students on both sides of the issue focused on concern over tuition increases. Many supporters felt that fewer blocks should cost less money while many of those who oppose the plan stressed that they feel that they would receive less of an education for more money.

Fewer students commented on divestment. Those that did overwhelmingly support divestment. A handful of respondents, however, fear the financial risks of divestment and one student stressed that students should be willing to back up their support of divestment with an acceptance of its risks and a willingness to take personal responsibility for the potential decrease in the College's assets as a result of divestment.

Some students refused to answer various questions either because they felt poorly informed about them or because they felt that the wording was biased.

KATIE KERWIN

Regarding Divestment if students are willing state that they will ret that portion of th financial aid award whic from South Afric investment, and com themselves to going out a finding replacement back for those lost throu divestiture, then they making a meaningf statement, more usef than ranting and ravi Are we, the studen willing to back up with re money what our mou say?

CATALYST POLL

WHERE THE STUDENTS STAND

CC is supposed to be prestigious...why lower standards to other colleges' levels?

What will happen to summer starts who automatically end their freshman year 1 credit short?

There is no guarantee that our education will improve as a result of the eight block plan. Have we reached the point of diminishing returns already?

How in the world do you expect people to not even be sick or take off a block? The block plan is intense as it is. There is no reasonable way to not miss at least one, if not two blocks in four years.

Half the students who are for divestment ought to realize that their parents & families have stock in those same companies. CC is just following good business practice.

	Yes	No	No Opinion
DIVESTMENT
1. Do you support the divestment of CC stock currently held in companies that operate in South Africa or maintain franchise agreements with South African management teams?	58%	37%	5%
2. Should CC's investment portfolio be made public?	63%	33%	4%
EIGHT BLOCK PLAN
1. Do you support the proposal for an Eight block year?	28%	67%	5%
2. Do you feel well informed about the changes that could result if the proposal is supported by the Board?	62%	37%	1%
3. Do you foresee problems in completing 32 out of 32 required credit units for graduation?	56%	39%	5%
4. Would you be willing to take year-long, semester-long, or winter break seminars or summer independent readings to compensate for blocks missed?	42%	54%	4%
5. Have student views been taken into account strongly enough on this issue?	18%	74%	8%
6. Have this plan and other options been explored thoroughly enough?	26%	64%	10%

	Positively	Negatively	Insignificantly	No Opinion
7. If passed, will the Eight block year affect your education positively, negatively, or insignificantly?	10%	40%	42%	8%

	Too Slow	Reasonably Slow	Just Fine	Reasonably Fast	Too Fast	No Opinion
8. Has the decision making process been: too slow, reasonably slow, just fine, reasonably fast, or too fast?	4%	11%	25%	24%	27%	9%

Total number of respondents: 365
Poll conducted by the Catalyst.

The 8-block proposal an outrage and, if passe would be reason enough f me to break ties with t college. An education institution should thi first of its student transient though they be

I think we shou reconsider a 7 - 9 plan so t students don't lose cour opportunities and th professors have more fr time. It seems like th would make everyone happ

An emphasis on publica tion by faculty members the expense of commitme to teaching will negative affect the quality o education provided at C

nyder—Updating The Plight Of The Condors

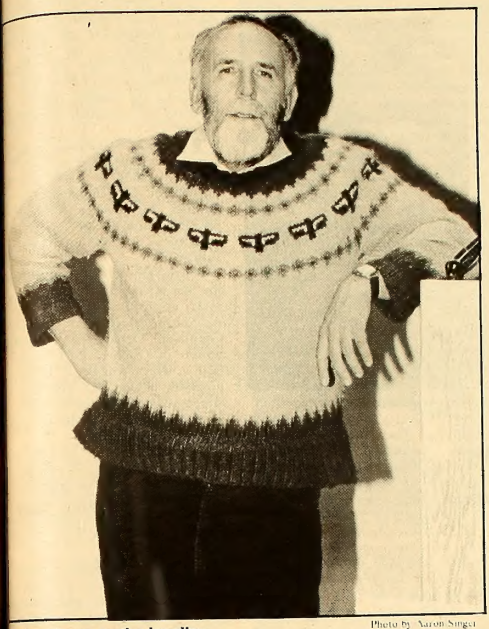

Photo by Aaron Singer

Snyder relies on captive breeding.

Dr. Noel Snyder, former field biologist the California Condor project, spoke Packard hall Wednesday (March 11) ile project's efforts to save the condor n extinction.

Snyder focused on the necessity of a tive breeding program due to the ssively high rate of mortality among wild population. "When you take a cies like the Condor, which raises only egg every other year and requires six years to reach maturity, you can't tolerate more than 5-6% annual mortality," Snyder explained, "yet the mortality rate had reached 20%."

Snyder identified lead poisoning as a major cause of death among adult birds. Condors ingest lead bullet fragments while feeding on the carcasses of deer which hunters have been unable to find.

Critics of captive breeding have suggested preventing hunting in Condor territories in an effort to allow the birds to remain in their natural habitat. Snyder, however, dispelled these proposals as impossible to carry out.

"It's very easy to say, 'Stop the shooting' in the Condor range, but try to do it. You wouldn't believe the political problems. The focus has just had to go to captive breeding in near terms."

At this point, 26 birds are being held in captivity at both the San Diego and Los Angeles zoos. Only one condor remains in the wild. Attempts are currently underway to bring him in as well.

Success of the captive breeding program will depend largely on the birds ability to overcome the lack of genetic variance inherent in such a small population. "We're forced by necessity to use birds who aren't the biggest, the best or even the normal. With endangered species, you are already looking at a weakened stock. That's not to say you won't have success. It's just going to be much more difficult," commented Snyder.

If all goes well, Snyder forsees possible release of captive-reared birds in the 1990's. Specific sites are currently under debate but are not limited strictly to California. Snyder mentioned the Grand Canyon as one possibility. "If there is success in California, we're going to see the birds released in other places in the country."

RICHARD VAN BUSKIRK

BB Bean COFFEE

WHOLESALE/RETAIL COFFEE ROASTERS

Featuring: Daily Roasting of the World's Premium Green Coffees.

Student Aid: A La BB

"Brew the Best: Brew BB"

Let us help you study with an easy stomach. BB Bean's varital roasts are notably smooth and gentle.

Experience the difference a quality bean freshly roasted to peak flavor can mean.

Brew the best for less... BB Bean offers specials discounts to CC students.

475-2236 334 East Colorado Ave. at Wahsatch

The Beach... The Border... Sun The Place! South Padre Island Texas

Colorado College Inter-Fraternity Council presents:

SOUTH PADRE ISLAND

March 27 - April 5, 1987

Package Includes:

- 7 nights lodging at deluxe SUNCHASE IV Condominiums with fully equipped kitchens, wet bar, color TV, & washer/dryer. This beach front resort has 4 tennis courts, an exercise room, a jacuzzi, 2 pools and an attached shopping mall.
- Welcome party with DJ, contests and prizes
- FREE sailing and windsurfing session
- On-site Great Destinations tour directors
- All taxes

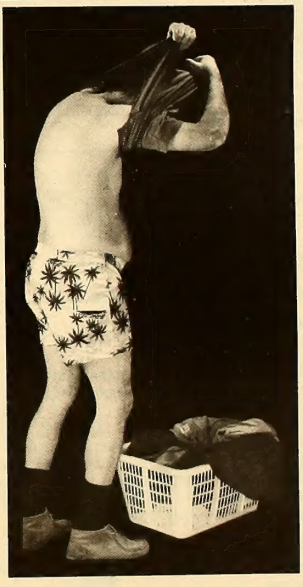
$139 land only

Options:

- Matamoros, Mexico shopping trip
- Isabella Queen Party Cruise
- Matamoros Nightclub Fiesta
- Island Club sports package including use of windsurfers, sailboats, snorkeling equipment, boogie boards, volleyball, tennis, and racquetball

For more information contact: Marshall Carr 635-8933

great destinations inc



Some people just can't wait for our big grand opening.

DUDS n SUDS

Good clean fun!

VISIT OUR NEW WEST SIDE LOCATION!

Opening Saturday, March 14.

- FRIENDLY ATTENDANTS
- REFRESHMENT BAR
- MAYTAG EQUIPMENT
- BIG SCREEN TV
- LOUNGE AREA
- POOL TABLE
- VIDEO GAMES
- WASH-DRY-FOLD SERVICE

1635 W. Uintah 473-1471 open 7am - 10pm

Education Fellowships Awarded

Marianna McJimsey and Allison Troe have been awarded the 1987 Rockefeller Education Fellowship. As a result of this award, Troe will work from March 31st through April 2nd with the Associated Colleges of the Midwest Urban Education Program in Chicago to complete research on her winning project. As part of her project, she will evaluate the effectiveness of the techniques of alternative schools in motivating students.

McJimsey will work with the Urban Education Program from march 26th through April 5th in exploring the techniques used in Chicago secondary schools to teach urban geography. McJimsey will investigate available curriculum materials and generate a bibliography as well.

The Urban Education Program was awarded a Rockefeller Foundation Grant for the 1986-87 academic year. One aspect of this grant was the initiation of the Rockfeller Education Fellowships that Troe and McJimsey have received. These fellowships are designed to interest liberal arts students in urban, public education. The ultimate goal of the fellowship program is to strengthen the potential pool of qualified candidates in the teaching profession. Fellowships are being awarded to ACM faculty members, with the ultimate goal of increasing interest in urban education on their respective campuses.

Troe, a teacher certification candidate, hopes to compare her observations of Chicago schools with those generated from her experience working in an alternative program in Colorado. McJimsey intends to put her findings to immediate use in her teaching at Colorado College and in special weekly seminars.

Troe and McJimsey submitted proposals outlining their areas of interest and intended strategies for investigation. Their proposals included plans for reporting their findings on campus upon their return from Chicago. The proposals were then judged by a campus committee named by the Academic Dean. The proposals, with the projects of other finalists, were submitted to an ACM ad hoc committee which determined the awards. Selections were based on several criteria including the extent to which the projects were related to the field of education and to Chicago or urban teaching issues, the ability of the projects to relate to the current and future studies of the applicants, and plans for disseminating the reports on campus after the experience. The recipients' awards will cover all the travel, housing, and daily expenses incurred during their three days of study in Chicago.

JOE BARBER

Photo by Jane Bierman

McJimsey—spanning the globe.

Troe "reflects" on her upcoming trip to Chicago. Photo by Jane Bierman

Grants For Science And Curriculum Study Awarded

CC has received a $250,000 grant from the W.M. Keck Foundation of Los Angeles toward construction and renovation of science facilities at the college, and a $200,000 grant from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation of New York City to reorganize the college's thematic minor program and strengthen interdisciplinary majors.

The Keck Foundation grant will support the college's objectives of: a new science building of more than 70,000 square feet, to compliment Olin Hall facilities for biology, chemistry and physics; renovation of Olin Hall (constructed in 1962); and renovation of Palmer Hall.

The two renovations and construction of the new science building are expected to total approximately $11.8 million according to Harold Jones, chairman of the Chemistry Department. Ground will be broken in October, 1986, for the new facility, which will be to the immediate northwest of Olin Hall. That project has a targeted completion date of summer, 1988, with the renovation projects to be phased in during the interim.

The $200,000 grant from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation is from its "Free Combinations" grant program. CC will use the funds for curriculum study, to help bring together interdisciplinary courses and establish better connections among various disciplines.

A thematic concentration requires that students take at least five interrelated courses from two or more departments outside of their major. The Mellon grant will support the college's plans to strengthen and reorganize twenty thematic minors and five interdisciplinary majors. The plan includes creating seminars and organizing lectures toward that aim, and hiring replacement faculty members over a three year period of this development.

Does food control your life? You can stop abusing food but you can't do it alone.

If you have an eating disorder—anorexia, bulimia or compulsive overeating—it doesn't have to control your life. There is a way to fight the disease of food addiction...and win.

At the Medical Treatment Center For Eating Disorders, we will bring people into your life who are winners at recovery. People who can offer you not only medical expertise, but emotional support as well. People who will help you change the way you think about food, and the way you think about yourself.

The Eating Disorders Unit provides inpatient and outpatient care for adolescents and adults. And our program is covered by most insurance plans.

We can help you find a solution. Call us today at 475-2111.

MEDICAL TREATMENT CENTER FOR EATING DISORDERS

Summit Health Ltd. EISENHOWER MEDICAL CENTER

33 Barnes Ave. at Pikes Peak Ave.
Colorado Springs, Colorado 80909
(303) 475-2111

Pascal Gasirabo: Out of Africa

Burundian experiences life without crocodiles

owing up in the Central African try of Burundi, Pascal Gasirabo and friends would swim west across the ri River's muddy waters into Zaire. ic these early international forays l prepare Pascal for the bureaucracy has faced in later travels, the river ssings presented a more direct llenge. "The river was infested with codiles and hippopotami. We swam river, --if we had met a croc, he'd have en us," Pascal remembers.

Pascal faces more complicated llenges today, one being his question citizenship. His parents are political gees from Burundi's northern ghbor, Rwanda, but have raised a ily in the village of Bubanza and have ed in the tropical mountains of utheastern Burundi for over twenty rs. From the rich soil they have grown anas, sweet potatoes, peanuts, beans, on and rice; they have also raised e, chickens, pigs and goats. Their en children (Pascal is the eldest) grew in this village but have been denied izenship by the Burundian ernment. "I consider myself undese, but Rwanda doesn't ognize me, neither does Burundi. I es that leaves me as a world citizen." Having lived in the center of the litically turbulent Africa has htened Pascal's political awareness. laughingly calls politics "my favorite ject," and adds that he feels CC dents need more awareness of rnational affairs.

"I doubt that most people at this school uld be able to find Burundi on a world p," Pascal observes. "Yet it is a ntry that is changing very rapidly; it changed very much in this century." Germany's Kaiser Wilhelm was the t European ruler to upseat the ditional Rwanda-Urunda kings who ed what is now Burundia. Since then e country has been subjected to various ers. After WWI, Germany turned rundia over to Belgian control. The lgians left the native kings in their seats ditional power but pulled the strings til 1962 when Burundia declared its dependence and King Mwambutsa rcised his rule. When King wambutsa left the throne to his sone wambutsa left the throne to his son ue in late 1965 and journeyed to Belgium for medical treatment, a Colonel in the Burundian army named Michel Michombero overthrew the government and set up a military dictatorship. Michombero controlled Burundi until 1976 when another military coup established Colonel Jean-Baptiste Bagaza as the leader. He still rules today.

As a country of 5.5 million people packed within 10,000 square miles (the size of Maryland), Burundi struggles between the traditions of its past and its technological change toward the future.

Photo by Jane Bierman

The worldly smile of Pascal Gasirabo.

"The population is growing very fast," Pascal claims. "This is dangerous because not enough food can be grown to feed everyone. Also, many of the young people leave their villages and travel to the cities in search of better lives. When they get there, there are no jobs."

While the government attempts to hold down the birth rate through education and birth control, the Burundian people are still tied to their traditional large families.

"Children are regarded as a sign of fertility and prosperity. Traditionally children are the best asset parents can hope for; there is nothing better," Pascal says. While Pascal admits he doesn't plan to follow his parents' example in raising fifteen children, he values having grown up in such a large family. "It is a good feeling growing up among so many who love me," Pascal adds. "I think this is something that many people in America miss."

Thirty years ago the western Burundian grasslands fed some of Africa's largest animals such as elephants, giraffes and rhinos. Lions roamed the Savannah. "Back in the 60's my parents saw these animals," Pascal remembers. "Nowadays these animals are gone; they've been killed off or have moved into Zaire."

Pascal's travels have taken him much further than Zaire. How does an African farmer's son find himself at a liberal arts college like CC?

Five years ago he won one of two scholarships offered to Burundian students by the United World College near Taos, New Mexico. Established by Armand Hammer, the college promotes international understanding and peace. "There are six others like it in the world," Pascal says. "At least one per continent - in Swaziland, Italy, England, British Columbia, Singapore, and Venezuela." 200 students from over 70 countries attend the New Mexico school's two year program.

While attending the United World College, Pascal heard about CC. "I was looking for a liberal arts school, one where I could meet people from varied backgrounds," Pascal recalls.

Now a CC junior, Pascal majors in Math with a German Studies minor. Languages in general interest pascal. "I'd like to learn as many as I can," he admits. So far he speaks his native language from Rwanda, Kinyarwanda, the Burundian nationa langauge, Kirundi, French, German, English, Swahili, and a smattering of Spanish

This fall Pascal attended the CC German exchange program in Luneburg, a program that he deems as excellent because of his opportunity to live with a German family and learn about German culture. Currently studying Spanish, Pascal hopes to attend the fall '87 CC program in Mexico.

Related to his interest in languages, Pascal also participtes in ISO (International Student Organization), an organization that promotes understanding of foreign cultures on the CC campus through theme dinners and presentations where foreign students prepare meals and speak about their native lands. ISO also acts as a support group for all exchange students.

"I think it is very important for CC students to be exposed to people from different background. It brings about understanding. There is still prejudice at CC. It's not applied openly but there's still a lot to be overcome...And it can't be done without more minority faculty and students," Pascal states.

Pascal believes ignorance of other people's cultures leads to misunderstanding. "Communication is so important... Before I came to the USA I had the idea that almost all White Americans were racists, because of rumours I had heard. But once I got here, he remembers, "I saw this was not true at all."

Ignorance of other countries' situations often distorts the United States' ability to mediate as a world leader, Pascal believes. Here at CC Pascal works for CCCAA, the organization that favors CC divestment from South Africa. Pascal says: "the US needs to make a statement to the South African government by pulling out US investments. So far the US hasn't applied any pressure. "No African countries (with the exception of Malawi) have diplomatic ties with South Africa," he states.

In his spare time Pascal often can be found playing football (soccer) in the CC turf room..."the real football where one uses his feet. I like football because it promotes teamwork. Also I can keep fit and meet people," Pascal says.

When Pascal Gasirabo graduates in May '88 he hopes to go on to graduate school somewhere in the United States. Someday he hopes to return to Burundi and help the people become socially aware of the oppression and suffering in their country. "Some of them have given up hope of it ever being better," Pascal murmers.

ALEC REKOW

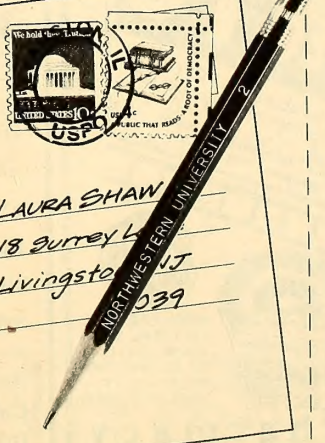
How about a quarter off?

Concert under the stars on Northwestern's lakefront campus

Summer's here! Reality begins! Could do the usual--get a job at the mall or lifeguard @ BEACH! Thinking of taking a class. DON'T FAINT! Just heard about this "multicourse discount plan" at Northwestern. Two classes -- save 20% Three classes -- save 25% Sounds good! M.

SUMMER SESSION '87 • NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY • 1-800-ENRLS-NU

LAURA SHAW
18 Surrey L
Livingsto NJ
039



NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
SUMMER SESSION '87

2003 Sheridan Road
Evanston, Illinois 60201

Please send my free copy of the Summer Session '87 catalog with financial aid and registration information. (Available mid-March)

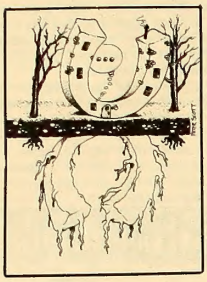
Name
School Address
City
State Zip
Home Address
City
State Zip

Wish you were here.
Send the coupon or call 1-800-ENRLS-NU
(Inside Illinois call 312-491-5250)

SS 1

FEATURES

Ellipses and



Hyperbole

It's fun to look them in the face and say with amazement, "You mean I have to get consent of the instructor...both instructors?" as if you've never been in the Registrar's Office before.

It's also fun to walk out the door on the left, wait thirty seconds and then come through the door on the right with two signatures indistinguishably scrawled on the drop-add slip. "Can I drop a course during the last week?" you might add just for effect, or "what does 'T track' mean again?"

I'm still not clear what "Consent of Instructor" means. In today's english the word "consent" mostly occurs in the term "consenting adults," which mostly occurs in reference to "explicit acts." And all this stuff is supposedly better if it occurs behind "clothed doors."

It makes sense that consenting instructors urge their students to be explicit, but I think the registrar really uses the term as an euphemism for "warn the poor sod that you will be taking her class."

Preregistration must be like Valentines Day for the professors; they can tell if anyone likes them by the number of points that get placed on their courses. I'll bet nothing bothers them more than "mercy points"—when students toss one or two points on the course, just like they were dropping a rock in the professor's trick-or-treat bag.

One Olinite can do a lot for a professor's image. Olinites take courses that require no points, so they often end up putting all ninety points on just one general studies course. And why shouldn't they; the general studies are often the most intriguing.

The following is a list of some courses on which I recommend you place all your points:

GS 11110—"Auschwitz and Other Vacation Resorts," taught by a visiting professor that only speaks English-pigeon, just quit smoking, lost his wife to a younger man, and actually believes that one block should equal a semester worth of work.

GS 6969—"The Phallus in the Western Tradition"—In this course, a reputed scholar, known for his erudition and panting, will expound on such topice as: "Why everything that is not perfectly circular is oblong," "If it ain't about sex, it ain't art," and "You can always find a phallus if you just look hard enough."

GS 101 9119—"Quarks, Feminists, and Hockey Pucks"—This is a class for non-majors, non-students, and non-entities. In this course professors and janitors from various disciplines and floors will teach stuff.

GS 330 2112—"Argumentation. Refutation, and Loathing"—This course is team taught by two professors who have opposing styles, perspectives and philosophies. Course readings include Clash of the Titans and When Worlds Collide.

EN 600—"White Western M... Writers"—Satisfying the "alterna... perspectives B" requirement, this co... bravely introduces students to wri... they can pronounce and may have h... about before.

What ever courses you choose, m... your waiting lists be short and all yo... tracks be 'K.'

AARON SHU...

A Journey Through Arizona

Students go on trip

The History of Life class left the cold climate of Colorado and headed to the balmy deserts of Arizona for a week. Well, not quite balmy. After getting stuck in a snow drift on Wolf Creek Pass and collecting firewood in snow up to our hips, we headed off to our first stop, Mesa Verde. Searching for a couple hours for an open campsite led us to the perfect spot, and we were lulled to sleep by the sound of passing trucks on the highway only twenty feet away. The next morning, despite frozen fingers and numb toes, we pushed the bus off into the sunrise to learn about Mesa Verde and the Anasazi Indians. After seeing some amazing cliff dwellings and learning all about Indian life, we headed for what we had all been waiting for; the ultimate experience, the Grand Canyon. On the way there we scoped out some dinosaur tracks, and drove through four states in under one minute. What an experience! That night we found an even better campsite, with the help of Ranger Rick, and settled into our sleeping bags while visions of the Grand Canyon danced in our heads.

The Grand Canyon can not even be described. One must see it to truly appreciate it. It is so immense it blows the mind. "Is this one badass place or what?" one CC student exclaimed. We headed down the trail in what felt like sub-zero temperatures, and learned about each formation that we passed along the way. We walked through millions of years of history in only a few hours. The sandstones, limestones, and shales that we saw told us about the different environments in each age we walked through, and gave us a good picture of how the massive canyon had formed.

After eating lunch with an incredible view of the Colorado River (it sure beats the view from Taylor and Bemis), some of the class just could not get enough and decided to go all the way down to the bottom. Getting to the bottom of ... canyon felt great, and while some of ... soaked our feet in the Colorado, ... hardcore hackers took up yet another ga... of hackeysack. After soaking up the s... and bandaging our burning blisters ... figured we better start on the seven m... journey up if we were to make it out of ... canyon before dark. Although it was h... tiring, and long, the hike up was just ... spectacular as the hike down; and w... worth the journey. Watching the sun ... over the canyon walls I thought of how ... hated to leave this extraordinary place; ... I knew that this amazing creation of natu... would stay with each one of us forever.

That night, after refueling ... McDonalds and getting lost once ag... (don't worry Bob, we still love you), we ... around the fire and told dirty jokes befo... dragging our sore muscles into our te... for yet another night in freezi... temperatures. The next day we had to le... the incredible canyon, but more adventur... lay ahead, as we moved on to meteor crat... the Petrified Forest, and the Painte... Desert. The meteor crater turned out to ... a slight letdown (what wouldn't be aft... the Grand Canyon?), when we could n... even get in to see it due to outrageous ... high, unplanned for financial requests. B... we didn't lose our enthusiasm, we mere... forged ahead to the Petrified Forest, whe... we walked among ancient trees that ha... miraculously turned to rock. After a scen... drive through the Painted Desert we we... on our way back to Colorado and the reali... of college life (along with comfortable be... and hot showers). Although most of us w... be quite happy if we never have to sit o... another bus again, our trip will not soon ... forgotten. The Grand Canyon not onl... taught me about the life that took place ... many millions of years ago, but als... inspired in me a renewed awe of th... mystical forces of nature.

LAURIE STON...

Photo Special! Every Monday!

coupon

FREE SECOND SET OF PRINTS

Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing! 819

This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon. Limited time offer. Offer in effect Mondays only.

Kodak Colorwatch System

WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!

College Pharmacy

833 North Tejon • 634-4861

WE WANT YOU!

Applications for editor(s) of The Catalyst, Disparaging Eye, Leviathan, and Nugget are available in the Student Center. Also, applications for Cutler Board President, Business Manager and Darkroom Manager are available.

Application deadline is Sat., March 28 at noon. Call the Catalyst office (x675) or Steve Schmid (633-4588) for more information.

Germans Visit CC Cont.

Cont. from p. 1

uch to do in the city." Indeed, but as ic Koops mentions, "the attractions r the mountains and the country, not e city." And the students have taken dvantage of the mountains, skiing at lonarch last Saturday. For other sports, e students report that they go imming every day, play raquetball, nd also use the fitness rooms.

Despite regrets of being somewhat t off from the student body by living off ampus, they report that so far their stay as been a positive experience. "The eather has been wonderful," says ngela Niedenger.

"Americans say that Germans are reserved, but the same can be said of the Americans. When we sat in the classroom nobody came to speak with us. This surprised us because we had heard how outgoing Americans are."

According to German Department Chairman Arman Wishard this group is the second largest ever to visit CC from Germany. This group visit is part of the CC-Luneburg exchange program which has existed for six years. There has also been a faculty exchange for the past four years. Wishard says:

"We expect to continue this program on an annual basis. Having this German/American interraction helps each group adjust to the other's culture."

Single students have travelled to Luneburn since 1972 when Wishard met a Fullbright student from the Goettingen Institute who was originally from Luneburg.

At the end of Block Seven the Luneburg group journeys with Professor Richardson, our CC German Professor and ace van driver/explorer, to Mexico for beach combing and canyon wandering. The group will return to Deutscheland after their Mexican excursion to begin their second semester.

PASCAL GASIRABO AND
JULIE INGWERSEN

PIZZA SHUTTLE
Open Daily at 11:00 AM
$5.00 (Plus Tax)
For Any 14" Single Item Pizza
(with this coupon)
After 8 PM
578-8686
Coupon Expires 4/10/87
One Coupon Per Order • Road & Weather Conditions Permitting

Photo of the Week

Photo by Jane Bierman

Trustees' Agenda Set Cont.

Continued from p. 1

government will also convey their displeasure of the current SAGA meal plan, and will propose a number of alternatives that could be used in the new Worner Center next year. Concerning the Eight Block Plan, the CCCA, while agreeing with faculty concerns for a less time-consuming, and structured year, feel that the current proposed plan has been too hastely formulated. Recommendations will endorse the study of other options and alternative plans that weigh student concerns more heavily.

The CCCAA will meet with the Investment Committee. Members of the Board have already received a copy of the CCCAA Position Paper, and the committee meeting will give the student group an additional opportunity to express their concerns, and clarify any questions that members might have on the Paper.

An Ad Hoc Committee on the Eight Block issue will also meet. After reviewing the present proposal, the Committee will make any small changes needed before presenting the final draft of the plan to the entire Board for final voting.

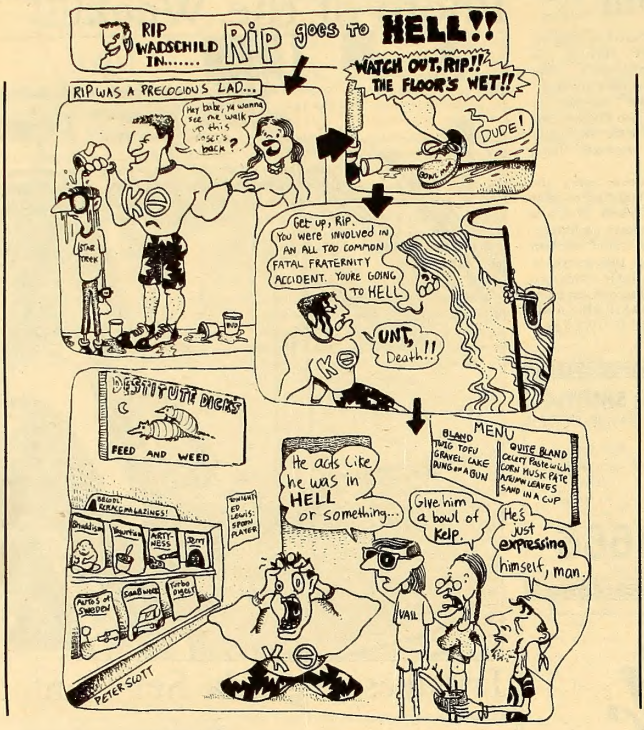
President Riley anticipates a smooth meeting, and will publish the voting results some time next week. Part three of this series will be the publication and analysis of these results.

PETER W. LOACH

Michelle®
Come try our Ice Cream!
CC ID Nights!
15% off ice cream & menu items Sunday thru Thursday
(does not apply to in store specials)
*Michelle Homemade Ice Cream—Richest in Town & Made Fresh Daily with no Preservatives.
122 North Tejon
For gift giving or any occasion don't forget a box of Michelle's chocolates or truffles.

Hertz
You don't just rent a car. You rent a company.
Call for Weekend Rate and Eligibility
315 N. Weber
473-2444
8-6 Mon-Sat
Appointments possible at any other time
5% discount with Ad

It's the luck of the Irish
...and the Tigers
CLASS RING SALE
March 9 - 17
$15 Off - 10k Gold
$30 Off - 14k Gold
$40 Off - 18k Gold
Colorado College Bookstore
McGregor Hall



RIP WADSCHILD IN.....
RIP goes to HELL!!
RIP WAS A PRECOCIOUS LAD...
WATCH OUT, RIP!! THE FLOOR'S WET!!
DUDE!
Get up, RIP. You were involved in an all too common fatal fraternity accident. Youre going to hell
UNT, UNT, Death..!!
DESTITUTE DIGS
FEED AND WEED
He acts like he was in HELL or something...
MENU
BLAND TOFU GRAVEL CAKE RING-a-GUN
QUITE BLAND CELERY PASTE WITH CORN HUSK PATE ARBOR LEAVES SAND IN A CUP
Give him a bowl of Kelp.
He's just expressing himself, man.
PETER SCOTT

THE COLORADO COLLEGE

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETER LOACH, News Editor
DAVID EVANS, Features Editor
MUNIR MEGHJEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
•
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETER SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
•
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
•
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Cutler Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 extension 675. The Catalyst is printed bi-monthly from September to May, except during holiday periods.

Cutler Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its education programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local laws.

Editorials appearing in the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 400 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Rastall Center, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

A work of considerable length may be submitted as a guest commentary. Persons interested in submitting commentary should contact the Catalyst at 632-4999 or 473-2233 ext. 675.

The Catalyst reserves the right to edit or cut letters to the editor and guest commentaries.

Staff Editorial

More On Hockey

The hockey season has finally ended on a very successful note—three playoff victories out of four games all on the road. About a month ago I publicized some questions concerning the hockey program that had been floating around for some time. After asking around and gathering some information and opinions, I'll try to make some sense of the issue.

Division III hockey at CC is an impossibility. Air Force has the only other program in the region. The school certainly could not afford to send a team to Minnesota (or further) every other week without guaranteed gate receipts. Likewise, Division III opponents would be reluctant to send their teams out to Colorado. Remember also that if the hockey program goes, so does the extremely successful women's soccer program.

CC's hockey program is a victim of the Division I stereotype perpetuated by the media through "hot" stories such as the SMU probation. Naturally the public hears more about the bad side of Division I, but CC's program comes nowhere near these gross injustices. The "dumb jock" stigma simply does not apply to the Tigers. Last year's team placed eight men on the WCHA All-Academic Team. The squad's graduation rate hovers around 90 percent (compared to Minnesota's 25 percent), better than the school in general. And its GPA lies around 3.0. Nor is the team costing the school a huge amount of money. It costs CC about the same to run football as it does to run hockey. So the hockey program neither compromises the college's academic integrity nor cost an inordinate amount of money.

Having a Division I sport certainly benefits the school in some areas. The training facilities at CC for all the athletes overshadow virtually every other division III school's. Without hockey, we wouldn't be blessed with Bruce Kola's healing hands. The team gives the school national publicity—especially in the East. It's probably the most visible CC product in the Colorado Springs area. By travelling to different cities and receiving press exposure, the team provides a valuable contact between alumni and the school. The program benefits the college in many not so obvious ways also, such as providing a campus unity focal point.

Continued on p. 12

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

"The Dirt"

To The Editor:

Sometimes gossip columns are funny, sometimes they're cute, and sometimes they're amatuer social bile. Has it ever occurred to you Mrs. Champagne that the rest of the campus is not as incredibly interested in the sexual preference of our fraternity members as yourself. And if what you say is true they're still better off gay than dealing with shallow and pretentious hosebags such as yourselves. I wrote about Fishbone the other week ago and they wrote a song just for lady's like you. Any of this hitting home? Of course I am being far too harsh. It's gonna be on my conscience all week. But I'm still talking about you so don't worry. Just dig up some dirt on me Edith baby. I dare ya; I double dare ya. Actually, I like your column. Or rather I would like your column if you could make it something to smile and laugh about instead of just plain raggin'. That gets boring and it gets old. It's obvious that you're not too serious about putting out good material. You're in love with the idea but aren't working hard enough to make it work. You should be glad I'm talking about you, 'cause in another few weeks "The Dirt's" novelty will be history and it won't be just weak; it'll be sad. But keep diggin Edith baby. Whether you dig up or down is up to you, but if you want people to keep talkin about you you'd better get a clue.

-Tulio Browning

Responding to Issues

To the Editor:

The letters included in the past two editions of the Catalyst regarding the comments in Mark Thesing's article entitled "The Schmack is Back" prompted me to make a few clarifications and suggestions.

First, as past Catalyst editor, it has been the long standing rule that the opinions section be an open, unbiased forum for the expression of thoughts and ideas—a medium of intellectual exchange—for those associated with the College. Indeed this semester's editors, Mike Fraterelli and Alec Rekow, have perpetuated this ideal by hosting a wide spectrum of editorial contributions.

Mark Thesing has written regularly for the Catalyst's Opinions section, since Block I of this year. On many occasions his comments have—to be blunt—pissed people off, not the least of which being his inappropriate suggestions regarding homosexuals in "The Schmack is Back."

Question: What has been the reaction to all this? Answer: Hostile letters by numerous individuals calling for an official Catalyst apology.

This is understandable but is also, in my view, a terrible waste of Opinions page real estate.

Thesing's comments elicit anger and frustration. Indeed how could anyone in his right mind say these things? Beneath the surface, however, Thesing's brashness could better have been rebutted from an offensive tact rather than the defensive.

Rather than enter into diatribes on the alleged incompetence of Thesing and his editors; time, energy and Catalyst newsprint could more effectively have been spent on the support and education of gay issues and their impact on the College and everyone associated with it.

Perhaps Mark Thesing's comments should be taken as an illustration of student ignorance on this subject of homosexuality at CC. In this event, a crisis of ignorance exists which would be better answered in the form of offensive, educated rebuttals answering Thesing's ill-versed cry for enlightenment rather than these long, repetitive letters of frustration.

There's been too much bitching in the letters to the editor of late. Enough already. We should be able to recognize a challenge when we see it. Use the Catalyst and your own editorial writing time wisely. The cure is not a formal Catalyst apology, but recognition and response to a challenge of ignorance.

Blair Sanford

Threshold of 1987

e Editor:

kind of news that could be read during the last in the press or seen on television, belonged mainly exclusively to the category "Crimes and dents." History seems to reduce itself more and at least in the mirror of the mass media, to a ssion of natural cataclysms, hostage dramas, ings and palavers of functionaries utterly ered by the events they are supposed to control. same impression of confusion, lack of direction ewilderment derives itself from a look at the omy. Since 1976, the economy has been acterized by constantly receeding profit rates for nobody seems to have discovered a remedy and will apparently continue well into the 1990s. singly, profits do not derive anymore from the tional business of a firm, but from some collateral ity, and more often than not the financial results ficially improved at the end of the year by some fting operation. Products that yield a profit re scarcer every day, while the money-losers ase in number.

wo types of businesses still seem to do well enough: ing and consulting. Of bankers, Imhoof-Hotze ented in the early 19th century that "these men appear to be most liberal when their rs are least needed, and least accessible when are most urgently required." As far as consultants' concerned, they remind one sometimes of quack rs and faith-healers of all kinds: they are mostly ht after when the economy is ailing and nobody eems to know what is wrong with it.

here is no lack of prescriptions and nostrums to today's stagnation. The economic papers are full fashionable language such as "streamlining" ction programs, "restructuring" management ns, discovering new "market inches." There is no anymore about "shrinking yourself back to e," that sounds reactionary. But mergers and sitions are definitely in, thanks to what is called "synergy effect." Unfortunately Greek isn't my of expertise and nobody has yet been able to tell what synergy really means. But one thing is clear: hese cures address only the symptoms. A true ovement of the economic situation is not to be oted. There are new investment impulses as there century with the start of the electrical industry. the time being it is still very unclear to me from re such revolutionary actions or impulses might he most surprising aspect of the situation however ow little protectionist thinking has been gaining ad. One hundred years ago, salvation was ved in cartellization and in tariff protection. ay, the trend is everywhere in the opposite ction: to bring down exaggerated price levels and e sheltered markets more freely accessible. The ds-word is "deregulation." Governments want to id of money-losing state corporations by atization and trying to bring the increasingly blesome farm subsidies under control. Even in rn Europe, some movement seems to have come the rigid structures of planning—"ca bouge" ("it s").

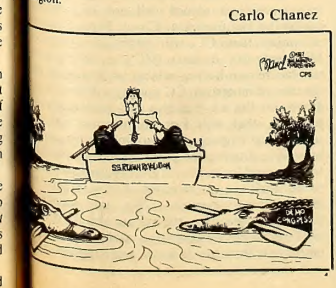
ill these holy cows really be butchered, or are e politicians merely acting in line with the old ss proverb: Pretending is a long way from overing (dergliche ta isch na lang nia halberet)?

(Dr. K. Sulzer)

ave purposely not given any comments on the exchange rate or the Third World indebtness of insurance reform, for the simple reason that I do nderstand it, probably due to the complete ce of a well thought foreign politic in ington.

Carlo Chanez



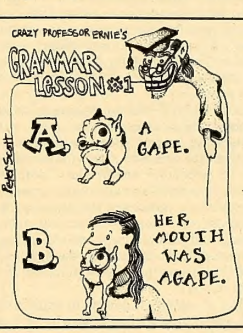
"Beat the System"

To the Editor:

We blew it guys. The Eight Block Plan is definitely here to stay. I don't hold any grudge against the faculty. I think the way they went about things was a bit covert, but they've got a job to do and if things aren't pushed ahead sometimes they just won't happen. What really bothers me is what everyone calls apathy.

I look around and what I see is a contradiction. People go home and study for three hours a night so that they will make good grades, so that they can get a high-paying job, so that other people won't be controlling their lives. Yet they won't take fifteen minutes to oppose a decision as important as the Eight Block Plan. They don't like it but they won't do anything about it. You can stash your sleeping bag in Tutt and live there and never learn how to control your life.

As students of CC we often approach college academics with the same attitude we had towards high school. High school was, more than anything else, filled with disiplinarians instead of teachers. There were hall passes and tardy permits and plenty of English teachers that never really cared what you wrote about as long as it was properly structured. But we're older now. We can't play the same old games (like writing completely ficticious research papers and getting "A's"). But there are new ones. Like the one called "Beat the System." This doesn't mean cheating on the honor code or other such cop-outs. It basically means getting what you want without compromising yourself.



The trickiest part of this is the balancing of priorities. When you start talking social life, this can become infinitely complex. I value my college social life because I know it's a unique social environment that will never again occur in my life. But that doesn't mean there's no fun after graduation. I thought it would be impossible to match my freshman year for the amount of nights I spent immobilized by laughter (and usually certain substances as well). Yet the next year I found myself ragin' beyond belief. In my third year at this school I now have to admit I'm not as intensely social; but it still feels right when I've got a beer in my hand. And more and more it feels right when I have a computer keyboard under my fingers. I think a big reason CC students don't want to deal with "real-life" issues is simply that we don't want to and don't think we should. I'm not talking about surface level guilt/conscience complexes. I'm talking subconscious. That voice that's been looking around at all the danger signs, wondering just how long this ship can weather the storm. Or if the storm has even hit yet. Our generation realizes we're the one's the big bucket's gonna get dumped on. We're all pretty clueless as to whats in that bucket but we sure know we want to have a little fun before it spills. "Hey listen, listen man...I'll tell you this; I don't know what's gonna happen, but I wanna get my kicks before the whole shithouse goes up in flames; all right, all right." —Jim Morrison.

So all you uncompromising activists ease up on those unconditional guilt trips, but don't ease up; know what I mean? As far as the apathetic masses go, start drawing some lines of integrity. Either you do something real or face the facts that you're apolitical. Words don't mean a thing. Many of us would like to call ourselves Liberals or Humanitarians. Those are just words until you put something behind them. Whatever you decide, be psyched. If you're honestly doing want you want to be doing and not just talking about it, political or not, you're lovin' it.

— Tulio Browning

Donations and Divestment

To the Class of 1987:

Now that we are about to graduate, the College has been attempting to establish a meaningful relationship with us after we leave. If we remain loyal to our alma mater, eventually we will display our loyalty by giving...money and time, good words to our family and friends, and perhaps we will even send our kids here. This is the way the College will survive. Perhaps some of us are bound to become extraordinarily rich and famous, and of course we will share the wealth with our alma mater. So the pitch is being made for us to donate...

Now I hope to be able to donate my support one day to the Colorado College. But I can't help thinking of the possibility that perhaps there are more worthy causes in the world than the one at CC. On what basis do we make this decision?

Here is one possible criteria: If the Colorado College Board of Trustees divests from South Africa.

If they do, then let's celebrate and feel good that our college, in the year we graduated, decided to divest from South Africa for ethical reasons. Then we can at least donate our $100 deposit to CC, and while we are at it plant a nice tree to commemorate divestment. Perhaps we could have a little plaque at the foot of the tree with words like "For the people of South Africa, and all the oppressed peoples of the world, we plant this tree."

If they don't, then perhaps the Seniors can donate the $100 deposits to the people of South Africa, and let's plant the tree anyway.

Saturday is when we will find out whether CC divests or not. So what do you think Seniors?

Anthony Lopez

Mark Thesing

No More Mr. Nice Guy

Resume Time

The other day I was wondering what happens to people after their Senior Year. Fortunately a graduated friend of mine was around, so I asked him "what should I do?"

"Go to the Career Center, Mr. Nice Guy," he said.

So I went to the Career Center and I talked to the friendly lady who works there.

She said, "Mr. Nice Guy now that you are graduating, it is now time for you to get a exciting and profitable job."

"O.K. that sounds good to me."

"The first thing that you have to do is write a resume," she explained.

"What's that," I asked.

"Well, resume is the French word for 'to lie,' but we take that to mean to record one's life. Now, Mr. Nice Guy, it is important to display your activities and education to be very employable so that you can impress them and they will give you a good job."

That sounded easy enough to me but later I to think. I had always wondered why some of my fellow students were so concerned about grades and seem to volunteer to do the most bogus things. This bothered me the more I thought about it.

It seemed that maybe these students knew all along about this resume stuff. Perhaps someone had explained this to them a long time ago that is why they have always been so concerned about grades and offices in campus organizations.

I was not about to let these weasles get my profitable and interesting job so I decided to augment my resume.

EDUCATION:
Colorado College, GPA 4.0, Sigma Cum Nada
(For transcript write to House of Transcripts, Vas Legas, Nevada, 94301) ACTIVITIES:
President of the Business Club, Advisor Wayne D. Rudner, (Recommendation Written by Wayne D. Rudner)
PERSONAL VALUES:
Sensitivity, Open-mindedness, Willingness to try anything.

Next Week, I'll tell you how my interviews go.□

Michael S. Mehan

The Bottom Line

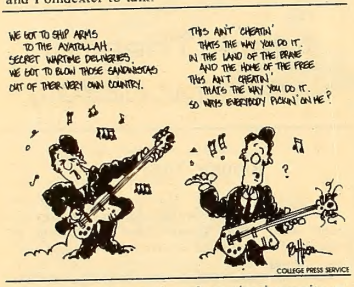
Off with their Heads!

It seems that the Iran-Contra scandal is finally blowing over.The Tower Commission report is complete, the President went on TV and told Americans that he was really sorry, the new White House staff, headed by the miracle man himself, Howard Baker, is busy cleaning house, the publicity boys are trying to make Ronald Reagan look busy and on top of things, and the Administration is trying to edge forward and away from the ruins of the Iranian arms policy.

However, after all the mental masterbation that has come out of Washington in the last few weeks, there still remains one tiny little sticking point in the whole ordeal, and that is, just what the heck really went on between that crazy love triangle of the White House, the Iranians and the Nicaraguans? We still do not know the truth!

Unfortunately the two men who know the whole poop are Oliver North and ex-National Security Advisor John Poindexter, and they are not going to talk. When asked to give us the dirt, these two quickly took the fifth and politely excused themselves from the hearings.

Now Congress and ex-Watergate hound dog, Lawrence Walsh, the independent council investigator, want to know the whole truth and nothing but the truth. The problem is how to get North and Poindexter to talk.



WE GOT TO SHIP ARMS TO THE AYATOLLAH, SECRET WARTIME DELIVERIES. WE GOT TO BLOW THOSE SANDINISTAS OUT OF THEIR VERY OWN COUNTRY.
THIS AIN'T CHEATIN' THAT'S THE WAY YOU DO IT. IN THE LAND OF THE BRAVE AND THE HOME OF THE FREE. THIS AIN'T CHEATIN' THAT'S THE WAY YOU DO IT. SO WHY'S EVERYBODY PICKIN' ON ME?
COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

Thus arises the question of granting immunity or partial immunity to North and Poindexter. This is a real dilema, since in order to get them to confess they want immunity from prosecution. And if they are given immunity they cannot be prosecuted on the basis of what they have said.

Also hindering the process of the law is a suit brought against Lawrence Walsh by Oliver North in a New York federal court. Walsh is currently pushing the judge to dismiss the suit. If the judge has any sense of justice at all he will dismiss it and allow justice to prevail.

Walsh is an independent council appointed by Congress to investigate wrongdoings in the executive branch of the government." ...The Congress may by Law vest the appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President along, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of the Departments," says the Constitution in Article II, Section 2. Therefore Congress has the right to appoint Mr. Walsh, an "Inferior Official" to the office of the President, in order to investigate the possibility that North and Poindexter may face criminal prosecution.

Back to the issue, Congress should not grant even partial immunity to either North or Poindexter. They should be thrown to the dogs. Let Walsh dig up the dirt on them and start formal criminal prosecution. They both could face charges for breaking the Executive order banning arms sales to Iran, the Congressional order of 19845 banning private or government aid to the Contras in Nicaragua, if they did truly not tell Reagan what was goinng on, they lied to their superior officer, the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States. The question of the missing money brings up the possibility of fraud and embezzlement of government funds, and North's orders to shred valuable documents may have been an obstruction of justice.

Walsh should move in for the kill on these two men. In a power hungry reach for glory, they jeapordized the credibility of the nation, not to mention what they did to their President's rating in the world. They have broken the law, and despite what Reagan says about North being a national hero, in the eyes of the rest of the country he is a shady person who should be shredded like all the documents that lovely Fawn Hall destroyed for him.

Poindexter has slunk back into a lower Naval position as Rear Admiral. He should join his buddy, "Olly" North, and be bucked right out of the service. Is it right that two men can turn an entire country upside down, halting the process of government while we figure out their mess, and then slink away and resume their previous lives in the Service, leaching off the tax payers money? No it is not right. If you break a law, you pay, if you rob the Seven-Eleven, you will be arrested, thus it is the same with North and Poindexter, if they have broken the law, they should pay to the fullest possible extent.□

Victor Greto

Follow the Leader

Is there anyone out there who can understand American politics? Is there anyone out there who can understand how Ronald Reagan, by appearing on television and wasting twenty minutes of our time, become miraculously absolved from public sin in the Iran-Arms deal by stating that "mistakes were made" and that he's "now" going to act his age (this can mean several things) and rearrange his administration and presidency to resemble something halfway legitimate? Can it be his consummate acting skills which, for me at least, make him look like a distraught yet innocent (a beautiful and pathetic combination) grandfather propped up by invisible strings, who speaks relentlessly and unequivocally down at me? His skills as an actor are, though mature, mediocre—his face and attitude and blanketing rhetoric play like a broken record. What is it about that guy that does it all for us?

The Ronald Reagan we all seem to want to believe in is the innocent, ideal uncompromising individualist who, no matter how much he may outwardly slip, always has an inside eye open upon all aspects of government; he is the man, no matter how naive and bumbling personally, whose great virtue (i.e. religious belief) and relative innocence (i.e. purity of intention and "of heart," striking out into the nasty real world of evil men and evil empires) shall eventually and inevitably overcome all obstacles. In more simplified terms, Ronald Reagan is America's dream of herself. No matter what that bumbling old fool will do we will and must forgive him for it; the man's intentions are pure, we tell ourselves, his grandfatherly, religious aspect is more telling of his "real" heart, where he "truly is coming from." Oh, Ronnie, thou art so fair, for thou art us!

And what is "us?" We are innocence personified, strict moral rhetoricians in the most profound puritanical sense, a world leader in spite of ourselves, a saviour, from the two world wars to our role now as defender of democracy and Western ideals. We are (let's admit it!) what Superman was supposed to be: defenders of truth, justice and the American Way. Of course, no one ever thought our version of truth and justice may be slightly tainted, onesided, perhaps a bit belligerent and hypocritical. But what difference does that make? Our intentions were pure, weren't they? What else matters?

But there is always a danger in projecting one's image of oneself onto another human being, especially the leader of a country. He is too easily forgiven, accrues too much power which we are too afraid to control and yield to ourselves. In a strange human contortion, the leader of the people becomes a mirror of ourselves, one we must forgive in order to live with ourselves, to allow us to keep alive the flame of our dreams, the ideals we have constructed and which we've convinced ourselves we are. If Ronald Reagan is a slimebag who continually attempts to curtail our individual freedoms through cronies like Meese; if he is a person so caught up in his self-righteousness to think he's absolved from the law (or worse, not touch enough to know that people who like and like him are so absolved) and can get to his righteous self-evident ends through any means possible, who must we think of ourselves as Americans? Isn't it too intolerable?

Freedom is such a horrible burden, and the burd may be too easily shifted into patterns of myth, leade and institutions—and through all the manifestations, freedom mutates into something totalitarian as Stalin's Russia, as Hitler's Germany perhaps, I submit, worse, for America totalitarianism lies disguised under such a weight coat of rhetoric and institutionalized righteousness that we fool ourselves into believing opposite of what seems to be actually taking place. become slaves to our ideal of ourselves, and lose tou of the horror of our reality.

Ronald Reagan is the ideal of ourselves Americans, and the horror of the reality of being American; he is a self-righteous demagogue who, allow it, will lead us to adject disgrace. He has alread done so in the eyes of the outside world, that "outsid so wonderfully untainted by our idealism, who ha created no mythical blinders to deflect their sigh Though they themselves (I'm talking about t Europeans), in my view, are tainted in their own vis of themselves as caught helplessly between t lumbering superpowers (for is it not a situation th helped create with their own relentless "civil wars" they are immune from our absurd and puritanic American myth, enough so they can help shine a ligh with which we may see ourselves more plainly.

The American myth is almost as powerful as t Hitler myth—the transfer of individual freedoms int the leader, not to mention the will to thi independently, is already under way. But our speci brand of totalitarianism will not happen overnight it seemed to do in Nazi Germany; it will continue creep along as it has over all our history, under t sacred and false guise of innocence and se righteousness. Perhaps the same conditions w provoke its speed as with Germany: a severe economi crisis, a frightened and paranoid middle-class in fe for its collective life, a nationalism that is a religion many profound senses of the term—is not the groun fallow now? Are we not ready to commit ourselves the leader, the personification and apotheosis of t American ideal? Are we not ready to sacrifice our pe individual rights for something greater in the eyes God and country? Enough of this sissy pussyfooti around! Let's get into Nicaragua and show them wh democracy really is! Let us reveal those horrid Rusk for what they really are, no-count devils who wish take over the world under one totalitarian yoke! Let get rid of those damned Arabs, existing as they do li hemorrhoids, killing innocent people. Desperat Who's desperate? The Arabs? Bullshit! They ha pushed us too far now as it is—it is no longer a time understanding, but action! Onward Christian soldier as Golly-Ollie North sayeth, let us put faith in the Lo and we will be triumphant! Onward, y redwhiteandblue Americans, and woe to any one, a voice, any thought which dares stand in our way!

Continued from p. 10

Many of the philosophical arguments against team rest on mistaken Division I stereotypes that h been dispelled above. The program has proven that not just in the business of turning out professio athletes. Because the school could not support Division III program, the argument that sports sho emphasize participation, not winning, is just not va The program does have its special privileges, but don't compromise the college in any manner.

President Riley has stated (and rightly so) that team's won-lost record will not be considered evaluating the program. Coach Bertsch himself recognize that CC will probably never build Minnesota-like dynasty (CC's recruiting standa emphasize non-hockey related standards too much the cost of integrity). CC hockey will have its ups downs on the ice, but also can guarantee an eth program that will not compromise the scho reputation. Anyway, the administration shows interest in altering the program so its probably g to be around for awhile. It gives too much to the sch to be sacrificed in the name of stereotypes or m philosophical questions. We can scrutinize program, argue that the school should not inv itself in such business-like athletic endeavors embrace it for what its worth and support it. I for will choose the latter.

David Makarechian

A Great Presidency: Out of Reach?

hings in Washington are starting to settle down. n's out, Baker's in, Nancy's happy; Ronnie said as sorry and for the most part the nation excused and now everything's on its way to being hunky- again.

is it?

he presidency has run a full circle. In 1980, after mptiness of the Johnson administration and the e of the Nixon years, after the absolute ineptitude e only unelected president and the national ise created by an experimental president from gia, the nation hungered for a new beginning. The on hungered for strong leadership, decisive action, ibility, charisma, professionalism—the edients of a great presidency—for which the on was long overdue.

d most of the people thought the nation had d it. King Reagan eased a whole new legislative ds through Congress in the early years—a great unicator armed with teflon—in a divine mission eer the nation back on course. Nothing could go ng—no, the nation's faith in the Presidency was ored—and Ronald Reagan had made it all happen.

his, of course, turned out to be a bunch of crap. he dirty laundry has been aired—the gressional investigation, the special prosecutor, Tower Commission, the Presidential apology—

we're veterans of yet another disappointing idency. And once again we're left with the stion: Where do we go from here?

f course, as always, we will look within the blished political structure to find a succesor to the ation of disappointment that is today's presidency. will once again look to the Harts and the Bidens, to Doles and the Bushes—and once again we will et a great presidency from candidates no different n those of the last two decades. And once again, or eight years later, we will wonder what went ng.

he presidential selection process is an intellectual ideological vacuum. The process of coaliton ding which is now necessary to rise above the atic, steadfast party establishment precludes the rise of truly new elements in presidential politics. The innovative become the puppet of the regulars. Witness the rise of an obscure Southern governor: Jimmy Carter became president because of his spineless pandering to even too many special interest groups than he could keep track of.

And innovative candidates who don't play the game can't get ahead. Jesse Jackson's alleged Rainbow Coalition suffocated from traditional party rules and established methods of candidate selection.

Today's party front-runners epitomize the party status quo. Gary Hart is beginning to succumb to the temptation of Democrat PAC money to pay off huge campaign debts, and has already begun to court big labor and to endorse its 1970s style liberalism. The Republicans offer the veteran wheeler-dealer Bob Dole, elected Senate minority leader for his sleaziness in cutting political deals. Established party structures again loom as the stifling element in the development of American politics.

So where do we go from here in presidential politics?

Probably to a reactionary Liberal president, but definitely back into the circle of failed presidencies. Some experts suggest that the United States might have to experience a whole new cycle of an incompetent Liberal and a toppled Conservative—a full circle of disappointment that will finally shake the political establishment out of its comfortable rut and to awaken the nation from its apathetic slumber.

Eight or ten more years of meaningless leadership will at once create a need for party change. Change may come from within—as with the creation of the New Deal creation under FDR or the rise of leftist George McGovern in 1972, or the change may come from without—a sort of Whigs of the 1990s.

Change must also manifest itself as creative leadership. Rather than coalition builders the nation must follow coaliton breakers...ideologues with the fortitude to establish their own party structure. And the leadership must spurn any connection to traditional spring boards to the presidency. We've looked to Congress and the State Houses for our Chief Executive, and perhaps it's time to look somewhere else. Can we dare to take an Iaccoca Presidential bid seriously? Perhaps a more relevant question is, can we dare not to?

The common denominator underlying a change in parties and a change in leadership is a change in the people. The near future requires a shift in the lofty expectations typically expected of the presidency. The people should hold out hope for great change within themselves before expecting greatness in the Oval office. □ hat is the first thing that comes to mind when you words like destruction, sabotage and trashing? rism, Guerrila warfare, maybe even a CU mity party? Yeah, that's what I thought too, until I ed into Mathias last block break.

Ecodefense Commandos

ere, on the corkboard in the lobby area, where the ing staff feels compelled to notify students of the t goings on, were little blurbs shouting ironmental Activism." Some of the articles were ional, but I was appalled when I read of the efense Commandos. One article on the board was ional advertisement for the second edition of ODEFENSE": an instructional brochure. Why a nd edition? Because the new one will have "entirely sections, including Destroying Heavy Equipment, puter Sabotage, Condo Trashing, Urban eywrenching..." I am a pretty naive person, you had always thought that environmental groups y subscribed to peaceful activism. I read on.

the bottom right-hand side of the board is a picture ndscaper tractor (a.k.a. snow removal equipment olorado Springers). Next to the picture is an ged, detailed drawing of the tractor's rear engine. n the detailed drawing is a balck arrow, pointing e suspects, a valve, a nut, something that is small ccessible but vital to the tractor's function. It would that the author of the drawing would like to draw ttention to a way in which we incapacitate nction equipment.

overing from my naivete, I thought for a while. hen, I must confess, I perpetrated a terrible crime. I ased my view on the corkboard, in neat, all capital ng with a blue ball point pen. I thought, doesn't ype of crusading, hostile attitude of Eco- ndos sound awfully similar to the self-rightious Right to Lifers' who bomb abortion clinics? Yes, I thought to myself, this is ironic, paradoxic, bordering on the oxy-moronic. I wrote something like that on the board.

Well, the R.A. whose baby that corkboard was, did not appreciate such forms of expression. Gasp! The next day I saw him crossing out my statement (read: censoring) with a black magic marker. I did not confront him, God only knows, he may have had a monkeywrench in his pants. I only gazed and wondered if his petty mind was capable of digesting the words he was scratching out.

Wait! The insipid-mindedness continues. If you go to the board, you can read all these cries to battle for yourself! Another article celebrated the heroic activities of two economic commandos who, in the middle of the night, infiltrated the whaling industries impregnable naval post and intelligently demonstrated to the whale-killers the commandos propensity for understanding and diplomacy. Their means of diplomacy: sledgehammers, acid, and, of course, monkeywrenches. The refrigeration system of the plant was destroyed, six diesel engines were dismantled and then dumped into the water, a laboratory was demolished, and the computers were trashed. "After 8 hours," the author proudly struts, "the plant looked as if it suffered a bomb blast."

Did they stop there? Ha! They were having a good time; they walked out to the corner stone of the whaling industry. No, not humans, you dummy, boats! Boats kill whales, not people. Jesus, even I knew that. Well, after they sank two of the chase boats, the two men had caused $4.6 million in damages! Exemplifying his truly poetic writing style cultivated at the Khmer Rouge School of Journalism, the author boasts, "Rod and Dave [the commandos] had brought the Icelandic whaling industry to its knees and then kicked it in the teeth." Diplomacy!

The question is, are these people environmental activists or terrorists?

In my naive Chicago suburb, my brother has a picture hanging in his room. It is a popular photograph taken in the 60's, or at some point during the peace movements. We've all seen it: a young man surrounded by national guardsmen, rifles held poised across their chest. Into the barrels of each of the rifles the young man is placing dandelions. DANDELIONS! I know I probably would not agree with the young man's political views, but I have a lot of respect for him.

Aren't these militant environmentalists embroiled in more than just a little self-contradiction? See, in my naive country town we were also taught that two wrongs don't usually make a right, and that you never bash the spokes in on your bike to make it go faster. The late Supreme Court Justice Black, addressing the question of absolute First Amendment rights, distinguished freedom of speech and expression from action. While the freedom of the former is absolutely protected by the Constitution, the latter is not.

The militant activities of the Ecodefense Commandos is criminal! Shame on you, Mathias R.A. surfer boy for promoting and Mr. Pelley for sponsoring such archaic, Middle Ages mentality. □

BY TOM ORI

Amerika The Grande

Amerika was not just a commie-basher. It was much more a critique on the United States than on the Soviet Union. The purpose of the film was not to confirm or remove 'evil empire' stereotypes but to provoke Americans into questioning basic ideals and institutions upon which their country was founded. Amerika's creators are not necessarily right-wing Reaganites but concerned Americans who fear their fellow citizens have become too apathetic and ignorant of basic political ideas.

Very rarely has a movie sparked so much controversy, not only in the media but also among politicians, statesmen, and leaders of nations. It has gained acclaim and criticism from both sides of the political spectrum. Moreover, the mini-series demonstrates how political the television has come to be.

When we learn Kris Kristofferson's motives for portraying the opposition leader in the film, it is no surprise that he was recently apprehended for protesting a U.S. nuclear test explosion. Said he, "I saw many points of contact between myself and Devon (his character). He returned from the Vietnam War critical of that war and things he found in American society. He felt America had drifted away from the principles upon which it was founded."

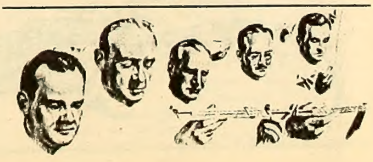
Amerika portrays an extreme situation. Only under such circumstances would most Americans analyze their native principles. Characters in the film speak of a sudden national consciousness which they took for granted before the occupation; only now are they questioning and realizing what it is to be American. They wish they had been more active in social and political affairs. How many Americans, I ask, have ever read the Federalist Papers?

This national consciousness moreover is not necessarily synonomous with the flag-waving patriotism that caused two world wars. The new patriotism demands a desire to recognize our country's basic institutions and a will to keep or change them depending on what will prevent us from falling apart or blowing ourselves up.

The storm over Amerika itself will soon subside, but hopefully the controversy will expand to address America's most urgent problems and necessary solutions, i.e. the film's ultimate objective. Perhaps Amerika will spark a series of films rectifying typical stereotypes toward the Soviets, indeed it may help scare the superpowers into talking peace.

One change would have made the film more realistic: a 1997 Amerika under American tyranny. The movie's Communist flavor may excite most viewers, but the greater danger in the United States is fascism from within. If Americans continue to rely on emotion rather than intellect in choosing their leaders, they could one day fuel the rise of a half-crazed demogogue-ruler, as happened in Germany not long ago. Commie-basher or not, our real foes in Amerika are not the Russians. □

PARTICK CHISHOLM



Food Review: Bijou

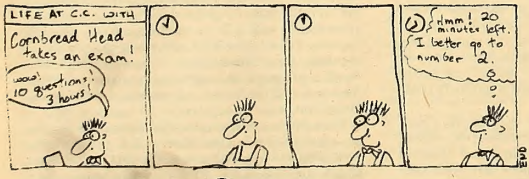
Photo by Jane Bierman

Located at 411 E. Bijou, Cafe Bijou serves coffees, pastries and drinks.

What's the matter with your nightlife? Can't you find somewhere to go when the clock strikes ten and the sidewalks of Colorado Springs roll their quiet way up into darkness? Slip into the Cafe Bijou. Art-decorated in the colors and detail of a Maxfield Parish print, this night spot provides all the essentials to wind down an evening or float in the morning. A myriad of coffee concoctions compliments cheesecakes and mousses for which you would sell your soul. Upstairs you find cocktails (specials for women on Thursday), and musical entertainment (CC grad Randy Isaacson plays folk guitar on Thursdays; weekends are Jazz). There is cocoa, tea, and excellent coffee if you don't want to drink alcohol, so the cafe is accessable to everyone. Downstairs the fare entails quieter tables given equally to daydream discussion and confessions d'amour. And, should you prefer to lone wolf it after sunset, everything is just close enough together to give people-watching that delectable auditory dimension. Who will be the first to succumb to the temptations of that lion clawed bathtub that waits in the Cafe Bijou bathroom for a frivolous youth? Passed over in the usual Tejon sweep, this cafe lounges just down the hill, half a block off Wahsatch. Cafe Bijou, in all its colors, is too often neglected by the CC Searchers-of-a-Good-Time. Slip out of your complaints for a couple of hours and try it on.

LAURA FINLEY

Life At CC With Cornbread Head



What's On Your Turntable

Mario Valdes, General Manager, KRCC
Cool Moe Dee, "Cool Moe Dee"

Robin Root, Director, Writing Center
Paul Horn, "Inside Two"

Chad Goodchild, Senior, English
Traffic, "Traffic"

Danny Scheman, Freshman, Undecided
Alan Holdsworth, "I.O.U."

Vasser Bailey, Senior, English
Echo and the Bunnymen, "Crocodile

Cameron Beattie, Junior, Music
Eddie Gomez, "Discovery"

Film Series

Mar..13 FRI Dr. No, Olin 1, 7:00 & 9:00
15 SUN The African Queen, Olin 1, 7:00 & 9:00
20 FRI Prizzi's Honor, Olin 1, 7:00 & 9:15
21 SAT 3Liquid Sky, Olin 1, 7:00 & 9:00

BLOCK 8

Apr. .10 FRI The Woman in the Window, Olin 1, 7:00 & 9:00
12 SUN Inherit the Wind, Olin 1, 7:00 & 9:15
17 FRI Monocle d'Amerique, Olin 1, 7:00 & 9:15
19 SUN They Won't Forget, Olin 1, 7:00 & 9:00
24 FRI All The King's Men, Olin 1, 7:00 & 9:00
26 SUN A Woman's Face, Olin 1, 7:00 & 9:00

Weekend Films Summed Up

DR. NO

Fri. March 13

The first James Bond movie and arguably the best because it does not take anything too seriously. Sean Conery stars in this mix of sex, violence, campy humor, and campy sex as 007 foils a master criminal in the West Indies.

1962 GB 111m
Olin Hall 7:00 & 9:00 p.m.

THE AFRICAN QUEEN

Sun. March 15

In the Film Series' second John Huston film this block, a gin-drinking river trader (Humphrey Bogart) and a prim missionary (Katherine Hepburn) make odd companions for a boat trip down a dangerous river, culminating in an attack on a German gunboat. Featuring an Oscar winning performance by Humphrey Bogart, THE AFRICAN QUEEN is a splendidly successful mixture of comedy, character and adventure.

1951, USA, 103m
Olin Hall 7:00 & 9:00 p.m.

Soul Not Rap

A Soul review? I'd say it's about ti
Loose Ends is the classy British t
Jane Eugene, Carl McIntosh and S
Nichol. You might remember the "Hangin' on a String" that marked th arrival on the American Soul scene a now they're back with a second alb called Zagora.

"Stay a Little While, Child" st things moving and is one of the m dance tunes on the album. The beginni includes what I guess you'd call Baghdad sound but soon goes into a go solid beat that has become one of trademarks of Loose Ends' music.

Funky tales of unrequited l continue on side one with "Slow Dow which bluntly asks: "Is this the part wh you take my heart to wipe your feet o
It's another dancable song but with l of saxaphone solos and Jane Euge strong vocals it slips into a more ja sound at times.

"Ooh, You Make Me Feel" (need l more about the lyrics) follows along same lines. However, it strays into rather pop sound that is due mainly to overly repetetive techno-beat.

Aside from dance tunes Zagora a contains enjoyable romantic balla
"You Can't Stop the Rain" features su blues-like vocals and a slow beat that seem to wash right over you. All I can is this song and dim lighting could deadly.

In a word. Loose Ends' Zagora is sli
It's a skillful combination of polish vocals and clever instrumentation tha truly enjoy: definitely a relief fr raunch and rap.

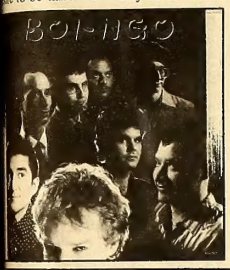
KATIE DALSEM

The Lotus Eater Boutique
is in the process of moving
to 311 North Tejon
(across from Poor Richards)
Visit Both Stores Until Our Move Is Complete!
Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm
Sat. 11-5 pm
THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE
Downtown on Platte Between Tejon & Cascade
phone: 635-2118

Boingo Loses Bounce

Los Angeles' Oingo Boingo has always been one of the more original bands around. Their music has traditionally consisted of jazz elements and tribal African percussion coupled with ceaselessly-danceable power pop. As unlikely as the combination sounds, Oingo secured massive popularity in the early 1980's and became the West Coast power pop combo. Curiously, they are the only members of California's early-'80's new wave to maintain success well into the middle of the decade. However the evolution of Oingo Boingo has been a tedious process. Somewhere along the line, leader Danny Elfman realized he had more to offer than anyone from other bands such as X and The Blasters and became obsessed with proving it. The result of this obsession has been an "artistic" branching-out during which Elfman as frequently occupied the band with work on film scores (notably Fast Times, Wierd Science and Back to School), not all of which has been entirely successful. Elfman supposedly exorcised the demon of his own legitimacy with his impressive 1984 solo album. Yet the group's newly-released sixth album, Boi-ngo appears to be the zenith of Elfman's desire to be taken seriously as an artist.



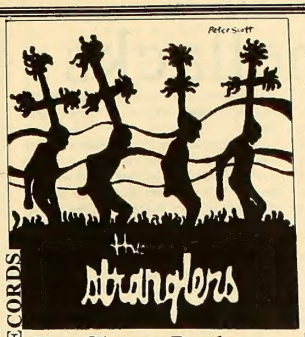
Boi-ngo opens with "Home Again," an eerie but decent tune which utilizes some layered vocal arrangements to balance the tension of Boingo's trademark horns, followed by "Where Do All My Friends Go?" a soulful chorus rap. Both these songs are condemnations of modern pretension full of death and nihilism, some favorite Boingo themes. Yet the sides next two songs, "Elevator Man" and "New Generation," are boring and trite, two adjectives which could never before be used to describe the band.

Side two begins promisingly with "We Close Our Eyes," a sort of The Byrds-meet-Wall of Voodoo tune which is happy-sounding but at the same time just dark enough in content to be scary. The track is followed by the album's highlight "Not My Slave," a fast-paced dance tune which recalls Boingo in their heyday and definitely ranks with the best work the group has ever done. The song, which appeared on the soundtrack of Johnathon Demme's fabulous film Something Wild, is a sad reminder of the raw energy and power Boingo used to be capable of before their music evolved into occasional nebulous, artistic mumbo-jumbo.

All in all, Boi-ngo is Oingo Boingo's least satisfying album to date. Though it receives passing grades on the strengths of a few good tracks and one great one, the fire has all but died from these guys' approach. It is evident that the days when these hard-working muscians would pack old warehouses for a loud, sweaty evening of slam dancing are over. In their prime, Oingo Boingo offered a sort of high-energy catharsis and something fast and exciting to fit the space in between the ears. Now they sound almost coldly professional. I sincerely hope that in the future they can lighten up and re-learn how to do what they do best.

DAVID EVANS

ALBUMS SUPPLIED BY BUDGET TAPES AND RECORDS



Not Gloom Rock

I wasn't quite sure what to expect from a band with a name like the Stranglers. As a matter of fact, I thought my friends at Budget were kidding when they first gave me the Stranglers album Dreamtime to listen to.

But I was in for a surprise. What I heard was not the expected hard core death music, but rather was a lively compilation of tunes with a sound at times similar to Simple Minds, with a little bit of Lou Reed thrown in.

The Stranglers get a bit heavy on chorus repetition on a few songs, and there's not a great deal of experimentation with musical styles. There's a suspicion of a reggae beat on a couple of the songs (just a suspicion, mind you), but the majority of the songs have an instrumental quality similar to that of the Church. There is some good keyboard as well as some trumpet and sax parts that add a bit of body to the sound.

This is a very listenable album. The message isn't deep enough to require careful listening, but I like it for its simplicity. Try it out. I have a feeling that this is one of those bands that grows on you with time.

JODY REED

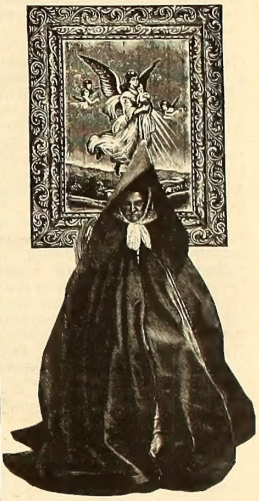
Arts Calendar

Sat., Mar. 14
Cynthia Gregory Dance Group, Pikes Peak Center, 8:00 p.m.

Thurs., Mar. 19
Latin American Film Series—Pixote, directed by Hector (Kiss of the Spider Woman) Babenco, 1981. Armstrong 300, 7:30 p.m.

Through Sun., Mar. 22
The Rite of Spring—Colorado Springs Symphony, Pikes Peak Center, 8:00 p.m.

Mon., Mar. 23
Latin American Film Series—Kiss of the Spider Woman, directed by Hector Babenco, 1985. Armstrong 300, 7:30 p.m.



Senior Art Shows:

Lise Grace

The senior project for Art Studio majors is a week-long show of their work. We will be announcing the dates and locations of those shows in this space. In addition, the artists, if they feel like it, will write about their shows.

Lise Grace's work will be in Packard Hall from Monday, March 16 through Saturday, March 21.

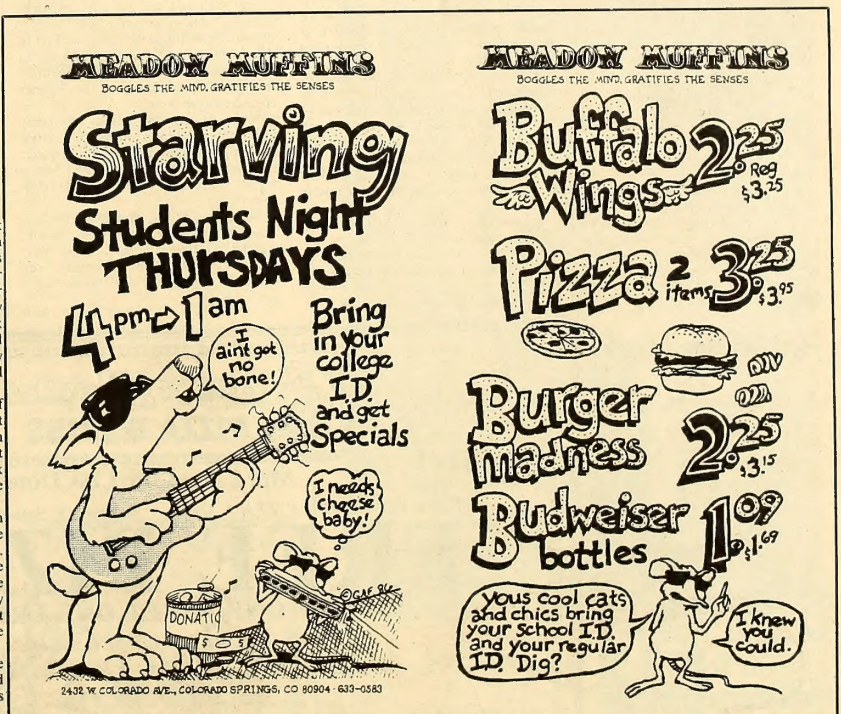
I suppose one could call my Senior Art show a retrospective one, even though the majority of the pieces were done this year. There are a few pieces done last year that have been included by merit of their relation to my work this year. They illustrate the directions in which my work would proceed, visually and conceptually, as well as represent my interest in exploring technical possibilities.

As a whole, my art is an extension of my compulsive side. In various works, it indulges in detail, surface, and pattern unfolding in a web of images in different degrees of abstraction. Much of my work is mixed media and compulsive in the use of materials.

It is the rapport that develops between the work in progress and me that guides the work to its resolution and completion. It is not necessarily some specific image in mind I may have had before I began the piece. When I do have a rigorously developed idea with which to begin, it usually undergoes an evolution of sorts in the actual execution.

A sense of mystery as well as the aforementioned dialogue and metamorphosis are what my works in this show convey—I think; I hope.

LISE GRACE



MEADOW MUFFINS
BOGGLES THE MIND, GRATIFIES THE SENSES
Starving Students Night
THURSDAYS
4pm ⇨ 1am
I ain't got no bone!
Bring in your college I.D. and get Specials
I needs cheese baby!
DONATIO
2432 W. COLORADO AVE., COLORADO SPRINGS, CO 80904 · 633-0583
MEADOW MUFFINS
BOGGLES THE MIND, GRATIFIES THE SENSES
Buffalo Wings 2.25 Reg $3.25
Pizza 2 items 3.25 $3.95
Burger madness 2.25 $3.15
Budweiser bottles 1.09 $1.69
Yous cool cats and chics bring your school I.D. and your regular I.D. Dig?
I knew you could.

Lax Schellacks

The Tiger Lacrosse Team is on fire! They have outscored their opponents thirty-nine to three in their first two regular season games. CSU was the first victim to succumb to the one-two punch of CC's awesome firepower and bonecrushing defense. The 21-2 slaughter, at CSU's home field, showed the amazing potential of this year's CC Tigers.

The stalwart defense played by Jim "Head" Cramer, Jack Foster, J.B. Behrins, Andy "Executioner" Constan, Chuck Blumenschein, and Chris Burns, proved to be nearly impregnable when complemented by the flawless goaltending of goalies Devon Standard and freshman Matt "Sparrow" McMahon.

Coach Tom "Nambla" Kay was "pleased" as the defense constantly supplied the ball to CC's potent offense. CC scored at will, and eleven different players claimed responsibility for peppering the CSU goalie for the team's twenty-one goals. Freshman Eric Petersen put it between the pipes four times, senior Rob Schwarz's three tallies made the score ten, and little Jimmy Quirk's hat trick made the score 13-0.

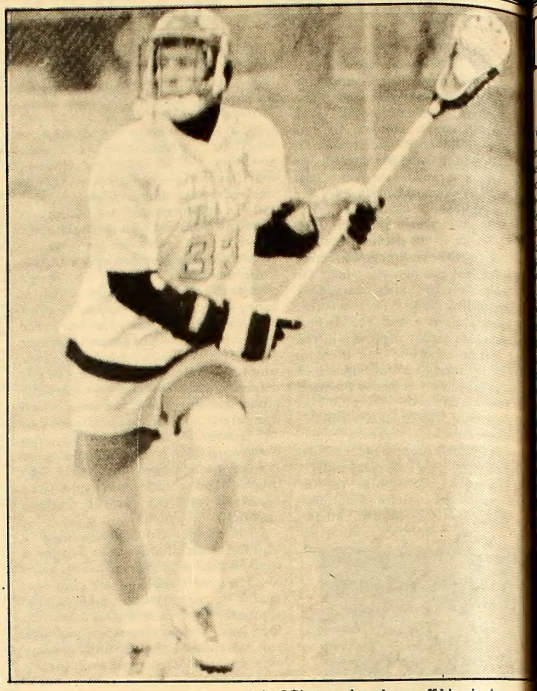
As CSU was blatantly outclassed, the Tigers were allowed the liberty of testing some of Coach Kay's new plays. The "Behind the Back Sparrow Crinkle Cleaner" resulted in two goals for senior Arnie Stifel, and freshmen Seth Miller and Mike Alkitis each netted two while executing the Tigers' ball control offense. Blake Anderson, Brian Brophy, Dave "Buddy" Byron, Guy Pope, and sexy Will Trousdale also contributed to the offensive fireworks with single goal blasts.

Saturday afternoon, as Siberian winds refrigerated faithful fans, the Tigers provided the heat as they toyed with the hapless DU Pioneers to the tune of 18-1. The teflon Tiger defense yielded merely once to a fluke DU goal. Goalies Standard and McMahon were hardly challenged as the CC defense intimidated the Pioneer attack. The CC defense remained belligerent and bellicose throughout as they abused the obsequious Pioneers.

The Tiger offense absolutely shattered the DU goalie. The crowd taunted the cringing individual with chants of "S-I-E-V-E" after each of the eighteen goals he surrendered. Mike Alkitis led the ostracism with four goals and seven assists, and Guy Pope had a sweet outing with three goals. Robby Schwarz, Eric Petersen, and Will Trousdale each added two goals, and single scores by Blake Andersen, Chris Allison, "Buddy" Byron, Ross Dohrmann, and Arnie Stifel threw the final shovelful of dirt on the Pioneer grave.

Be there (Stewart Field) at 2:00 p.m. on Saturday as the Tigers attempt to speed the extinction of the CU Buffaloes. Then, on Thursday at 3:30 p.m., come watch as CC attempts to defeat, degrade, humiliate, beat, spit upon, and demoralize Air Force in the annual grudge match with the Falcons.

D. SCOTT STANDARD



Robby Schwarz, who scored five goals in CC's two wins, shows off his winning form.

Photo by Jerry Wang

Big Cats Take 2nd

The Big Cat men's swimming team finished their 1986-87 season in style by placing second at the ISL championships at the CC pool Feb. 20 and 21. The finish was the highest by the team since 1973 when the Big Cats also took second place.

While there were many outstanding individual performances, the most impressive performance was by the team as a whole. Every swimmer and diver on the team scored points in the meet which enabled the Big Cats to overcome 3rd place finisher CU.

The team was led by seniors Tom Shimotake, Paul Moreno, Dave Surbeck, Robb Griggs and Kevin Diffee who were all swimming in their final meet as Big Cats. Juniors Brandon Sheafor, Kent Van Metre, Doug Hodge, Craig Clear and Bill Hulings also contributed heavily to the point tally, as did sophomores Tom Hackett, Tom Smith and Roger Denny. The freshcats showed the team strength should not dwindle much as Jason Levine, Wolfram Gottschalk, John Dorsch, Rodney McCarley, Tyler Mingst and Dirk Dykes accumulated a significant amount of the team's points.

Most of the credit for this goes to Coach Jerry Lear. In his 24th season as coach of the Tigers, Lear turned in one of his most impressive coaching performances in leading the team throughout their spectacular year. For his efforts, Lear was honored as ISL Coach of the Year by the other league coaches.

Several school records fell to the 1986-87 Big Cats during the meet. Senior Kevin Diffee broke his 400 IM and 200 breaststroke records and tied the 200 IM record. Freshmen speedster Jay Levine broke the 50 freestyle and the longstanding 100 breaststroke records. Sophomore Tom Hackett shattered the 1650 freestyle record and also teamed up with Diffee, Surbeck, and Griggs to set a record in the 800 free relay. The 400 medley relay record was also bettered by Gottschalk, Denny, Levine and Griggs.

Junior Craig Clear was outstanding in setting a school record in the 1-meter diving competition. He also took first in the event and qualified for Nationals to be held later this month. Clear qualified for the National meet in the 3-meter competition as well.

NAIA powerhouse Denver University took first in the meet, while CU finished 30 points behind CC for third place. Colorado School of Mines and Metro State finished fourth and fifth, respectively.

To Shimo, Stony, Shredwell, Dudley, Van, Misty, Moron, Stretch, Spank, Rudder, Shrubber, Guido, RPM, Yak, D.C., Condor, Blum Thumper, and especially, the Silver Cat, thanks for a great season!

DIFF AND ICE

Icers End With Win At #1 UND

Colorado College concluded its 198[illegible] 87 hockey campaign on a positive no[illegible] last weekend, claiming a come-fro[illegible] behind 2-1 victory over Weste[illegible] Collegiate Hockey Association regula[illegible] season champion and No. 1-rank[illegible] North Dakota.

The Tigers lost the opener of their tw[illegible] game, total-goals playoff series in Gra[illegible] Forks, N.D., by a 6-2 count. The [illegible] total-goals triumph vaulted the Fighti[illegible] Sioux into next week's WCH[illegible] championship series against Minneso[illegible] as the Gophers defeated Wisconsin [illegible] other second-round action.

With Saturday's victory, CC becam[illegible] the only team in the nation to beat Nor[illegible] Dakota twice this season. The Tige[illegible] who claimed a 3-2 decision at t[illegible] Broadmoor World Arena on Decembe[illegible]

Continued on p. 18

The Guinea Pigg

ETHNIC ART CLOTHING & JEWELRY FROM SOUTH AMERICA, AFRICA, & ASIA

IN OLD COLORADO CITY
2510 W. COLORADO AVE
633-0584

1625-B W. UINTAH
In Uintah Station Shopping Center

ATE TWO FOR ONE

475-8241
• 15 Minute Pick-Up

Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS

. . .More Pizza for Less Dough

CALL US FOR ALL YOUR SPECIAL PARTY NEEDS!

- 30 Min. Delivery -

Also serving a variety of delicious subs & salads.

FREE FLAVORED PIZZA • Garlic • Buttered • Sesame • Poppy • Rye

FREE PIZZA

BUY ONE — GET ONE FREE

Of Equal or Lesser Value

ALL PIZZAS COME TWO FOR YOU

Expires 4/15/87

Not Valid With Any Other Coupon • Delivery Extra • Area Limited

I.D. CC 2

Dean's Drivel

It's tournament time, baby

Well, it's that time of year again. The e when those people who hate ketball get tortured with three weeks re, and those who love the game get all y could ever want: NCAA rnament time. Sixty-four games in ween days, culminating with the Final r March 28-30 in New Orleans. That rious event where .500 teams nsylvania, Fairfield, Idaho State) get hance to play the best in the country rth Carolina, Indiana, and UNLV, pectively), always carrying the dream t, for one day, anything can happen. hough it's not likely that any of these known small conference powers will n come close to winning, Cleveland e's upset of Indiana in 1986, and St. eph's upsets of DePaul during the rk Aquirre era are just a few examples that inevitable occurrence in the rnament, the major upset, which kes every game exciting and portant.

This year's tournament, conspicuously sent of a defending champion uisville) or an obviously dominant m (Georgetown in 1985), still sports a mber of excellent teams and extremely mpetetive regional matchups. Here is a ef examination of the four regional ups:

AST: Third-ranked North Carolina ks to be the class of this region, but tre Dame, which beat the Tar Heels ter this year at South Bend, and rdue, which looked impressive in tying the Big Ten regular season title, will vide stiff challenges. UNC, lead by tor guard Kenny Smith, the ACC's rth leading scorer at 16.9 ppg, shman cover boy J.R. Reid, and solid formers Joe Wolf and Jeff Lebo, has depth and coaching essential to ccess in the tournament. Purdue, ugh not as deep as the Tar Heels, ats one of the nation's best starting 's, and the Big Ten's fifth leading orer in Troy Lewis (19.9 ppg). Notre me, also winners over DePaul and ke this season, is led by recovered star id Rivers (who nearly lost his life in ff season car accident), and a strong porting cast that includes consistent formers Donald Royal, Gary Voce, d Mark Stevenson. The Irish also ter from a thin bench, however, and be looking to avoid a repeat of last r's upset loss to unheralded Arkansas-tle Rock (Notre Dame will face ddle Tennessee State in this year's first nd). Other teams to watch in this on are Syracuse, Michigan, and rth Carolina State. The Orangemen, champions of the Big East with rgetown and Pittsburgh, and losers he Hoyas in the Big East tournament l, 69-59, are sparked by outstanding shman Sherman Douglas, but will d strong performances from center ny Seikaly to be effective. Michigan, ch closed out the regular season with impressive 104-68 home shellacking of rdue, will rely on the inside play of m Rice, the outside shooting of rde Thompson, and the all-around ellence of Gary Grant, considered by ny to be the Big Ten's premier guard. k for North Carolina and Purdue to le it out for the trip to New Orleans.

UTHEAST: Georgetown is the best m in this region, but Illinois and bama will make sure that the Hoyas' for the bayou won't be a cakewalk. East regular season tri-champion and rnament victor Georgetown has it all. n Thompson is a great coach, the as have tremendous depth, and All-erican Reggie Williams has been tanding all season. Georgetown can win any game with defense, and Williams and Perry McDonald have the experience to lead the team in tough situations. The only weak spot for the Hoyas is their traditional achilles heel, suspect free-throw shooting. Illinois and Alabama will fight it out for the chance to battle Georgetown in the regional final. The Illini have an excellent team, led by the inside-outside forward combination of Ken Norman and Doug Altenberger, and the strong guard play of Tony Wysinger. Norman led the Big Ten in rebounding, and finished sixth in scoring at a 19.9 ppg clip, and Altenberger can shoot the three-point shot as well as anyone. The Illini's stiffest challenge could come in the second round, when they are scheduled to battle Alabama-Birmingham in Birmingham. Alabama, winners of both the SEC regular season championship and the conference tournament, is led by SEC Player of the Year Derrick McKey. The Tide, playing the first two rounds close to home in Birmingham, are peaking at just the right time and will be difficult to beat. Kansas, Providence, and Clemson will also challenge in this region. The Jayhawks, with All-American Danny Manning leading the way, could surprise some people, but inferior talent will hinder the coaching genius of Larry Brown. Providence, led by scorers Billy Donovan and Delray Brooks, could also challenge, but will have to face Gene Bartow's tough UAB Blazers at home in Birmingham. Clemson, led by Horace Grant, the ACC's leading scorer and rebounder (21.2 ppg, 9.7 rpg), will fight Kansas for the right to duke it out with Georgetown in the regional semifinal. The team to beat is still Georgetown, and the Hoyas should advance to the Final Four.

MIDWEST: Indiana is the region's top seed, but DePaul's Blue Demons and Temple's Owls are also legitimate Final Four contenders. The Hoosiers have been tough all year, but had to back into a tie for the Big Ten regular season championship when Purdue lost at Michigan. Guard Steve Alford finished second in the conference in scoring at 21.7 ppg, and Dean Garrett led the team in rebounds with 8.3 per game. Indiana has a great athlete in Keith Smart, and Bobby Knight's coaching brilliance keys a defense that is still one of the toughest around. DePaul, which finished the season fifth in the national rankings at 26-2, relies on Dallas Comegys, who led the team in both scoring (17.3 ppg) and rebounding (7.4 rpg). The Blue Demons' only losses came to Georgetown and Notre Dame, and they will benefit from playing their first and second-round games in the friendly confines of the Rosemont Horizon, their home arena. Temple, whose .912 winning percentage (31-3) was third best in the country, lost only one conference game in rolling to both the Atlantic 10 regular season and conference tournament championships. Leading scorer Nate Blackwell (19.9 ppg) was the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year, and John Chaney was the conference's Coach of the Year. Duke, Missouri, St John's and LSU are other teams in the region with significant chances at advancing. The Blue Devils, with the ACC's third best rebounder, Danny Ferry, and senior point guard Tommy Amaker leading the way, will battle Missouri for the chance to meet Indiana in the conference semifinals. Missouri's Tigers, led by Derrick Chievous the Big Eight's leading scorer (24.4 ppg) and fourth best rebounder (8.5), will rely on Head Coach Norm Stewart's experience in tournament play. St John's, with first-team all-Big East guard Mark Jackson running the show, also has excellent players in Willie Glass and Shelton Jones, but has too many stiffs (Matt Brust, Marco Baldi, etc.) to be a Final Four choice. Louisiana State's Tigers lost to Alabama in the SEC tournament final, but Head Coach Dale Brown knows how to get a team ready for the tournament (LSU lost to eventual champion Louisville in the 1986 Final Four semifinals). Look for the winner of the DePaul-Temple matchup to edge Indiana for a trip to the Final Four.

WEST: Jerry Tarkanian's UNLV Runnin' Rebels are the nation's top-ranked team and the West's number one seed. Iowa heads the region's lower bracket, and these two teams should advance for an exciting showdown in the regional final. UNLV, number one in the country for the last six weeks of the season, relies on excellent shooting and the play of Armon Gilliam and Mark Wade. Gilliam, who led the PCAA in rebounding (9.1 rpg) and finished second in scoring (22.6), is a dominant force inside, and Wade, who finished second in the nation in assists with 10.5 per game, leads a Rebel attack that led the nation in scoring (93.2 ppg) and average margin of victory (17.9 points). The Rebels only loss of the season was a 89-88 thriller at Oklahoma. Iowa's Hawkeyes are also an offensive power, averaging 87.0 points per game and a 13.2 point margin of victory. The Hawkeyes are deep and talented, and are led by Roy Marble, Gary Wright, Brad Lohaus, and B.J. Armstrong. Pittsburgh, Oklahoma, UCLA, and Virginia are also bona fide contenders. The Panthers, Big East regular season tri-champions, are led by the nation's leading rebounder Jerome Lane, Charles Smith, and Curtis Aiken. The Panthers boast an extremely talented starting contingent, but consistency and depth make them somewhat suspect. Oklahoma's Sooners will likely battle Pittsburgh for the chance to face Iowa in the regional semifinal. Led by senior guard Tim McAllister, the Big Eight's fourth best scorer (19.4 ppg), and the Big Eight's best rebounder, Harvey Grant (9.9 rpg), the Sooners are another team loaded with talent. They must regroup after losing their last three games of the season (and five out of their last seven), but can beat anyone if they get hot. UCLA, winners of twenty of their last twenty-two games, won the inaugural Pacific Ten tournament over Washington on their home court at Pauley Pavilion. Reggie Miller is a streak shooter, and guard Pooh Richardson leads an explosive Bruin attack. Virginia is always tough in the NCAA tournament. Coach Terry Holland has a smart, well disciplined team that lost twice to North Carolina by two points or less this season. They will probably test UCLA in an excellent second-round matchup. Iowa could upend UNLV to advance to the Final Four, but look for Oklahoma or Pittsburgh if either of those teams gets hot.

PIZZA SHUTTLE
COMING AT YOU
Open Daily at 11:00 AM
$5.00 (Plus Tax)
For Any 14" Single Item Pizza
(with this coupon)
After 8 PM
578-8686
Coupon Expires 4/10/87
One Coupon Per Order • Road & Weather Conditions Permitting

State of the art equipment
for the backcountry connoisseur.

Mountain Chalet
CC's Outdoor Connection
226 N. Tejon
Downtown •633-0732

Club Hockey: Women Split...

Photo by Rink Murray

Dean French celebrates a CC goal as a disgusted opponent braces himself to boot.

Men Don't Win

The air was thick with excitement last Friday as the Men's Club Hockey Team was ready to take on the Minnesota Junior All Stars at Honnen Ice Palace. "I knew we were ready to play," said player/coach Erik (that's not boos you're hearing, that's Gooof) Kahler, "when I saw the Roe Bros put on the foil." The Tigers put on a great first period show as Eric "I can score too" Petersen paced the team to a 2-1 lead. Riding on the crest of such good fortune, Coach Kahler decided to have the team play the second period without sticks. Minnesota jumped out in front with an 8-0 spurt and never looked back. The Tigers ended up losing the game 10-6.

The next day, the well rested Tigers traveled to Air Force to take part in the "Big Tournament." At 7:00 a.m., the Tigers met CSU, a team they easily defeated early in the season. Between the pipes was Jerry "The Cat" Wang, who conned the refs into putting up a shooting glass behind him in goal. The Tigers then proceeded to toy with CSU, as Dean "Superman" French and Nate "Longenecker" Longenecker tallied the G's. The most spectacular goal of the game, came when the Roe Bros combined on a perfect give and go that left the goalie crying. With "The Cat" and "The Glass" keeping every CSU shot out of the net, the Tigers coasted to an easy victory. "We played old time hockey, just like Eddy Shore" commented Mark "I like hitting" Pankoff.

The Tigers' next game was against the Colorado All-Stars at 11:00 a.m. Again the Tigers came out flying and put so many points on the board that it started to look like a basketball game. Commented one fan "Gee, I thought it was a basketball game." With the game completely out of hand, Scott "I don't like contact" Pankhoff decided to make the game a little more fair by picking up a five minute major for trying to put his stick through an opposing player's face. Not wanting poor Scott to sit all alone in the sin bin, the rest of the team also picked up penalties. Rich "Let me shoot" Liebhaber, ended the game with a nice shot into the top right corner. He then proceeded to celebrate with a victory dance that has not been equaled this side of "Dance Fever." Asked to comment about the dance, Pete "Clubber" Husak said, "Rich is a good dancer for a knob, eh?"

It was at this time that Coach Kahler decided that he didn't like winning. He demanded that the officials take away CC's wins and replace them with losses. The officials, not wanting to upset Jim "Let me at 'em" Bloom, handed CC 6-9 and 7-1 losses. "I agree with the coach's decision," said "The Cat." "I didn't want to wake up tomorrow and play anyway."

WAYNE PUCKSKI

Varsity Hockey

cont. from p. 16

6, 1986, also are the only WCHA team to defeat the Sioux in Grand Forks. North Dakota's only other loss at home this season came at the hands of non-league foe United States International.

Colorado College wound up with a 17-24-1 overall record in '86-87, winning six of its last eight outings.

The Tigers, who got power-play goals from senior center Rick Boh (Kamloops, B.C.) and senior defenseman Rob Doyle (Lindsay, Ont.) in Friday's loss, entered the third period of Saturday's contest trailing 1-0. But freshman forward Paul Noad (Markham, Ont.) converted a pass from junior defenseman/left wing Doug Clarke (Weston, Ont.) at 7:24 of the period to tie the score. Then, with just 11 seconds left, senior center Scott Schneider (Rochester, Minn.) scored from the slot to give CC its third triumph in four playoff games this season and first ever over North Dakota. The goal was Schneider's 21st of the season.

The Tigers had defeated the University of Denver, 4-2 and 3-2, in first-round action a week earlier at DU Arena.

Sophomore goalie Derek Pizzey (Cranbrook, B.C.) was selected by the media as the No. 1 star in Saturday's game, finishing with 45 saves. Pizzey, who had 30 stops in Friday's loss, held the Sioux' high-powered tandem of Tony Hrkac and Bob Joyce to a goal apiece in the series, Joyce notching North Dakota's sole tally of the night at 10:02 of the second period Saturday.

Boh wound up as CC's leading scorer with 64 points (22 goals, 42 assists) this season, followed by Doyle with 54 (17-34). Each had an assist on the other's goal Friday while Clarke, who finished the season with 48 points (11-37), picked up three assists in the series.

The women's hockey team won one and lost one last weekend. The women took the road to Boulder, beating the Buffaloes 2-1 on an overtime goal by junior Sarah Meskin Friday night. But the Tigers were unable to continue that winning streak on Sunday when the team fell to the Denver Bandits, 3-0.

CC avenging a loss in their last meeting with the CU Buffaloes, struck first and early. Senior Sarah Flynn skated into the zone from mid ice, went around the net and backhanded the puck past CU's goalie in the first period.

Boulder did not answer that goal until the second period on a questionable score. There was alot of scrapping in front of the CC net and many people felt the whistle should have blown. But the puck slipped past Tiger netminder Sara Turner.

"Sara had an excellent game and the only goal came on a defensive lapse when the other team was allowed numerous slaps at the puck in the crease," commented Coach Vic Sunshine. .

The game was tied at the end of regulation time and CC was shorthanded. Between the third and [illegible] periods Sunshine told his team to [illegible] about the penalty and play offensively.

"A tie is like kissing your sis[illegible] according to Sunshine. "I told them [illegible] for the goal and Sarah Meskin did [illegible] and capitalized."

Meskin let loose a slapper on a h[illegible] away 24 seconds into the OT to end [illegible] game with a victory for the Tigers, [illegible] third of the season.

About Sunday's loss to Den[illegible] Sunshine would only say "We w[illegible] horseshit."

This weekend the women return[illegible] Honnen in search of their first home[illegible] win this season. The Tigers host Den[illegible] this Saturday at 11:15 at the ice pala[illegible]

"We're looking forward to s[illegible] impressive hockey. It should be [illegible] exciting game; we owe one to Denv[illegible] said Sunshine. The women are [illegible] against Denver in this year's meetings [illegible] get out of bed and cheer them on. [illegible] game will only last about an hour so h[illegible] to Honnen around 11:15 tomorrow.

QUINN TIKKANEN

Photo by Steve Lan[illegible]

Women's Club Hockey goalie Dorothy Diggs ushers a Denver shot wide.

YAKITORI

Sushi Happy - Hour

Saturday's 5 - 7 pm

Most Pieces of Sushi $1.00 a piece*

* Some are more.

Downtown
16 E. Bijou
578-0915

Yaki-Doodle

Live From Aspen:

America's Downhill

Swiss Dominate

It was the day of the Swiss last weekend the 1987 Aspen International World up ski races. Saturday's downhill was minated by the Swiss racers who swept top three places. This year's World up overall winner, Pirmin Zubriggen ok top honors in the "America's wnhill" to also capture the World Cup wnhill title. He also holds the lead in World Cup giant slalom and the per-giant slalom standings.

Zubriggen won the 'America's wnhill' with a time of 1:47.29, llowed by teammates Daniel Mahrer (1:47.34) in second place and Karl ilger (1:48.04) in third place. They uld have swept the first four positions one of the premier Swiss downhillers preface favorite, Peter Mueller, ssed a gate, disqualifying him. He cked a 1:47.58 which would have given a third place finish. Mueller was the racer with the chance to challenge riggen for the downhill title. Mueller won the Aspen downhill four out of times, including last year's race. riggen placed fifth in 1986.

This year's downhill course, set by the ited States Downhill Coach, Theo ig, was more technical (turnier) than ars past in an effort to control speed ch can be a problem in the second half of the course from the Aztec pitch and down. Racers can reach speeds up to 70 mph. But after the first training run on Wednesday, March 4, racers complained and a few gates had to be reset, opening up the course more for the final training

The results of the training runs determine the running order of the race. Training run positions depend on the racer's points accumulated over the season. The first fifteen racers in the standings make up the first seed. Their placing in that seed is random. On Saturday, Daniel Mahrer ran first while Zubriggen drew the last spot of the first seed. Third place finisher Karl Alpiger ran in the twelfth position. The only American in the top seed was Doug Lewis who was the eighth racer down the course but finished ninth overall.

The conditions of the course favored the first fifteen competitors. Aspen's Ruthie's Run, the trail on which the course is set, consisted of hardpacked snow with icy and bumpy conditions last Saturday morning. But with the temperatures soaring in the high fifties and the sun beating on most sections of the course, conditions slowed the later racers. Plus the ruts developed to hamper the skiers in the turns. The last two racers in the field of seventy-six were unable to finish the race, going off course at the airplane turn because of the icy rutty conditions in that cranker.

The World Cup Tour continues this weekend in Calgary where Zubriggen will try to add the super-G crown to his overall and downhill titles. Mark Giradelli of Luxemborg is the closest to Zurbiggen in the quest but in order for Giradelli to take over he must win and Zurbriggen cannot place in the top fifteen.

K MAHONEY

American Saga: Where Are They

What happened to the Americans in the "America's Downhill"?

Doug Lewis, Salisbury, Vt., was the hope for the United States but finished ninth, almost a full two seconds behind the winner, Switzerland's Pirmin Zubriggen. The next US place was a 40th by Allan Lauba of Bellevue, Washington. Other American racers, Bill Hudson, California, Tom Bowers, Morrison, CO, Jeff Olson, Montanna, and Kraig Sourbeer, Pennsylvania, finished 45th, 48th, 49th, and 51st respectively.

The name "America's Downhill" does not come from the same origins as those of the "America's Cup." Years of domination by Americans in the only downhill race on US soil has not happened. Olympic downhill gold medalist Bill Johnson returned from Sarajevo in 1984 to become the only American to capture the Aspen Winternational downhill crown.

This year Johnson, sidelined with a knee injury, joined the local Aspen television station KSPN, adding color commentary. This left Lewis as the top, and realistically the only contender for an American victory. Lauba, the second US finisher, had retired from the racing circuit to go to school and coach. He came out of retirement and placed third in the national downhill at Crested Butte, Feb. 18. A week before the Aspen race, Lauba was not even assured a place on the US Ski Team roster.

What is America's problem? The trend around America is to skip downhills for young potential racers because of the danger. No one wants to host a downhill race because the liability involved. This leaves the Americans at a great disadvantage to their European competitors who have alot more opportunities to race in downhills.

According to Bill Johnson there is a great need in America to promote downhill and get coaches enthusiastic about the race. And that enthusiasm will carry over to the ski areas and they will be willing to host a downhill race.

But until then, the US Ski Team will continue to struggle in the World Cup races.

K. MAHONEY

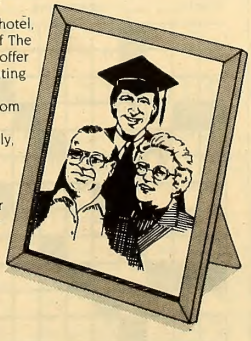
THE ANTLERS HOTEL
Colorado Springs, Colorado

Picture yourself at The Antlers Hotel for graduation.
Colorado Springs' finest...for only $60!

The Antlers...Colorado Springs' only Four-Star, Four-Diamond hotel, located just nine blocks south of The Colorado College, has a special offer for families and friends of graduating students.

- Single or double occupancy room rate of only $60
- A portrait of graduate and family, compliments of The Antlers
- Complimentary valet parking

Call Cynthia at The Antlers for reservations...we'll make this special event picture perfect!



4 S. Cascade Avenue
Chase Stone Center
Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903
(303) 473-5600
(800) 232-2323
Operated by The Broadmoor Management Company

© 1987, The Antlers

Anxiously awaiting summer vacation?

. . . Taylor Travel will get you there!

"Your Campus Travel Agency"

636-3871 818 N. Tejon

ANNOUNCEMENTS

"AT CC"

Announcement

Deadline!!! Students interested in securing one of the CC Award in Literature grants must return applications to Professor Butte's office, Armstrong 253, by March 20th.

URGENT — If you have not returned your intention to graduate letter to the Registrar's Office, please do so immediately or stop in the Office and fill one out. Thanks.

WE WANT YOU! Applications for editor(s) of The Catalyst, Disparaging Eye, Leviathan, and Nugget are available in the Student Center. Also, applications for Cutler Board President, Business Manager, and Darkroom Manager are available. Application deadline is Sat., March 28 at noon. Call The Catalyst office (x675) or Steve Schmid (633-4588) for more information.

T-Shirts — NCAAW Fun Run participants can now pick up their tee shirts from Adam Burke x243 (Rm. 229 Loomis Hall).

PI GAMMA MU CERTIFICATES can be picked up in Palmer Hall - Room 22 E.

The Tin Drum, the German classic portraying the chaos of Nazi Society, is showing Wed. March 18 at 8:00 p.m. in the German House. English subtitles.

Going to Chicago? I have a rd/trip ticket from C.Spgs - O'Hare, 25 March - 5 April. $145! Call Laura x211.

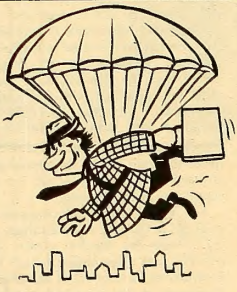
Ballroom Dancing Lessons—El Pomar upstairs hall. Get ready for the President's Ball and learn to Tango, Rumba, Cha Cha, Country Swing and Waltz. Two Arthur Murray dance instructors will teach the lessons. Wear slippery tennis shoes. Sunday, March 15 and 22nd, 7-9 p.m. Sponsored by CCCA. Free.

INTERNSHIPS: NEW YORK CITY/LONG ISLAND/WEST-CHESTER. The National College Internship Service, specializing in internship development for college students, is now accepting applications for Summer 1987 internships.

Placements are available with sponsoring companies in New York City, on Long Island and in Westchester. Placements are individually designed, fully supervised and evaluated. New for 1987: more paid internships.

Please call or write for application material: National College Internship Service, 374 New York Avenue, Huntington, New York 11743 (516) 673-0440 or contact your career and internship placement offices on campus.

I SUPPORT THE OFFICIAL LANGUAGE PROPOSAL 'CAUSE I FEEL LIKE THAT IF PEOPLE DON'T MAKE A EFFORT TO LEARN GOOD ENGLISH THEN THEY AIN'T GOT NO RIGHT TO CALL THEMSELVES AMERICANS!



Announcement

Are you going home for spring break? Would you like to visit your high school and talk to students about CC? Then...Be a High School Ambassador!!

Informational meeting: Wednesday, March 18th, 12:15 p.m., Armstrong 230. If you can not attend, please call the Admission Office.

Ski's For Sale—Blizzard Thermo Slalom 195 cm, only used once, $180 ($360 value). Call Michelle Fisher at 632-2058.

College Students earn $6-$10 per hour working part time on campus, for more information call 1-800-932-0528.

National Scholarship Search has access to a data base containing over 15,000 financial aid sources valued at over $4 billion dollars. The firm guarantees to find at least five, and as many as twenty-five, possible sources of financial aid, based upon biographical data supplied by the student. If they fail to locate at least five sources they refund the nominal processing fee, which is claimed to be less than one half of what some other search firms charge. They serve college-bound high school students as well as college freshmen and sophomores. Their mailing address is: 6645 Cam. Scioto, San Diego. CA 92037, (619) 459-5525 ext. 912.

FULBRIGHT FELLOWSHIPS 1988-89. IIE announces the opening of the 1988-89 competiton for grants supporting graduate study or research abroad under the Fulbright-Hays Program. Applicants must be U.S. citizens and hold at least a B.A. or the equivalent. Proficiency in the langauge of the host country is generally required.

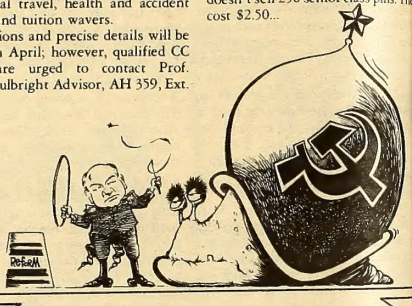
Grants include maintenance for the tenure of the award, round-trip international travel, health and accident insurance and tuition wavers.

Applications and precise details will be available in April; however, qualified CC students are urged to contact Prof. Wishard, Fulbright Advisor, AH 359, Ext. 520.

Internships: New York City/Long Island/Westchester—The National College Internship Service, specializing in internship development for college students, is now accepting applications for Summer 1987 internships. Placements are available with sponsoring companies in New York City, on Long Island and in Westchester. Placements are individually designed, fully supervised and evaluated. New for 1987: more paid internships. For application material call or write: National College Internship Service, 374 New York Avenue, Huntington, New York 11743 (516) 673-0440 or contact your career and internship placement offices on campus.

PIZZA SHUTTLE
Open Daily at 11:00 AM
Six Pack
$2.00 (plus tax) 16 Oz. Drinks Of Your Choice
578-8686
Coupon Expires 4/10/87
One Coupon Per Order • Road & Weather Conditions Permitting

Save a Life! Kathleen Delaney (x266) claimed that God will call her home if she doesn't sell 250 senior class pins. They cost $2.50...



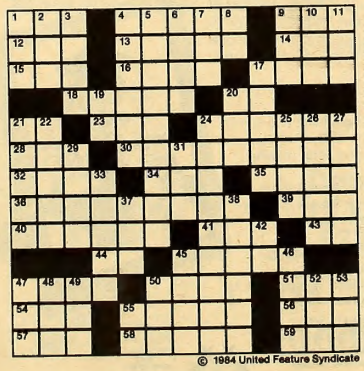
The Weekly Crossword Puzzle

ACROSS

1 Chinese pagoda
4 Let in
9 Eggs
12 Everyone
13 Sounds a horn
14 Lair
15 Insect
16 Book of Old Testament
17 One following
18 Small house
20 Yes: Sp.
21 Football score: abbr.
23 Algonquian Indian
24 Meal
28 Land measure
30 Generously
32 Word of sorrow
34 Once around track
35 Tart
36 Finished
39 The self
40 Handles
41 Alcoholic beverage
43 Steamship: abbr.
44 Exists
45 Denude
47 Wolfhound
50 Footwear
51 Brown kiwi
54 Moccasin
55 Equals
56 Paid notices
57 Organ of sight
58 Remains
59 Asiatic ox

DOWN

1 Flap
2 Sudsy brew
3 Fish sauce
4 Kettledrum
5 Homes
6 Earth's satellite
7 Possessive pronoun
8 Tensile strength: abbr.
9 Poem
10 Irritate
11 Pismire
17 East Indian palm: pl.
19 For instance
20 Weight of India
21 Pamphlet
22 Sorrow
24 Collection
25 Century plant
26 Bullets
27 Beginners
29 Title of respect
31 Cudgel
33 Country of Europe
37 Army officers: abbr.
38 Imprisonment
42 Roman 1001
45 Home of N.Y. Mets
46 Supplicate
47 Simian
48 Simple lyric
49 High card
50 Deposit
52 Room in harem
53 Inquire
55 Postscript: abbr.



© 1984 United Feature Syndicate

COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

PIZZA SHUTTLE
OPEN DAILY
AT 11:00 AM
578-8686
Have You Seen Our Coupons In This Issue?

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 20 March 1987 Volume 21, No. 68

Trustees: No Divestment

Spencer Announces Controversial Decision

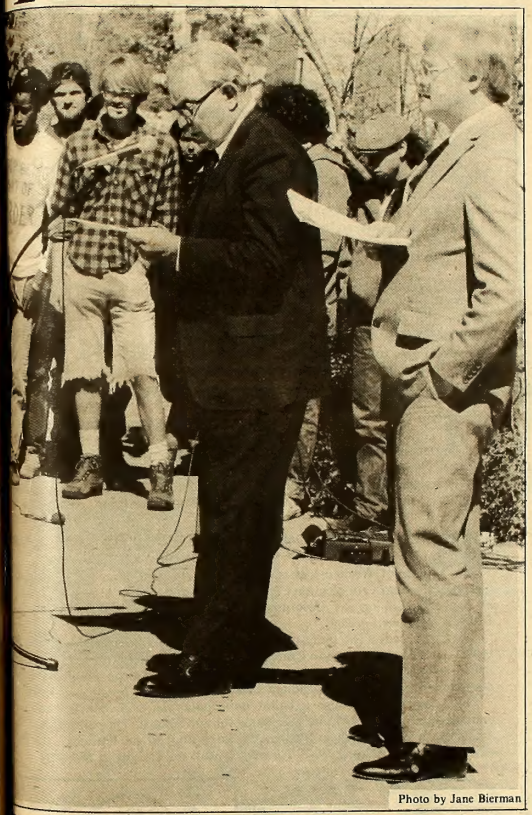


Photo by Jane Bierman

Chairman William Spencer reads the Board's divestment decision as disgruntled students toss pennies at his feet. President Riley (at far right) looks on.

Speaking to an emotional group of divestment supporters, William Spencer, Chairman of CC's Board of Trustees, announced the Board's decision not to divest just after noon on Saturday, March 14th. President of the College, Gresham Riley, who had just announced the Board's decision to support the Eight Block Plan, stood next to Spencer as he made the announcement on the West side of Armstrong Hall.

"The CC Board of Trustees appreciates the interest in and concern about South Africa and Apartheid as expressed by the College's faculty and students," Spencer began. Students groaned at what they perceived as a condescending dismissal. "As soon as they said they appreciated us," said one, "I knew they'd decided not to divest."

Spencer, who is affiliated with Citicorp, continued explaining that the Board had decided "to reaffirm its long-standing policy of investing in American companies who conduct business in South Africa and who subscribe to the Sullivan Principles." As he spoke, protestors threw hundreds of pennies at Spencer's feet as a symbol of the College's dedication to money rather than to the people of South Africa.

Shaken by the continual clanking of pennies on the ground, Spencer explained that the Board position to oppose Apartheid "is consistent with continued investment in American companies doing business in South Africa."

The Board fears possible revolution as a result of the withdrawal of American companies from South Africa and prefers to follow the lead of moderates who oppose Apartheid but seek alternative methods for bringing about change.

"The Board of Trustees at Colorado College," continued Spencer, has among its most important legal obligations responsibility for the fiduciary well-being of the institution...The taking of such a

Continued on p. 6

"Voiceless" Students Protest Outside President's Office

Students have staged a silent vigil as a way of conveying their shame for the College's weekend decision not to divest. The vigil began at 9:00 a.m. on Monday, March 16th, when two to three students sat outside Gresham Riley's office with their mouths taped as a symbol that their voices had not been heard.

At 5:00 p.m. on Monday, the College's security guard asked the students to leave as they were in a secured part of the building that is locked daily at 5:00 p.m. The students did not respond to this request which led the guard to discuss the situation with President Riley who was still in his office.

After a short discussion, the students report that Riley emerged from his office and explained that the area contained many confidential and valuable records and that for security reasons he would have to ask them to leave. The students still answered with silence.

Although Riley could technically have arrested the students for their failure to leave the secured area, he chose instead to allow them to stay Monday night and stationed a security guard in the Armstrong administrative offices to protect the area.

The vigil has continued throughout the week, but the students have decided not to engage in an occupation and have therefore been there during the work hours only. Throughout the week there have been at least two students (and as many as ten to fifteen) silently protesting the College's decision. While they sit with their mouths taped, they have been writing letters to CC alumnae to enlist their economic support for divestment.

Reacting to the vigil outside his office, President Riley says that he respects the right of the students to freely express their views. "Their refusal to leave [on Monday night] which compromised security, however is a problem." Riley calls the Monday night vigil the "first time in discussions when students have self consciously violated institutional policies." He thinks that the demonstration has "interrupted a constructive discussion between students and the Board...The students' silence can be interpreted as a lack of willingness on

Continued on p. 6

Olsen Wins Nationals

For the second time in two years CC phomore Beth Olsen has soared to new ights in diving.

Last weekend she successfully rended her NCAA Division III diving es, claiming victories in the one- and ree-meter events at the national mpionship meet in Canton, Ohio.

While the nation's top Division III ms, UCSD, Kenyon and Pomona won team titles, Olsen set meet records in th of her events as she took her second ecutive title, amassing 433.85 points the one-meter competition and 451.60 her three-meter triumph.

Olsen's return to the diving mpionships has proven difficult. "I was practically going into neurotic seizures before the meet," she admits. "I felt so much pressure to exceed my accomplishments last year, to perform amazing feats."

Yet under the guidance of Diving Coach Laura Luckett-Lohse, a former Colorado College two-time Division III All-American (1983 and 84) who was recently named 1987 Division III Diving Coach of the Year, Olsen was able to combat the pressure. "I tried to block out the intimidation, to turn my nervous energy to action," Olsen says.

"This meet highlighted the season—I won the top diving award and Laura won

Continued on p. 21

INSIDE

Free Cash is Elementary, Watson — Page 2

Teacher Tenure Reviewed — Page 7

Gay Awareness Week — Page 14

Real Men Read Comics — Page 15

Baseball Previews — Page 22

What's News?

Analyzing The Issues

News coverage of Contra issues, and the findings of investigative committees looking into the Iran/Contra affair, have certainly been extensive. One would think the American public knew just about all the angles of inquiry concerning these Nicaraguan rebels. New stories and questions, however, still continue to surface—most recently surrounding private fundraisers for the "Freedom Fighters."

In April, 1985 President Reagan avidly canvassed conservative supporters to donate to a tax-exempt Nicaraguan Refugee Fund. The President drew his supporters' attention to the plight of thousands of Nicaraguans forced out of homes and towns due to the "political developments in that nation" (GT 3/16 from Chicago Tribune). As he put it "Vive Nicaragua Libre!", (Free Nicaragua Lives). As the Washington Post puts it "A New Tax Shelter: The Contras."

Later that same month (April 15) Reagan attended a kickoff dinner for the refugee fund. The President pressed the flesh and kissed an Hispanic child presented as a former refugee (though it was later discovered that the child had never lived anywhere else but North of the Border). Joining Reagan at the dinner were cronies Oliver North, William Casey, Robert McFarlane and Vice-President George Bush.

Let there be no doubt that raising funds for refugees breaks no laws, and can be openly lauded. Guesses at the amount of money raised at the 700 plate dinner at the J.W. Marriot Hotel two blocks from the White House, start at $220,000. Organizers of the fund-raiser, however, cannot be sure that more than $3,000 ever got to the refugees. It appears the accountants of the donated money have had amnesia symptoms, and some of the funds may have been used to buy arms for the Contras despite a Congressional ban in 1984 on private and public contributions to these Nicaraguan rebels.

Independent counsel in the Iran/Contra investigation, Lawrence Walsh, is evidently looking into the actions of this and such private fund-raisings. Walsh believes some of the funds were indeed used to buy weapons for the Contras, and that the network of people involved in this particular fund-raiser became important to Oliver North in his efforts at securing a minimum of $1.7 million in Contra aid in 1985 and 1986.

Accusations have also been flying that Carl Channell (one of the April 15 fund-raiser organizers) and others have skimmed for themselves much of the funds raised at the dinner. Alvaro Rizo, one-time Nicaraguan diplomat, claims the fund-raisers have taken interest in "the blood of the Nicaraguan people" to "put money in their own pockets." (GT 3/16)

To find these kind of donations and embezzlement schemes in the corporate world may not appear surprising. But to again find U.S. Government officials, including our popularly elected President, linked to such an affair creates a feeling bordering on sincere political anxiety. We have all heard the countless facts and questions surrounding the Iran/Contra affair - actions taken by government officials through government means and structures. Where, however, do we want to draw the line on elected or appointed officials' use of private means and structures? Naturally, these officials belong to various organizations including their political parties, and restricting their personal pursuits, as sought through volunteer associations, would certainly go against much that is American. Are we willing, however, to allow these government officials the right to pursue goals associated with the illegal spending of private funds? More generally, should we permit the consistent use by these officials of the benefits of public image and access to government resources, afforded them by the positions we have directly or indirectly placed them in?

The media offers expansive coverage of our political system and its officials, to the extent that the line dividing the public and private lives of these leaders becomes blurred. Do we expect or anticipate that the officials we elect shall uphold in private the virtues they agree to support in pubic? That they are servants of the people 24-hours a day? Do we always consider what the President does our in the open an action taken from his elected position? Shall we allow these officials to use their positions outside the governing realm to benefit their personal convictions? Where is it we want to draw the line between the public and private lives of such powerful leaders? Lets keep on our toes and see where further investigations into these affairs draws this elusive line.

NEWS EDITORS

Title Courtesy of The Washington Post March 23, 1987

"A New Tax Shelter: The Contras"

News Briefs

CC Nets Four Watson Fellowships

Four CC seniors have been waiting with bated breath this past week to hear whether they would be Watson Fellow recipients. Margi Duncombe, one of the directors who initially reviewed all the Watson Fellow applicants, said Tuesday night, "They're all strong candidates." She hoped that they all got accepted.

Finally, the news was released yesterday. "We've got four," the note said. Four out of four; that means that Chris Dunn, Tony Lopez, Stuart Martz, and So Yong Park will all be on their way to a foreign country after graduation for a year of study. Chris Dunn intends to study in Brazil, Tony Lopez in Canada, Stuart Martz in Ireland, and So Yong Park on an island off the coast of Korea.

The CC Committee who initially conducted the interviews was thrilled by the news that all four candidates had been accepted, which is quite unusual, considering that there are only about 70 or 75 students awarded the Fellowship annually nation-wide. CONGRATULATIONS to all!!

A more detailed article outlining the specifics of their travel will follow in the next edition of The Catalyst.

Dancers Perform This Weekend

A dance concert choreographed by two Colorado College instructors will be held at 8:15 p.m. Thursday-Saturday, March 19-21, in Armstrong Theatre on campus.

Tickets for any of the three performances cost $3 and are available at the Student Center, 931 N. Nevada Ave., or at the door. (Admission is free with CC activity card.)

Choreography is by Peggy Berg and Alan Lommasson. Bert, Assistant Professor of Dance, will present "Between Silences" and "Are You Listening?"—the latter an improvisational structure for 13 performers, with music by Steve Reich and Meredity Monk. Additional original pieces will be offered by Lommasson, Assistant Professor of Dance and Drama at the college.

All Campus Talent Show This Weekend

Once again The Student/Alumni Association puts the greatest talent at CC "In The Spotlight." The 3rd Annual All-Campus Talent Show will be presented tonight and tomorrow night in Packard Hall at 8:15 pm. The Master of Ceremonies for the performances is Rob Peck '89. Performing will be Aaron Shure '88 with his own style of comedy, a vocal solo by Helmi Shepard '89, a jazz dance routine by Wendy Burch '89 and Shannon Callaway '89, original piano solos by Marcia Bloemendaal '87, and a vocal duet by Marti Deters '90 and Jessica Hunter '90. Also appearing will be Victor Rockwell '87 playing classical guitar, Liz Stanton '88 performing a vocal solo, original poetry by Chris Lloyd '89, Carey Ewing '87 playing the piano, Brigid McBride '87 and Brad Tisdel '89 will be harmonizing in a vocal duet, Emily Scott '89 with a vocal solo, Scott Bramwell '90 improvising on the piano and Reggie Williams '87 with a stand-up comedy routine. Please attend this lively and entertaining show which is being brought to you FREE OF CHARGE by The Student/Alumni Association.

Colorado Springs Candidates for Mayor to Debate

The League of Women Voters of the Pikes Peak Region has scheduled a Colorado Springs City Election Candidates' Night Tuesday, March 31, 7:30 PM at Packard Hall on the Colorado Campus. All candidates for Mayor and Council have been invited.

The City Election will be Tuesday, April 7. Voters will elect a Mayor, four at-large Council members, and a Council member for District 1 (northwest). Voters will also decide four charter amendment proposals, the airport bond issue, and possibly a citizen-initiated ordinance on smoking in the private workplace.

The League will publish a ballot issue pamphlet with concise, unbiased explanations of the issues and arguments for and against. The pamphlets will be available in late March at Penrose Library and all its branches, the City Administration Building, 30 S. Nevada, or call the League at 599-8438.

the Date Bar a Restaurant
Serving UNIQUE HOMEMADE RECIPES

10% off with CC ID

Serving Breakfast & Lunch
Mon.-Sat.
7 am - 4 pm
24 E. Kiowa
578-5693

the Stagecoach Inn
702 Manitou Avenue
On Fountain Creek in Manitou Springs

Formal Elegance That Makes Every Occasion A Special Occasion

Reservations 685-9335
Banquet & Catering Facilities For All Occasions

Events Support Divestment: Teach-In, Rallies and the Leeches

Students packed into Shove Chapel for a teach-in on Apartheid, joined in a series in support of divestment and marched to the Leeches in Armstrong quad during a series of events held last Friday and Saturday to herald the March Board of Trustees meeting. The CCCAA (The Colorado College Community Against Apartheid) sponsored two days of activities in order to show campus support for divestment of CC's stocks from South Africa.

Friday's activities began with a teach-in at Shove Chapel with approximately 100 to 200 students attending. Don Will, Intl. International Studies graduate student, spoke on the economic foundations of Apartheid, stressing that Apartheid is a deeply rooted economic system. "It is not just a system a racial inequality," asserted Will. "It's a system of economic dominance." He called the dichotomy between whites and blacks in South Africa "astounding." He described the whites as one of the most prosperous groups of people in the world, ranking among those in the Scandinavian countries. Blacks on the other hand, said Will, suffer from extreme poverty and its side effects such as a spiralling infant mortality rate.

When asked whether blacks would suffer as a result of divestment, Will rejected short term suffering which he believes will hasten much needed change in the country. He also cited a recent London Times poll which showed that 71% of black Africans favored sanctions even though such actions might hurt them. Will believes that it is "arrogant of us to say, 'well, what about their welfare," when Africans are saying that they want sanctions." Overall, Will stressed that people who oppose Apartheid need to dismantle the system, not reform it.

History professor, William Hochman, snuck away from his class at break to speak at the teach-in. He explained that he did not let his class out for the teach-in because he doesn't want politicization to disrupt the academic functioning of the College. He said, however, that "some issues go beyond normal constraints." Citing the overt racism and brutal repression in South Africa, he said that "academic institutions cannot stand apart on such issues. "To do nothing, is in itself a statement...when fundamental moral values are at stake Liberal Arts colleges must act." Hochman stressed that the extreme human rights violations in South Africa demand that the College alter its usual stance against political partisanship. "We need to make an institutional statement."

Two students then spoke about research they had done on South Africa. Sindi Medar-Gould described the effects of Apartheid on women. She cited Apartheid's disruption of the family as intensely oppressive saying that it "puts women at the bottom of the cesspool of South African society." Migrant labor, which separates men and women, completely undermines the family, while it simultaneously puts intense pressures on women. "Essentially," noted Sindi, "it makes it illegal for women to live with their husbands." She described the displacement as disruptive to all South Africans.

Priscilla Pettit then spoke on the Sullivan principles, the guidelines that many American companies have used to ensure better treatment of blacks in South Africa. Priscilla believes, after studying the principles during a one block independent study, that many of the signatories are dodging the tenets of the Sullivan principles. She described each of the principles and explained why she thinks they have never worked and never will. "Ultimately the signatories are victims of the South African laws." She ntes that even the final drafts of the American companies' compliance forms must be approved by the South African government before being sent to the American firm which evaluates how closely companies have complied with the principles. She believes that attempts to revise the principles or to reform Apartheid will only prolong the suffering of blacks there.

History professor Doug Monroy ended the teach-in with the admission that the College is involved in a brutal system. "CC profits from Apartheid," he said. He congratulated those who support divestment, stressing that they are a part of a world wide community that detests Apartheid. "We could go on with cynicism and apathy, but instead we engage this issue...the longer we prolong decolonization, the more morbid the situation becomes there." Monroy conceded that divestment would be a symbolic gesture. "It won't mean much in tangible terms, but we can join a larger movement...the longer Apartheid survives the longer brutality will."

A Friday afternoon rally featured Johnny Duncan from the NAACP, CC College Association president Jon-Mark Patterson and BSU president Sindi Medar-Gould, among others. Patterson told of CCCA's 10-1 vote in favor of divestment; Medar-Gould read Martin Luther King's thoughts on divestment. Students sang, chanted, and spoke about why they supported divestment. Various leaders of CCCAA read pledges of support that they had gained from campus organizations, twenty-one of which chose to support the call for divestment.

The band "The Leeches" then performed in Armstrong quad, which was followed by a barbecue. Later in the evening, Kenneth Burton, the Dean of Shove Chapel lead a candle-light vigil for peace in South Africa. The day's activities ended with a bonfire and an overnight vigil at the shanties.

Saturday morning, protestors greeted the Board of Trustees as they arrived for their board meeting at Armstrong Hall. A morning rally featured the music of Peyote jazz and speaker Ntathu Mbatha from the African National Congress. Mbatha, a South African who was forced to leave her country in 1963 insisted, "The perpetuation of Apartheid is what hurts blacks in South Africa. Blacks are willing to withstand a short period of economic deprivation to reverse such a repressive system." She told of the history of the African National Congress, the leading opponent to Apartheid, starting with its

Continued on p. 4

DOMINO'S PIZZA

TWO 12" ONE TOPPING PIZZAS FOR $9.14

(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.

Continued By Popular Demand

DOMINO'S PIZZA DELIVERS® FREE.

All Pizzas Include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.

Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95

Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers,
Extra Cheese (1 item)
Double Cheese (2 items)
Thick Crust, Extra Sauce
Each Item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19

Ask about our Group Discount (on 5 or more pizza orders).

We accept checks.

Prices do not include tax.
Our drivers carry less than $20.00.

Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.

Limited Delivery Area
Our drivers carry less than $20

AVOID THE NOID CALL DOMINO'S PIZZA

30 minute guarantee

If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes, present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off your order.
One coupon per pizza.

Fast, Free Delivery
Good at listed locations.

One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!

For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same), and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings.

Two 12" pizzas will only cost you:

Superb cheese	$7.95
1 topping	$9.14
2 toppings	$10.33
3 toppings	$11.52
4 toppings	$12.71
5 toppings	$13.90
6 toppings	$15.09

Twice the pizza for one low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minute or less, GUARANTEED!

Offer may expire anytime

635-1511

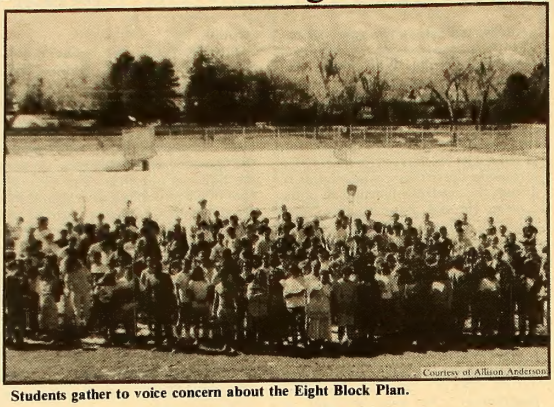
Board Decisions Announced: Eight Block Plan Passes

At the March 14, 1987, meeting of the Colorado College Board of Trustees, action was taken on the following items which are of special interest to the faculty, administration, staff, and students:

1. Tenure was granted to: Marlow Anderson, Assistant Professor of Mathematics, Ruth Kolarik, Assistant Professor af Art, Bruce Loeffler, Assistant Professor of Geology, Carol Neel, Assistant Professor History, Jeffrey Noblett, Assistant Professor of Geology, Adrienne Seward, Assistant Professor of English.

2. Promotions were approved for: Marlow Anderson from Assistant to Associate Professor of Mathematics, William Becker from Associate to Full Professor of Economics, Peggy Berg from Assistant to Associate Professor of Dance, Ronald Capen from Associate to Full Professor of Biology, Andrew Dunham from Assistant to Associate Professor of Political Science, Ruth Kolarik from Assistant to Associate Professor of Art, Carol Neel from Assistant to Associate Professor of History, Adrienne Seward from Assistant to Associate Professor of English, Marianne Stoller from Associate to Full Professor of Anthropology, Val Veirs from Associate to Full Professor of Physics, Barbara Winternitz from Adjunct Assistant Professor to Adjunct Associate Professor of Biology.

3. Sabbatical leaves were approved for: Susan Ashley, Professor of History, full year, Peggy Berg, Assistant Professor of Dance, full year, Jim Coleman, Associate Professor of English, Blocks 5-9, Michael Bird, Professor of Economics, Blocks 1-4, Charles Bordner, Professor of Physics, full year, Owen Cramer, Professor of Classics, full year, Andrew Dunham, Assistant Professor of Political Science, full year, Colatta Everhart, Assistant Professor of Physical Education, full year, Douglas Freed, Professor of Psychology, four blocks, Paul Kuerbis, Associate Professor of Education, full year, Robert Lee, Associate Professor of Political Science, full year, Erick Leonard, Assistant Professor of Geology, full year, James Malcolm, Professor of Drama, Bolcks 1-4, Carol Neel, Assistant Professor of History, four blocks, Michael Nowak, Professor of Anthropology, Blocks 5-9, Elmer Peterson, Professor of French, four blocks, Dennis Showalter, Professor of History, four blocks, Joan Stone, Adjunct Assistant Professor of English, full year, Barbara Winternitz, Adjunct Assistant Professor of Biology, Blocks 5-9.



Courtesy of Allison Anderson

Students gather to voice concern about the Eight Block Plan.

4. Unpaid leaves were approved for: Jack Carter, Professor of Biology, three blocks, Mark Stavig, Professor of English, Bolcks 5-9.

5. Additions to the faculty for 1986-87 were approved: Yiding Lee, Special Visiting Associate Professor, Blocks 6-7, William McAllister, Visiting Assistant Professor of Political Science, Block 6, Kathy o'Neal, Supervisor of Elementary School Teachers, Fred Trusell, Lecturer in Chemistry, Blocks 8-9, Esther Stineman, Lecturer in English, Block 7, Richard Wunderli, Visiting Associate Professor of History, Block 5.

6. Addition to the faculty for the 1987-88 was approved: Ann Zwinger, Visiting Professor of English, Block 1.

7. The proposed budget for 1987-88 was approved.

8. Salary Increase: An increase of 6% in the faculty, administrative, and support staff salary budgets, based on a 2.57% inflation formula calculation, was approved. The Board's Academic Policy Committee will continue review of the Faculty Salary Report at its June 1987 meeting.

9. The following increase in tuition and fees was approved: Tuition $9,360 - an increase of $665 or 7.5%, Room $1,[illegible] - an increase of $70 or 5%, Board $1,[illegible] an increase of $70 or 5%, for totals of $12,420, $805, and 6.9%.

10. Eight Block Year: The Eight Block academic year proposal was approved with implementation in the fall semester of the 1988-89 academic year. The Board recognizes that the faculty is engaged in detailed implementation planning which may require minor modifications in certain provisions of the proposal. The Board recognizes the concerns of students, parents, and alumni, and requests that the faculty review and report the final version of the plan after the completion of their anaylsis of the course schedule and present a summary of the final version to the Board along with a progress report on planning and implementation.

11. Child Care Center: The establishment of a child care center at Colorado College was approved providing the governance of the center is structured in the College's best interest and the existence of the center is constantly reviewed with regard to quality of care and cost of operation.

12. Sciences Facilities: The President and Vice President for Business and Finance were directed and authorized to develop a plan for refinancing and refunding the Colorado College Science Facilities Revenue Bonds of 1985, for the purpose of extending the maturity of the bonds issued to a date not later than December 1, 1995.

13. Divestment: The long-standing policy of investing in American companies who conduct business in South Africa and who subscribe to the Sullivan Principles was reaffirmed.

The Administration of the College was authorized to provide sufficient funds for an appropriate, ongoing debate on the South African divestment issue, provided that both pro- and anti-divestment speakers are brought to campus.

The appointment of a small ad hoc committee of Trustees, including but not limited to members of the Investment Committee, was authorized to meet from time to time with a corresponding committee from the campus to discuss the South African situation and the implications for the College's investments. The campus committee will be composed of both faculty and students. Presence on the committee of both proponents for continuing investment in South Africa-related corporations and proponents for divestment will be mandatory if the process is to function in a constructive fashion.

COURTESY OF PRESIDENT RI[illegible]

Rallies for Divestment

Continued from p. 3

inception in 1912. Mbatha responded to the charge that the ANC is generally violence in South Africa. She believes that it is hypocritical for people to criticize the ANC when they are not willing to take every non-violent option possible (including the withdrawal of economic support). "If we aren't doing everything else possible, for instance imposing sanctions," said Mbatha, "then we have no right to condemn violence."

Students Matt Case and Chris West sang with the crowd of around 50 to 60 people, while supporters, including a few members of the faculty, spoke and chanted in favor of divestment until the Board decision was announced a few minutes after 12:00 p.m.

KATIE KERWIN

Are you a victim of laundry abuse?

We have the means to fight back: Quality Maytag washers & dryers, Big-Screen TV, video games, pool table, snack and beverage bar, plus a comfortable, relaxing atmosphere. And for those who really hate doing laundry, we offer a drop-off Wash-Dry-Fold service, too.

DUDS 'n SUDS
Good clean fun!

VISIT OUR NEW WEST SIDE LOCATION!

- MAYTAG EQUIPMENT
- FRIENDLY ATTENDANTS
- REFRESHMENT BAR
- BIG SCREEN TV
- LOUNGE AREA
- POOL TABLE
- VIDEO GAMES
- WASH-DRY-FOLD SERVICE

1635 W. Uintah 473-1471 open 7am - 10pm

SILK STOCKINGS

A NOSTALGIC BOUTIQUE
Antique Costume Jewelry
Equisite Clothing
Unique & Fun Accessories
126 N. Nevada Ave.
636-9640

Use this for 10% off

Kappa Sigs Indicted

Student Conduct Committee Cites "Inappropriate Conduct"

Following a closed hearing with the Student Conduct Committee, the Kappa Sigma fraternity has been found guilty of what the Committee deems, "inappropriate conduct" for person's attending The Colorado College. The hearing stemmed from the "strip" pledge activity at the CC-DU hockey game on February 20 at the Broadmoor World Arena. While the committee can only make recommendations, Dean McLeod "accepted [those] recommendations in full" as is her right as Dean of Students. The committee recommendations will therefore be carried out and will undoubtedly affect the Kappa Sigs and the Greek system as a whole.

The Student Conduct Committee consists of three faculty members, one administrator, the Dean of Students (non-voting member) and five students. The hearings took place over three days (Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, March 10th, 11th and 12th) and consisted of the questioning of nine witnessess - either members of the fraternity, or other CC persons who brought complaints of the game-time activity to the Administrations attention.

As the hearing began, questions concerning possible hazing violations arose. A strict hazing code exists at CC, and if the committee applied a strict interpretation of that code, a strong case could have been made toward a verdict of guilty. The committee decided, however, "that the most important issue was one of public display." It became inclined to overlook the hazing question, so to better concentrate on the public dimension.

Dean McLeod has instructed the fraternity to perform two campus services. The fraternity must submit a formal apology to any of those present at the game who might have been offended. The Catalyst was chosen as the means for conveying this apology, which can subsequently be found in today's issue.

The Kappa Sigs must also propose five ideas for an educational program to be presented on campus. An example of which could be the sponsoring of a weekend film series stressing minority rights, or other important issues. Of these five proposals, one or more could be approved by the Inter Fraternity Council (IFC) or the Dean of Students. The Kappa Sigs would then chose one of the approved programs and produce it sometime this year.

An important addition to the role of the IFC in Greek affairs also emerged from these hearings. From henceforth, if any fraternity intends to engage in an "public displays" either on campus or off, a written proposal of such an intention must be given to the IFC for approval. The committee recommended the establishment of this policy so that the fraternities would "put more consideration into what they do." This would, according to the committee chairman, "eliminate the chance for such a demonstration (the "strip") to occur in the future."

It was the committee's task to help define proper (and improper) public conduct by Colorado College students. The committee recognizes the right for the fraternity to spark the crowd and instill spirit at the games, but hoped their decision in this case would emphasize the need for more careful consideration of future actions and their possible repercussions. The committee "in no way" sought to merely punish the Kappa Sig's, but hoped most to define the sometimes ambiguous conduct guidelines. The Kappa Sig's found the hearings "very professionally" carried out, and hope the experience will help them "look for more positive ways to support the hockey program."

PETER W. LOACH

Photo of the Week

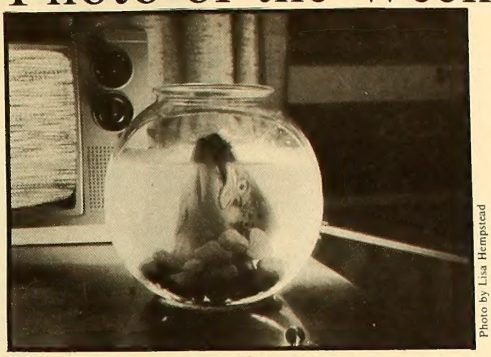


Photo by Lisa Hempstead

Thanks CC For Your Great Support
Enjoy Your Spring Break

Two For You™
FREE FLAVORED PIZZA CRUST
Original, Sesame, Buttered, Rye, Poppy Seed, Garlic

PIZZA	2 SMALL	2 MEDIUM	2 LARGE
Cheese Only	5.24	7.23	9.44
1 Item	6.07	8.17	10.48
2 Items	6.90	9.10	11.52
3 Items	7.73	10.04	12.56
Extra Items	.83	.93	1.04
Extra Cheese	1.46	1.88	2.40

- Pizza by the Slice of Medium Pizza .99 - Available 11:00 A.M.-2:00 P.M. -

—ITEMS—
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Green Peppers, Onion, Bacon, Ground Beef, Italian Sausage, Black Olives, Mild Peppers – We Use 100% Real Mozzarella Cheese!

The Hungry Howies Special 8.51 10.76 14.12
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Green Peppers, and Onions. No Substitutes.

Howie BREAD $1.04 Topped With Melted Cheese $1.61
A generous portion of Hot Buttered Garlic Bread topped with Parmesan Cheese.

HOT SUBS

	Reg. 6"	Large 12"
Meatball Sub With Melted Cheese, Parmesan, Special Sauce.	2.10	3.68
Pizza Sub Pizza Sauce, Pepperoni, and Cheese.	1.73	3.10
Pizza Sub Deluxe Pepperoni, Ham, Mushroom, Mozzarella Cheese and Pizza Sauce.	2.10	3.68
Pizza Sub Special Pepperoni, Ham, Mushroom, Onion, Green Pepper, Mozzarella Cheese, and Pizza Sauce.	2.21	3.89
Deluxe Combination Pepperoni, Sliced Ham, Mozzarella Cheese.	2.10	3.68
Steak & Cheese	2.21	3.89
Steak, Cheese & Mushroom	2.36	4.15
Ham & Cheese	2.10	3.68
Cheeseburger Sub	2.10	3.68
Italian Sausage & Cheese	2.21	3.89
Vegetarian Sub	2.10	3.68

All Subs Listed Above include Lettuce, Tomato, Onion and Mild Peppers. Italian Dressing on the Side.

SALADS
Your choice of 1,000 Island, Blue Cheese, Creamy Italian or Italian Dressings.

Chef Salad ..... Sm. 1.84 Lg. 2.99
Fresh crisp Lettuce, Tomatoes and Onions topped with Diced Ham, Mozzarella Cheese and Black Olives.

Tossed Salad ..... Sm. 1.25 Lg. 2.09
Lettuce and Tomatoes topped with a Black Olive. Your choice of Dressings.

Antipasto Salad ..... Sm. 3.15 Lg. 6.04

Prices Subject to Change Without Notice

Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS

Hungry Howies

FREE FLAVORED PIZZA CRUSTS
• Original • Sesame Seed • Rye
• Buttered • Garlic • Poppy Seed

So Delicious You'll Be Tempted To Start Where You Used To Leave Off!

FREE PIZZA
BUY ONE — GET ONE FREE
of equal or lesser value
ALL PIZZAS COME TWO-FOR-YOU
PICKUP or DELIVERY
WITH THIS COUPON
Not Valid With Any Other Coupon
ID # CC1

1625 B. W. Uintah
(Uintah Station)

HOURS
MON thru THURS - 11 AM til 11 PM
FRI & SAT - 11 AM til MIDNIGHT
SUNDAY - 11 AM til 11 PM
Delivery Starts at 11 AM. Minimum Delivery Order $6.00 Limited Delivery Area

--ATE --TWO --FOR --ONE
475-8241

Board Rejects Divestment

Continued from p. 1

risk might be justified if the step in question were clearly supportable on practical, political, or moral grounds."

Spencer noted that the Board does not think that the campus discussions of divestment have been balanced. The Board has therefore directed President Riley to provide sufficient funds for an ongoing debate that will provide both pro and con discussions.

Protesters responded emotionally, some in tears, as they chanted, "We won't rest 'till you divest." CCCAA leader Matt Case spoke to the crowd, describing his frustrations. "We played by all the rules...For two years we have been working with them, but they don't listen...Even President Reagan's panel admits that constructive engagement [in South Africa] doesn't work." Case described how the Board had been skeptical that CCCAA really represented a majority of the campus. "So we went to the students and we got their support. The CCCA which represents all the students voted 10-1 to support us. Twenty-one campus organizations pledged their support. And still the Board does not listen. That's a slap in the face."

Sociology Porfessor Jeff Livesay then said, "This is a very shameful moment in the history of CC. The values of this institution are a sham." Livesay questioned how a school that says it is interested in teaching ethical values can make what he believes is a totally unethical decision. "We have garnered support, but it doesn't matter at all." Livesay then picked up a penny, tossed it in the air and let it fall saying, "these pieces of metal are more important to them than human beings." Livesay then encouraged the protestors to keep up their fight. "We have to keep on struggling because it is a long term fight."

About 60 protestors then marched silently, with tape over their mouths to signify their voicelessness, from Armstrong to President Riley's house where several Board members met for lunch. The protestors sat in a silent vigil outside the President's house, at times breaking the silence to share their feelings of defeat and anger.

At one point, a few of those attending the lunch joined the protestors outside. Dean of the College, Glenn Brooks, first came out. He was joined by Max Taylor and Renee Rabinowitz who escorted William Spencer outside. The protestors, for the most part, maintained a silent vigil, but at one point a student asked Spencer a question regarding CC's divestment policy which he answered. The dialouge then broke off when Spencer rejoined other Board members inside.

KATIE KERWIN

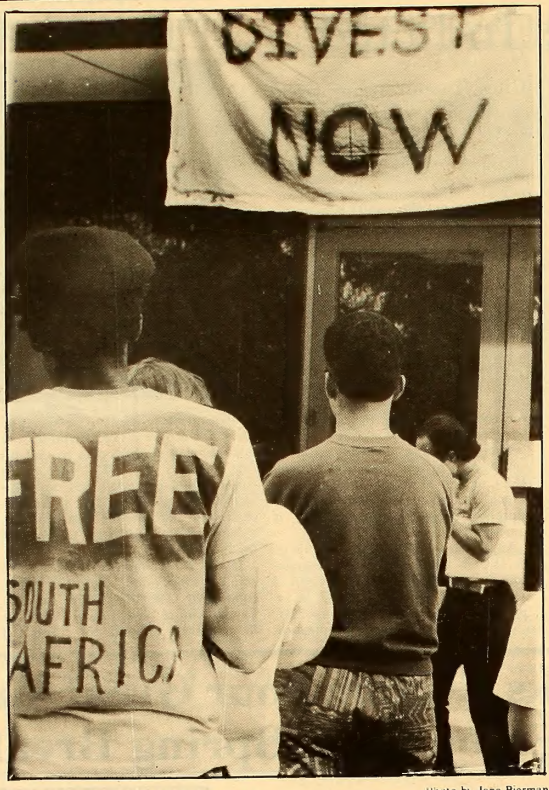

Photo by Jane Bierman

Riley Responds to Vigil

Continued from p. 1

the part of the students to engage in a dialogue."

Riley says that he disagrees that the students are voiceless. Instead he thinks that the Board has been listening to them for two years. Not agreeing and not hearing are two different things, says Riley. "The fact that there is a fundamental disagreement between the Board and the supporters of divestment doesn't mean that the students haven't been heard." Riley explains that the Board believes the situation in South Africa is sufficiently complex that even "morally sensitive people can come out on different sides." He cites the campus debate between Professors Jeff Livesay and David Hendrickson as evidence of such opposing assessments of Apartheid by sensitive, thinking people.

Protesting students register a variety of concerns. Many feel demoralized because they see the Board as acting autonomously without any regard for their concerns. "The Board did not take us seriously," said one. Another major concern is that as of May 31st, Rev. Sullivan who developed the Sullivan Principles, has pledged to no longer support the Principles, himself. He does not believe that they are bringing strides in South Africa. Still, the College voted to reaffirm its position which as of 1978 had been based on investing only in companies that subscribe to the Sullivan Principles. Many supporters of divestment view the Board decision to reaffirm its policy as hypocritical since within two months the Principles will no longer be valid.

Riley says that the Board wants to wait and see what will happen in May. He says that Rev. Sullivan has advised two courses of action for getting American companies out of South Africa.

One course is to divest. But Riley stresses that the other is to retain stock which would give stockholders the power to pressure companies into withdrawing from South Africa. Riley also stresses that the issue of how to combat Apartheid "is not settled once and for all. The Board is saying that it wants the debate to continue. It wants to facilitate and be a part of the ongoing debate."

Riley cites the Board's creation of an ad hoc committee to meet with campus representatives to discuss the South African situation and its implications for the College's investments as evidence that the issue is not permanently buried.

Several of the student protestors have charged the Board with failure to uphold the educational values of the College. Instead they think the College is operating as a business and not as an educational institution. CC Financial Vice President, Thomas Wenslau calls such a statement inappropriate. He believes that proponents of divestment equate a stance against divestment with a policy that supports Apartheid. "It's always difficult to separate the ends from the means," says Wenslau, but he explains that the Board would be willing to make the financial sacrifice if they deemed divestment as the best way for altering the repressive policies of Apartheid.

Wenslau also stresses that the Board has very different duties from those of the faculty and staff. "I don't mean to demean the supporters of divestment," says Wenslau, "but the context of the Board's decision is much broader and more complex than many people realize. The Board is ultimately responsible for the financial well being of the College. Just as the students' rights to express their views should be protected, so too should the Board's right to protect its responsibilities."

Students plan to continue the vigil, but they are also engaging in active disruptive campaigns. "We've got to play the game," said one, "and that means we have to talk money with them." Students are soliciting support from alumni and are encouraging seniors not to make a donation to the College this year. They are also encouraging students to contact their parents and ask them to send a letter of protest this year rather than a financial contribution. Over one hundred students gathered for the largest CCCAA meeting ever on Monday night to brainstorm about their next phase of their fight for divestment.

KATIE KERWIN

The Lotus Eater Boutique
has MOVED to a new home at
311 NORTH TEJON
Come See Us and Take Us on Your Spring Break
Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm
Sat. 11-5 pm
THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE
Downtown
Just North of Platte
phone:
635-2118

SKYWAY VIDEO
Rentals & Sales
577-9047
Hours:
Monday-Thursday
10:30-7
Friday & Saturday
10:30-8
Closed Sunday

- Foreign Films (Excellent Selection)
- Classic Films
- Operas
- Musicals

As well as an extensive selection of

- Current Releases

— No Club Or Membership Fees —
Tuesday Special - $1.49 Rentals
Sunday Rentals - Free
Skyway Plaza • S. 8th & Arcturus
(feel free to call for directions)

Examining the Tenure Issue

What Is It? Who Gets It? Who Decides?

Of all the topics which surface in academic circles of conversation, none is probably more often-discussed and at the same time misunderstood than the issue of professorial tenure. The average student generally regards tenure as a protective shield behind which a professor can do no wrong and exercise absolute privilege. A well-known instance of supposed tenure abuse at CC occurred two years ago when a professor was accused by several students of inappropriate and unfair behavior during oral compositions. Due to the professor's tenured position no action was taken. Yet in contrast to such rare instances, CC's tenure system is in reality a lengthly, thorough process which contains several built in checks and balances which protect against such potential abuses of job security.

Assistant Dean Victor Nelson-Cisneros defines professorial tenure at CC as "job security based on a rigorous evaluation process." To begin with, CC tends to tenure only those professors with Ph.D.'s or an "appropriate terminal degree" for departments where Ph.D.'s are not necessarily required (Art Studio, Dance and Physical Education). The process of evaluation actually begins during the job recruitment process and continues through the professor's first six years. Once six years have elapsed the professor becomes eligible for consideration. At this time the individual department may recommend a faculty member for tenure. Thus begins a long and thorough review process during which letters of recommendation are solicited from faculty members and students alike. The department chairman then puts together a portfolio including these recommendations, the candidate's various published materials and a letter of recommendation by the department chairmar. An executive committee then reviews the file and submits its recommendation to the Dean and the President who make the final decision.

"The evaluation of professors at CC is a constant, ongoing process"

This past weekend the college considered six candidates, all of whom were granted tenure. In CC's recent past it has been rare that a candidate is denied tenure. In fact Dean of the College Glenn Brooks recalls only one negative tenure decision during his eight years as Dean. This high candidate success rate owes mostly to CC's intense and thorough pre-hiring screening process for faculty members. "We're very thorough in hiring for tenure track positions," says Dean Brooks. "Therefore it's very unusual if someone leaves either voluntarily or involuntarily." Political Science Department Chairman Timothy Fuller adds that it is CC's philosophy to recruit faculty members who are believed to be capable of gaining tenure. "The idea is to recruit with thoroughness so that anyone hired on the tenure track should be able to get tenure," Fuller comments.

In addition to the rigorous recruitment process, a professor is subjected to a half-way third year diagnostic review during which the faculty member's performance to date is evaluated. In fact, this third year review has become the point where the administration is most likely to decide if a faculty member will eventually be worthy of tenure. And while it is true that no faculty member has recently been denied tenure, several have in recent years resigned following unfavorable third year reviews. Dean Brooks sees the third year review as a favorable alternative to a potentially negative tenure vote in that it allows a professor to leave without experiencing the ignominy of tenure denial: "Once in a while we'll discover an unfortunate situation where a parting of ways is better for both the school and the individual faculty member," says Dean Brooks. In this light the third year review represents a major juncture in a professor's career; for at this point an instructor may be faced with the very precarious decision of either leaving the college and having a better chance of finding employment elsewhere, or remaining and risking tenure denial. If a candidate is found unworthy and denied tenure it can effectively spell the end of his or her career.

"The idea is to recruit with thoroughness so that anyone hired on the tenure track should be able to get tenure."
—Timothy Fuller

Before being granted tenure, CC instructors are employed on the basis of a series of annual contracts. During the years preceeding the tenure decision the teacher is obviously under a high degree of pressure to perform, as any negative developments can signal the end of a career. Alex Vargo, the only tenured woman professor in the Biology Department, calls her pre-tenure days "the closest I've ever felt to being ruined in my life." She goes on to say, "I was working so hard to succeed and I couldn't see what I was doing wrong."

Vargo sees the pre-tenure period as a time in which the faculty member is pressured to conform to established norms in order to build tenure. These "norms," according to Vargo, can prove to be problematic to a female professor ying to build tenure. "When one enters a system made and maintained primarily by men it's bound to be prejudiced," she says. "If, for example, a woman wants to leave to have a baby or bring her baby with her to class, such behavior can be viewed by colleagues as unprofessional." She likens a woman trying to succeed in the male-dominated professorial ranks to a male trying to become a nurse, dancer or hairdresser. "The irony is," she states, "that the most renowned hairdressers and dancers are male."

A major question regarding tenure is whether or not it is favorable to have an entire department tenured. Dean Brooks states that the administration is neutral towards the issue of entirely-tenured departments, stating that the administration "tries to make tenure decisions solely on the merits of performance." Assistant Dean Victor Nelson-Cisneros adds that CC "has no goal of having a certain percentage of faculty tenured." While some schools have limits regulating how many faculty members may be tenured, CC employs no such quota system. At schools which use tenure quotas intense, ugly rivalries can develop between professors when two are up for tenure in the same year.

However since each CC faculty member hired on the tenure track is employed on the assumption that he or she will be a worthy eventual candidate for tenure, the possibility readily exists in each department that all faculty members will be tenured. Professor Fuller cites a disadvantage with entirely-tenured departments in that personnel could remain unchanged for a long period of time. In such a situation a sort of stagnation or status quo could evolve and the curriculum could be deprived of fresh ideas and methods. However Dean Brooks feels that the normal job turnover provided by retirements and resignations "provides plenty of the new blood which is vital to the college."

Two common misconceptions about the tenure system are that achieving tenure entails a pay raise and that once a professor is awarded tenure he or she is no longer subject to evaluation and criticism of performance. First of all, faculty members do not receive pay raises strictly on the basis of tenure, but rather earn them on the basis of meritorious performance and achievement.

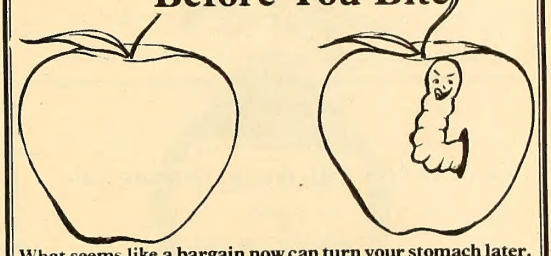
Another commonly-held view is that once a professor achieves tenure he or she no longer needs to impress the administration and losses the incentive to excel. Yet this is not the case, for the evaluation of professors at CC is a constant, ongoing process. As Professor Fuller cites, the incremental climb up the professorial ranks to the highest position of full professor requires a long history of outstanding achievement. Climbing this ladder of accomplishment and prestige requires a diligent, constant commitment to excellence on the part of the professor. Thus, the incentive of promotion acts as an effective check on the abuses potential in job security.

The merits of the tenure system are obvious: job security can allow professors to experiment with dynamic and exciting forms of instruction. Yet the pre-tenure period of conformity and anxiety has turned some faculty members against the tenure system. Dean Brooks advocates CC's non-quota tenure system as both good for the institution and the individual instructor alike, commenting that the college maintains a "healthy balance between tenured and non-tenured faculty." CC's complex system of continuous professorial evaluation which spans from the recruitment to the post-tenure years appears to be an effective method of balancing job security with both incentives to excellence and checks on abuses.

DAVID EVANS

GRIFFIS/BLESSING INC.

Compare Apples to Apples Before You Bite



What seems like a bargain now can turn your stomach later.

We offer a unique array of properties and services and can tailor a lease to meet your particular financial and service needs. It might actually save you money - as well as some unpleasant surprises.

Just a few of our FREE advantages:

1. Bi weekly maid service
2. Assistance in locating sub-tenants
3. Security Systems
4. Hot tub
5. Fire places
6. 24 hour plumbing & heating service
7. Washer/dryers, dishwashers
8. Prompt return and accurate accounting of damage deposits

When the pipe breaks at night and your organic chem final is the next day, make sure you know who to call....the same people you should call today.

GRIFFIS/BLESSING Inc.
520-1234

Remaining Units:
3: two bedroom
2: four bedroom
1: six bedroom
7: 3 bedroom
2: five bedroom
1: seven bedroom

$100 cash back if lease is signed by March 25

Econ Specialists Slated for '87-88

Unique Courses to be Offered

The 1987-1988 academic calendar is now set. It is important to mention that the Economics Department is approaching the concept of teaching on the block plan with a new philosophy. In an effort to improve the quality of education, the Economics Department has invited several renowned specialists to come and share their views and insights regarding a subject directly related to their respective fields of interest. So far, three have accepted to teach a block. In order to alleviate any possible problems that the block plan might cause these newcomers, each course will be co-taught with an economics professor. So with no further adieu, here are the courses:

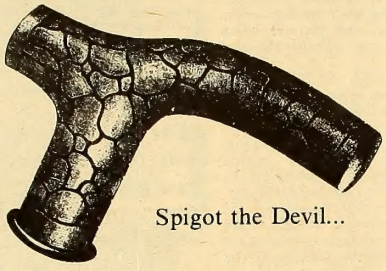
To begin the series, Advanced Topics in Economics: The Japanese Challenge to American Competitiveness will be taught block 1 by Walt Hecox and Kenzo Sasaoka. "Ken" is presently the president of Yokogawa-Hewlett-Packard, Ltd. of Tokyo, Japan. In 1952 with a BS degree in Electrical Engineering and some graduate work in Advanced Management under his belt, he joined Hewlett-Packard as a research and development engineer. Since then, he has served as manufacturing manager, R&D manager, division general manager and since 1974 as president. In 1982 he was awarded the prestigious Deming Application Award for his company's statistical quality control performance. If one considers the fact that the decline of the U.S. economy could be due to a decrease in quality control, then Ken should shed a new light on this problem.

Business Organization and Management in a Competitive Environment will be taught block 3 by Bill Weida and John Knight. John is the Founder, President and Chief Executive Officer of Viking Drill and Tool which is based in St. Paul, Minnesota. In 1958, he graduated from CC with a BA in Physics and went on to earn his MBA from Harvard University in 1962. Since then, he has worked as a physicist for Libby Owen Ford Glass Co. and in systems management, production management, and plant management for the Dana Corporation.

To end the series, Advanced Topics in Economics: Issues of Environment, Development, and the World Economy will be taught Block 6 by Walt Hecox and Maurice F. Strong. Maurice has been labeled "Custodian of the Planet" by the New York Times for his services to humanity. He has been awarded some 23 honorary doctorates by universities around the world. Some of his former occupations include Secretary-General of the UN Conference on the Human Environment, First Executive Director of the UN Environment Program in Nairobi, Chairman of the Canada Development Investment Corporation and of Canada's International Development and Research Centre, recently as Under-Secretary General of the UN, Executive Co-ordinator of the UN Office for Emergency Operations in Africa, Chairman of the North-South Roundtable in Rome, and Member of the World commission on Environment and Development in Geneva. Obviously, his views regarding the environment are highly honored and have a dynamic impact on the global environment.

From reading the credentials of these "newcomers," it is apparent that they influence the national if not international economy. It is the hope of the Economics Department that the CC professors can focus the views and insights of these three in the realm of a classroom atmosphere. These classes will be extremely dynamic and rewarding for those who choose to participate. They are highly recommended and should take top priority for any Economics/Business-Economics major.

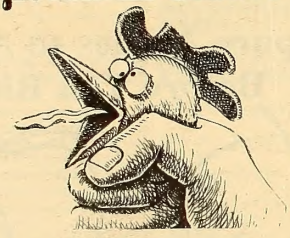
GREG ARCHER



Spigot the Devil...

Downtown 226 N. Tejon 633-0732

Mountain Chalet



Come to Our 19th Annual Spring Sale

— or —

We'll Chake this Chicken

Save 30-50%

on

Winter Clothing, Cross-Country and Telemark Skis, Rental Skis and Boots, Shorts, and Much More

Sale Ends March 31

CC's Outdoor Connection
266 North Tejon 633-0732
Downtown

LIFE AT C.C. with CORNBREAD HEAD
BUYS A C.D. PLAYER
IRON MAIDEN
Let's see if it sounds as good as they say!
Wow! There's no tape hiss or record scratches or anything!
Oops! I forgot to turn it on.

Student Special

20% Off All Services (w/Ad or ID)

	REGULAR PRICE	YOUR PRICE
Just—A—Cut	5.95	4.75
Shampoo & Cut	6.95	5.55
Shampoo, Cut & Blow Dry	10.95	8.75
Shampoo & Set	7.95	6.35
Colorings (from)	24.95	19.95
Perms (from)	24.95	19.95

NO APPOINTMENT NECESSARY
GREAT EXPECTATIONS
PRECISION HAIRCUTTERS

6 Southgate Road (Southgate Mall) 520-9957

Mon. - Fri. 8 - 7
Sat. 8 - 5
Sun. 11 - 5

Family Hair Care with the Personal Touch

Look at Those Mountains, Look at Those Trees...

Do's and Don'ts for Spring Break in La La Land

IN OUR PARTY ANIMAL Getups We are set to Cruise the Hottest and Most American Night Bars in RLOS Angeires!! YAR HAR HAR HAR!!
OH MY GOD. Just LOOK at Them.
Dudes. Get Real.
Hard Rock CAFE LOS ANGELES
ITS TOUGH TO BE COOL IN L.A...

You know it was pretty groovy. Hilary, my best friend, and I were at the beach when we saw this total hunk, Skip. All I had to do was bat my eyelashes at him a few times before he noticed me. It seemed like an eternity before he got his gorgy golden wetsuit-clad bod over to my silver lamé tanning mat. He said, ever so charmingly, "Hey babe, what's going? What's having this party tonight and I was wondering...?" I seized the opportunity to respond cooly, after I flipped my head to one side so he could see only one eye, "Yeah, sure I'd love to." He left and it took me a micro-second to hop into the white on white on white convertible "wab" (Volkswagen Rabbit to those who aren't familiar with the vernacular), to prepare for the big date. Yikes! It only gave me five hours to get ready. As I cruised down P.C.H. with Madonna going full blast, with the wind in my hair and the sand between my toes, I took a second out of my busy day to appreciate how groovy it was to be young, beautiful, carefree and living in L.A.

In all seriousness the teen scene in Los Angeles can be interpreted in such lofty terms. Afterall, most of the people who live in the "Big Orange" are not focused, mature adults. So while you are there you must do as the Romans do and hang with it. Your main purpose is to have fun. Before we get ahead of ourselves, let's take some time to make a list of the do's and dont's to follow while you are there.

Rule #1: You are not to be seen anywhere near the Hard Rock Cafe. The trend has long since been outdated. The only people you will find here are tourists. you will rarely hear an American tongue wag here. After all—who would be dumb enough to spend ten dollars on a hamburger?

Rule #2: 3-2-1, The Palace, Marilyn's Backstreet: These clubs are fashion dont's!!! In L.A. any under 21 club is a wanna be thirteen year-olds hangout. If you get your jollies from sewing your wild oats with a bunch of prepubescent lovelies, that's your business, if not, buyer beware!!!

Rule #3: When going to the beach...Anything south of Malibu or any private beach club (even if you belong to one) is totally bourgeoise; real surfers and sun bunnies can be found at State Beach (station #10) or Paradise Cove. Never never walk past "The Colony" craning your neck to see a star. it is utterly boring and repulsive. Also, if you have any pride, don't admit you go to Palm Springs for the weekend—even if it is only to relax. We do not want to be associated with Bob Hope now do we?

Rule #4: When dressing yourself, or others, choose the most ghastly clothes you can pull out of your closet, rumour has it bell bottoms and platform shoes are the rage again. If not, it's worth a go. Close fitting garmets are preferable, especially white ones, but—(no pun intended!) only if you are wearing contrasting underwear, underneath...

Rule #5: Be sure every one thinks you are somebody famous, that is why you look so bad today. You really are a household name. You decided not to pull out any stops today, lest someone notice you.

Don't get down on yourself if the superficiality does not come naturally to you. It will come with time; all those long days in the mall, at the beach and in the clubs will make you as dull and empty as you ever wanted to be. If your goals seem out of reach, always remember: they are egocetric and YOU CAN BE TOO.

ANDREA CARROLL TROWER

A Journey to Norad (without a paddle)

We found out what NORAD really stands for—Nancy's Old Radioactive Dog! We discovered this along with other surprising tidbits while we were BMX-ing after school the other day. We met an older man, garbed in a toolbelt, standing on the side of Cheyenne Mountain. Much to our amazement, this was not just another NORAD nobody; it was Robert McFarlane, freshly out of the hospital and happily busying himself with menial missile clean-up.

"It's part of my therapy," the chipper former National Security Advisor chirped. "You don't have any barbituates on you, kids, by any chance?"

Lucky Day Bob! We dug deep in our mittens and discovered several prescriptions worth of Dexatrim.

"Here, Sir!" we said, chuckling to ourselves.

In exchange for our kindness, he invited us into his janitorial closet deep within the mountain for a tour.

"Yea, yea," we whined, "everyone goes on tours, we wanna see the OTHER SIDE OF NORAD."

Briefly stunned, he agreed. He pointed to a plain garage door behind a nearby evergreen. He took out his Genie Automatic door opener and PRESTO!—Genie opens the door and turns on the light!

There we were.

"Golly, this is swell!" we ejaculated.

There before us was a sight previously unwitnessed by almost any upper-middle class caucasian youth. All around us swarmed children, there must have been millions. We'd seen some of their faces on milk cartons before.

"Those are all missing children," smiled McFarlane, dazedly, "but we found them."

Standing by a couple of rather bored Bigfeet—overweight and out of shape—was found former union leader Jimmy Hoffa. He was engaged in a discussion with a plump and jovial Terry Waite.

"This is our mission control center and this is Captain Tommy," said McFarlane as he introduced us to the casual young man plugging away at the Apple Two.

"I have my finger on the pulse of nuclear destruction," quipped the Toughskin clad pugnacious prepubescent.

"Ha, Ha," we said in unison.

Next, we came upon three old men in overalls playing gin rummy beneath a flashing neon "Just Say No In Geneva" sign. When we asked about them, Bob told us, "Oh, them? They're just the military-industrial complex playing a quick card game before supper."

All the while the inimitable, unemployable Lawrence Welk and his new orchestra—"Death Rays from Space"—played "Tiny Bubbles."

As Lassie romped playfully on the oriental throw rugs at the feet of Darth Vader, we really began to feel at home.

SAND SHEF AND LISA BETTY

AIM HIGH

PUT YOUR COLLEGE DEGREE TO WORK.

Air Force Officer Training School is an excellent start to a challenging career as an Air Force Officer. We offer great starting pay, medical care, 30 days of vacation with pay each year and management opportunities. Contact an Air Force recruiter. Find out what Officer Training School can mean for you. Call

(303)528-1722 Collect

AIR FORCE

Hertz

You don't just rent a car. You rent a company.

Call for Weekend Rate and Eligibility

315 N. Weber
473-2444
8-6 Mon-Sat
Appointments possible at any other time

5% discount with Ad

Travel Books for Spring Break

RAND McNALLY ROAD ATLAS	5.95
OVERCOMING JET LAG	5.95
MEXICO ON $20 A DAY	10.95
THE HIDDEN WEST	9.50
COLORADO SCENIC GUIDE	9.95
THE SIERRA CLUB GUIDE TO THE NATIONAL PARKS
DESERT SOUTHWEST	13.95
COLORADO ACCOMODATIONS GUIDE	7.95
ADVENTURING IN THE ROCKIES	10.95

Colorado College Bookstore

In Support of the Board

To the Editor

This past Saturday, The Colorado College Board of Trustees voted down a resolution by the faculty to eliminate our investments from companies who have dealings in South Africa. Although I do not know the particulars of the ideas behind the making of this decision, many are, nevertheless, satisfied with their decision. It is about time the other side of the coin was heard on this campus. For the past few years some students have been watching the doings of a very vocal group on this campus and have not fully heard the opinions of other students.

It is the firm belief of many students on this campus that divestiture is nothing more than hollow, symbolic rhetoric. It is time to stop believing that if we divest that no one will buy up the shares we sell off. There will always be buyers without a conscience who will buy the shares if they are put up for sale. We would only be passing the position we have in the companies to bring about reform from those with a conscience to those without. This does not mean that we are for Apartheid; we certainly are not. I see it as a crime against humanity as much as the vocal groups. I feel, however, that there are much better ways of making progress in South Africa: namely, keeping the shares we have in these companies and getting together with the other shareholders and forcing the Board of Directors of these companies to take action against the South African government. This will serve the same purpose as divestiture, but will not be as potentially harmful to the college.

If the college did indeed divest its earnings from these companies, we would face the possibility of retaliation against the college by these companies. In the past when schools have divested, many companies stopped giving aid to the schools in the form of grants and scholarships. This in turn has hurt the colleges and does not seem to be a very smart maneuver. Many on this campus say that this is a price worth paying for our ideals, but many would disagree. By using the College's position in the company as shareholders, we can force the companies to either pressure the government of South Africa or pull out of the country all together. So it seems that we can achieve the same ends either way, but we do not have to cut our throats in the process.

It is time to give up the fight for divestiture, and move the attentions of the college to putting pressure on the Board of Trustees to take a position on Apartheid and make things happen in the companies in which we own shares. This would be a smarter move to all who are concerned than to keep fighting a battle which has already been lost.

Steve Franklin

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETER LOACH, News Editor
DAVID EVANS, Features Editor
MUNIR MEGHJEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
•
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETER SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
•
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
•
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Cutler Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 extension 675. The Catalyst is printed six monthly from September to May, except during holiday periods.

Cutler Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its education programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local laws.

Editorials appearing in the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 400 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Rastall Center, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

A work of considerable length may be submitted as a guest commentary. Persons interested in submitting commentary should contact the Catalyst at 632-9999 or 473-2233 ext. 675.

The Catalyst reserves the right to edit or cut letters to the editor and guest commentaries.

Divest From CC

To the Editor:

The Board of Trustees is using the charge of "one-sided" discussion to try to neutralize the CCCAA position paper. The implication of the Board's "concern" that the debate on campus has been unbalanced is that if the other side were presented, the students and faculty who support divestment would see the error of our ways and endorse the Board's position. The Board of Trustees of this College ought to have taken the CCCAA position paper seriously and argued its points and conclusions; to dismiss it out of hand as "uninformed" is insulting.

The "other side" is official policy in this society; it is presented daily in the newspapers and on television. President Reagan articulates the "other side" at every opportunity. It is ironic that the Board accuses the campus community of a one-sided discussion just weeks after a Presidential Commission concluded that "constructive engagement" in South Africa is a sham and that the US should move to isolate South Africa in the world economy.

Mr. Spencer in his statement about divestment to the College community on March 14, 1987 said that the Board believed that there might be financial costs of divestment which might undermine the financial integrity of the College. I urge the College community to show the Board that there are real costs resulting from their failure to divest. I call on the College community to DIVEST FROM CC. If money talks at Colorado College, and I believe that it does, perhaps the Board will hear the lost dollars where it failed to hear our arguments.

I have revoked my contribution to the Capital Campaign and I urge any faculty or staff who make a monthly contribution to do the same. A note to Vice President Chamberlain saying that your contribution is revoked until the College divests is all you need to let your money speak to the Board.

Seniors have already received their first solicitation in the form of a request that they donate their deposit to the senior gift. They can write on the pledge card "$100.00 on the day the College divests from South Africa, not a penny until then."

Students from all classes can write to alumns and friends of the College whom they know and ask them to withhold their contributions to the College until the College divests from South Africa. Students can talk with the alumni organizations and with prospective students in their home towns. Students and staff can refuse to participate in next year's dialogue; the organizations to which we belong can refuse to offer prizes for dialogue workers. Many local businesses can contribute to the College; we can talk with them about the issues and urge them to withhold their contributions until the College divests.

Sincerely,
Margaret Duncombe

"We Won't Rest Till You Divest"

To the Editors, the students, the faculty, and especially to the Board of Trustees:

I would like to write about one of the strangest, most emotional weekends I've had in four years at Colorado College. It began last Friday afternoon at the Leeches' divestment dance. I've never seen such energy and such happiness on this campus. People were dancing, singing, playing disc, soccer and hack. They were having a good time. But they were there for a reason; a simple yet extremely powerful reason: caring.

These people care about the future. They are concerned about the livelihood of people thousands of miles away, people who are being oppressed by the racist regime of South Africa.

Earlier that day they had heard important messages about our world: we must be concerned, we must act, we must give to others and help others. I think and I hope that everyone there on Friday came away with a good feeling about CC and how we, as students of this institution, must be concerned about its actions.

It scares and depresses me that humans can act so terribly towards one another. We are all one people on one planet and we must learn to care for others and treat them as equals. I find it disgusting and despicable enough that we mistreat and harm our fellow beings of mother earth, but how can we also mistreat and harm our own species.

Later that night at a bonfire on Armstrong quad there was a different feeling. These people were solemn and reflective, both about themselves and about South Africa. How can I act? How should the college act? How can CC help black South Africans?

The next day at a rally for divestment I again had the feeling of love and caring. Students were out showing concern for others. These people were trying to live up to the College's 'ideals' of caring for a just world and acting responsibly.

At about 12:15 this mood was shattered. William Spencer, the Board of Trustee's chairperson, announced that the College would continue to invest in the oppressive, racist dictatorship of South Africa. I find it hard to believe that the Board could act in such an irresponsible, callous manner. Don't they read the newspapers or watch the news? Everyone from Archbishop Tutu to the Colorado College faculty has stated that divestment is the most effective means to ending the atrocities of Apartheid.

Mr. Spencer then continued by saying that the issue has been too one sided on campus and that the Board would provide funds in the future for debate about divestment. This is both ironic and narrow minded. There is a reason why the debate is so one sided: the students and faculty of this college are well educated. They read newspapers. They watch the news on television. The 60-8 faculty vote, the recent Catalyst poll, and the 11-1 CCCA vote stand as evidence that the campus believes divestment will aid in the abolishment of apartheid.

Pro-investors have had ample opportunity to speak out, and yet they do not speak. The divestment debate on campus is one sided for a reason, Mr. Spencer. There is little or no opposition.

I furthermore find the Board's decision insulting. The Board of Trustees is not a separate entity of the College, it is part of the College and must take the campus' opinions into account. We, the students and faculty of CC, are not children, and therefore must not be treated as such. We have resoundingly stated that we want the college to divest. Please respect what we have to say and reconsider your opposition to the College's full divestment from South Africa.

After Mr. Spenser's remarks a large group of people walked over to President Riley's house, where the Board was eating lunch. Our mouths were taped shut, in response to the Board's deaf ears. I had such a strange feeling walking up the street and then sitting on the Riley's doorstep. Why were we here and what steps should we take in the future?

We were here because we were and are concerned about South Africa and the College's role in the situation. Even though the Board acted irresponsibly we will not act in such a manner. We must continue to further educate the students, the faculty, and especially the Board of Trustees. We must continue to fight for freedom.

I urge everyone on this campus to write the Board of Trustees and to write Gresham Riley. Let them know that you are upset and ashamed about their decision. WE WON'T REST TILL YOU DIVEST!

I can only hope that the feeling of goodwill, love, and caring I felt on Friday can continue and can grow. We must stay active and concerned. We are the hope of the future in this crazy world. The Board of Trustees is living in the past. We must point them in the right direction, towards the direction of the future, the direction of divestment.

Sincerely,
David B. Williams

Alumni Support and Divestment

Dear Editor,

As a CC alumni I must state my displeasure with the Board of Trustees on their continued policy of investing in South Africa, and their failure to adequately respond to widespread objections of that practice.

I recently became aware of the on-campus resistance to this policy, and was heartened to see the support for divestiture (which is universal in the world community with the exception of the U.S. and Britain, and is being embraced by a large and increasing number of colleges and universities) coming from a growing, and apparently majority student voice. In addition the overwhelming faculty mandate (60 to 8), the CCCA vote (10 to 1), and many diverse student organizations, all coming out strongly for divestment, lead me to believe that the Board would act in their proper capacity of responsibly representing CC's students and faculty (for whom the school exists).

That the Board refused to acknowledge this obligation in its decision of Saturday, March 14, was a revealing condemnation of the integrity of CC as a viable liberal arts college and democratic institution, and therefore no longer worthy of alumni support.

For that reason I will continue to withhold my support, both financial and personal, and encourage my fellow alumni to do the same, until the Board of Trustees acts on their obligation to respond to, and ultimately represent, the Colorado College community.

Sincerely,
Stephen J. Wood

"Hooray for the Board"

To the Editor:

We are writing to the Catalyst to voice our support of the Board of Trustees decision not to divest from corporations doing business in South Africa. We realize that this may lead to charges that we are racists and bigots, but that is simply not so. What is going on in South Africa is unjust. There is no place for apartheid in the 20th Century. But, we feel that divestment is simply not the right thing to do.

Most students who have protested CC's investments in corporations doing business in South Africa probably don't realize that divestment could lead to an immediate increase in tuition. The fact is that a lot of us are here because of CC's large endowment, which allows CC to remain a cheaper school to attend than a lot of comparable schools. On top of that, CC's large endowment allows the school to give millions to its students in the form of grants and scholarships. We would like to know which students would be willing to forego their financial aid if CC divested? Are there any volunteers?

We believe that life for blacks in South Africa is dismal and must be improved. But, CC's divestment would have no effect. Let's assume that 10% of CC's investment portfolio is with corporations doing business in South Africa (that is probably a conservative figure). That's about $8 million in stocks. If CC were to sell those stocks, they would surely be bought up very quickly, and possibly by domestic companies or foreign nations not concerned with the injustices of racism. With the current bull market, those corporations would not be affected in the least. It would only hurt CC and its students. It would not affect South Africa.

We respect that CC students are politically active, and willing to rally behind a cause. As college students, it is important for us to become politically conscious members of American Society. But, it is also important for us to realize that CC's divestment would have no positive effect on life in South Africa. However, life at CC could be adversely affected very quickly. Is the entire student body ready to sacrifice? We think not, and thank the Board of Trustees for realizing this.

David K. Katy
Eugene V. Tonski
Michael R. Ruppenthal
Rob Bogue
Philip B. Davis

A liberal arts education is the reason for why we attend CC, little do our parents know they're sending us to a hypocrisy.

Freedom, equality and justice for all,
those are CC's values it would seem,
then why are our 12,000 dollars a year supporting an oppressive regime?

Divestment, South Africa, the Sullivan Principles, sick of hearing about everything?
Well now it's time to sit back and think,
Just what does it all mean?

Divestment aside, though it's a good cause,
the issue goes beyond just that,
the question we have before us right now is about power and where it's at.

We have no say in where our money goes though it's us who are paying the fees, the power is held by the elite few known as the board of trustees.

With all of the student and faculty support you'd think we would have a say, the faculty voted 60 to 8
and we had the support of the CCCA.

With speakers and movies we educated many,
we built shanties and held rallies too,
the petitions, letters and statements should show
the importance we place on the issue.

Two years of hard work just to get our voice heard yet our voices had not mattered at all,
it came down to two hours in a meeting of the board.
we felt like we'd talked to a wall.

So enough of these games of hypocrisy nestled at the foot of Pikes Peak,
Colorado College, you better watch out,
it's time for the students to speak!

Laurie Stone

Voice Your Opinions To The Board

Dear CC Community,

This letter is prompted by the events that occured during the last week surrounding the Divestment issue.

On Friday, March 13th a teach-in on South Africa was held in Shove Chapel. Later that afternoon a rally at the shanties, music by the Leeches, and a sleep-over outside of Armstrong all contributed to raising the consciousness of hundreds of members of The CC Community.

Saturday afternoon found faculty and students seated outside of President Riley's home. They gathered in silent vigil, responding to the earlier decision of The Board of Trustees to maintain and possibly to increase, our investments in companies that do business, and thus contribute to oppression, in South Africa.

Despite The Board's awareness of the 60 to 8 faculty vote in support of divestment, CCCA's endorsement by a vote of 11 to 1, and 20 written calls for divestment from student organizations, the Trustees chose to deny the expressed feelings of this large group of concerned faculty and students.

In our continuing effort to be heard, we call upon you to release your anger and frustration about the unanimous decision to remain invested in South Africa, by writing to the Board of Trustees. If you feel as though you don't understand Aparthied and the divestment issue well enough to speak out, watch for Colorado College Community Against Aparthied (CCCAA) announcements. You can begin by attending tonight's Open Forum People's Poetry Party at 7:00 pm in Gates Common Room.

If you do feel strongly, we urge you to write to Gresham Riley and the Board of Trustees, whose addresses are listed below.

This is your college, you should have a right to voice your opinion on its policies.

Board of Trustees Members

Mr. William I. Spencer, President, 12 Beekman Place, New York, NY 10022.

Mr. William J. Hybl, 10 Lake Circle, Colorado Springs, CO.

Mr. Robert Donner, Jr., 6 Plainview Road, Colorado Springs, CO.

Mr. Russell T. Tutt, 100 Marland Road, Colorado Springs, CO 80906.

Mr. Kent O. Olin, 2725 Fox Grove Ct., Englewood, CO.

President

Gresham Riley, President's Office, Colorado College.

Speak Out.
Lisa Berman
Michelle Chalmers
Kim Harrell

"People and Planets"

To the Editor

A little refection upon the thoughtful article on Ecodefence last week. Dandelions in gunbarrels will not stop deforestation. Yet the point is valid. If Martin Luther King had given in to pressures from radicals the Civil Rights Movement could have been a much bloody and tragic affair. Militant tactics often endanger lives, and always escalate "us and them" syndromes. The problem lies in the difference between people and planets. All people feel a certain responsibility towards other humans. This may only extend to their family and community, or it may stretch across continents. Oppressed people are willing to fight and die to stop the torture and repression of their kind. Yet how many will do this for our planet? Tropical rain forests are being destroyed at the rate of an area of the size of Austria every year. These delicate systems are millions of years old and cannot be replaced. The burning of these carbon dioxide rich systems is raising the global temperature, among countless other global hazards. How long before we live in a wasteland? What kind of a world, if any, will our children inherit? Monkeywrenching should be a last ditch and unglamorous action (this is the same viewpoint given in ECODEFENCE). But until you can come up with a stronger method of preserving our ecosystem; it should not be ruled out. Survival is the highest priority of any species. Our species cannot survive without our planet.

Tulio Browning

"Thoughts of a Disappointed Activist"

To the Editor

I sit here trying to think of what went wrong. The Board of Trustees has just announced their decision in deciding to continue their policy of "constructive engagement" with companies that do business with South Africa. After their announcement, they go to Gresham Riley's beautiful white house and eat expensive food and drink expensive wine. And tonight they fly home to wherever home may be, to yet more beautiful houses. I find it hard to believe that they will be able to sleep well tonight or for many more nights knowing about the thousands of nonwhite people they have just decided to continue killing. We who are concerned about the issues of South Africa have worked for many months. We have discussed the issue, researched the issue, spoken about the issue and written extensive papers on the issue. All of our work has enabled us to educate ourselves about South Africa and its present situation and we have thus decided that we support divestment. It is obvious to me that we have considered both sides of the many arguments for and against divestment and have come to a rational and educated decision. And there are many others around the world who have reached the same conclusion including the indigenous people of South Africa. These people, who have had to beg and fight for simple human rights have asked us to disinvest for over twenty years. It amazes me that people are still wondering whether or not divestment is the correct way to handle the problem. We are not hippie-radicals fighting for the hell of it; we are simply caring people. And what we ask for is overwhelmingly simple; we ask for the arrest of the killing of thousands upon thousands of innocent lives. A white regime government is South Africa is responsible for the death of thousands of nonwhites simply because of the color of their skin. And today we have discovered that Colorado College, i.e. the Board of Trustees, is indirectly responsible for the death of those people as well. We have opened our hearts and bled as our South African brothers and sisters literally bleed from beatings, torture and gun shot wounds.

I try to better understand why such a small handful of whites want so much power and can so willingly kill people because of their color in order to hold on to that power. But I do not think I will ever understand. I can not understand the white regime government in South Africa and the bloodshed for which they are responsible; nor can I understand why the Board of Trustees think that they know what's best for the suffering South African people. The Board has decided that they know that "constructive engagement" will be much more beneficial for the blacks in South Africa than divestment despite the fact that those blacks want us to divest. Yet the Board has admitted that the possibility that they may lose money if they divest has been one of the key deciding factors in their decision not to divest. Obviously morality does not effect their decisions just as money does effect their decisions.

We struggle to understand as we struggle in our fight for and with the nonwhite South Africans. I now understand much about the situation in South Africa through extensive research and other means of education and through other means of education I now understand that the "democracy" of Colorado College is a farce. But we will not give up. We will continue to fight for the rights of the nonwhite people of South Africa and will continue to listen to the indigenous people. I am deeply ashamed of the decision that Colorado College has made since that decision is supposed to represent what I believe. But we, at the Colorado College Community Against Apartheid, will persevere in our efforts to make the Board realize what the majority of the faculty and students want - divestment. We won't rest till they divest.

Priscilla Pettit
Member of the Colorado College Community Against Apartheid (CCCAA).

★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★

We appreciate statements of opinion and response in the Opinions Section. If you have an idea for an article, please contact the Editors at x675, or call Opinions Editor Munir Meghjee (x338), Editor Alec Rekow (634-8345) or Michael Fraterelli (578-5125).

★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★

OPINIONS

Eight blocks instead of nine, I think that's great, who could ask for more?
So what if that extra thousand dollars a year is going right out the door?

You say that our education's at stake?
Well, that doesn't bother me, think of the longer vacations we'll get,
just more time for us to ski.

With requirements to graduate and for my major too
You say I'll have no freedom to choose other classes that interest me and that my liberal arts experience I'll lose.

32 out of 32 credits to graudate, you ask, "how will we manage?"
Well, think of it this way when you have to miss a block,
it makes life more of a challenge.

You say that we're losing our flexibility by switching to the eight block plan, but think of our longer summer vacation,
how much more time we have to work on our tan.

Of course we shouldn't ask the students how they feel though it's their education and money,
the students should have some say, you argue,
What, . . . are you trying to be funny?

That extra block we have each year has always been a bother to me,
I mean who needs to deal with learning more,
when we're at a school as prestigous as CC?

Laurie Stone

Self-Righteous Environmentalism

To the Editor:

Wow, I never thought of myself as a self-righteous environmental asshole, but then again, just because I walk up-right, have a brain (probably our species' downfall), and supposedly think rationally, I do not think I'm any better off or superior to the Ursus horribilis who mangles and mutilates some poor Winnebago camper in Yellowstone or Glacier National park. All I can say is more power to the Griz... geez, I guess I am a self-righteous asshole after all, but on whose terms, Mr. Griz's or Mr. Ori's? But then, who ever decided that we as humans could rape, pillage, and plunder our environment? Do we ever stop and think how the Griz, or for that matter any other species, feels about having us invade their homes? I seriously doubt it.

The time has come for a radical departure from our traditional attitudes, and the so-called eco-defenders are filling a necessary vacuum between the "earth-rapers" and the Sierra Club types who espouse a political reform response to environmental issues. We cannot continue to look at environmental issues from our traditional anthropocentric viewpoint, but instead we must begin to form a more biocentric perspective, the basic premise of which holds that all organisms and beings, as part of the interrelated whole (the Earth), are all equal in intrinsic worth. What the ecodefenders like the "Icelandic duo" do is force us to rethink our preconceived attitudes towards the earth and all her inhabitants, which is a far cry from self-righteous gobbledygook. I might add that Iceland probably will not prosecute the pair, because any indictment would draw attention to their illegal whaling practices! So where's the self-contradiction now, Mr. Ori?

Self-righteousness is assuming that humankind as a species knows what is best. We have the knowledge, but we must temper our haste. And to Tom Ori, pick up an edition of Ecodefense, or better yet, Deep Ecology, and then decide who espouses the "archaic, Middle Ages mentality." Happy Monkey-wrenching!

Tom Penzel

Kappa Sigma's Apology

To the Editors:

At the last DU vs. CC hockey game held at the Broadmoor World Arena, Kappa Sigma actives and pledges participated in the traditional "House Strip." We apologize to any member of the larger Colorado College community who found our actions offensive. We realize that this year's activity was in bad taste.

As always, the activity was intended to rally Tiger fans behind our team. The Kappa Sigma Fraternity will continue to support CC hockey, and will find more positive means of accomplishing that end.

The Kappa Sigma Fraternity

EcoDefense Clarification

To the Editor:

I would like to clarify a couple of statements made last week in the Catalyst, in the article "Ecodefense Commandos."

One of the main goals of our RA staff in Mathias is to promote the liberal arts and alternative ways of thinking, through programs and the corkboard downstairs. We do not necessarily "feel compelled to notify students of the latest goings on;" we only hope to promote a little mental activity outside the classroom.

I would also like to explain why I "censored" the corkboard. I spent three hours the Saturday of fifth block break on the board, only to return thirty minutes later to find Mr. Ori's comment on bombing abortion clinics. Actually, I had to laugh—it was a creative and provocative statement, and I initially thought I would leave it on the board. I soon realized, however, that grafitti always spawns more grafitti, and I decided to cross out the remark in hopes that the information presented in the articles and pictures would last the entire block, unmolested.

Craig Heacock

The Voiceless Majority

To the Editor

"I'm sorry, I have to be going" the Board of Trustees Chairman Bill Spencer muttered as he squirmed away from the angry students protesting the Board's decision on divestment last Saturday. He got up from his chair on President Riley's lawn and pretended to be engaged in "dialogue" as he B-Lined for the front door. He had been sitting quietly on a chair above the protesters, watching, pretending, waiting as we sat with tape on our mouths to symbolize the voicelessness the campus has experienced on this issue. After a while, someone asked a question aside to Mr. Spencer and then asked him to share his response with the crowd. When another student then asked a follow-up question, he left.

This is why students are sitting in front of the President's office right now with tape over their mouths and a sign on the wall stating "From Capetown to Colorado College...Voiceless Majority." The divestment issue has raised more campus awareness, concern and input into the Board's decision making process than any other issue in the recent history of the College. And yet they still didn't listen.

"With regard to the major policy issues as well as those decisions regarding personnel and the budget it is the Board's responsibility to be accountable to the College. They can best fulfill that responsibility by conducting their business privately." (My italics)

That is not to say that the Board does not rely heavily on the input of the faculty, students and others in their decision making process."—President Riley (Disparaging Eye, March 21, 1986)

Twenty-one student organizations, 1300 signatures, a Committee on Shareholder Responsibility recommendation, an 11-1 CCCA vote, a 60-8 faculty vote and two Catalyst polls all indicated the campus' desire for divestment. A thorough position paper which cited the overwhelming arguments for divestment was shared with the Board members and many people feel that it was ignored.

Mr. Spencer was interviewed by a Gazette journalist on Gresham's quiet lawn that afternoon and his responses suggested that he had not even read the position paper. Students and faculty that have met with the Board concerning the divestment issue have reported little response and a lot of window gazing.

"Maturation occurs as a result of being able to participate in decision making activities" —President Riley.

The Colorado College By-Laws state that the College shall be "managed, controlled and governed by the Board of Trustees." Although the Administration has made encouraging overtures concerning student input into the school's policies, this decision especially and several others as well have revealed the reality behind the lip-service.

There is a growing understanding on campus that the Board doesn't give a damn about what students and faculty think. Yet we have to live with their decisions everyday while they come on campus only four times each year. In addition, we have no say in and are left completely unaware about the nominating and selection process of Board members. They are a completely autonomous and incestuous group that have to answer to no one but themselves.

There is a feeling amongst those of us that have been involved with this issue and worked with the Board that their decision was made out of a paternalistic, reactionary response to what they viewed as the campus "telling" them what to do. They were annoyed that a bunch of students and faculty would have the gall to presume that they might be mature and intelligent enough to participate in a "real world" executive type decision. But we are being harshly reminded that CC is part of the real world, and as we have learned in class, the real world is full of wealthy minorities with all the power and little need to listen to the concerns of the people. That's the lesson we have learned this day, children: Shut up...'cause no one is going to listen.

But we are in the process of teaching ourselves something in this movement. It's something many of us experienced on Gresham's lawn last Saturday, or the silent vigil in front of the President's office, or at the energetic meeting last Monday of 120 students and faculty to decide how to respond to the Board's decision. It's something having to do with people power and organization and the struggle for justice. And it's something greater than anything the Board can attempt to squelch with a committee and a two page statement.

Matt Case

The Eight Block Proposal

A Resolution from the Ad Hoc Committee

1. The Committee recommends that the Board approve the Eight Block proposal as the best way to address the proven needs of the academic program. The revisions would be initiated in the fall semester of the 1988-89 academic year.

2. The Board recognizes that the faculty is engaged in detailed implementation planning which may require minor modifications of certain provisions of the proposal, e.g. concerning the amount of credit awarded for semester and year-long courses, limits on credits for majors, and limits on credits students may take outside of block courses, and flexibility of the program for students and faculty.

3. The Board recognizes the concerns of students, parents, and alumni, and requests that the faculty review and refine the final version of the plan after the completion of their analysis of the course schedule and present a summary of the final version to the Board along with a progress report on planning for implementation.

4. The Ad Hoc Committee on the Eight Block proposal is hereby disbanded. □

The Board's Position

On Divestment

The Colorado College Board of Trustees appreciates the interest in and concern about South Africa and Apartheid as expressed by the College's faculty and students.

The Board shares this interest and concern, because its consistent, public position has been, and continues to be, opposition to the South African government's policy of Apartheid.

The position paper presented by the Colorado College Community Against Apartheid, the votes of the faculty and the CCCA, and the position taken by the College's Shareholders Responsibility Committee have been carefully read and noted both by the Trustee Investment Committee and by the entire Board of Trustees.

After due consideration and discussion, the Board has voted to reaffirm its long-standing policy of investing in American companies who conduct business in South Africa and who subscribe to the Sullivan Principles.

Reasons for this decision are:

-The belief that opposition to Apartheid is consistent with continued invetment in American companies doing business in South Africa.

-Recognition of the fact that there are both moderate black and white South African opponents of Apartheid who are also opponents of divestment and the retreat of American companies from their country.

-The belief that divestment may not contribute to the dismantling of Apartheid and the fear that it may

THE DISPARAGING EYE

A Journal of General Interest

VOLUME 3 NUMBER 2 MARCH 20, 1987

Costa Rica's Fading Dream

BY JOE HRBEK

Life in Costa Rica is delightfully unique to its Central American counterparts. Policy is achieved through peaceful and democratic means. Defeated officers step down from their positions willingly. Costa Rican citizens have a say in the affairs of their government. These qualities are rare in the Central American region; in fact, almost unheard of. Elsewhere, in the isthmus, corruption, oppression, and depression are the accepted norms.

But can Costa Rica's Cinderella story last? Recent situations have cast doubt on hopes for the nation's future. The country's economy is spiraling downward at an uncontrollable rate. Conflict and depression in neighboring countries are taking their toll in Costa Rica. Its citizens are becoming restless. Unless measures are taken to remedy these circumstances, and maybe even if measures are taken, the Central Americanization of Costa Rica is a noteworthy possibility.

The purpose of this paper is to discuss Costa Rica's future. In doing this, four areas of interest which are proving to be vital to the country's hopes will be presented. Then, possible escape routes and solutions to the problems will be offered.

The first area of vital importance to Costa Rica's situation is its economy. As I mentioned earlier, it has taken a drastic turn for the worse. The nation's foreign debt stands at between $4.5 and $6 billion dollars, large enough to rank it the second largest per capita debt in the world, behind only Israel's. This debt has contributed to an inflation rate of 16%, while, at the same time, salary increases average only 4% among the workers there.

Relief is not in sight. Depression amongst Costa Rica's neighbors in the region is causing droves of refugees to flow inside Costa Rican borders. By 1985, 16,000 refugees were legally admitted. Government officials estimate, however, that around 40,000 entered the country unofficially from the three years before and up to 1985. This means that not only must the government provide for its own citizens, (which it obviously is having a hard time doing) but it must also provide for other nations, too.

Moreover, paying interest on its foreign debt has become a tremendous, if not impossible, task for the small nation. The government has been forced to seek aid in grants and loans, and has found some success. But, in all likelihood, it cannot expect to receive enough aid to pay off its interest which will be in excess of $250 million this year alone.

Continuance of this trend would be lethal to the harmony between workers and employers in Costa Rica, and must be watched closely. Governmental officials must fear worker uprisings. Some insiders feel the government has only a couple of years to set the economic house in order before social unrest becomes a reality. Others say the unrest has already begun. "September and October (of 1986) brought a wave of demonstrations..."

The second area which Costa Rica's future prosperity could hinge on is its position of neutrality. Continuance or reversal of such policy would have tremendous implications concerning relations with foreign nations domestic prosperity.

Costa Rica has adhered to this position to the point that it has not yet adopted an army to protect itself. This has been both beneficial and detrimental to the causes of the government.

First, neutrality has benefitted Costa Rica in the way that its insistence on not adopting an army has helped keep it out of major conflict in a region constantly plagued by violence. Costa Rica, on top of all its other problems, certainly could not afford war with another nation.

Yet, on the other hand, neutrality has proven to be detrimental in the sense that, since it cannot choose one side in a conflict, both sides are prone to come down hard on the small and unprotected nation. Take, for example, the war in Nicaragua, Costa Rica's neighbor to the north. Costa Ricans have great fear of the Sandinista government's tremendous military buildup and aggressive policies. Yet, at the same time, the opposition to the Sandinistas, the Contras, are housing themselves in Costa Rican territory, and thus, are bringing the war into its territory.

See Costa Rica, page 6

Person of the Month:
John Tower

BY DAVE MAKARECHIAN

Editor 's Note: In each issue The Disparaging Eye focuses on an influential newsmaker in the Person of the Month column. The Person of the Month need not by famous—big name or little, good guy or gal—if he has had an influence on recent current events, we will write about him. The Disparaging Eye welcomes your input for the Person of the Month. Please submit nominees to the Eye's editorial staff.

On Thursday, February 27, 1987 a special commission headed by former Senator John Tower of Texas released its findings on the Reagan Administration 's illegal sale of arms to Iran. The scandal is, perhaps, among the most significant aspects of the Reagan administration. That is not to say that the administration hasn 't done anything noteworthy. Reagan has achieved an arms build-up, a new direction in foreign policy, and has dismantled many of the impediments to a free economy—and all of these things are significant.

But the administration has fallen far short. Since Watergate, Ford, and the Carter debacle, and now, with the Iran crisis and the official findings of the Tower commission, the nation still distrusts the Presidency.

Most agree that in the early years Ronald Reagan had an important impact on most Americans. A nation tired of lies, tired of incompetence, and tired of disappointments finally had a figure to look to for principles, honesty, and values that built this country into a world power.

But as the facts of the Iran controversy started to surface, and perhaps more important, as the rumors started to shatter mainstream America 's image of the Reagan Dynasty, the nation needed a gentle let-down. The nation needed to know the truth, and a rational, thoughtful analysis of foreign policy machinery and the Reagan Presidency. In 1987, a tired, wary nation needed a voice of reason, not a passionate indictment from a Woodward and Bernstien style crucifixion.

John Tower 's Commission filled the bill perfectly, and for that reason, John Tower is the Person of the Month.

Chief among Tower 's accomplishments is the gentle, reasonable de-mystification of the once-lofty Reagan administration. Upon the appointment of the Tower commission, many doubted its potency. John Tower, Edmund Muskie, and Brent Scowcroft carry weight in Washington, but in the face of a now Conservatized DC, and a nation in staunch support of its favorite grandfather Ronald Reagan, one would have to question their influence.

But the Commission answered critics by flatly blowing the whistle on Reagan. In no uncertain terms, the Commission pointed out that despite previous denials about courting moderate Iranians, the Administration actively sought an arms-for-hostage swap. Although we were all mislead by the Administration 's hardline proclamations, the United States did—and for all we know still does—negotiate with international terrorists. Moreover, the Administration 's previous public characterization of Iran as the "international version of Murder Incorporated," and Washington 's pleas for allies to stop selling arms to Iran or Iraq, have similarly turned out to be a farce.

The Tower Commission 's second largest accomplishment is its affirmation of faith in the National Security Council structure. During the crisis critics from all sides have questioned whether or not its architects could have foreseen problems with the council upon its creation in 1947. The Commission 's foreign policy experts—among the three most experienced in the United States—have given the NSC a large enough vote of confidence for it to maintain a viable part of the nation 's foreign policy apparatus.

But Tower 's commission didn 't stop there. They also provided policy makers—and the nation—with guidelines for future NSC and foreign policy dealings. The Commission advised against Senate confirmation of the NSC Chief. Tower pointed out that the Constitution ascribes supreme foreign policy decisions to the executive branch, and that congress should not interfere with this process. Second, the Commission reiterated the importance of the NSC Chief of actively managing the foreign policy machinery (unlike Robert MacFarland or John Poindexter) to prevent the Ollie North 's of the world from playing too large a role. Third, the Commission advised the NSC to stress judgments of justice in its decisions. Included in its recommendations was the appointment of a legal adviser. The Commission 's other recommendations included limiting covert action and the involvement of private citizens, and leaving intelligence judgments to the CIA.

The Tower Commission also promises to have a significant impact on Presidential management style. In the last two administrations the nation may have witnessed presidential styles in juxtaposition. Jimmy Carter considered too many details—he assumed the job of a mid-level manager as well as a chief executive. He scheduled play on the White House tennis court and also formulated policy on matters of national importance. But Ronald Reagan played the role of Chairman of the Board to the exclusion of anything else. With that kind of management style, Donald Regan-types became power brokers, junior staff made policy. Tower portrayed the Reagan administration as being out of control and on the rocks.

Perhaps the most important aspect of the Tower Commission is its role as confidence builder and restorer. The Commission 's credibility at once suggests a thorough going over of the scandal and the Administration. The nation can be confident that no stone was left un-turned: a popular administration that out stepped its bounds is back on earth, and hopefully moving in the right direction.

Photo Courtesy of U.S. News and World Report

STAFF

Brian Smith & Norm Leahy ..... Editors-In-Chief

Juan Calderon, Bill Porter ..... Art Editors

Dave Makarechian, Karl Ossentjuk & Steve Geraghty ..... Associate Editors

Dave Fitzgerald ..... Layout Editor

Karen Willoughby .... Copy Editor (Welcome to the Staff, Karen)

Contributors: Werner G. Heim, Greg Archer, Suzie Klein, John Bump, Joe Hrbek, Matt Case, Pat Chisholm, and Matt Sanidas.

Typesetter: Linda Shireman

Thanks for your help Jennifer!

The opinions expressed herein do not necessarily reflect those of the Disparaging Eye staff. The Disparaging Eye reserves the right to edit letters to the editor and guest commentaries.

Don't Get Left Behind
Catch the next issue of The Eye

The Ed's Box...

Alright, we admit, we fell for it...we voted for President Reagan in 1984, and since then, the returns on our votes have been less than stunning. How so? Where do we start?

Growing deficits. The rate of increase in the amount of federal red ink is greater now, in nominal dollars, than at any time in history. For a president who ran on a platform that called for less government and balanced budgets, this is not only out of character, it has turned out to be a failed promise. And a potentially deadly one for our future economic health.

"Iranscam" proves once again that this country suffers from a lack of leadership. Those of us who voted for Reagan didn't necessarily agree with him on every issue or even on most issues. But Reagan did appeal to us because he projected a vision. Here was a president who would set an agenda, and see to it that his agenda would go through Congress and become implemented. More importantly, Reagan projected leadership through his personality. Granted, he wasn't the most articulate or intelligent person in the world, but he convinced us to believe in ourselves. He showed us that America possesses virtue after all.

The emphasis on a moral agenda. Though we can appreciate the fact that a president has the right to pursue what he thinks to be the needs of the nation, there are limits. The continual, undying drive to establish a uniform code of morality on an inherently independent nation is wrong. It is also dangerous. Ron has set upon us the mad-dog moralists who will not stop until they have made the nation in their own image. They would not have had this opportunity without the president's tacit approval. All we can say of this is: What have we done?

The voters elected a president whose lack of attention to detail has made him look like an unsure, tired old man. We knew of Reagan's lack of knowledge and uncertainty when his limited mental capacity confronted a challenge. Remember his occasional press conferences? Remember some of his outlandish statements? Remember Reagan's "senility test" after his bumbling first debate with Walter Mondale? These examples showed us that maybe...just maybe, the Office of the President was over Ron's head. But most people refused to sit up and take notice. After all, it was "morning in America," and we the electorate (like the president at cabinet meetings), just happened to sleep in.

Which brings us to some final thoughts...Will anything substantive get accomplished in Washington during the next two years? Earlier we mentioned how America cried out for leadership and Ronald Reagan arrived, promising lower taxes, a stronger defense and a balanced budget all in one. Well President Reagan's magic formula didn't work. Now America has lower taxes—and record budget and trade deficits. Defense spending has increased, but is our defense any stronger? On that note, does the administration even have a coherent defense policy? (America obviously does not have a coherent foreign policy.)

Just at the time when these serious issues need addressing, Iranscam has assured us that these issues probably will not be addressed. Furthermore, Iranscam has opened our eyes and made us wonder if perhaps the leadership ever existed. Maybe America can somehow "float" through the next two years, avoiding a major economic catastrophe and possibly even making some small accomplishments.

If our economy survives the next two years and the public's renewed cynicism doesn't overwhelm our political process, perhaps a real leader will emerge as president. At this point we can only hope.

Brian M. Smith

Norm Leahy

Brian Smith
Norm Leahy

Private Schools Under Fire

BY KARL OSSENTJUK

Regulation threatens to endanger one of the last self-governing institutions in existence today. A movement has arisen in Colorado to require first-through-12th-grade private schools to be accredited in the manner that public schools are. Under the present law, private schools do not have to be accredited, and teachers do not have to be state-certified. The legislature debated four years ago whether to initiate some control over private schools and came to the conclusion that the system should be left unhampered. The issue is once again confronting the legislature due to a claim filed in February against Back to Basics Educational Systems Inc., a group of private schools owned by Roy Stock of Denver.

The lawsuit was brought by parents of five students who attended a Back to Basics school in Denver, and who assert that the school is guilty of academic neglect. The lawsuit, one of the first against a private school in Colorado, rests on the claim that Stock made promises about academic instruction that he failed to keep, swore at students and promoted uneducational, demeaning activities for the students. The children reported to their parents incidents of verbal abuse, lack of instruction and orders to sell game cards and lottery tickets at a bingo hall to pay off scholarships they received to attend Back to Basics, despite the fact that the students are not of age to do so.

Colorado state law severely limits regulation of private schools, and the schools rely instead on an unwritten system of checks and balances. According to a survey on private schools by the Education Commission of the States, Colorado's minimal regulation of private schools is similar to other states. A state bill adopted in 1983 applied limited regulation to private schools. The law requires all private schools to offer a "basic education," which must include reading, writing, mathematics and history. According to Patricia Lines, a policy analyst for the U.S. undersecretary of education, "Colorado is the most lenient state" with only eight of an estimated 800 first-through-12th grade private schools in Colorado accredited.

The accrediting process consists of state officials reviewing such aspects as schooling and expertise of teachers, the ratio of teachers-to-students, number of counselors on the staff and the types of subjects taught. A certain amount of private school regulation does exist in Colorado. Private schools under present Colorado state statutes must be in session 172 days a year (the same as public schools), and are required to register their students with the nearest public school district.

No public movement has arisen to push for changes in state law, and it appears that private schools will continue to be just that—private. Arthur Ellis, director of the Colorado's Accreditation Office, stated: "public pressure really isn't there; maybe it should be, because we all have something to lose if students are coming through the system uneducated."

Regulation through Colorado state law is not the solution, though. Direction and jurisdiction must be based in the individual school, or "private" loses its strongest distinction from "public." Competition among private schools for students promotes efficiency and a high level of competency, without depending on and being determined by state law. Parents interested in enrolling their child in private schools simply need to be cautious and research the schools individually. A school with a long history of academic excellence is most likely doing a good job, and has eliminated the corruption that often enters unrestrained institutions. Given minimal regulation, competition will continue to yield an effective private school system because the expense involved in attending these schools subjects the system to intense scrutiny. If dissatisfied parents succeed in initiating increased regulation, though, the system will lose its inbred competitiveness and be subjected to the incompetence that is presently plaguing the public school system in America. Private schools have proven themselves efficient without regulation and will continue to do so. They exist as an alternative to the public school system that arose later and must not be governed under public regulation.

News... And Sports

BY STEVE GERAGHTY

Detroit autoworkers walk off their jobs, and that 's news. Professional football and baseball players go on strike. That 's sports.

A wealthy supporter of a US senator contributes $2 million to the senator 's presidential campaign, and that 's news. A wealthy friend of Dennis Conner donates $2 million to the "Stars and Stripes" to recapture America 's Cup. That 's sports.

A judge 's life is threatened outside of the courtroom because of the way he 's handling a particular case, and that 's news. An umpire 's poor call in a World Series brings thousands of death threats to him and his family. That 's sports.

A sniper fires random shots into a New York crowd, killing none, and that 's news. In 1972, terrorists kill twelve Israeli Olympians in a three day siege on Munich. That 's sports.

The faculty of The Colorado College votes for divestment of school holdings in South Africa, and that 's news. Jimmy Carter pulls the US out of the 1980 Moscow Olympics. That 's sports.

David Kennedy dies of a drug overdose, and that 's news. Len Bias dies of cocaine overdose. That 's sports.

The President 's wife enters a drug rehabilitation program, and that 's news. An all-star point guard checks into a drug rehabilitation center so that he can return to the court in a uniform. That 's sports.

AT&T is forced to breakup because of antitrust suits, and that 's news. The USFL wins three dollars from the NFL in its antitrust suit. That 's sports.

OPEC nations collude to double the price of oil, and that 's news. Major league baseball owners collude against free agency, and the players cry foul. That 's sports.

Insider trading scandals rock Wall Street, and that 's news. College basketball teams are convicted of fixing games. That 's sports.

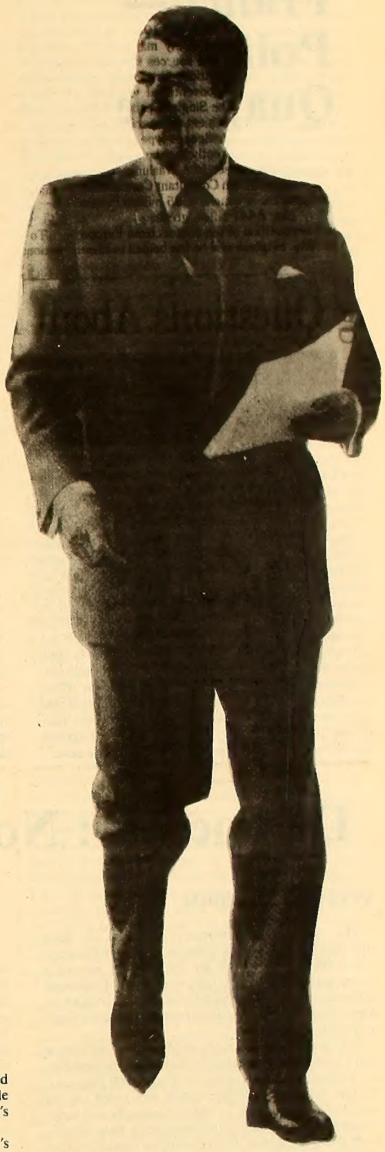
A retired plumber wins $4 million in the lottery after a lucky spin of the wheel, and that 's news. A longtime horse lover finally picks the quinella he 's been waiting for and wins $4 million. That 's sports.

The Better Business Bureau shuts down a shady business after investigations turn up serious misconduct charges, and that 's news. The NCAA shuts down the SMU football program for repeated serious recruiting violations. That 's sports.

Dick Lamm takes some heat for a "conflict of interest" when he writes a letter of recommendation for a casino license for his penny stock broker, and that 's news. The general manager of an NHL team signs a contract for the same duties with another team while still contracted to the first, and as a result is banned from the league for two years. That 's sports.

University of Colorado students are arrested for their involvement in a somewhat peaceful protest against CIA recruitment on their campus, and that 's news. Police are forced to step in when a riot erupts at an international soccer game during which many spectators are trampled to death. That 's sports.

You read the rest of this paper, and that 's news. Read this article and think about its examples. That 's sports.



Whenever Richard Cory went downtown,
We people on the pavement looked at him:
He was a gentleman from sole to crown,
Clean favored, and imperially slim.

And he was always quietly arrayed,
And he was always human when he talked;
But still he fluttered pulses when he said,
"Good-morning," and he glittered when he walked.

And he was rich—yes, richer than a king—
And admirably schooled in every grace:
In time, we thought that he was every thing to make us wish that we were in his place.

So on we worked, and waited for the light,
And went without the meat, and cursed the bread;
And Richard Cory, one calm summer night,
Went home and put a bullet through his head.

—E.A. ROBINSON, 1896

Franco—Political Quagmire

BY GREG ARCHER AND MATT SANIDAS

The political system of France is representative of the diverse ideologies of the population. It is in fact a product of the many external forces that have infiltrated the different political parties and their influences on the general population. Primarily we want to give an over-view of the current political system and the general characteristics inherent in each political party.

The political system of France has evolved through four constitutional eras and is presently in its fifth republic (Cinquieme Republique). This constitutional era was started on the first of July, 1958 by Charles De Gaulle as a result of increasing internal pressures to resolve the Algerian crisis of autonomy. Similarly, there was a need for the restructuralization of national goals. For example, problems such as the national budget, the decolonization of Indochina, Morocco and Tunisia and the smaller problems of incorporation into the European community needed to be addressed. Hence, the birth of the current political system that will be discussed.

Beginning from the extreme right of the political spectrum, there is the Front National (FN) which is led by LePen. Most critics characterize LePen and his political party as fascists. LePen has dispelled these myths by being very nationalistic in policy. This is to say that in being nationalistic, he is against the unrestricted immigration of foreigners into France. For example, in the past election he won a majority of votes in the south of France reflecting the unwanted and unrestricted entrance of Arabs from northern Africa through Spain. A logical assumption would be that the opinions of the FN are racist in nature. However, they are not because according to the FN these immigrants only abuse the social benefits provided by the state.

The next political party in the spectrum (still moving from right to left) is the "Rassemblement Pour La Republique" (RPR). This party formed December of 1976 by Jacques Chirac follows the political strategies of Charles De Gaulle. In terms of the American political system, this party is most comparable to the Republican party in its views and policies. It appeals to the upper middle class because of its basically conservative views. In the last election, they regained a majority in parliament along with the UDF.

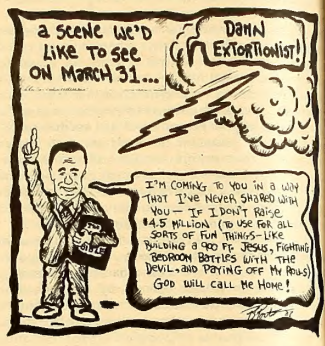
The UDF or "Union Pour La Democratie Francaises" was the reformation of three political groups. In 1978, the "parti radical," the "parti republicain" and "Le Centre des democrates-sociaux" regrouped to form the UDF. As of now this party is led by Giscard D 'Estaing. The UDF is most comparable to the Democratic party of the U.S. It is mostly geared toward the middle class or the bourgeoisie in that it represents the views of the common working class. In other words, this party can and does accept some of the socialistic policies that are proposed for the benefit of the common person as opposed to catering to the rich.

Continuing towards the left, we have the party "Socialiste" (PS) which is led by the current president of France, Francois Mitterand. The PS was formed in 1971 to replace a former socialist faction in French politics. This party in general tries to denounce the social and moral inequalities inherent in a capitalistic society. Therefore all social and political policies are molded toward benefiting the majority. In any case, from viewing the results from the past election, it is obvious that the voting population is shying away from the socialist party.

At this point, we arrive at the other extreme of the political spectrum. On this end we find the "parti communiste francais" (PCF) which was founded in 1920 as a result of a split between the socialist party at the congress of Tours. The current leader of the PCF is Georges Marchais. As the name of the party suggests, the PCF follows the guidelines laid down by Marx and his Communist Manifesto. The PCF tries to create policies that represent the needs of the proleteriat. Needless to say it is not very popular with the majority parties, RPR and UDF because of its anti-capitalistic policies on the subject of accumulation and profit.

The voting population of France is inconsistent at best. One does not find the loyalty to a political party that we of the United States find. In the parliamentary elections of last March, the right represented by Chirac and D 'Estaing and their respective parties regained the majority. This created a clever dichotomy of political views. On one side, one sees the right wing decisions of parliament and on the other side, there are the policies favored by a left wing president, Francois Mitterand. Therefore one would ask if anything substantial could ever be accomplished. Placed in a realm of political diversity, the policy makers are forced to make decisions representative of the varying political ideologies. If not, fundamental changes will occur in the political balance between left and right.

In view of the forthcoming election, it will be interesting to see if fundamental changes will occur. Obviously, from the parliamentary elections of last spring, the voting population is becoming more conservative. Perhaps this reflects a dissatisfaction with the ramifications of past socialistic policies. It would appear as if the PS did not fully succeed in attaining its national goals for bettering the welfare of the country. However, one must keep in mind that in view of the diverse political parties coupled with the interdependence of national policies, one party alone will find it difficult—if not impossible—to achieve all national goals.



A SCENE WE'D LIKE TO SEE ON MARCH 31...
DAMN EXTORTIONIST!
I'M COMING TO YOU IN A WAY THAT I'VE NEVER SHARED WITH YOU — IF I DON'T RAISE $4.5 MILLION (TO USE FOR ALL SORTS OF FUN THINGS—LIKE BUILDING A 900 FT. JESUS, FIGHTING BEDROOM BATTLES WITH THE DEVIL AND PAYING OFF MY MOLS) GOD WILL CALL ME HOME!

Democracy: Not a Universal Solution

BY PATRICK CHISHOLM

The notion that democracy can work in most countries is absurd. Try holding an election in Pakistan, where 80% of the people are too illiterate to read a voting ballot. Try explaining the concept of universal suffrage to a typical Honduran who is too worried about where his next meal is coming from than to even begin to consider politics.

It is dangerous to install a modern political system into a country whose socio/economic system resembles the backwardness of England or France 300 years ago. At that time the political system was based on the socio/economic system, i.e. that of monarchy and semi-feudalism. In no way could democracy have sprung from this arrangement. Only during the transition from a rural, agricultural society into an industrialized nation was parliamentary democracy born. The growth of trade and commerce during eighteenth and nineteenth centuries necessitated the rise of a prosperous, politically-aware middle class which demanded from the aristocracy a role in governing, to be manifested in the form of democracy.

Yet today although such countries suited for democracy are relatively few, governments randomly assign democracy to any country—regardless of its economic backwardness. After third world countries gained independence from Europe, each was still an agricultural, semi-feudal cluster of territories and lacking a significant middle class. Their leaders drastically flawed by implementing western-style constitutions; constitutions designed for societies far too advanced, far different from their own.

In most cases post-colonial countries dubbed themselves 'peoples ' republics ' and designed constitutions calling for multi-party parliamentary democracy; government by and for the people, for this would supposedly lead to industrialization. Little did they realize that such ideals do not lead to industrialization. Rather, industrialization—the transition from semi-feudalism to capitalism—leads to those ideals. And without a robust middle class, democratic ideals are rubbish.

The history of the post-independence third world is tarnished with bloody coups, military dictatorships, civil war, and mass corruption. In South America for example, only Venezuela has survived with unbroken civilian rule. In Africa and Asia most nations are ruled by a dictatorship/plutocracy. Many a 'democratic ' country is often less democratic than its communist counterparts. Freedom is almost nonexistent. Indeed, were political freedom granted at all, to enjoy that freedom would still be hopeless. A peasant in, say, Kenya is unfree; totally bound to tending his crops in order to survive.

Of all the officially democratic third world countries, India is among the very few which has even approached democracy. But many argue that India 's reliance on western political ideals has actually damaged her standing. Although civil war has been averted since independence from the British in 1947, internal violence has raged, largely due to India 's federalist system whereby the central government grants limited autonomy to each state. This system is designed for a modernized, homogeneous nation—unlike India. An example of problems arising thereof storms in the state of Punjab where Sikhs (a religion) are the majority. Within the last few years Sikhs and Hindus have slaughtered each other by the thousands as Sikhs demand more autonomy for Punjab due to religious and economic differences with the mainland. Radical Sikhs wish to form their own separate country! Federalism is forlorn in sucha culturally divided India.

Also asinine is that India 's constitution calls for a secular nation, much like the American Constitution. But separation of church and state is much easier for the latter. America 's industrialization has been accompanied by a waning of traditional values such as religion. On the other hand in non-industrialized India, the devoutly religious populace makes the secular constitution look like toilet paper. Constitutions don 't induce (religious) change. Change must come first, then the constitution.

'Elections ' is not synonymous with 'democracy. ' 80% of India 's people live in remote villages and probably never heard of Rajiv Gandhi 's platform let alone that of his opponents. Unless forced by their landlords, the majority of these villagers don 't vote, and most likely don 't care. Moreover, democracy requires that voters have a good understanding of political affairs, thus a good education. But over two-thirds of Indians cannot even read. When elections are held in India, should it be called democracy? I think not.

But, you ask, what of a country like Chile with a 90% literacy rate and one of the highest standards of living in the third world? There, too, is democracy dead. During the early 1960 's Chile was well organized with effective political parties, popular elections, and a powerful legislature. However, changing social and economic patterns produced a rising tide of demands for the government. Vicious cycles of price collapse, cutbacks, strikes, work stoppages, and violence polarized the electorate and leadership until in the early 1970 's a socialist government gained power. Not surprisingly the concept of a socialist government in Latin America scared enough western nations into supporting a coup in Chile, the end result being the notorious Mr. Pinochet. It took less than a decade to go from democracy, to socialism, to military dictatorship.

The term 'democracy ' means nothing to most leaders of the third world. They do anything to remain in power, whether it be ballot-stuffing, assassination of political opponents, or outright suspension of elections.

In short, the post-independence 'democratic ' third world has been a hodgepodge of quarreling political parties and ethnic groups, mass poverty amid great wealth, corruption in high office, and totalitarianism in the shadow of an uncontrollable population explosion. If there exists a remedial political system for India, Chile, and their third world counterparts, democracy is not it.

GENETICS:

The Questions...

BY WERNER G. HEIM

When Blobgig burned his hand picking up a rock heated by the campfire, a dispute arose. Was the burned hand Gibat's fault because he had discovered how to start a fire? Was it Ticktum's since she had started this particular fire? Was it Konack's since he had said dropped the rock near the fire? Or was the fault Blobgig's own because he had not yet learned that hot objects burn hands?

The technological application of new knowledge, whether the discovery of fire thousands of years ago or a new discovery in genetics or reproduction made yesterday, raises question of responsibility, law, ethics, religion, and everyday behavior. The questions arising from the application of past discoveries have largely been settled; those from new ones are currently with us. Among discoveries which raise some of the largest questions are those in the related fields of genetics and reproduction.

Until approximately the beginning of this century, individuals had basically only two decisions to make regarding genetics and reproduction: whether to reproduce and with whom. Now we have knowledge and techniques which allow us to make, and demand that we make, decisions on how to reproduce and, if not, how to prevent reproduction. Also, should we seek information on the genetic situation of a partner, a fetus, or a child, and if so by what means, whether to continue or discontinue a pregnancy and, if to discontinue, when and by what means.

What, for example are some of the decisions and questions surrounding the decision on the means of reproduction? In most cases, of course, reproduction will be initiated in the time-honored way with perhaps the only technological aspect being the cessation of the means previsouly used to prevent pregnancy.

But in many instances, the "natural" way to reproduce does not work or may be considered undesirable. The alternatives are now manyfold. Suppose the male partner produces too few sperm to secure fertilization in any single impregnation? Artificial insemination with the man's sperm collected over some time is available. Does the man produce no sperm at all or is he the carrier of a serious genetic disease which might manifest in the offspring? Artificial insemination by donor sperm is a possibility.

Is there an abnormality in the female such that eggs cannot get to the uterus or sperm to the egg? In vitro fertilization with re-implantation into the same woman is possible. Does the woman fail to produce eggs altogether? In vitro fertilization of an egg, perhaps by sperm from her husband, perhaps by sperm from another male, of an egg obtained from a donor is possible. Is a woman unable to carry a pregnancy or would carrying a pregnancy be dangerous to her or the fetus? Implantation of an egg, possibly from her and fertilized by her husband's sperm, into the uterus of a foster mother is a possibility.

All these possibilities are present ones, not speculations for the future, and each carries with it a peculiar set of questions. Is, for instance, the use of a foster mother in a given set of circumstances morally correct? Is it merely a modern extension of the notion, stemming from at least biblical times, of a wet nurse? Or is it a process that disrupts the idea and ideal of family or perhaps the child's very concept of having "a" mother? But how critical to a child's normal emotional development is such a concept? Is the risk to the child's psychological health greater here than in the case of adoption? What is moral? What is in the child's best interest? What is in the parents' best interest here? Can parents make a judgment without an overwhelming conflict of interest?

But what of some of the aspects of the process itself? Is the contract between the foster mother and the couple who hired her legally enforceable? Should it be enforceable under any circumstances or only when a court deems the reasons for using a foster mother to be sufficiently strong? Should there be legislation differentiating "sufficient" from "insufficient" reasons? And on what basis should such distinctions be made?

What are the responsibilities of the foster mother? If she drinks alcoholic beverages and the child is born with the fetal alcoholism syndrome, can the couple to whom she was under contract sue her for damages? Can the child sue her? Suppose a foster mother, while pregnant, is struck by a careless driver and the fetus is injured or killed? To whom does that driver's responsibility extend for the death or injury of the fetus? The foster mother? The contracting couple? Both? Neither?

Or take another set of examples. It is now possible to diagnose the existence of many severe congenital and genetic abnormalities and diseases prenatally—early enough, in fact, that a possible termination of the pregnancy is not a very high-risk procedure. If such a severe defect is found in a fetus, do the parents have a right, a privilege, or perhaps even a duty to continue the pregnancy and bring a child into the world who may never be much more than a "vegetable?" Does an insurance company or a government agency have the right to refuse payment for such a child's medical care because its disease state was "preventable?" Does the child have a right to sue its parents to recover damages for the miserable state of its existence? But if it were not in such a miserable state of existence, would it be in existence at all?

These and many other questions are now seeking answers. Should (or even must) answers be provided by society, either through the legislative or, more likely, the judicial process? But on what basis—in what framework of ethical or judicial reasoning—should legislators or judges reach decisions?

Perhaps some will maintain that at least some of these answers can only be answered by individuals or families for themselves, not by the state for everyone. Assuming this to be the case, is it easier to answer the questions? What reasoning, what standards, what religious or moral precepts can the individual bring to bear? But what is the alternative? Is is morally right to make decisions concerning life and death—of the unconceived, the unborn, the helpless young, or even the helpless aged—on the basis of what is little more than a hunch, a vague feeling in the pit of the stomach?

I cannot do more than raise the questions; I cannot give the answers because I don't know them. But I know that I cannot do less than raise the questions.

...And The Answers

BY STEVE GERAGHTY

Just when we were feeling overwhelmed by all of the questions, we were saved by the answer. And we didn't have to search very long or very hard for it, because there it was on page one of the Gazette: Vatican bans artificial, surrogate conception. In its 40-page document, entitled "Instruction on Respect for Human Life in Its Origin and on the Dignity of Procreation," the Vatican rejected all scientific advances in the battle against sterility. The document placed a ban on all methods of conception by artificial or surrogate means. The reasons: these methods are immoral and contrary to nature.

For the first time—probably ever—the unborn were given their own rights. These rights were pretty strictly defined to be: the right to be conceived, the right to be considered a human being from the moment of fertilization, and the right to be carried in the maternal womb and to be brought into this world as a result of an act of sex between married parents. The first two of these rights are not big shockers; in fact, these questions have been battled out in United States courts for a few years (if only the judges had been given these answers earlier...). Yet it is the third of these rights that has carried the true weight of the Vatican decision.

"Only the conjugal act is worthy of procuring the creation of a new human being," summed up Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger. Years of biomedical advances against sterility down the drain—not to mention just a few billion dollars. Sterile married couples are now requested to adopt rather than to give in to the evil modern technology. The Vatican said that married couples have no automatic right to a child, and that if the act of sex does not result in conception, then so be the will of God. I don 't know who gave us the desire to know so much and to search for ways to conquer our roadblocks, but I always assumed that God had a hand in it somewhere. But then the Vatican made this decision. According to the document, "the one conceived must be the fruit of his parents ' love; he cannot be desired or conceived as the product of an intervention of medical or biological techniques, for that would be reducing him to an object of scientific technology." To this I say rubbish (mainly because it 's printable).

Most couples get married so that some day they might be able to raise children of their own. This process begins with conception. And if the Catholic Church would just look around, nature—or God—has never universally dictated that one male is to find one female and settle down forever. In fact, some species are still around because they are reproductive maniacs. Humans happened to have adopted a social standard of having parents watch over the development of their offspring for many years after birth. If the institution of marriage were not what it is today, sterile mates would probably leave each other to find reproductively successful matches. And now science has provided a partial cure for sterility. So what is so wrong with science providing sterile couples the opportunity to experience conception and the birth process?

The Catholic Church seems to answer that there is a lot wrong with this. The Vatican would start with artificial insemination/fertilization and test-tube babies (which are strongly objected by the Church). In the case of the male, artificial insemination requires masturbation—"an act which lacks the sexual relationship called for by our moral order"—which has been a no-no for a long time. But with the new techniques to combat sterility, masturbation for this purpose can now be part of the conception process for couples wishing to go this route. According to the Church, test-tube babies not only tamper with the mystery of creation, but are presumptuous acts of man to play the role of God. How the process of conception takes place is hardly a mystery anymore, but try telling that to the Vatican. With the process of in-vitro fertilization, the Vatican claims that many embryos must be discarded or destroyed because only a few are transferred to the woman 's body. "By acting in this way the researcher usurps the place of God ...He sets himself up as the master of the destiny of others inasmuch as he arbitrarily chooses whom he will allow to live and whom he will send to death," the Vatican said in its report. Again rubbish—but this time it 's not just my opinion because it 's also biological fact. Some "embryos" are disgarded in in vitro fertilization, but not because some researcher or doctor chose to destroy it. The "embryos" are disgarded because they cannot survive to produce a living human; the biological criteria remain the same for the doctor as they did for God. If a doctor implanted an "embryo" that had no chance for survival, imagine the liability suit coming to his nearest courtroom. But who 's going to sue God? Spontaneous abortions are a lot more common than most people think.

See Answers, page 7

Black Market Communism

BY JOHN BUMP

The following is an essay on the underground economy in the Eastern Bloc with a description of a personal experience with the black market. The size of the economy and its value to the people will be discussed. The difference between the underground economy and black market must first be defined. The underground economy is also referred to in literature as the "second economy," "counter economy," "unofficial economy," "parallel market," "private enterprise," and other names. The black market is one part of the underground economy.

One definition of the second economy uses the following criteria with the stipulation that one must be met: 1) the economic activity must be directly for private gain; 2) it must be in some significant respect in knowing contravention of existing law. Using this definition it can include some legal activites. This would include private plots used for farming and private housing. There are several other legal practices that exist, but are too obscure to be worth mentioning. The most interesting activities are those which are illegal.

"The most common economic crime is stealing from the state." Stealing from the state has two effects. First, it hurts the state and lowers the incomes of the workers. Fewer goods reach the stores because so many goods are skimmed off the top. As a result some wages are lower than they might otherwise be, because the state does not receive enough in sales of these goods to pay a full wage. This crime also applies to services. Workers are in effect stealing man-power from the system when they repair an appliance for a bribe rather than one on their assigned work schedule. The service industry is particularly hard hit by this type of activity. Nearly every type of service from medicine to law is affected.

The second effect of stealing from the state is in the redistribution and improved quality of the goods and services. Essentially the free market mechanism rather, than the state plan, is used to distribute the goods and services. This greatly increases the efficiency of distribution. Goods tend to go where they are desired most rather than the somewhat arbitrary location prescribed by the plan. Services also reap the same distributional benefits.

More importantly the quality of services increases. Under the plan a mechanic receives the same pay regardless of the skill and diligence used in his job. With the lack of incentive to perform jobs well, the quality of both goods and services has suffered. This is a major reason for poor medical care in the East Bloc.

Many service workers will only do their normal jobs after receiving a bribe. This is in effect stealing time from the state. The employee will not receive the bribe unless the task is successfully accomplished. This incentive naturally promotes a higher degree of quality into the work. For example good medical care cannot be found, with very rare exceptions, in the Soviet Union without a bribe. The system of bribery raises the level of medical care throughout the entire system. Medical students would have no incentive to develop their skills to the fullest if they knew they would receive the same pay even if they were poor doctors.

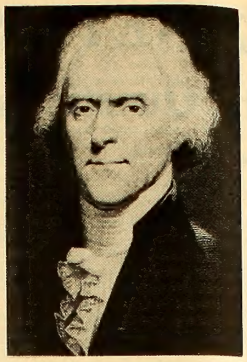
When the losses to the system in both difficulty planning and goods and services are compared to the gains in efficiency and quality, one can conclude that the gains outweigh the losses. It is nearly impossible to statistically prove this, but it is theoretically logical. As far as goods are concerned, the actual number of goods is no less—and possibly higher—than if nothing were stolen. For example, an apple orchard manager was convicted of stealing apple crates. The crates he was supposed to receive never arrived and the apples would have spoiled if he had not stolen the crates. The distribution is certainly better than with no private enterprise. The aggregate quality of services improves under a centrally planned economy with a counter economy. The loss to the economy is in the planner's ability to develop an effective plan. This loss is certainly much smaller than the benefits.

The unofficial economy is much more than stealing from the state. It also has some unproductive features. Bribery has become commonplace in other areas, such as bribing a professor to gain admittance to a prestigious university. This has the undesirable effect on society of having an underqualified student take the place of a more qualified one. Common criminals can bribe judges to receive a lenient sentence. This type of action, loosely related to the counter economy, is undesirable.

Barter of goods is another major feature of private enterprise in the East Bloc. It takes many forms and is similar to normal underground activities. Often goods are more desirable than money. This type of action has nearly identical effects to those of normal sales.

The black market has political effects. It is ideologically unpure and discredits the authority of the government and the Communist party. It also raises doubts about the government's ability to provide minimal material benefits under the planned economic system. It also elevates the power of money in a society where money is supposed to be unimportant.

Currency speculation is probably the most severe economic crime and is punishable by death. Most blackmarketeers in the Soviet Union who trade clothing and other merchandise would not even consider currency speculation. It is simply trading rubles to foreigners, diplomats, or others holding Western currency for hard currency, generally dollars.



The basis of our government being the opinion of the people, the very first object should be to keep that right; and were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers, or newspapers with a government, I should not hesitate for a moment to prefer the latter. But I should mean that every man should receive those papers, and be capable of reading them.

—Thomas Jefferson
January 16, 1787

This phenomenon is widespread in every eastern bloc country except Hungary and Yugoslavia where it is less prominent than elsewhere. In Hungary and Yugoslavia the official exchange rates are close to the black market rate. For example the official rate in Hungary is 2.78 forints for one Austrian shilling. The black market rate is four forints per shilling. Other countries have a much wider spread. I will focus on Czechoslovakia where the black market rate is approximately two-and-a-half times higher than the official rate.

Upon entering the country all foreigners are required to exchange ten dollars for each day they will be in the country. Once this money is gone the black market is the best option for exchanging more money. It is not quite as dangerous as in the Soviet Union. Many Czechs who come in contact with foreigners regularly are willing to exchange money. Among these people are the professionals who do it for a living. They officially have other jobs, but in reality exchanging money is their real profession.

See Black Market, page 8

From Costa Rica, page 1

Also, on one hand, Costa Rica's neutrality may appear attractive to foreign investors. On the other hand, though, choosing sides with, say, the United States, and supporting President Reagan's policy of supporting the Contras would earn them a "big brother" for protection. Costa Rica's neutrality or abolition of its neutrality policy would have tremendous implications either way.

The third area of vital importance to Costa Rica's future which also must be closely watched is the situation throughout the Central American region. As stated before, the situation in Nicaragua is testing the patience of Costa Rica's neutrality. Poverty in Honduras, death squads in Guatemala, and repression in El Salvador has sent flocks of refugees from each of these countries to Costa Rica, where the prospects for happiness are brighter. We have already seen what this means to the Costa Rican government financially. It must find a way to keep foreigners fed and healthy too. Considerable also is the fact that this country has been, for the most part, racially homogenous, and hasn't had to deal with racial mixtures. These refugees coming in all carry with them different backgrounds, and different political ideals and standards. This puts even greater weight on the already heavily burdened democracy in Costa Rica. Costa Rica has professed its neutrality, but has been unable to escape the stress resulting from conflict in neighboring countries nonetheless.

The fourth vital area is the United States' policy towards Costa Rica. U.S. President Ronald Reagan has made clear his policy objectives in the isthmus; to eliminate the communist threat in favor of democracy. Because of the vulnerability of Costa Rica's economy, the small nation could easily be used by Reagan to help his cause. The President has the power of the dollar bill, something which Costa Rica may need to survive.

Aggressive U.S. policy toward the communist Sandinistas is not in Costa Rica's best interests. American aid to the Contras, Reagan's choice of policy in opposition to the Sandinistas, means more guns for the Nicaraguan rebels. Since many of these rebels are housed in Costa Rica, this means more guns inside Costa Rican borders, a situation the government has desperately tried to avoid with neutrality policies. Moreover, this will mean greater chances of border clashes between Sandinista army units and Contra rebels inside the Costa Rican border. Unfortunately, the effects of the $100 million in aid awarded to the Contras will soon be seen in this small, defenseless country. Eventually, if the war in Nicaragua intensifies, Costa Rica must give in and choose sides in the conflict, or continue bearing the burdens of a war that is not even its own. Continuance of Reagan's aggressive policy will intensify the conflict.

Up to this point, we have discussed four areas in which Costa Rica's future could hinge on. Is the country helpless in regards to these matters?

Surely Costa Rica's choices are limited. But is has choices nonetheless. First, it will be important for the nation to cling on to its neutrality. This nation needs to look as attractive as it possibly can to foreign investors. The poor state of the economy is the nation's greatest concern. Peace is more attractive than war. Also in regards to the economy of the country, cuts will be necessary in the social spending department. Of course, this will be political suicide for the nation's leader, such cuts will be very unpopular among the nation's citizens. But this sacrifice is necessary. Consider the education problem in the country. The problem is that there is too much education. What can such a small country do with so many lawyers and professors? The point is that the governments social spending is unnecessarily too high.

As far as the conflict among Costa Rica's neighboring nations, all it can do is support peace talks. What else can an armyless nation do? The only weight Costa Rica holds here is that it is happily peaceful, and maybe neighbors will look to Costa Rica as an example and eventually catch on.

The Costa Rican government must also deal with U.S. President Ronald Reagan in a delicate manner. The President needs to be convinced that a friendly relationship with Costa Rica, the regions most respectable democracy, is in America's best interest. He needs to be convinced that his aggressive policies will not promote harmonious relationships with Costa Rica. Also, he needs to know that his support of the Contras may nag at the Sandinistas, but not sufficiently damage them.

Most importantly for Costa Rica in regards to its relations with the U.S., President Reagan's final term must be endured patiently in hopes that the 1988 Presidential elections in the U.S. will bring better luck to them.

Costa Rica's Cinderella story has been slightly tinted in recent times. The country's future is uncertain. I have listed four areas of special concern which will affect the path Costa Rica ends up taking. These areas are its doctrine of neutrality, the economy, the situation among neighboring countries in the isthmus, and United States policy towards the region. In some areas, Costa Rica has choices, in others, all it can do is wait and see. Hopefully a few more Jose Figueres' will surface when this country really needs them.

Colorado College: An Isolated Entity?

BY SUZIE KLEIN

Tina, the resident assistant for Slocum Hall, needs to return a Botany text book that she borrowed from a student on her wing. She knocks on the door and hears a voice: "Come on in, it is open." Upon entering, Tina encounters three people in the room smoking a bong. On previous occasions, Tina detected a marijuana aroma coming from the same room. They invite Tina to sit down and join the group. What action should she take?

There exists a definite incongruity between Colorado State Law and the educational philosophy at Colorado College. Colorado State Law affirms it is illegal to possess marijuana; possession of less than one ounce is a misdemeanor and over an ounce is a felony. Colorado College, compared to State laws, is not as affirmative with their stand against drugs. By taking Tina's situation and analyzing how Immanuel Kant, John Stuart Mill and Aristotle would intervene, it is easy to discern that the philosophers, and Colorado College, feel humans are basically free. Human reason must be assumed to be the most important capability which individuals possess. The College wishes to develop critical thinking, but in doing so avoids the law. First let us examine Colorado College's drug policy and then come back to Tina's situation. In doing this, we can see how the philosophers would handle Tina's dilema, which philosopher's principles are most practical, and where the incongruity lies. The Colorado College policy on drugs is the following:

> "The College views drug misuse with grave concern and has the obligation to uphold federal, state and local laws concerning possession and use of illegal drugs. The College is neither a sanctuary protecting those who violate drug laws nor a police agency enforcing those laws. Colorado College is opposed to the use of illegal drugs on or off campus and encourages students to become familiar with the physiological, psychological and legal aspect of drug use." (The Pathfinder, 1986/87, p. 59.)

The phrase: "The college is neither a sanctuary protecting those who violate drug laws nor a police agency enforcing those laws" bluntly implies CC neither accepts nor condones drug use on the campus. The administration takes a safe approach which claims they are "opposed" to drugs but they think people should be responsible and "become familiar with the physiological, psychological, and legal aspects of drug use." Unless you are a pre-med student if you have an interest in studying drugs, you will not investigate how marijuana affects the brain. The reason for reading and determining the "physiological, psychological, and legal aspects," therefore, would be to prepare yourself for taking drugs. So the College is not saying yes or no to drug usage but hoping people will make their own choice.

Educators at Colorado College want to produce responsible individuals, and drugs can be a means for this development. Assistant Dean of Students, Doug Gerterner, feels people should research and know what psychological effects drugs have. He has more concern for the individuals who take drugs as an escape than for those who take drugs to improve memory or thought. Likewise, he feels that schools have moved away from the "en loco parentis" or parental figures and have moved to a structure where people can learn from mistakes and take chances instead of being limited by rigid law.

An example of this would be a housemate who affirmed: "I started smoking pot when I came to Colorado College and made the conscious decision that I did not want to smoke pot." She tried the drug and reasoned that it was not for her. This is the process the College desires—students make their own decisions. Educators are using drugs to develop responsibility. Now that we have seen Colorado College's drug policy and philosophy we can move to the second half of the article which determines how each philosopher would handle Tina's dilema.

Immanuel Kant would stress that humans must examine their reasons. Tina would ask, "What is the action, the reason, and can the reason be universalized?" The action is either joining her friends or fulfilling her job as an RA. The reason for sitting down and getting stoned might be to relax with friends or because she feels pressured into accompanying them. A strong reason against joining her friends would be that as a resident assistant, her job policy states she must immediately intervene and give a verbal warning or take disciplinary action against those who violate the law. This is where it becomes complicated because Tina must weigh the reasons and ask: "If I take illegal drugs am I willing to have all people in all circumstances take illegal drugs?" Because she is a free individual she can make the choice and everything depends on her judgment.

Aristotle would suggest reasoning out what was best, for Tina, under the circumstances. Tina should, above all else, seek virtue and should obey the laws. According to Aristotle, we have the reasoning and free will to decide between virtue and vice. From previously formed customs and habits, Tina should automatically pick the more virtuous act. Tina could also choose the more virtuous act by looking at excellent individuals and deciding what action they would take.

Finally, Aristotle would emphasize that pleasure is only a means of acquiring happiness but not happiness in itself. He states, "In the many, however, pleasure seemingly causes deception, since it appears good when it is not; at any rate, they choose what is pleasant because they assume it is good, and avoid pain because they assume it is evil." Pleasure can cause "deception" because it is only a means to the end goal which is happiness.

Mill shows that all people desire pleasure and it is our basic drive to avoid pain by acquiring pleasure. If Tina uses Mill's philosophy she would see that these sense pleasures are of the lower sort because she might have tried drugs before and, therefore, is able to judge. Also constant stimulation of physical desires should not happen in Mill's hypothetical state because our institutions should ideally mold our desires such that they are for the common good. Mill would hope that individuals were taught to strive for the mental desires instead of the physical. His hypothetical society should automatically guide individuals toward the higher desires. Yet something has gone wrong because our supposedly "best and brightest" people in the United States, congressmen and scholars to name a few, have a tendency to choose the lower physical desires.

All the philosophers, for the Colorado College drug issue, would suggest upholding the law. Kant stresses that before we can have freedom we must have laws. Morality, according to Kant, is governed by law. Likewise, Mill shows that laws and institutions make excellent people. Lastly the strongest argument is Aristotle's view that laws and institutions are the most beautiful thing in the state. All three agree that Tina would exhibit responsibility to the community if she obeyed the laws.

If you have a law it does not mean you are governed by a paternalistic state. An individual always has the choice to break or not to break to law. With or without a law the basic freedom to reason and to choose will always prevail. If you want to smoke pot, than you can make the conscious decision that you do not believe in the laws and you wish to break them and accept the consequences.

The College has stated what it is not; it is not a "sanctuary" or a "police agency." I believe it needs to make a stronger statement: it is against drug use and will take swift action against law breakers. Drugs are too dangerous a means to make a responsible individual, even if the reasoning is to teach the person to think: "I will try this, even though it is against the law, and then decide whether it is for me or not." The key phrase is "even though it is against the law" because, in this, people are taking for granted that as an active member of a community the person will uphold the laws. If you suggest drugs are a means for learning responsibility, you indirectly undermine the laws. And how many laws will a person feel free to break after breaking one?

The student contribution to improving the drug problem at Colorado College would be to sign an agreement, similar to the honor code, which states they will uphold the rules and regulations of the school and of the State of Colorado. This code would have more emphasis on the drug problem than on property damage which we see, for instance, in the housing contract. After all, we have to ask is Colorado College an isolated entity that makes up its own rules and regulations, or are we part of a greater scheme?

From Answers, page 5

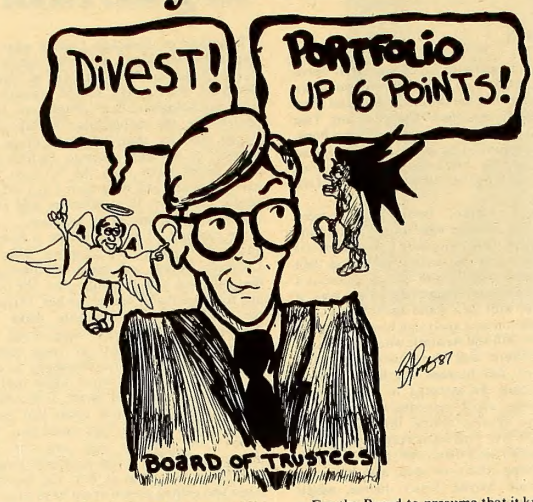
While I have made the point obvious that I strongly disagree with the Vatican 's position on artificial conception, I do think that they are moving the right direction concerning surrogate parenthood. Too many problems have already arisen in this area. The Vatican claims that the unity of marriage is damaged, genetic parenthood is ruptured, and all-in-all it leads to dissention, disorder, and injustice. The Vatican seems to have hit the nail on the head, except that genetic parenthood need not be ruptured if the egg and sperm come from the parents and the resulting "embryo" is then implanted in a surrogate mother. But disorder and injustice have already become direct results of surrogate parenthood. The biological connections of fetus and parent have great bearings on the emotional connections too. Anyone searching for a surrogate mother for a developing child should carefully screen anyone offering their "services." The first thing I would look for is a mother. They already know the feelings connected with gestation and birth, and as a result might be able to predict her feelings for the child once it is born. Anyone who has not gone through the entire process before need not apply. "St. Elsewhere" had a wonderful episode about the surrogate parenthood problem: Howie Mandel was convinced that his donated sperm was responsible for twins, which caused a great deal of trouble for all involved. Perhaps sterile couples should heed the Vatican 's warning. But if they choose to ignore it, may they approach the entire process with a great deal of caution.

CCCAA Played Fair



BY MATT CASE

There's something hideous going on behind the concrete walls of Armstrong Hall. Something so contrary to the supposed ideals and mission of this school that must make even the most apathetic student angry.

When the Chairman of the Board, Bill Spencer, began the Trustees statement on divestment with the words "We appreciate..." the crowd on hand knew what the final outcome of the statement would be. We have been told so many times how much the Board "appreciates" and "considers" student input into decision-making, but it has become increasingly clear that these words are empty.

The Divestment Movement on campus has given the Board every chance to illustrate its concern for student input and the College's committment to social responsibility. Ever since the CC Community Against Apartheid was formed in April of 1985 we have been playing by the Board's rules. We understood then that it would be inappropriate for students to take over the administration building for divestment (as was the case at many other schools) with no prior education, campus support, or attempts to contact the Board through formal channels. We've done all that now, but it has proven worthless.

We approached the Board in June of 1985 with a proposal to create an Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility to deal with the South Africa question and to check up on other investments that might also fall short of the College's supposed moral standards. In light of the more militant divestment actions going on at Columbia, Berkeley, and UC Santa Cruz, the Board was pleasantly surprised by this proposal and gladly endorsed the creation of this committee, hoping that it would tone down the rumblings of the political movement on campus. After a few delays by the administration, the committee was formed and took to investigating the South Africa question. The committee recommended divestment and the Board rejected the committee's advice.

"You're a minority and you don't represent the campus" is what the CCCAA has continually heard from the other end of the long, polished, wooden table in the Board meeting room. Although we had 650 signatures and a CCCA "whole hearted" endorsement after the initial month of the movement, we realized that we needed more indicators of campus support. Since then, we have acquired 1032 signatures (800 of which are students), two Catalyst polls revealing that a majority of the students support divestment, the endorsement of 21 student organizations, an 11-1 CCCA vote, and a 60-8 (with four absentations) faculty vote. And yet when I and three others met with the Trustee Investment Committee last Thursday, one of the members stated "you understand that this support is not a mandate."

They first told us that we didn't have enough campus support and now that we do have that support, they say that it doesn't matter. Clearly the deception evident in this example raises some serious questions about the Board and its treatment of and respect for students who wish to have some input into the decision-making processes of their college. We have played by the rules, and it has proven worthless.

In addition, there is strong evidence which throws a doubtful shadow over the Board's stated concern for social responsibility and Black South Africans.

After students voiced a concern over the South Africa issue in 1978, the Board endorsed the Sullivan Principles (which one investment Committee member compared to "Cotton Candy"). During a rally in April of 1985, however, Vice-President Tom Wenzlau revealed that the Board no longer subscribed to the Investor Responsibility Research Center publication that lists which companies adhere to the Sullivan Principles and which do not. In effect, they no longer knew if the school was investing in companies that only hired Whites, or payed Black employees subhuman wages, or viciously exploited the Black cheap labor pool that is the foundation for apartheid. They no longer knew, and we have to wonder if they really cared.

I don't doubt that every Board member deplores apartheid. That's easy to say and the Board has said it often. (Can you imagine if they stated that they support apartheid?) But the real question is not do they care about Black South Africans and social responsibility, but rather what do they care more about? In what order do social responsibility, student concerns, and economic growth fit into the hierarchy of Trustee concerns?

Although the Board stated a concern for South African Blacks as the criteria for their decision, there is overwhelming evidence that continued investment in South Africa only reinforces apartheid. Two years ago, the arguments against divestment, although inadequate, had some legitimacy. But in light of the increased repression in South Africa over the past two years: the advent of the State of Emergency; the increase in detentions without charge (60% of the 25,000 South Africans detained under the present security and emergency laws have been released without charge); the increase in "un-rest related" deaths (from 1.23 in 1984 to 5.23 in 1986), there can be no legitimate defence of constructive engagement and the Sullivan Principles. The only people that continue with the same worn-out, disproven arguments are those who have a vested interest in continued investment: the South African government, invested companies, individuals, and institutions. Rev. Sullivan has said himself that his principles have failed and unless aparthied is ended by May of this year he will recind them. There was bilateral support for economic sanctions in Congress. 114 colleges and universities, 19 states, 63 cities and Congress have all initiated divestment legislature. Even Reagan couldn't find anyone to support constructive engagement. The panel he appointed to investigate this issue concluded that the U.S. should join the international community in a concerted effort to isolate South Africa economically. And most importantly, the overwhelming majority of Black liberation organizations and leaders within South Africa, despite possible imprisonment for doing so, have called for divestiture: Nobel Peace Prize winner Bishop Desmond Tutu, the Reverend Alan Boesak, the United Democratic Front, and the African National Congress to name a few.

For the Board to presume that it knows better than Black South Africans what is better for them is arrogant, racist, and fundamentally contrary to the supposed ideals of our college. President Riley wrote in his 1985 Report that the College attempts to "inculcate in students an awareness of others, a feeling of mutual obligation."

As Professor Livesay stated after the Board's decision, we have learned an important lesson. We have learned that the Board of Trustees of our college doesn't give a damn about our opinions nor about social responsibility. The Board has proven true the cynical view that power only cares about and listens to power.

We were hopeful that the Trustees believed in what CC teaches us: to take ethics seriously and to act in socially responsible ways. We've given them every opportunity to show their commitment to the liberal arts tradition. We've investigated the divestment issue more than any Board member would ever have the time to and we've shared that research with them. We rallied campus support. We waited patiently for the slow wheels of bureaucracy to turn. And when they did, we learned that they never listened to us, and they really didn't care anyway.

We played by the rules, we went through the proper channels, we had our memos printed up proper and signed them "Respectfully, The CCCAA." But the Board has proven that they do not respect us nor the College's commitment to social responsibility. Because of that they have lost the respect of much of the campus community. We played by the rules, and it didn't work. But the divestment movement has more momentum now than it ever has...

From Black Market, page 6

I was fortunate enough to meet one of these people. Our (a friend and I) first contact with him was near a prominent tourist site in Prague. We exchanged money and asked directions. Later that day we met him again and questioned him about how he knew we were Americans before he heard us speak. He proudly replied it was part of his job and went on to show us how he could identify anyone's nationality by their dress and mannerisms. To prove it he correctly identified approximately a dozen groups of people from both the East and the West. He told us about a bet he once made for approximately $400 with a disbeliever that a tourist group was Italian. He won the bet.

The second thing that caught our attention was a plastic bag full of koruny, the Czech currency. It was full of over 60,000 koruny, or $5,000 at the official rate. is when we realized that we were dealing with a professional.

He boastingly told us that he was "well-known by the police." We learned that the secret police were watching us, but did not concern themselves with speculators. We then went to see his apartment.

The appearance was typically drab from the outside. Upon reaching his floor we saw an elderly man give us a very nasty look and dart into his apartment. A quick glance inside revealed a dim, poorly furnished flat. After a quick, but thorough look to see that nobody was coming, he began unlocking his door. He had at least four locks in a country with little crime. We quickly proceeded inside and he relocked all the locks. The apartment was nice enough to rival the nicest "yuppie pad" in the United States. Everything in the apartment was purchased in the West, right down to his many bottles of Heinz ketchup. He had a lot of fresh fruit and other delicacies not widely available in the East Bloc. After giving us peaches and scotch we continued to question him. He dodged many questions, but revealed some interesting things.

First, all the dollars he received were resold to a marketeer in Poland. Dollars have a much higher value in Poland than in Czechoslovakia. He did not know why. It was also revealed that it is a minor miracle when an American exchanges on the black market. Two reasons were given to explain this. One, Americans are afraid of getting caught by the police and second, they carry traveler's checks which are nonconvertible on the black market. The Italians and West Germans are the biggest traders. While we were talking with him outside he exchanged the equivalent of $50 with some Italians. The average salary in Czechoslovakia is $120 a month at the official rate. With this income it is difficult to do more than exist. It is certainly not enough to buy a car or travel to the West, which he has done five times. Unfortunately many of our more probing questions on the black market were avoided or ignored.

Victor Greto

Subway Homesick Blues

ometimes I wonder, as an individual, how angry I to be to be alive—or even, more importantly, much I need to remember to be alive. It is always er to be angry than it is to remember vividly things, s of mind, conditions and so on. As I grow older I me less angry, but I have to learn to remember the er, what had caused it, why it's now dissipating. It's to be angry when you're poor, easy to hate rich ple who "know not what they do." Yet it seems e important to know why, and that's where, I k, memory and age help, they add sophistication e's outlook, and mixed with a modicum of anger, produce results—even if these results lay in silent idual victories.

or instance, it is easy to be angry at the thought and that in the post-Civil War South a plan was ally begun to import Italian laborers to work the on fields because they saw those immigrants as ntially a cheaper labor force than the freed Blacks. uldn't that anger anyone? Sure, but what to do i? Hate? Maybe, it's certainly there, the hate, it s and reaches my mouth like indigestion; but all it is—indigestion. I remember riding on a York subway with my girlfriend going home to klyn. We were virtually alone in the entire area, ack man was driving, and when we reached a stop, a t, bald nervous man got on. I'm not Mr. ception but I felt "trouble" as soon as this little man e on. He nervously checked his watch every few nds, looking up at the driver, then over at us—I, of rse, looked dutifully away.

fter a few moments he started bitching about thing you could imagine under the sun: "Sweet us," he panted—he seemed to be out of breath from word go—"these trains are so fuckin' slow. rst,"—and he'd look at me—"there was a time re these motherfuckin' Jewish liberals and niggers e in when the trains ran on time, when it wouldn't so fuckin' long to reach Brooklyn—for Christ's ." And he ranted on, attacking kikes, niggers, s, liberals...I looked up at the driver and he was ed in his seat, tapping his foot to a tune that must been playing in his head—and smiling, grinning ear to ear. After the little man got off, the driver ed to me, noticing my eyes, the way I clutched my 's hand, and said: "What's the matter, man? He's r kind, ain't he?"

My first reaction was to plead "innocence," never that meant, to plead an "affinity" towards the driver, again, whatever that was. But instead, I just held hands, sat back in the seat and closed my eyes. Brooklyn, I thought, where are thou?

I thought bitterly later, "Hell, the driver was right, wasn't he?" I could throw all the facts of Italian laborers and ghettoes I could think of at the driver, and it would have been as useless as asking the little man to shutup. There was something, I think, in that moment where I could have stood up within myself and have known what to think, how to react, how to look. My anger for the little man was more fear than pride, hatred than understanding; I couldn't even act within and stand up for the "wop" in me, let alone earn any kind of affinity with the driver—"He's your kind, ain't he?"—Damn fucking right he was.

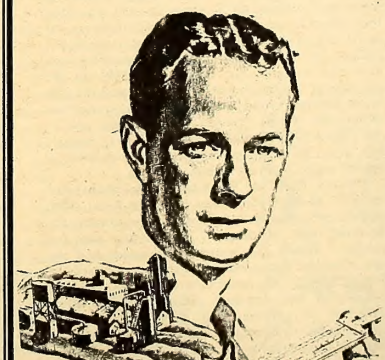
Life, if looked upon in the way I felt it in the subway, is a horrible condition. Within moans the cry "Leave me alone! Leave me alone!" tied inextricably with the plea "Touch me! Help me!" Manipulating the burdens of being a human being, playing off my group affinities—poor, Italian, lower class—with my individual idiosyncrasies—concepts of myself as "innocent," order up against chaos, sensitive me against a practical, unfeeling world—there remained no room left to be any one but a mass of reactions. There was no me to stand up to the little man. Maybe that's what courage is, and maybe that's what the driver didn't see.

I sometimes think I have to remember and know as best I can, all my group ties, my individual weaknesses, and because of it all (not in spite of it all) strike out into the world as though I had, in some brief shining self-realization, discovered who I was—a sort of dialectical process, from the "group" to my idea of myself, synthesized into a declaration of action. In the case of the subway, it could have been only inward "spiritual" action (perhaps where most "action" takes place), but it would have been action nonetheless. There would exist no need to "reach out" to the driver, or recoil from the little man, I would "be" each moment—and the fact that I was or that I "be" would be my declaration.

Memory, then, or contemplated history, gives one a considered perspective for raw anger; it expands one's vision to encompass both the reasons why one is angry and what one can do or accomplish with it. The individual as a synthesis of reactions to "group" and idiosyncrasy, in the mature individual, evokes a "positive" response—an older Hamlet, a less-sure-of-himself Othello—to strike through these idiosyncratic reactions and group affinities into the outside world, to "assert their individuality" as they say. And perhaps all this is merely an assertion of one's right to be alive, legitimacy in the light of others.

So what's this got to do with anything? Perhaps now I'm looking forward to hitting the subway again, being called a "fucking wop," bearing the burden of the white society's decay—and knowing who I am.

Hell, some of the littlest things in life make everything else worthwhile.□



David Makarechian

Apartheid American Style

The CCCAA and divestment supporters may have fallen short with the decision of the Trustees last weekend, but the activists did achieve one very important goal—the teach-in, rallies, and media blitz educated the community on the evils of Apartheid The long history of abuses in South Africa is horrifying—even the most conservative are shocked that institutional racism still exists in the world.

The merits of divestment notwithstanding, we can applaud the protestors for trying to restore the United States to its position as a city on a hill: a model of morality for the world to emulate. It's only natural for a free society to protest barriers to freedom abroad. After all, one wouldn't expect the people of the United States to protest Apartheid if we hadn't already eliminated institutional racism.

But we haven't already eliminated institutional racism. A distinctly American version of Apartheid is thriving in this country. Its oppressive machinery is contradicting claims of righteous Americans trying to stamp out evil governments abroad. In short, those who live in glass houses shouldn't throw stones.

Or should I say glass tepees.

Admittedly, the oppression of Native Americans may seem to be old hat, and a boring issue. But in our haste to divest, to protest, to man the shanties, and to righteously police a foreign society, we should not forget that our society is guilty, too.

American style Apartheid like South Africa's, starts with government. The United States rules Native Americans through a bureau of the Federal Government. No other ethnic group is represented that way. The Bureau of Indian Affairs is a branch of the Department of Interior, where, according to insiders, gravel gets more attention than Indians because it has a more important economic impact.

American style Apartheid, like South Africa's, is extended to the school system. Russell Means, leader of the American Indian Movement AIM, sums it up best: "When you're taught that your country was discovered by a white man, when you're taught that your mother and father are pagan savages who scalped and attacked wagon trains, etc., none of it being the truth, of course, your feelings of self-worth and self-dignity suffer greatly."

Perhaps the understatement of the century.

And American style Apartheid, like South Africa's, destroys cultural identity. Native Americans have been expected to assimilate, rather than to preserve their heritage. For example, a number of states are currently protesting gambling on Indian reservations—even though most of the reservation's inhabitants see gambling as the Indian's oldest profession. And of course, the white man's economic, legal, and social values are all forced upon the Native American. Self-determination may be the only American value that the Indian has been spared.

A radical solution to destroy American apartheid advocated by AIM and other Native groups seeks to restore choice and to eliminate bureaucracy in Indian affairs. The agency would be abolished, and absolute self-determination would be restored for each locality. The individual could choose a lifestyle—and a value system—that fits him the best.

Freeing Native Americans from the clutches of the Federal Government and the White Man's values isn't necessarily a throw back to bow and arrow days. Everyone knows that the day of the open range and the buffalo are gone.

But the independence movement does hold a promise to end the suppression that has decimated a people's character and has precluded their growth in society. It could encourage the cultural reawakening that Indians have experienced in the last decade—which has given the Native American a new awareness of what he can do in society.

Institutional racism is not always riots, random killings, and totalitarian government. Because of it, decimation of individual character, it's all the same. A house cleaning is in order to eliminate institutional racism anywhere in the world. But we should clean our house before we clean any other. □ ontribute to a revolutionary upheaval and an tendant, massive loss of life.

Mark Thesing's "No More Mr. Nice Guy" and Michael S. Mehan's "The Bottom Line" will appear again in the next issue.

e Board of Trustees at CC has among its most rtant legal obligations responsibility for the ary well-being of the institution. Expert advice to the Investment Committee of the Board and full Board is that divestment at this time could ribute to the weakening of the financial rpinnings of the College. The taking of such a risk ot be justified if the step in question were clearly portable on practical, political, or moral grounds. the reasons cited the step of divestment does not ear to be justified on any of these grounds. sequently, the Board reaffirms its standing policy. o concluding notes should be registered. The first oncern on the part of the Board that the debate on us about divestment has not been balanced. efore, the Board has authorized the inistration of the College to provide sufficient for an appropriate, on going debate on the issue, ded that both pro- and anti-divestment speakers brought to campus.

econd, the Board has authorized the appointment small ad hoc committee of Trustees, including but mited to members of the Investment Committee, eet from time to time with a corresponding mittee from the campus to discuss the South an situation and its implications for the College's ments. The campus committee should be posed of both faculty and students. Similarly, ence on the committee of both proponents for sued investment in South Africa-related rations and proponents for divestment will be latory if the process is to function in a uctive fashion.□

New Ski Resorts and the Environment

The United States Forest Service has given its approval to two proposed ski areas in the Wolf Creek Pass area of southern Colorado. The areas would do extensive damage to the natural ecosystems of the area, pollute streams, and bring thousands of high-impact human beings to the region. However, they probably would not attract enough skiers to make a profit. Both areas, given the environmental degradation they would cause and their questionable ability to stay afloat financially, should not be built.

The Wolf Creek Valley and East Fork projects are located in a relatively undeveloped area between Pagosa Springs and Wolf Creek Pass in the San Juan Mountains. The San Juan Range is one of the biggest areas of undeveloped land left in Colorado, and must play a major role in any plan for the preservation of wildlands and wildlife in the state's future. Because of th size of the region, species of wildlife that need large amounts of territory still live there; a grizzly bear (which is a threatened species) was even found several years ago. And, because the area is still fairly wild, ski resorts are sure to do major damage to the pristine ecosystems. Between them, the proposals would develop around two thousand acres of ski terrain and destroy valleys and forests with more than five thousand condos and other housing.

Streams would also take a beating — up to a million gallons a day of treated sewage each day could be spewed into the, wrecking the fishing quality. And, development of ski slopes and the construction of condominiums and other buildings would cause a major increase in the amount of sediment eroded into the streams.

You'd think that proposals like these would be stopped by the Forest Service solely on the basis of their environmental impact. Unfortunately for the regional ecosystem, the projects have been approved, not halted, and environmental degradation is not even the only bad thing about them. The other bad aspect is this: it is not at all certain that, after a thorough trashing of the forests, valleys, and streams of the area, the projects will make enough money to keep operating. There has been so much downhill skiing available at new ski areas in the state that skiers can't use it all. This kind of oversupply helped put the Broadmoor in financial trouble last year, and it was a factor that helped close Eldora ski area near Boulder permanently. Another financial consideration is that construction would require several million of your tax dollars to upgrade the airport in Pagosa Springs.

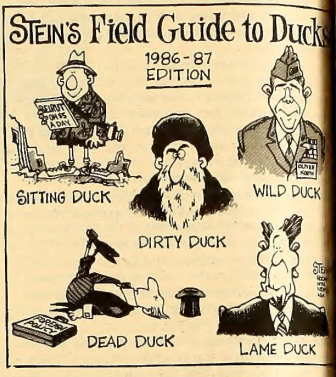
There is no doubt that Wolf Creek Valley and East Fork are extremely damaging and extremely unnecessary. This is a classic case of the pro-development Forest Service giving its approval to a couple of awful projects. Wolf Creek Valley and East Fork would destroy the environmental quality of a crucial wild area in Colorado, and would probably go bankrupt anyway. An environmental impact statement (EIS) has been released for the East Fork Project, and the Forest Service is accepting public comment about the proposal (comments will be used in deciding whether or not to go ahead with construction). Let the Forest Service know that East Fork is wasteful and destructive and must be stopped. Mention the Wolf Creek Valley project, too. Write to Forest Supervisor John Kirkpatrick, San Juan National Forest, 701 Camino Del Rio, Durango, CO 81301.

Other Environmental Updates:

 Support is building behind an effort to get the Gunnison River (near Black Canyon) and the North St. Vrain River (north of Boulder) designated as "wild and scenic" rivers. Wild and scenic rivers are protected from many forms of development, including dam building. Please write to Senators Wirth and Armstrong, and Representative Hefley, expressing support for wild and scenic designation for both rivers. Write to senators at U.S. Senate, Washington, DC 20510. Write to representatives at U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC 20515.

 A legislative alert network for nuclear issues is being started on campus. If you are interested write letters to senators and representatives before critical arms control votes, write your name, on-campus address, phone number, and home state on a piece of paper and put it in the Nuclear Action Coalition box in the Student Center. Or, send it to Nuclear Action Coalition, c/o Student Center, through intra-campus mail. □

BY ERIC JOHNSON



Gay Awareness Week

"You don't have to be South African and Black to oppose Apartheid You don't have to be gay or lesbian to oppose discrimination aginst those of us who are." (F[illegible] Kratsche, Catalyst, 5/12/86)

We find it frustrating that the struggle for gay rights has been carried only by gay men and lesbians. While we can work for divestment from South Africa, opposition to the contras in Nicaragua, or women's rights, our straight counterparts rarely voice their support for gay rights. Because no one is free until all are free, the ending of gay oppression is as important as the fights against racism and sexism. The strong emergence of homophobia in the 1980's has caused the struggle for gay rights to be not only taboo but dangerous. If one works for the movement, one is assumed to be gay and is discriminated against accordingly.

What is it like to be gay and "out" on the CC campus? The discrimination is subtle and pervasive. Gays are the largest single minority on the campus and the most oppressed. How does a lesbian react to a "screw your roommate" party where one's roommate must find a male date for the other? How do we justify to ourselves the times that we have lied about our sexuality? By lying, we are denying all that gay activists have fought for in the last one hundred years; yet at the same time we are forced to act with intelligent discretion. Gays are oppressed by the assumptions that permeate society. One assumes that people are straight; this is ironic considering the Alfred Kinsey report showing that at least 10% of the adult population is gay.

The Out and About/Gay student group on campus has tried to tackle these assumptions on many different levels. On the personal level we have begun the re-education process necessary to celebrate our sexuality. By reading gay literature, watching movies, and discussing personal stories, the process of divorcing ourselves from heterosexual propaganda has begun. However, our focus has now shifted to education of the predominately homophobic CC campus. By sponsoring Gay Awareness Week, the group hopes to begin to make the campus aware of gay struggles.

Being aware however does not stop with no longer making jokes about gay people, using derogatory slang, or causing actual physical harm. Awareness does not stop with the acceptance of gays as equal or the willingness to work for gay rights. Awareness is the knowledge that the vast majority of our social structures are repressive for gays and that our own assumptions perpetuate that oppression. One must deal with one's own discomfort about the issue and realize the way we all oppress gays with our silence. The times that we have not confronted those who repress us makes us just as responsible as those who overtly condemn homosexuals. We, along with all the members of Out and About, encourage all — gay and straight — to attend the activities in Gay Awareness Week as a beginning process of self liberation.

Schedule of Events (First week of 8th Block)

Monday, April 6th: Movie "Parting Glances" A hilariously touching movie about two men who have been lovers for years. Robert is being transferred out of the country, and his lover, Michael, is being left behind. The movie explores the relationship between gays and straights, the impact of AIDS on the attitudes of several generations of gays, and the thin line separating lovers and friends in the gay world. Has been called "the best movie ever made about gays in the United States" and "the most promising feature-film debut by a young American writer-director in several years." Armstrong 300, 7:00 p.m.

Tuesday, April 7th: Workshop "Homophobia and the 80's" Kathy Obear, Gates Common Room 3:30. Are the prevailing attitudes about homosexuality the "natural state" of things? Come discuss how the backlash against the women's movement and the breakdown of traditional sex roles has increased the level of homophobia in our society, adversely effecting both gays and non-gays. Workshop will allow everyone to explore their own feelings about homophobia in a nonthreatening environment and help challenge myths.

Wednesday, April 8th: John Boswell author of Christianity, Social Tolerance and Homosexuality will speak at the Lloyd lecture. 8:15 p.m. Packard.

Thursday, April 9th: John Boswell will speak at the Thursday-at-11. Packard.

Friday, April 10th: "Blue Jeans Day" Are you opposed to discrimination against gays? Show your support of gay rights by wearing blue jeans on Friday.

Monday, April 13th: "Straight Night" 6:00 Dern House. Come discuss what life is like for gay men and lesbians at CC with members of the Out and About group. Feel free to come with any questions you might have.

Throughout Gay Awareness Week we will be asking all to show their support for changing the anti-discrimination policy at CC by signing the following petition. The Board of Trustees will consider the clause at their June board meeting.

"The Colorado College professes to be a leader in the field of higher education and an institution based in the liberal arts tradition. In keeping with this tradition, The Colorado College has consistently provided a community where social equality and the free exchange of ideas are treasured. With this in mind we urge The Colorado College to continue in its commitment to leadership and social progress.

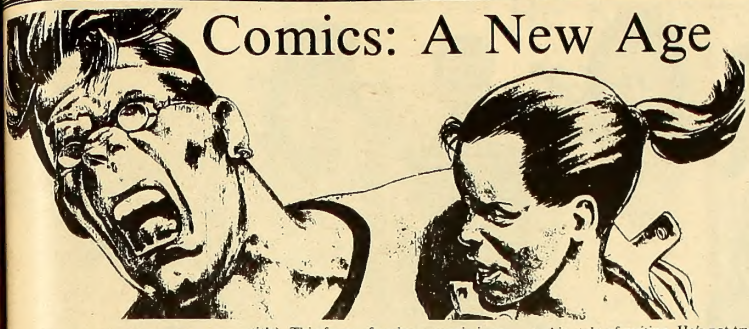
"In providing such leadership, we must not be bound by conventional views or thinking. We therefore believe it is crucial for The Colorado College to join with other leading institutions such as Amherst, Harvard, Williams, and Yale and corporations like American Telephone and Telegraph, CITICORP, Adolph Coors Co., General Electric, and Standard Oil of California in formally declaring that we will not discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation.

"The Colorado College embodies the ideal that if a person is to be judged, it should be on the basis on their demonstrated and potential merits, not the trappings of the society in which we live. Therefore, we ask you to add to the affirmative action clause a phrase which clearly states that The Colorado College will not discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation in its educational programs, activities, or employment policies. This should appear not just in the by-laws of the College, but also in the faculty Handbook, Support Staff Handbook, The Colorado College Bulletin, and the prospectus sent to interested students.

"Through this action, The Colorado College will help lead the way in freeing society from its outdated constraints and will, in a positive way, promote the ideas which the Colorado College seeks to instill in its students." □

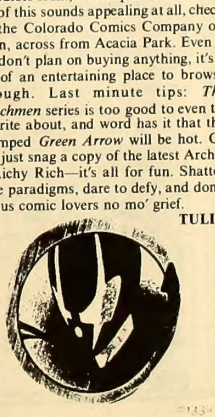
BY STEPHANIE BRYSON
RAINA BRUBAKER
TAMARA BARTLETT
KRIS HATELID
JILL SCHWAB
HEIDI SCHMIDT

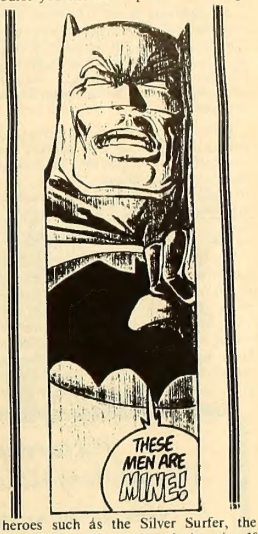
Comics: A New Age



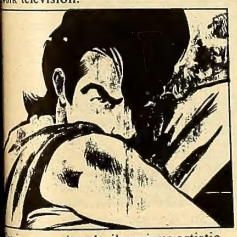
I've only touched upon a few of the titles and personalities reshaping the comics world. For those who have never been inclined towards comics, there are two major comic companies: Marvel and Detective Comics (DC). The past decade was dominated by Marvel. Recently it appears the tide is turning. Many of Marvels best writers are leaving for DC or independent companies. The Dark Knight series has set off a chain of character renovation throughout the comic industry. Characters are being transformed from paper-mache, kid-stuff characters to more complex and in-depth individuals. In short; the mainstream comic industry is maturing. There are plenty of modern classics I haven't mentioned such as David Sim's Cerebus the Aarrdvark, Matt Wagner's Mage, and Liberatore's Ranxerox. And of course you should keep in mind vintage heroes such as the Silver Surfer, the Incredible Hulk, and Captain America. If any of this sounds appealing at all, check out the Colorado Comics Company on Tejon, across from Acacia Park. Even if you don't plan on buying anything, it's a hell of an entertaining place to browse through. Last minute tips: The Watchmen series is too good to even try to write about, and word has it that the revamped Green Arrow will be hot. Or hey, just snag a copy of the latest Archie or Richy Rich—it's all for fun. Shatter those paradigms, dare to defy, and don't give us comic lovers no mo' grief.

TULIO





ast block-break I was fighting the rums pretty well. Until Friday ning. Speaking figuratively, it was as six hundred pound amorphous ture wearing a greasy blue tank-top ded "depression" was crushing my face first into a endless steel slab ed "meaningless existence." Yeah, of those mornings. Since I wasn't g up to playing the tortured artist turning my emotions into something ssive which other people could bum on, I needed another solution quick. ntown Colorado Springs was my tion. Spent forty bucks on records, s, pizza and ice cream. Ended the happier than a good ol' boy with an ola in one hand and a Moon Pie in ther (well, at least as happy). Most le are probably aware of the spiritual ing power of records, pizza, and of e Josh and John's. But how many of are clued into the fact that comic s aren't kid stuff anymore? Okay, most comics have some sort of ce fiction, fantasy, or adventure twork that they're built around. e people will never find this genre rising, but don't start talking to me t "still livin in the fourth grade" n your mind's vegetating in front of rk television.

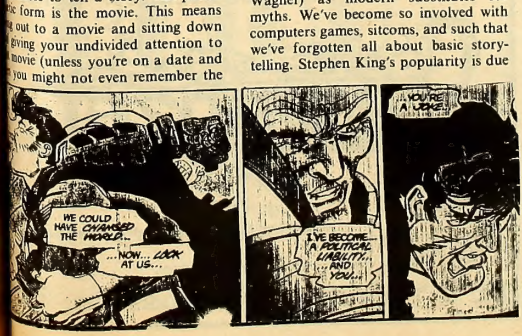


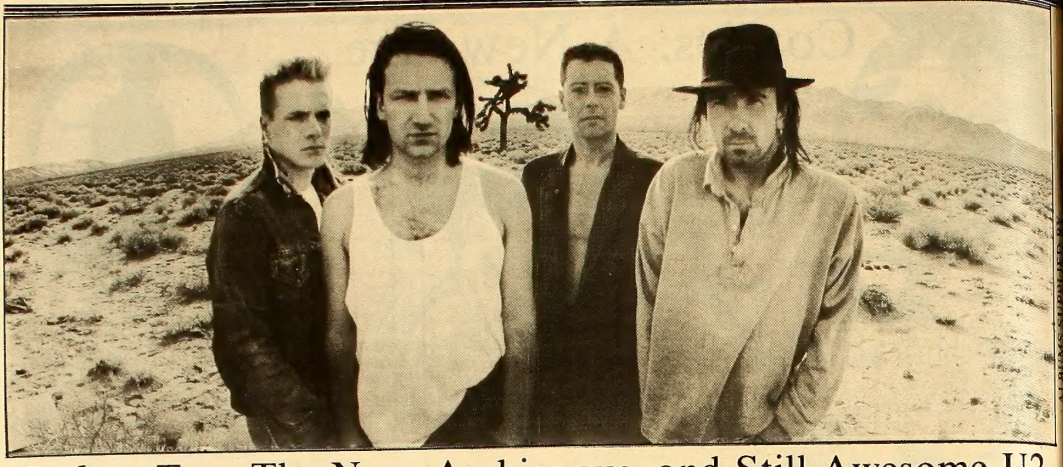
mics are a singularly unique artistic um. They combine words and es in a static form. Static form is ny way of saying its there in your ds and not projected or electronic. can put it down and finish it later, n up and paste all over your erator, roll it up and chase erels...whatever. This is in contrast to inetic means of combining words pictures to tell a story. The purest ic form is the movie. This means g out to a movie and sitting down giving your undivided attention to movie (unless you're on a date and you might not even remember the title). This form of seeing a movie is an experience. VCR's do not generally provide experiences. This is not to say that they aren't fun, inexpensive and can't give you access to material you'd never see at any Spring's cinema. But some movies just don't belong on a twenty-four inch screen; it's just not the same. Even a cinema movie doesn't have the aforementioned advantages of comic books.

Responsibility for this new golden age of comics lies primarily with new writers and illustrators who are willing to take risks. I can still remember my amazement after finishing The Swamp Thing, issue thirty. This was the first issue I'd read since Alan Moore began writing it. Here was someone who realized the potential of combining powerful writing with the paneled format of comic books. Alan Moore will set you up word by word, frame by frame so that as you turn the page you're hit with a full-page graphic visualization of your worst nightmare. The artwork of Bissette and Totleban provide the spectacular visuals. The Swamp Thing's first couple of issues were intense enough to lose the comics code approval. Yet at the same time Moore wasn't just going for the shock effect. He took Berni Wrightstone's humanoid slime and turned it into a earth elemental; a representation of "the green." Sounds pretty corny huh? Yeah well, so would a lot of the greek myths if you'd never heard them before. Ken Kesey saw comics (and this was before modern masters such as Moore, Miller and Wagner) as modern substitutes for myths. We've become so involved with computers games, sitcoms, and such that we've forgotten all about basic story-telling. Stephen King's popularity is due to his style of writing. He's not trying to impress anyone; he just wants to tell a story. Admittedly, a lot of new comics are violent. Yet Wendy Pinn has created a serious called Elfquest which is the comic book equivalent of Tolkein's The Hobbit, in the sense that it's not childish yet it doesn't deal with spine-cracking ultraviolence either.

Frank Miller has that field well taken care of. Anyone who has seen "A Clockwork Orange," "Scarface" or "The Road Warrior" knows that creative genius can work through a violent medium. His best-known work is his "Dark Knight" series. In this series he takes the character of Batman and turns him into a semi-psychotic vigilante that makes Swarzenegger's Mazola posturing seem shallow and contrived. Throughout the entire series (available now in book form) Miller prods the reader's notions of urban crime and vigilanties with exaggerated heroes and villains. Robin turns out to be a girl and Superman is a pawn of the government; totally lacking in character. The Batmobile looks like a tank and if you ever see Batman smile it isn't a happy smile; it's a lot more like Jack Nicholson's twisted grin. Frank Miller isn't writing for kids.

HE WEARS THE FLAG.
I HADN'T NOTICED.
IT DOESN'T MEAN ANYTHING TO THEM. THINKS THE SOLDIER, TO THEM, IT'S JUST A PIECE OF CLOTH.
SOMETIMES I FEEL SO SMART.





Joshua Tree: The New, Ambiguous, and Still Awesome U2

Did you know that according to Rolling Stone, The Beastie Boys currently have the number one album in the country? Now, that's scary! Therefore, in these disillusioned times, I'm happy that one of the truly exceptional bands of the eighties has a new album out.

The question is, can U2 live up to its previous success? Well, after listening to The Joshua Tree, I'd definitely have to say yes, this new album is unmistakably U2, but at the same time it contains surprising new sounds that further add to its appeal.

Even the title is the most different and ambiguous of all of U2's albums. The name refers to a twisted tree that grows in the Southwest deserts. It was once thought that its gnarled branches symbolized the Old Testament prophet Joshua pointing the way to the promised land. For a band that has become famous for facing social and political injustice head-on, this title fits the album.

The Joshua Tree immediately takes you in with fast anthem-like songs such as "Where The Streets Have No Name" and "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For." In contrast to the rather negative name and lyrics, the latter tune has a pleasing upbeat sound that is reminiscent of "Bad" from the previous album.

"With Or Without You" is next on the side and changes the pace of things a bit. It's a slower captivating song that seems to swell up and down and finally climax with Bono exclaiming the title refrain repetedly.

In sharp contrast to "With Or Without You" is the brash cut "Bullet The Blue Sky" that denounces such things as America's involvement with fighting overseas. With the help of a heavy beat and the Edge's haunting guitar licks the song has a raw sound similar to that of previous albums like Boy.

"Running To Stand Still" ends side one and almost completely shuns the trademark U2 sound. It starts out with Blues guitar that reminds me of Ry Cooder's work on the Paris Texas soundtrack. Later, the song slides into a sixties fold-song sound. Peaceful? Yes, but the lyrics are another tale of heroin addiction. The ending mirrors the beginning and Blues harmonica interjections further spice things up.

Experimentation with different styles continues on side two with "Trip Through Your Wires" which has a distinctive country feel. I know that seems surprising, but with the use of clever harmonica work and a good foot stomping beat it comes across really well.

This rocker quickly goes into "[illegible] Tree Hill." It sounds so jubliant & upbeat that it's hard to believe, unless listen to the lyrics, that it was written [illegible] U2 crew member that was killed motorcycle accident. Towards the Bono's voice rises up in so much emo tha the song becomes very Gospel-like later ends in a slow elegy.

The ending of the album is similar that of the last one, The Unforgett Fire, but instead of Martin Luther this eerie ode goes out to "Mother The Disappeared." The whispery vo and slow steady beat have a ra mesmerizing effect that gradually b you to the outer-most branches of wonderful Joshua Tree. My high recommendations go out to this albu

KATIE DALSEM

The Scoop on CD's

We all have our favorite creature comforts. And since most of us here get nice fat checks from mommy and daddy, many of life's little luxuries come our way. My personal money vacuum is music. Yesterday that vacuum engulfed a large wad of cash and spewed back a compact disc player. I thought was just going to write an article on CD's. Well, at least I didn't buy all the disks I wanted, so I can still eat. If you're one of the supposed 2,500,000 people buying a disc player this year, here's a few facts I dug up.

Compact disc players range in price from about $129.00 for your bargain-buy model to about $7,000.00 for an Acuphase state-of-the-art. Any player under $200.00 one should research carefully. Although the components might be basically the same as a $400.00 model the quality of workmanship is not. Without quality parts and design you may find yourself buying a new player after a few years. Phillips (Magnavox in America) and Sony co-developed the Compact Disc system, so any model by either company should be trustworthy.

But everybody knows it's not the player that'll put you in the poor house; it's the discs. The specialist I spoke with at the Sound Shop defined the price range as being within twelve to fifteen dollars. I personally haven't seen too many twelve or thirteen dollar discs. But then Colorado Springs is not known for its low record prices either. For those of you who are biding your time, waiting for disc prices to come down; think again. Disc sales went up about 300 per cent last y It's no secret the record industry has b hammered upon by home-taping double tape decks. With the onset digital recording they could be facin full-on financial crisis. The last thing want to do is lower disc prices. Actua considering how much more complex to make a disc (factory rooms ar thousand times cleaner, spec-wise, th hospital rooms) the prices are fa reasonable. Many used record st carry used disks for around ten doll

So, is vinyl going the way of th track? Doubtful. Yet we will be see CD singles and interactive CD/video is the recording medium of the fut While it won't be in the graveyard quite awhile, it appears that records be taking third place to CD's and casse I still think they're more fun that C anyway.

TULIO BROWNI

Picture yourself at The Antlers Hotel for graduation.

Colorado Springs' finest...for only $65!

Colorado Springs' only 4-star hotel, The Antlers, has a special offer for parents of graduating CC seniors.

- Single or double occupancy room rate of only $65!
- A free portrait of your graduate, with family if you wish
- Special car rental rate from Enterprise Leasing for Antlers guests only...the car of your choice for just $21.95 per day! (Subject to availability)
- Complimentary valet parking

Call Cynthia at The Antlers for reservations and let us know you're the parent of a Colorado College graduate...we'll make this special event picture perfect!

The Antlers Hotel
Chase Stone Center
Colorado Springs
In Colorado (303) 473-5600
Toll-Free 1-800-232-2323

theAntlers

Operated by Broadmoor Management Company
©1986 The Antlers

Hair Designers for Men & Women

RAPUNZEL

Style cuts, Cellophanes, Perms & Color.

Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.

Stop in or make your appointment:

827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

agrada Familia by Lise Grace from her Senior Art Show in Packard gh Spring Break. This multi-media piece is one of a varied, intelligent, and thought-out collection.

Be Kind to Art

CC is a liberal arts college, right? That is to say, we try to learn a little bit of everything from bio to art in hopes of becoming well-educated people. Art, yes, of course.

Art majors have art shows that are up and down in one week. But the college doesn't have a museum, gallery, or any sort of permanent collection of art. Why is this?

Some may consider all the construction sites as a form of "raw art" (who made that stencil anyway?), but let's not get too liberal, and instead look forward to a wide range of large-scale contemporary sculptures that will be erected this weekend around campus in highly visible areas.

The art works will give us something to stare at, gather around, and talk about.

As mentioned in an earlier issue of the Catalyst, there will be nine pieces in this outdoor exhibit created by a group of artists from the Rocky Mountain region called FORM, inc. Robert Mangold, Mike Molliconi, Jeff Nelsen, Frank Swanson, Bill Vielehr, Doug Wilson, Jerry Wingren, and our own art professor, Carl Reed, as members of FORM, plus a visiting artist, Charles Parsons, will each contribute an original work. These monumental pieces will be seen on campus from Monday, March 23, through September.

The exhibit is in conjunction with a course entitled "Public Sculpture" taught by professors Ruth Kolarik and Reed this block. Reed's contribution is an assembled sculpture in which the students of his class will actually go through the process and participate in setting up such a sizeable piece. "It will give the students more of a real life experience," said Reed, "a sense of the immediate."

The artists anticipate some controversy from their show, but hope that the students' reactions will not be as childish as those of several Denver University students who vandalized a piece that was exhibited on DU's c. mpus grounds.

Unfortunately, a section of sculptor Bill Vielehr's which was installed early, located just south of Tutt Library, has already been pushed over and broken. Granted, not everyone will like these contemporary pieces, but let's encourage people to treat the outdoor sculptures with respect. These artists have worked very hard — and if you do have any violent (or pleasant) reactions to them grab a pen, not a hammer, and write a letter to the editor!

Hopefully, after exposing the students and faculty of CC to the pleasure of having art surrounding the campus, the college will be inspired to purchase some of its own. Artworks have a certain power and are meant to cause a reaction on the viewer's part. Feel free to visit with the artists who will be scattered around the campus this weekend. And watch their creations come to life.

SUSAN GRIAK

What's On Your Turntable

Laurel McLeod, Dean of Students
George Winston, "Winter to Spring"

Hans Krimm, Professor, Philosophy
Mozart Violin Concertos

Mike Fraterelli, Junior, History
Yes, "Yessongs"

Jim Grossman, Junior, Poli. Sci.
Leon Redbone, "Red to Blue"

Ellen Stein, Senior, Art Studio
Warren Zevon, "Excitable Boy"

Jeannette Hawes, Freshman, French
Style Council, "My Ever Changing Moods"

Photo by Jane Berman

CAFE BIJOU
DINING & SPIRITS
• serving • nch & light dinners, exquisite desserts & coffees
• first floor •
jazz, cocktails & hors d'oeuvres
• second floor •
o the night fantastic in a turn of the century home
East Bijou 632-9640
g in this ad for a free specialty drink with your lunch or dinner

YAKITORI
Sushi Happy - Hour
Saturday's 5 - 7 pm
Most Pieces of Sushi $1.00 a piece*
* Some are more.

Downtown
16 E. Bijou
578-0915
Yaki-Doodle

Woody's Got One

The thing about Woody Allen movies is that you can't judge them on any sort of scale that you would a regular movie. On the way to the theatre, you already know that what you're about to see will be funny, warm and intelligent—in other words, miles above the trash usually shown at the various multi-plexes sprinkled about our fair city. So it's pointless to tell you that Radio Days is a great movie; the question is, how great is it in its own class? How does it rate on the Allen Barometer?

(My editor just told me that I've implied all other movies suck and that everybody loves Woody Allen. It is not my intention to discriminate or make sweeping generalizations, please, accept my apology now and don't write and bother the editor.)

Anyway, Radio Days is a sort of self indulgent period piece. Woody doesn't appear, but his voice narrates as we see vignettes from the life of a Rockaway, New York Jewish family in the 1940's. The family is one we've seen before, as is the bespectacled, red haired kid playing young Woody. This time, we get to spend more time with the family than we did in Annie Hall; the various characters become more sharp and clear. Each episode centers around radio, some by how it affects the family and some take place in the glamorous world behind the speaker. The plush, tinsel existence of the radio stars serves as a nice contrast to the very real, sometimes stark life that Allen's family lives in Rockaway. The movie takes place in two completely different worlds that somehow manage to revolve around each other; it is an effective comment on media for both then and today.

The thing about the vignette form of the movie is that some of them work and some of them don't. While many of the scenes are alternatingly hilarious and poignant, others seem hackneyed and drawn out. The Mia Farrow character in particular has some grating, too-familiar moments.

But Radio Days is, of course, great fun. Throughout the film old friends continue to appear out of the blue—some that haven't been in Allen movies in quite a while. After telling you to definitely go see it and have a good time, I'd say Radio Days rates a good solid six on the Allen Barometer.

NINA DE GRAMONT

State of the Tenor

Sit up nights weeping over the lack of good new jazz? Worn your Sonny Rollins discs clean through? Wondering what you can consume next? This pair of albums by Joe Henderson on Blue Note is just the ticket, hipsters. Taken from a weekend at the Village Vanguard in New York last year, these sides are inspired by Rollins in more ways than one. The format, tenor, bass, and drums, recall the classic pair of Blue Note albums Sonny Rollins cut with his trio at the Village Vanguard 28 years ago. Henderson's sound is straight out of Rollins as well. The absence of chordal accompaniment and the sparse instrumentation force the tenor and the bass to fill out the entire song. Henderson is up to the task, and here he's workin' out with some of the all-stars: Ron Carter on bass and Al Foster on drums. Ron Carter, consistently amazing throughout these two discs, has the ability to complete the harmonic and melodic foundations so that between the two of them, the piano is never missed. Don Sickler has done a great job of arranging these tunes for tenor and bass. The choice of material is generally lesser known compositions by the masters: Duke Ellington, Thelonius Monk, Charlie Mingus, Charlie Parker, Horace Silver, with 2 or 3 original compositions mixed in. Ron Carter's "Loose Change" on Vol. 1 is the only weak spot, and the trio kicks right back in with a great version of Monk's "Ask Me Now," followed by Henderson's bop composition "Isotope." Ron Carter's solo on this tune swings so hard. Some of the high points on Vol. 2 are the beautiful interpretation of Charlie Mingus' "Portrait" and Henderson's "The Bead Game," a great combination of slightly out playing and hard swing. Both of these albums are superb straight-ahead, and the CD's sound fantastic, if you can find them.

NICK NESBITT

Primordial Figure* #3 1984-S by Ki Hokushin. From the Third W States Exhibition at the Fine Arts C through May 10. The exc contemporary exhibition wil reviewed in the next Catalyst.

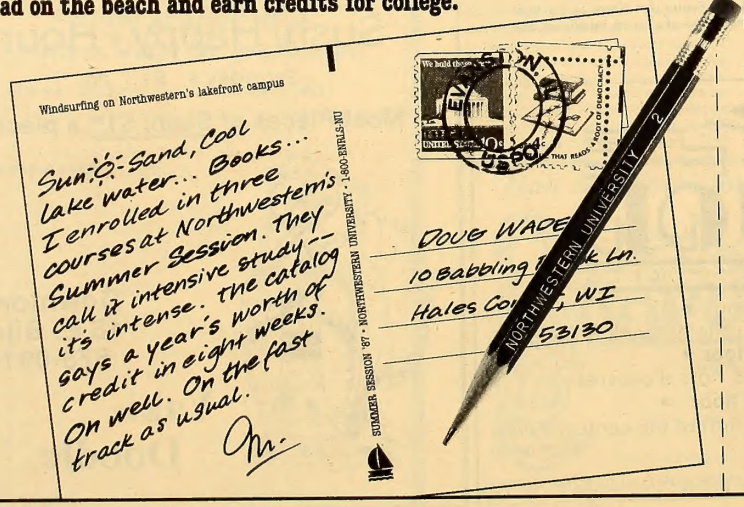
Living in the Shadows?
Leave the Cave!
Join LEVIATHAN #4
Before you hit the beach, submit political thought and commentary, PHOTOGRAPHY, fiction, ART, poetry, and YOUR CHAINS.
Photo by Jennifer

Read on the beach and earn credits for college.



Windsurfing on Northwestern's lakefront campus
Sun. Sand, Cool lake water... Books... I enrolled in three courses at Northwestern's Summer Session. They call it intensive study— it's intense. The catalog says a year's worth of credit in eight weeks. On well. On the fast track as usual.
SUMMER SESSION '87 • NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY • 1-800-ENRLS-NU
DOUG WADE
10 Babbling
Hales Co
WI
53130
NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
SUMMER SESSION '87

2003 Sheridan Road
Evanston, Illinois 60201

Please send my free copy of the Summer Session '87 catalog with financial aid and registration information. (Available mid-March)

Name

School Address

City

State Zip

Home Address

City

State Zip

Wish you were here.
Send the coupon or call 1-800-ENRLS-NU
(Inside Illinois call 312-491-5280)

Tigers Earn All-WCHA Honors

e season may have ended but the rs keep coming for some of the
rs. Two members of the 1986-87 ado College hockey team were ed to the All-Western Collegiate ey Association team and two more ved honorable mention. Senior trin Rob Doyle was chosen as an All-HA first team member as a enseman while senior center Rick Boh e second team. Honorable mention to sophomore standout Derek and junior Doug Clarke.

rth Dakota dominates the first team four players: forwards Tony Hrkac
Bob Joyce; Ian Kidd, the other enseman with Doyle; and Ed Belfour goal. Northern Michigan's Gary ons is the third forward. The second consists of Wisconsin's goalie Mike ter, forwards Tony Granato and Ranheim also of Wisconsin, and Millen of Minnesota, along with Defenders are Minnesota-Duluth's
Gosselin and Minnesota's Todd ards.

e All-WCHA team is voted on by am captains, members of the media, the schools' sports information tors. The voting is done in February the end of the regular season.

oyle, a second team selection his homore and junior year and rable mention his rookie season, ined Dave Feamster and Doug er earlier this season as the top-g defenseman in Tiger hockey
y with 202 career points (51 goals 51 assists).

was a nice way to end four years. It's al group of players and great to be in the same category as them," ented Doyle on his newest honor, ll-WCHA team.

ob Doyle was no surprise. He deserves it with all the records he set and everything he's accomplished in his career," said Head Coach Mike Bertsch.

Doyle was also the number two scoring defenseman in the WCHA this season, two points behind North Dakota's Kidd.

Boh, the leading scorer for the Tigers for the past two years, scored 22 goals and assisted 42 for a 64 point season this year. This was the most points scored by a CC player in one season since 1978-79. He finished his Tiger career tied for eleventh with Harry Whitworth (1946-50) on the school's all-time scoring list.

"Rick is definitely one of the top six or seven forwards in the league. And there isn't that much of a difference in talent level between the first and second team selections. Rick worked very hard in his four years to achieve this," praised Bertsch.

On his All-WCHA selection Boh said "It's nice to finally get recognition personally for four years of hard work. Especially when its not only the team that notices the improvements but the other players in the league."

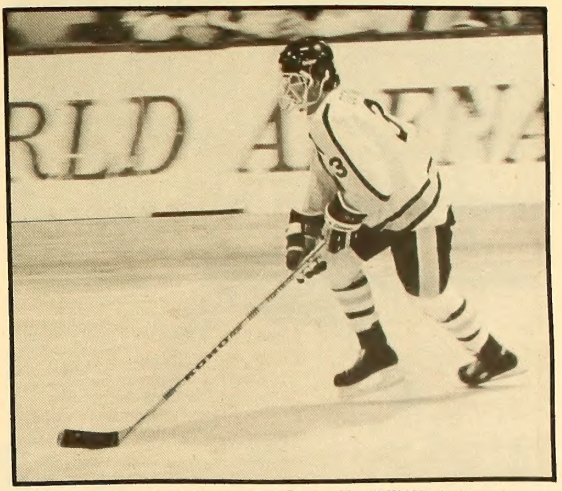
Other players aren't the only other ones to notice Rick Boh. He leaves tomorrow to join the Canadian Olympic team for three weeks on a tour of Canada. The team will be playing Russia and mostly European teams while the Tiger senior is with the team.

The Tiger Honorable Mentions, Clarke and Pizzey both will be returning next year to CC. Pizzey received WCHA Player of the Week twice this season with his outstanding play between the pipes and Clarke proved his versatility doubling as a left wing and defenseman.

Other Tiger seniors easily could have joined the All-WCHA ranks. Defenseman Scott Campbell gained a reputation as the league's best defensive checker. Campbell was also named WCHA Player of the Week for his defensive efforts in the first series against the Denver Pioneers during the regular season. Forwards Scott Schneider and Gord Whitaker both finished the season and their Tiger careers strongly. Schneider tallied 4 goals and three assists in the 10-2 massacre of the Pioneers in the last game of the regular season. He had nine points for the weekend and earned his WCHA Player of the Week title. In the last game of his college career, Schneider scored the winning goal inthe 2-1 victory over the University of North Dakota. Whitaker, a big man in front of the net for CC, had a hat trick in that 10-2 rout of Denver and went on to score two goals in the first game of the playoffs against the Pioneers.

These four named to the 1986-87 All-WCHA team represent the largest CC contingent in Bertsch's five years as head coach.

K. MAHONEY



All-time leading scoring defenseman Rob Doyle adds All-WCHA first team to his list of achievements. Photo by Ernie Ferguson rows the discus but his mind is on a Ranchman's Sepcial. Photo by Jerry Wang

Grossman Competes in Nationals

CC's alpine ski team, traditionally strong in the National Collegiate Skiing Association's Rocky Mountain Region, continued to strengthen its reputation by sending slalom and giant slalom ace Jim Grossman to the NCSA's National Championships at Crested Butte March 3-7.

Grossman, a junior from Sun Valley, Idaho, qualified for both the slalom and giant slalom events by finishing as the highest individual in the region outside of the region's top two teams, Brigham Young University and Western State College.

The CC team's third-place finish in the region is particularly satisfying considering the excellence of the top two teams. BYU could be competetive in NCAA Division I classification.

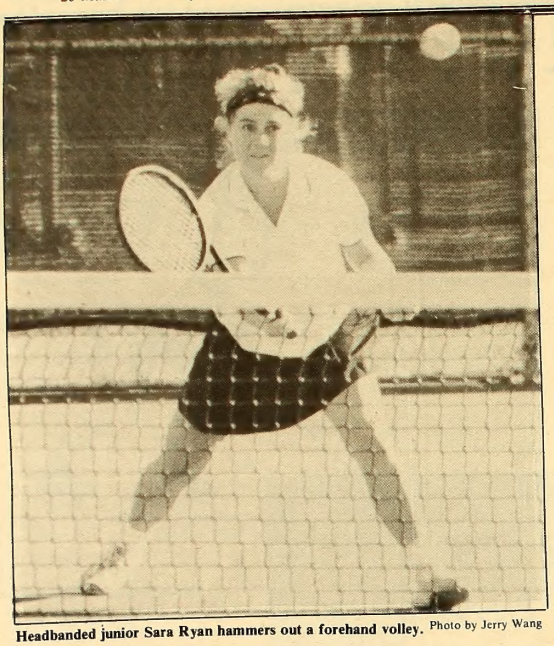
Starting in 50th position in the slalom, Grossman's excellent first run earned him 14th place heading into the second run. Unfortunately, a lost ski ten gates from the bottom of the course meant disqualification, but the giant slalom race remained.

Grossman's times for the GS had consistently been two to three seconds behind those of eventual champion Steve Jones of BYU all year. However, after his first run, a run Grossman understood from spectators to be comparable to his normal efforts, he was inexplicably nearly ten seconds behind Jones. Although this obviously resulted from a timing mistake, Grossman, racing as an individual in a team oriented championship, was not given proper time or consideration to look into correcting the error. Although CC Coach Mark Rinehard, as the NSCA's Rocky Mountain Region President, presided over the event, little effort was made to reevaluate Grossman's time, and he declined to take his second run.

Although he finished neither event, Grossman's excellent performance in the slalom hints at a strong future for his senior season. And CC's team, losing only one senior to graduation, will be bolstered by the return of national qualifier Martha Tierney, involvement of nationally ranked independent skiers Matt Carson and Mark Sandvik and an excellent recruiting class. With both experience and excellent depth, look for great things from CC's Ski Team in the 1987-88 season.

DEAN CAMPBELL

B.M.O.C. Jim Grossman carves.



Headbanded junior Sara Ryan hammers out a forehand volley. Photo by Jerry Wang

Women's Tennis

Tigers win first two, but suffer first loss to AFA in three years

The women's tennis team has gotten off to a promising 2-1 start this season. Posting decisive wins over Kearney State of Nebraska and Regis College of Denver, the team's only loss thus far came at the hands of Division II Air Force. Fourth-year Coach Erol Agnos has high hopes for her team which finished fourth in last year's Division III Nationals in Kalamazoo, Michigan, and was ranked fifth nationally over-all.

Six returning players and three freshmen make up the team whose starting line-up is as follows: at the number one singles is junior Sara Ryan, junior Theresa Kuehne, and freshman Stacey Wing, following in the second and third spots respectively. Senior co-captain Melissa Forbes is at No. 4, while junior Meredith Clark and freshman Josey Axt round out the squad at five and six. Ryan and Forbes are the number one doubles team with Wing and senior co-captain Kathleen Delaney at No. 2. Kuehne and Clark, No. 3 doubles. Returning sophomores Anchalee Smith and freshman Min-Min Lo add depth to the team which is necessary to gain another nationals bid.

Despite the bad weather which forced the women indoors for their first match against Kearney, CC cruised to a 9-0 victory without dropping a set. (Kearney) are a good team, but t extensive conditioning mad difference," says Coach Agnos of She continues, "I think the team best shape they've ever be Everyone's worked extremely h drills combining distance runnin footwork skills. I'm sure it will p down the road."

The team then coasted to an 8-1 over Regis in their second home Next, CC traveled to Air Force, lo 2 in a match that was much clos the score indicates. "We lost thre four three-set matches and come u on all but one tie-breaker. E played well, we just need some matches under our belt," comm Coach Agnos.

The women will play six matches on spring break in California th return home to play another six m in April. The team must do w California in order to receive a berth to nationals. Of their chanc post-season play, No. 1 Sara Ryan "We're in shape and we have the t we just hold on to what we've go half way there."

SARA RYAN

Women's Club Loses Heartbreaker in Thir

Susan Deeds' hat trick just wasn't enough to give the Colorado College women's club hockey team its first home ice victory last Saturday. The Tigers fell to the Denver Bandits 6-5 after Denver scored three unanswered goals in the third period.

CC held the lead at the end of the first and second periods but lost the offensive drive in the third.

Deeds opened the scoring in the second minute of play, stealing the puck from a Denver defenseman at the blue line. The junior right winger from Vermont beat the Bandits' goalie Dina Carson, a CC alumnus, one on one.

Less than a minute later Denver evened the score at 1-1, slipping the puck past Tiger netminder Sarah Turner.

Deeds took to the ice again and CC took over the lead again. Senior left winger Kathy Mahoney, also a New Englander, shot the puck from the left boards. Carson got a piece of it but tipped it into the slot where Deeds was all alone. She put the puck away in the upper left corner.

Once again Denver tied the game on a breakaway power play goal in the first period. CC rallied back with a goal from senior Sarah Flynn. Flynn, a center from New York, took the puck from a Denver defender and beat Carson stickside to make the score 3-2.

Denver came out at the start of the middle frame and erased CC's margin temporarily. Deeds topped off her hat trick to give the lead back to CC in the middle of the second. Mahoney, from behind the Bandits net, sent the puck up the middle and Deeds was there to pop it in. Denver answered that one less than a minute later but CC had one goal left in them.

Senior center Sarah Stevens (yes another New Englander) laid the puck on junior co-captain Sarah Meskin's stick. The Minnesota left winger skated down the left boards and fired one to the far corner for goal number five.

That was the Tigers' scoring drive and although Turner hung tough in net, aided by defenseman Martha Deeds, Kim "Quarters" Keely, and Christina Chamberlain, the Bandits explod the third period. The cursed one margin struck again.

This weekend the Tigers hos Aspen Motherpuckers at I tomorrow, Honnen Ice Palace. In th meeting of the two teams the Tigers close 4-3 game. The team w appreciate some support. The gam only last about an hour and in bet the second and third periods, there w a Shoot the Puck Contest. The w will receive a $25 gift certificate a Hub. So come on down to Honne Palace and cheer for the Tigers to some Motherpuckin' butt.

QUINN TIKKANEN

Photo by Jerry Wang

A CC rugger frantically tries to escape from a very smelly place.

Ruggers Rage

RUGBY (rug' be) A silly British tradition in which two opposing sides of fifteen dim-witted men chase after an over-inflated football in an effort to hurt one another before getting drunk.

Spring is in the air. That means that the snow in front of Armstrong (excuse me, Mandela) Hall will be gone in a month or so. But most importantly that means it's Rugby season.

Yes, the CC Rugby team after a couple of slow years is back in action. Under the organizational skill of Mark Vander Something the team has come together and faces a ten game season culminating in the Western Regional Sevens Tournament.

When aksed about the team this year, junior Bob Osmundson remarked, "It's a wild bunch o' guys. Party animals all of 'em. Some of them can even play Rugby." The team consists of players from every class. Some have played for years while others are playing for their first time.

The rules are fairly simple and the only requirements are the ability to run, tackle, drink beer and sing obnoxious songs. The game itself works off of rudimentary skills: running, passing, catching, kicking and hitting, combined with a certain Rugby finesse—a headed violence tempered with mo of sheer insanity and panic. The te led by senior fly-half Paul Schae gutsy and intelligent "Rugger" years of experience serve a inspiration for the younger pla "Pasta" Paul Fulginetti, a three Rugby veteran, said that he owe "determination and talent all t Bell." Bell along with Arthur provide technical strategies, emot unity and spiritual guidance for the But it's not the concerted effort of fi men working together. This was e last Saturday at Washburn Field. Tigers put on an impressive displa skill and sportsmanship under blazing March sun. Altho suffering a disappointing loss at hands of Metro, both players and seemed to have a grand good time. W asked to comment on the game, s Dickson Musslewhite responded grunts, gaseous expulsions and unintelligible combination of burp four-letter words. But it was a game. Fun for the whole family round up the kids, get the geriatrics bed, by a 12-pack of Schaefers and support CC Rugby.

O. P

...nued from p. 1

...ch of the Year," Olsen adds.

...dditionally, Olsen's performance at ...ion qualified her for the NCAA ...sion I meet to be held this week ...rsday through Saturday) in ...napolis.

...will give her a chance to compete ...st the best divers in the country, ... of them Olympic caliber," said ... Schofield, head coach of the CC ...en's Swimming and Diving team.

...en feels confident for the meet. She ...the Indianapolis facilities "amazing, ...est in the nation."

...thusiasm to compete withstanding, ...existed some question as to whether ...would participate in this weekend's ...petition.

...lthough she attended last year's ...sion I final in Arkansas and placed ...d and 33rd in the one- and three- ...r competitions, Beth had originally ...told that she wouldn't be allowed to ...pete this year because of the Division ...status of diving at CC.

...s it turned out, the CC Athletic ...artment decided to support Beth's ...sion I journey. Director Dick Tabor ...Coach Luckett-Lohse: "There's no ...stion about it; she's got to go. The ...question is who will go with her." ...cause Coach Luckett-Lohse was committed to attend the Divison III competition in Canton, where junior Craig Clear competes for the men's diving title this week, Beth lacked a coach for the Indianapolis meet.

Fortunately, Beth's mother volunteered to come along; CC quickly appointed her as an official school representative.

While Beth doesn't predict a high finish at the Division I championship, she reaffirms her confidence to compete. "Last year I just wasn't prepared; this year I have much more confidence."

"Diving is such a subjective sport. It's all performance in that one has to impress the judges...and it can get really frustrating—they study you, your suit, your attitude. It's not like swimming where you deal with time and flat-out racing. Diving is all performance," Beth says.

Men's Swim Coach Jerrel Lear believes that Beth's consistency stems from two qualities: "All the hours of work, her dedication, has strengthened her confidence. I think that confidence really showed up when she repeated as national champion. Beth has a great attitude toward diving and life. She sets goals and then carries them out."

Beth admits that she has "sometimes thought of devoting myself to Division I competition. But the sacrifices are so great. There's no chance to pursue anything else."

"The divers I'll be competing against live for this. They breathe it," Beth says.

How has Beth prepared for this higher level of competition? "I've been learning a lot of new dives lately, a real crash course. It'll be funny to see everyone at this meet. We'll have bruises all over our arms and legs from mistakes in practice."

While Beth excells in the one-meter event, she especially loves the three-meter. "I've always wanted to fly; the three-meter is where I can make attempts," Beth laughs.

In national competition each diver must fulfill a list of eleven dives: five required and six optionals.

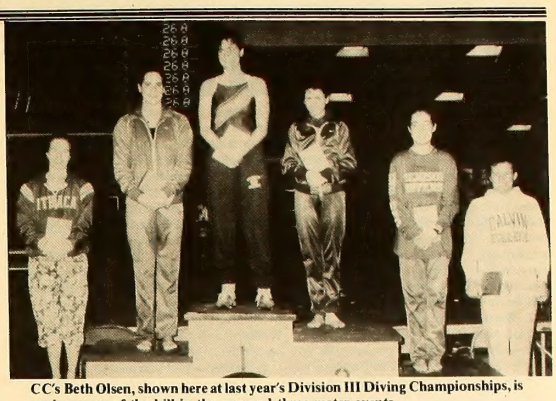
"I like to get the required dives out of the way," Beth admits. "It's great to lose myself in the twists and turns of the optional dives."

Many CC student/athletes find it difficult to concentrate on a varsity sport amidst the twists and turns of CC academic pressures. However, Beth enjoys the balance between school and sport at CC.

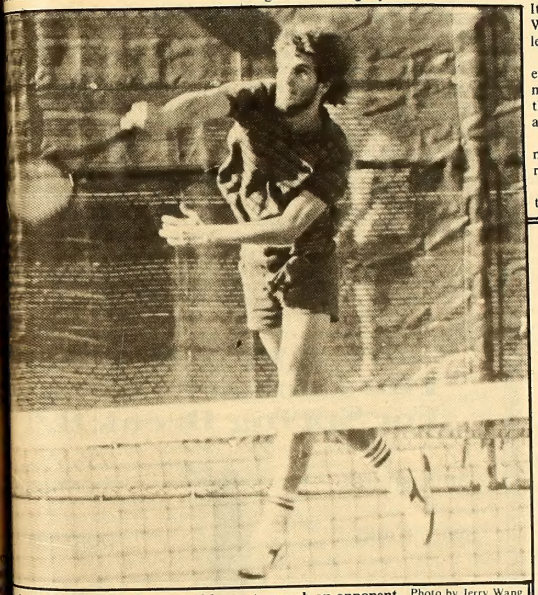
"Diving gives me a direction and a base. It's something I know very well, having dived since age seven; yet I can experiment with it as well. It gives me a chance to explore."

This weekend Beth Olsen will explore the competitive realms of Division I diving. As Head Coach Joani Schofield says, "Beth deserves that opportunity, especially since she had so little competition in Division III."

ALEC REKOW



CC's Beth Olsen, shown here at last year's Division III Diving Championships, is again queen of the hill in the one and three meter events.



...ded Bengal Kyle Fedler goes airborne to smash an opponent. Photo by Jerry Wang

...en's Tennis

...e men's tennis team opened its ...on on Saturday, March 7 against ... after having its first match against ...s cancelled due to snow the previous ...day. The Tigers dropped their ...er 5-4, as they split the six singles ...hes, but lost two of the three ...bles. Winners in singles were Kyle ...er at number two, John Osherwitz at ...ber four, and John Born at five. John ...an and Bill Poll combined for the ...n only win at doubles.

...ubber gym floor is not an optimal ...surface, but until their first match, ...eam had been confined to El Pomar's ...ce gym as they waited for the snow ...elt. Last week, the guys got outside ...e first time this month. Although ...ese conditions improved, their ...e schedule did not. On March 10 the ...k, much to their dismay, confronted ...Force. In singles, Bill Poll and John ... played impressively close matches. ...d the number one doubles team of ...Fedler and John Born, but despite ... efforts, the Tigers came away without winning so much as a single set. Coach Ken Bartz explains that, "Air Force is a tough division 1 team, and they're better this year than they have been in several years. They're probably the best that we'll play this year. We have a young team. I think we'll do well this year, but we're young."

On Thursday, two days after being drubbed by Air Force, the Tigers got their season on track at home, dealing a 6-3 loss to Regis. Kyle "The Rat" Fedler, John Duncan, John Osherwitz, John Born, and George Wilmer all collected wins in singles, with Poll and Duncan chalking up their season's second win at doubles.

The Tigers had a match cancelled on Tuesday due to Sunday night's snow, but they will battle Metropolitan at home on Friday and travel to CSU for a match on Saturday. Over Spring Break the men's team will travel to Phoenix to face southwest teams such as Gustavus Adolphus, Claremont, And Redlands.

JOHN DUNCAN

Photo Special!
Every Monday!
coupon
FREE
SECOND SET OF PRINTS
Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!
This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon.
819
Limited time offer.
Kodak Colorwatch System
WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!
Kodak
Ektachrome
Film
200
College Pharmacy
833 North Tejon • 634-4861

Baseball Predictions

American League Previews

The East

1. Toronto—The Blue Jays have evolved into a potential dynasty. They have loads of young talent and plenty more waiting in their farm system. With Barfield, Moseby, and George Bell in the outfield and Fernandez and Garcia anchoring the infield, they have outstanding offensive and defensive potential. If Stieb remains healthy there will be no stopping Toronto.

2. Boston—The Red Sox are in a very crucial situation. They must begin a transition to younger players. In 87 expect Ellis Burks and Pat Dodson to eventually take over for Henderson and Buckner respectively. As usual there are many questions for the Red Sox. If they manage to get everybody signed and the pitching remains sound Boston will take Toronto to the wire.

3. New York—I don't care how many runs they will score, the Yankees cannot win unless they trade Steinbrenner for some pitching. Rick Rhoden is not the answer. Henderson, Mattingly, Randolph, Righetti and Winfield are all tremendous competitors, they don't need any help from their owner. If the Yankees don't get some pitching the Mets will continue to own New York.

4. Detroit—Without All-Star catcher Lance Parrish I don't expect the Tigers to challenge. They seemingly have the talent to win, but they don't have the chemistry to follow through. Maybe winning in 85 was too easy.

5. Cleveland—With six different division winners in the last six years the Indians are due to win the division. Many observers think that they will. With a rotation including forty-eight year old Phil Niekro don't expect too much. Joe Carter may win the MVP but the Indians need pitching, and experience.

6. Milwaukee—The Brewers are another team needing experience. They have plenty of talent in Miguera, Nieves, Robidoux, and Deer but they have to develop the maturity of teammates such as Cooper and Yount. They have a good thing going and the fans must be patient.

7. Baltimore—I never thought I would see the day that I picked the Orioles last. Their problem is that they have too many big, slow players. Weavers theory of pitching, defense and the three run homer are a thing of the past. Look for big years from Boddicker, Murray and Ripken, also look for some wholesale changes by July.

The West

1. Kansas City—Don't under estimate the effect that Dick Howser has on this team. When he was down they were down, this year they will thrive off of his strength. Big years from Brett, Wilson, White, and a return to form of their temendous pitching staff will assure the Royals of a title in the weak American League West.

2. California—It looks to me that Gene Mauch will have to suffer for another year. It will be difficult for the Angels to recover from last years play-off loss. Look for Witt and McCaskill to have twenty win seasons while Wally Joyner and the rest of the Angels continue to be Almost good enough.

3. Oakland—The A's are a team on the rebound. They have developed a strong nucleus. Griffin, Canseco, and Davis are all stars. Reggie Jackson is losing his bat but should provide some previously needed leadership. If Andujar can keep a lid on his emotions LaRussa and the rest of his A's could be alive come September.

4. Texas—Like so many other teams in the West, the Rangers, are loaded with youth. Texas showed last year that hustle could make up for a lack of experience. I think a lot of the rookies, especially the pitchers will find it harder the second time around. With Incaviglia, Sierra, and rookie Jeff Kunkel the future is bright in Texas but give it another year.

5. Chicago—It is hard to tell how much Hawk Harelson screwed up the White Sox. He made too many changes to expect to win. Then he compounded it by changing the changes. Guillen, Walker, and Baines are exceptional players but they need some support.

6. Seattle—The Mariners should have taken some advice from their counterpart expansion team. Until recently the Mariners refused to establish a solid farm system. It is just starting to take root. Watch for big things from Mike Langston, Alvin Davis and third-baseman Jim Pressly. Seattle should take care of these players and wait tor some more help in the Bullpen.

7. Minnesota—I don't know if it has something to do with the Metrodome or not but the Twins are destined to lose. Jack Morris might have helped but I don't think he would have been enough to challenge the rest of the division. While they might not win, Kirby Puckett is worth admission by himself.

CHIP ROEHRIG

National League

The East

1. New York The Mets look to be the first team since the 1978 Phillies to repeat as NL East champs. Here are three keys to the Mets' season: 1) McReynolds in left solidifies the outfield (another great Met trade). 2) Everybody knows that hitters are laying off Gooden's high, hard junk; he must, and can, adjust. 3) The loss of Ray Knight (did he hit a home run after April?) hurts this team, exposing an already weak left side, but offensively, '86 was his swan song anyway. With the rest of the '86 team intact, look for the Mets to again play for the pennant.

2. Philadelphia Von Hayes is the key to the Phillies chances, and his tremendous '86 numbers (.305 batting average, 107 runs, 98 rbi's, 46 doubles) establish him as a bona fide superstar. It will be interesting to see how Mike Easler will fit into the outfield with Glenn Wilson and Milt Thompson. The Phils infield is a great one, and with Lance Parrish behind the plate, this should be a double figure home run team at every position except Jelz at shortstop. Phillie starting pitching is thin without a staff ace, and Rawley and Carman are both question marks coming off shoulder injuries. The veteran Phil bullpen is fairly solid, led by Steve Bedrosian, Kent Tekulve, and Tom Hume. If the starting pitching comes together, the Phillies are as good a team as the Mets.

3. St Louis The Cardinals are still the speediest and best defensive team in the league, and their pitching staff is superior. A key for the Cards is a return to form of former .300 hitters Herr (.252), McGee (.256), and Pendleton (.239), and Vince Coleman, who can still steal 107 bases without hitting or walking, needs to strikeout less in the leadoff spot. Coleman, McGee and Smith, the top of the lineup, must wreak havoc, and Herr, Clark, van Slyke and Pendleton must all have 70 rbi seasons. The pitching staff looks strong, with three lefties (ace John Tudor; Greg Matthews (11-8, 3.65 ERA); and freshly reacquired Dave LaPoint), and two righties (Cox, 2.90 ERA, should win 20 games this year; and Forsch, 14 wins in '86).

4. Chicago Because they play in Wrigley, the Cubs are always like two different ball clubs; each player realizing his potential in that friendly bastion where emotion tends to promote uncharacteristic skill, and then reality sets back in on the road. Durham, Dunston, Davis, Moreland, Sandberg, Dernier and now Dawson, are solid starters, but their relative mediocrity (Durham, Davis, Moreland) in the freindly offensive confines of Wrigley make them questionable. The Cubs had the worst pitching staff in the NL last year (4.49 ERA), and Stucliffe, Trout, Eckersley, and Sanderson remain a mystery after former, though sporadic, excellence. Reliever and top closer Lee Smith led the team in victories with nine last year, and if he leads the team in this category again this year, the Cubs are in real trouble.

5. Pittsburgh The Pirates, after unloading all their veteran talent, are one team truly committed to a thorough rebuilding process. Barry Bonds stole 36 bases in 113 games (despite a .223 average), and knocked in 16 homers and 48 rbi's to lead the outfield. The infield is far superior, with an all-star caliber third baseman in Jim Morrison (23 homers, 88 rbi's), and another solid performer at the other corner in first baseman Sid Bream (77 rbi's). Tony Pena (52 rbi's) will have to improve to halt his slide toward the bottom of the lineup. With Reuschel (16) and Bielecki (6-11) leading the w... and Rick Rhoden gone, this could be... worst starting lineup in baseball. ... Pirates, during a period of execut... brilliance, refused to trade former ... Larry McWilliams (3-11, 5.15 ERA ... '86) for George Hendrick in '84. Who d... they give up? John Tudor.

6. Montreal The off-season losses ... Reardon, Dawson, and Rain... decimated the Expos. Righthande... relievers Andy McGaffigan and T... Burke will have to take up the slack ... Reardon's absence, and speedy, steal... hitting centerfielder Mitch Webster ... need some help in the outfield. T... Expos' infield (Brooks, Wallac... Galarraga, Law) should return, but t... team is going to need some assistan... from a mostly barren AAA menu do... in Indianapolis. Floyd Youmans is t... only definitely solid starter (13-12, 3... ERA, 202 strikeouts), with Hesketh a... Bryn Smith questionable after late seas... injuries.

The West

1. Cincinnati This team is deep. W... a smart blend of youth (Davis, Lari... Daniels), dependable professiona... (Dester, Diaz), and experienced all-st... (Parker, Bell) in the starting lineup, t... Reds appear poised to take their fi... division title of the 80's. Pitching is t... key, and though the Reds' startin... rotation can't match that of the Astros ... Dodgers, their relievers exceed both a...

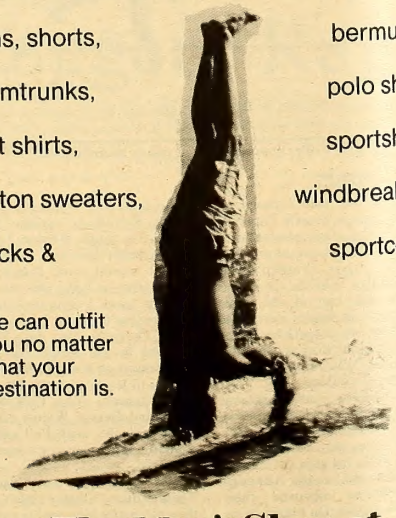
Continued on p. 23

SURF'S UP!

Catch A Wave Wearing The Coolest Fashions For Spring Break'87!

jams, shorts,
swimtrunks,
knit shirts,
cotton sweaters,
slacks &

bermudas,
polo shirts,
sportshirts,
windbreakers,
sportcoats.



We can outfit you no matter what your destination is.

The Men's Shop at The Broadmoor

Monday - Saturday 9:30 - 5:30

...ued from p. 22

...win alot of games the starters don't. ...Gullickson is a crafty, dependable 15 ...man, Ted Power seems to be thriving ...starter, and Ron Robinson (10-3, 14 ...) and lefties John Franco (29 saves, ...ERA) and Rob Murphy (6-0, 0.72 ...) hold down the fort in the pen. ...ager Pete Rose seems to understand ...talent that's suddenly emerging, and ...ld lead the team to 90+ wins and ...aps a division crown.

...Houston The '87 Astro team, ...tially identical to the '86 edition, ...ld collapse along the lines of the '85 ...ginals, a team they're modeled after. ...pen ace Dave Smith, like Schiraldi in ...on (except that Smith generally ...t throw the same pitch 697 times in a ...t, is a blowhard relief man distined ...obscurity, Cruz is fading fast in left, ...Billy Hatcher has that fluky quality ...ut him. Don't look for the Astros to ...eat as NL West champs.

...Los Angeles The Dodgers lost a ...ch of one run games last season, but ...s going to happen when a team ...ects to include a bullpen in its ...sive strategy. Questions fill the ...ger roster: first baseman Franklin ...bs (.226, mucho strikeouts), is still a ...ity, Duncan at short can't do ...gh with the stick (.229), catcher ...cia can't hit all of a sudden (26 rbi's ...2 games), and Madlock at third is ...n down defensively. Guerrero and ...nball are the two real hitters on the ..., and both have plenty to prove in ... The staring staff (Valenzuela, ...eycutt, Hershiser, Welch) and the Dodger heritage of winning with fundamentally inferior teams make them the last of the three teams with a legitimate shot at winning in the West.

4. San Francisco Injuries killed the Giants in '86. At various points in the season, injuries felled good looking hitter Will Clark, all-star third baseman Chris Brown, 20-game winner Mike Krukow, and centerfielder Dan Gladden, not to mention team leader Jeffrey Leonard to a wrist injury. Shoulder surgery to Jamaican leftfielder Chili Davis and knee surgery to second baseman Robbie Thompson in the off-season also cloud the San Francisco scene. Outfielder Candy Maldonado (18 homers, 85 rbi's) will provide offense, and Brown and Uribe will provide tight defense on the left side of the infield. Krukow (20-9, 3.05 ERA) is going to need some help in the starting rotation and that means 15-win seasons from Davis, Downs, and Mike LaCoss, none of whom have done so before if the Giants hope to penetrate the Reds and Astros.

5. San Diego The Padres have always been a team comprised mostly of jackasses, so new manager Larry Bowa should fit in nicely. Even with the departure of Nettles, Royster and Kennedy, this is still a team of overseasoned veterans (Garvey, Gossage, Whitson, Templeton) with major uncertainties at key positions. The addition of lefty Storm Davis (the best pitcher on the collapsed '86 Oriole staff) offsets the loss of Hoyt and the rest of the pitching staff could provide enough depth allowing the healthy return of Show and Dravecky. I'm pulling for the Padres, even with the little pipper Bowa managing, only because it will be up to them to ensure another last-place finish for...

6. Atlanta The most ridiculous and repulsive franchise in the league. A team that only scored 14 more runs than the Cardinals in a stadium half the size. The Braves, comprised mostly of fat, slow, stubby guys, start the worst second baseman for 150 games every year; get ol' Mother Hubbard outta here, will ya"? Their staff ace regularly looses more games than he wins, and their bullpen ace hasn't thrown a ball in two years and probably won't ever again. With the departure of Horner, the Bravos have only two offensive players (Murphy and Griffey), and a crummy defense. And we're talking about a team whose shameless television ad campaigns annually reach new levels of nationalistic shallowness. The '87 version of the Braves could be worse than anything we saw in the seventies.

CHRIS BENNETT

Men's Club Beat Brat Pack

A hat trick by senior Scott Pankoff and a pair of goals by sophomore Jamie Hurley sparked a 9-8 victory for the Colorado College men's club hockey team over a traveling Midgets All Star team from California.

The brat pack struck first at 13:04 of the first period and held that margin until a CC powerplay with 47 seconds left in the period. Pankoff backhanded the puck past the sixteen year old goalie to even the score at 1-1.

The second period was a shootout for both teams with CC scoring four goals and California tallying five. Scoring for the Tigers were Pankoff with his second, Hurley with the first of his pair, a short handed goal by Nathan from Edmonton, and an old time hockey score by Pete Husack.

Starting the third period with a one goal deficit CC rallied back with a goal from Jeff Metheney. The Tigers traded goals with the All Stars with CC getting goal number 7 on a wrap around play by Hurley. Dave Roe set up Dean French for goal number 8 with a centering pass. The score was tied 8-8 with a 1:30 left in the game when Pankoff on his knees banked a shot of one of the little boy's legs for the game winner.

As usual great defense was played by the Roe brothers and Lowe Billinglsy. Jerry "The Cat" Wang anchored this trio with a fine performance in the net.

EDDIE SHORE

...ijis Win IM Hoops

...the risk of rendering the NCAA ...tball tournament's remaining ...n games entirely anticlimactic, CC ...mural Basketball Tournament ...ls went ahead with the "A" League ...ament as planned. The event, which ... experts consider the pinnacle of ...ur athletic achievement (rivalled ... by the Mississippi State High ...l Hockey Tournament and North ...ta's State High School Gymnastics ...n international importance), took ... March 12-17 at El Pomar Sports ...r. In the tourney's final contest, Phi ...ma Jamma capped an undefeated ...n with a come from behind 62-57 ...y over Death Zone that gave them a ...p of the best-of-three series. ...a's win gave them their second "A" ...et Tournament Championship in as ... years, and their fourteen ...ecutive wins included the ...pionship of the all-school Pre-...mas Tournament last semester.

...Thursday, March 12, semifinal ...pitted the Kappa Sigs vs. Phi ...ma Jamma and Death Zone vs. ..., the Pre-Christmas runners-up. ...the opening semifinal, the Sigs, ...d by Toler "We're Pretty" Goodwin, ..."Take it to the Hole" Cole, Dana ..." Rademacher, and scrappy Steve ..."Enforcer" Geraghty, led most of the ...before bowing out, 59-55. Phi ...ma Jamma, a team of senior Fijis ...a very weak namesake of the ...ton Cougars 1983-84 team with ...n Olajuwon), relied on clutch free ...shooting down the stretch from ..."Lisa" Cheshire and Dean "El ..." Campbell to escape with the ...ry.

...sday's second semifinal proved ...what of an upset as decided ...dogs Death Zone upended Guests ...ance to the finals. Death Zone was ...by Greg "Mister" Rogers and John ..." Horning, while the conquered ... were led by IM studs Bryce ...son" Lloyd, Jerry "Gang Bang" ... and Paul "Lean but Mean" ...

The championship series' initial game opened on a sour note for Death Zone as Phi Slamma Jamma jumped out to a 42-24 halftime lead behind the sharpshooting of Mike "Lance/Peanut" Casper and fast break magic of Ron "Horn Puppies" Warner. The game ended in a routing 68-44 Jamma win that included some inspired play from Jim "Head Like" Cramer.

Game two was a completely different story as Death Zone raced to an early 24-13 lead behind Rogers, Horning, and Todd "Adlai" Stephenson. Jamma fought back, however, and trailed only 29-25 at halftime.

The second half was more of the same as Death Zone again upped its lead to eleven at 38-27. Mike "Widebody" Ukropina led the charge with several key rebounds and a number of tough shots, and John "Be My" Guest chipped in with some much needed defensive help.

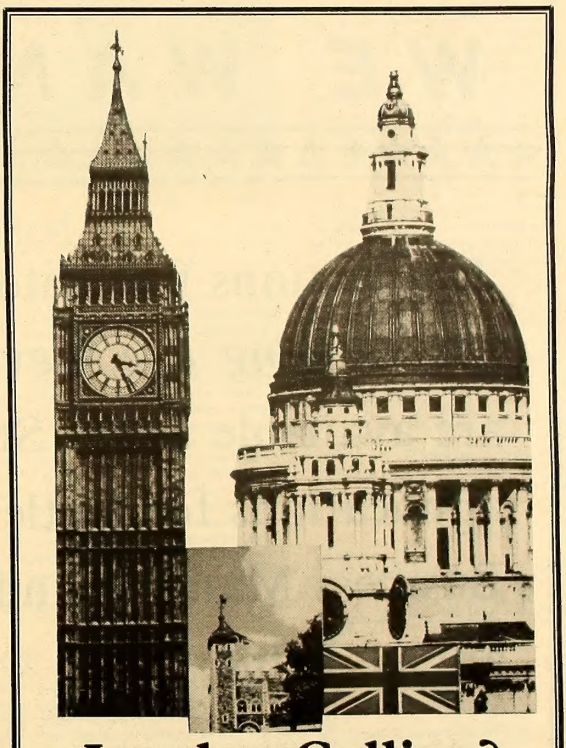
But the veteran Jamma squad fought back, and Dave "Get Unt Me" Evans and Chris "Night Of" Schmid keyed a ball hawking man-on-man defense that forced numerous Death Zone turnovers.

With 1:26 to go, and Death Zone leading 57-56 after one of three key long range bombs from Horning, Schmid sliced in for a steal and layup for the go ahead points.

Death Zone got the ball back, but with only 0:15 showing on the clock, Casper stepped in front of a pass and cut to the hoop for the clinching score, but was fouled. Shooting one and one, Casper canned both, and Jamma led, 60-57. "Lance" later iced the game with a steal (that was actually a foul; we can only hope it didn't matter at that point) and a pass ahead to "Night Of," who, for the first time after who knows how many unsuccessful pregame attempts, bounced the ball off the ground and slammed it home for the game's final points.

After the game, Jamma center Evans summed up the team's performance, "I really thought we got unt tonight. Let's pound."

FORMICA JORDAN



London Calling?
Think of
Taylor Travel
"Your Campus Travel Agency"
818 N. Tejon 636-3871

"AT CC"

France Charter Fares Extended to More U.S. Cities—Low summer charter fares have been expanded in 1987 to include Boston and Washington, D.C., to Paris. New York to Paris and Nice, gateway to the Riviera, are once again available, as last year, from Jet Vacations via Air Charter, the Air France subsidiary. For information and reservations, contact a travel specialist or Jet Vacations, in NYC 212-247-0999, elsewhere 1-800-538-0999.

Work Aborad Programs in Britain, Ireland, France, Germany, New Zealand and Costa Rica—The program is open to US students 18 years of age or older enrolled in a US college or university. The only cost to the student is a modest program fee of $82 and the airfare to their destination abroad—an expense that may be reduced by special student and youth fares available through Council Travel Services. For more information and application forms, write or phone: Council on International Educational Exchange, PR-WA, 205 East 42nd Street, New York, NY 10017, (212) 661-1414; or 919 Irving Street, San Francisco, CA 94122, (415) 566-6222.

"Peoples Poetry Party"—Open forum! Come express yourself creatively in poems, songs and outcry. Gates Common Room, 7 p.m., March 20.

WANTED!! Tour Guides for Spring Break. Will pay. If interested, contact the Admissions Office at ext. 344.

Spring Fester Tour '87 (Zion, Las Vegas). Seeking two belay bunnies. No climbing experience necessary but could prove beneficial. Must like country music, cheap beer and lawn chairs. Call 685-5722.

For Sale: 19" Univega touring bike, excellent condition! Call Laurie at 634-1340.

CC Students interested in entering the annual Evelyn Bridges Poetry Contest should submit their poems (no more than ten per person) to John Longo (Armstrong Hall 244) on or before the deadline, 5:00 p.m., April 29. First prize is $50; Second, $30; Third, $20. Students should type the poems, staple the pages together, place them in an envelope with a pseudonym on the outside, and attach a second envelope with the same peudonym on the outside and a slip of paper inside with their real name and phone number. Prizes will be announced at the annual Awards Convocation in May.

Robert M. Stabler Award For Summer Marine Or Field Station Study—Apply now for the Robert M. Stabler Award, a partial scholarship for summer marine or field station study. Preference given to students between their junior and senior year. Submit letter of application, including information about your acceptance at the station, to Dr. Werner G. Heim, Dept. of Biology by April 15.

Financial Aid for 1987-88: If you plan to apply for financial aid for the academic year 1987-88, your Financial Aid Form should be filed by April 1, 1987. Applications are available at the Financial Aid Office, Room 219, Armstrong Hall.

Announcing The First CC Internat... Week—Plays, seminars, d... exhibitions, discussions, and much m... to focus on cultural traditions ... around the world! April 11-18! ... miss the culminating event on April ... an outdoor international fes... featuring food, song, and dance! ... entire week promises to be a fun-fi... educational experience!

Meditation—Shove Chapel, 8:00-... a.m. Music, silence, mystical and ... other writings (enter by northeast d...

For Sale: 1 pair EB Rock Climbing Sh... (worn once), size 4 (equal women's ... XCL 180 skilom x-country ... w/ bindings 195cm. Call 636-1975.

T	A	A		A	D	M	I	T		O	V	A
A	L	L		T	O	O	T	S		D	E	N
B	E	E		A	M	O	S			N	E	X	T
		C	A	B	I	N		S	I
T	D		S	A	C			R	E	P	A	S	T
R	O	D		L	I	B	E	R	A	L	L	Y
A	L	A	S		L	A	P		S	O	U	P
C	O	M	P	L	E	T	E	D		E	G	G
T	R	E	A	T	S		R	U	M		S
			I	S		S	T	R	I	P
A	L	A	N		S	H	O	E		R	O	A
P	A	C		P	E	E	R	S		A	D	S
E	Y	E		S	T	A	Y	S		Y	A	K

WE WANT YOU!

★★★

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 10 April 1987 Volume 21, No. 9

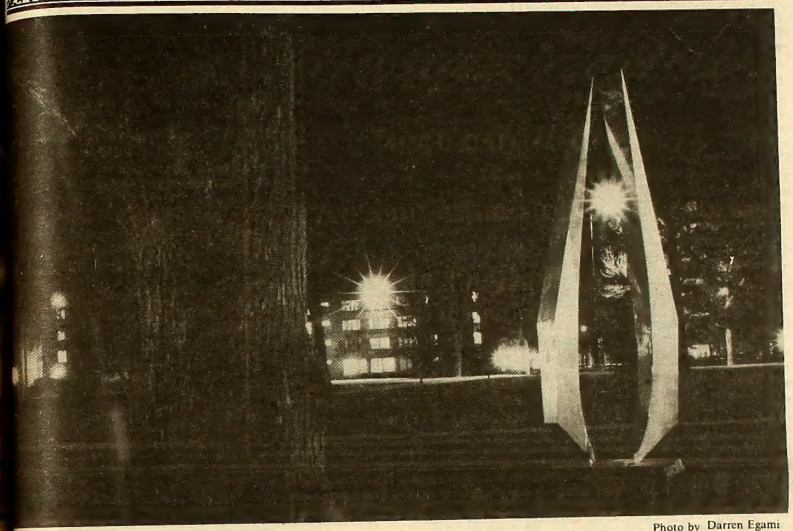

Photo by Darren Egami

Lloyd Lecture

Boswell Speaks On Social Categorization

"Standards of personal and public good are capricious, dependant on a particular point of view," John Boswell stated Wednesday night as the speaker for the annual Lloyd Lecture. Boswell author of Christianity, Social Tolerance, and Homosexuality, spoke on the ways social and ethical categories are formulated in western culture and how these catagories affect minorities, specifically Jews and Homosexuals. Ethical standards, Boswell argued, are those congruent with the good, virtuous, and excellent; social standards are concepts of correct citizenship. When the combination of these two catagories occur and is seen as exclusively true, the range of tolerance in society diminishes.

After delineating the history of western culture into three broad periods, the Ancient World, Catholic Europe, and the Modern Era, Boswell explored the concepts of the public and private good in each. The Ancient World conceptualized the private good as arete, the Greek word for "excellence." Standards for excellence were pluralistic as they were determined by a variety of philosophers, educators, and writers. The private good, citizenship, was based on the legislative function of the state which operated under the auspices of "the greater and wiser part." The congruence between arete and citizenship was flexible. All beings could posess excellence which was mainly individualistic and associated with an essential truth. Under these standards, Jews and homosexuals suffered few disadvantages; they were influential citizens who were written about as part of the natural order of things. Gay men were said to make the best statesmen.

Continued on p. 4

Four Paths Less Traveled

Watson Winners To Go Abroad

Four Colorado College seniors: Chris ...nn, History major, Anthony Lopez, ...cology major, Stuart Martz, LAS ...or in musicology, and SoYoung ...rk. History major have recently been ...rded Watson Fellowships and are ...paring for a year of independent study ...foreign country. This is the third time ...Colorado College's history that all four ...nnees, the maximum number from ...one institution, were accepted by ...inistrators of the Thomas J. Watson ...undation. The foundation, established ...1968, offers approximately 80 grants ...ch year nation-wide, $11,000 to single ...llows and $15,000 to married Fellows ...travel to a foreign country and conduct ...dependent research.

Colorado College's Watson recipients ...l be going to various corners of this ...net earth—to Brazil, Canada, Ireland ...d Korea—to conduct their studies. Their journeys will commence sometime after graduation; some of them intend to leave as early as June and a few are waiting until September. All four Fellows already have some working knowledge of the language and dialects spoken, having previously traveled and stimulated their interest in the country in which they intend to study. The issues they will be addressing range from socio-historic to artistic in nature:

Chris Dunn intends to study Afro-Brazilian religions in two urban centers in Bahia and Recife, Brazil. Dunn speaks of the presence and prevalence of pagan religions, which are an integral part of the lives of the people living in these rapidly modernizing and industrializing cities. He describes a scene of an urban center in Brazil which simultaneously embraces traditional pagan rituals as well as the technology of the "modern" world: one in which people gather in the streets to worship, performing various rituals involving the lighting of candles, singing and dancing, while encouraging the implementation of computers and all that represents "progress" and "technology." Dunn suggests that not only are pagan religions existing in this kind of environment, but they have actually "evolved" and become more prominent in some regions due to an increasingly tolerant and "democratic" government.

What interests Chris Dunn are precisely the political and social dynamics affecting the "evolution" of two pagan religions, Candomble and Xango, both of African origin, imported to Brazil during colonialism, which have now essentially assumed their own "uniquely Brazilian" character. Dunn wants to examine the nature of these religions and

Cont. p. 8

Romulus the Great Slated for Next Week

The Colorado College German ...partment will present a student ...duction of Friedrich Durrenmatt's ...mulus, The Great on April 13, 14, and ...d 8 p.m. in Theatre 32 of Armstrong ...ll. The play will be given in German ...d is directed by Horst Richardson. ...ge manager is Gen Dever.

Durrenmatt, a contemporary Swiss ...ywright, discusses the fall of Rome in ...s comedy with a serious twist. The year ...476 A.D. and the German barbarians ...e invading the Roman empire from the ...th. Romulus, the last Roman ...peror, is called "The Great" by ...rrenmatt because he does nothing to ...vent the fall of the empire. He is of the ...sion that Rome has become so ...ident that it no longer deserves to ...st. Various fanatical Roman patriots ...to rescue the state but the emperor does not budge in his conviction that Rome is doomed. The German invaders have arrived and everyone at court has fled, only Romulus has remained, expecting to die. But the German prince, Odoaker, has some surprises in store for Romulus as the play comes to a close.

Starring in the lead role as Romulus is Richard Frohock, who has just completed a year of study at a German university. His wife, Julia, the empress, is played by Sylvie Martinez and Bettina Mok is their charming daughter. Engaged to her is Amilian, Bill Campbell, who has just returned from German captivity. Pat Chisholm and Scott Reznik outdo themselves in their roles as minister or war and minister of domestic affairs. Spurius T. Mama, a heroic soldier who cannot sleep, is depicted by Gloria Krzoski. The bombastic businessman, Caesar Rupf, is played by Jan Oppermann. Pascal Gasirabo is cast in the role of Apollyon, an art dealer and Tim Wirth, playing a drama coach, attempts to instruct the emperor's daughter in the fine art of classical verse. Servants to the emperor are Cornelia Forster-Gress and Angela Letbetter. Dan Pierce is Odoaker, the German prince and Tim Wirth also plays his fierce nephew.

The German Department of CC has established a tradition of German play production. Romulus, the Great (Romulus, der Grosse) is, of course, produced in German. Introductions by the cast in English prior to each scene will help those not up on their German understand the play. The play has four scenes and will last about 1 1/2 hours.

INSIDE

Year of Africa
Page 5

Honor Constitution Revamped
Page 10

Divestment Dilemmas
Page 11

The Ultimate Smiths' Album
Page 14

Sugar Ray Simply Marvelous
Page 18

NEWS

The Catalyst

What's News?

Analyzing The Issues

Just when you thought that Nicaragua was the only scene of significant U.S. support for rebels, or that South Africa remains the only site of controversy in southern Africa, think again. Think Angola—the location of another heating quagmire of U.S./U.S.S.R. conflict.

There appears to be a growing trend of Soviet involvement in this Marxist southwestern Africa nation. The U.S., under the guidance of the Reagan doctrine that promotes not just mere containment of such political systems, but more pertinently, their downfall, has been supporting some rebels (known as the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola—UNITA) with covert military aid ($15 million in 1986). In response to UNITA's growing strength, the Christian Science Monitor (April 7) reports that the Soviets have been making "round-the-clock" deliveries this past month of military equipment and Cuban and Angolan troops to Angola's southeastern region—the stronghold of UNITA. As a senior U.S. official commented, these Soviet backed troops "will go for military victory over [rebel leder Jonas] Savimbi."

If such a victory occurred, bringing military and political stability to Angola, it is believed they would pursue the independence of neighboring Namibia, under South African administration since the mid-1960's. The United Nations has demanded the removal of this foreign ruling system. The Pretoria government, however, has refused, insisting on the removal of Soviet (2,500) and Cuban (35,000) military personnel from Angola before allowing the independence of its uranium-rich holding. The U.S. has attempted to institute this linkage as the crux of their bargaining scheme in Angola, but has thus far been unsuccessful.

With the U.S. reaching a dead-end along this bargaining route, many fear only a military solution remains. As one analyst commented, "If Savimbi were to appear to be losing, this might make President Reagan feel obliged to respond with further covert military assistance." (CSM April 7, p. 8) The South African's are naturally also concerned with this buildup and anticipate further support for UNITA. Carol Lancaster, director of the African Studies Program at Georgetown, however, feels the Soviets may not be pushing for an outright military victory. She "questions Soviet interest in pushing hard now in Angola" as it would certainly inspire American conservatives to pursue the military solution.

The obvious questions arising out of these complex international developments, is how the U.S. should react. Should a military buildup of UNITA take place? Where can such a military solution lead, if not to further Soviet escalation? Have negotiations been exhausted? Can discussion with the South Af ans elucidate possible solutions? , Carol Lancaster accurate in questioning Soviet interests or are they really taking a big step that requires violent response? The easiest move by the U.S. would be to send more money to UNITA, but then the easier approaches rarely help complex situations. The hardest move would be lengthy negotiation that incorporates the Namibia issue—yet patience (historically absent here) would be a necessary virtue at the bargaining table.

We should all keep on top of the issues surrounding Nicaragua and South Africa, but lets not forget those other less "popular" hot spots like Angola—before it becomes the "talk of the town."

NEWS EDITORS

News Briefs

Visiting Scholar From London

Robert Browning, Professor Emeritus of Birkbeck College, University of London, will give a public lecture, "How the Greeks Perceived Themselves and Others Over 2000 Years," at 8:15 p.m. on April 16 in Packard Auditorium.

One of the world's experts on the history and language of medieval Greece, Professor Browning has published widely on late Roman and Byzantine history as well as the Greek language. His books include: Medieval and Modern Greek, The Byzantine Empire, The Emperor Julian, Justinian and Theodora, and Byzantium and Bulgaria. As a scholar and linguist, his knowledge extends from Linear B through modern Greek. His interests also range wide, chronologically and geographically, over eastern Europe, where he spent World War II in Military Intelligence. He is a Fellow of the British Academy and a corresponding member of the Academy of Athens. The Greek government has named him a Commander of the Order of the Phoenix. Professor Browning has lectured widely in Europe, Australia, and the United States. He has a reputation as a man of immense learning, who can communicate his knowledge to a broad audience. His lecture promises to be lively and wide-ranging.

Professor Browning will be on campus during the entire week of April 13 through 17. He will participate in classes and discussions on a variety of topics throughout his stay. If you or your students would like further details, please contact one of us.

This extraordinary visit is made possible through the "Visiting Byzantinist" program sponsored by The Dumbarton Oaks Center for Medieval Studies together with the Medieval Academy of America and partially funded by the National Endowment for the Humanities. A Colorado College Venture Grant provided additional support.

Class of 88 Elections

It's time for elections of permanent class officers for the Class of 1988. Elections will be held April 20 and 21 for President, Vice-President, Secretary, and Treasurer. Anyone who will graduate in the spring of 1988 is eligible to vote.

The officers you choose should have good organizational skills, enthusiasm, and a strong desire to create class cohesiveness. Class officers are challenged to create a class identity before graduation. Your class officers will be your representatives after graduation, and will help coordinate reunions every five years. It is important that the four officers know a wide variety of students so they can encourage attendance at senior events and at reunions. During your senior year a Steering Committee of the officers, class agents, and other interested seniors will plan monthly senior events, work on the Senior Dinner Dance, and organize any special events for the class. (This year class agents will be selected by the Development Office.)

Any juniors who are interested in running for an office should pick up an application at Mathias Desk, Loomis Desk, Tutt Alumni House, Olin, Tutt Library, or the Student Center. Applications are due at Tutt Alumni House on April 15 at 5:00 p.m. A candidates' information meeting is scheduled for 12:15 p.m. in Loomis Lounge on April 15.

Anasazi Block Break

Anasazi—the Ancient Ones—were a prehistoric Southwest people who left vestiges of a flourishing culture and a mysterious demise. Their legacy will be the subject of an exciting three day cultural exchange program of demonstrations, dances, story telling and lectures exploring the Anasazi heritage still present today in Pueblo Indian culture. Scheduled for April 30-May 2, "Children of the Anasazi" is co-sponsored by the Pioneers' Museum and the Colorado College Department of Southwest Studies, and will be presented by the American Indian Exhibition group, Glenn Paquin, director. The event is free and open to the general public. All presentations will be held in Armstrong Hall on the Colorado College campus (located on the northeast corner of North Cascade and Cache La Poudre). These demonstrations offer a unique investigation of Pueblo Indian culture through academic lectures, art and dance performances, music, poetry and seminars. Funding is provided by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

"Children of the Anasazi" is presented in conjunction with "Anasazi World," a photo exhibit from the Smithsonian Institution Traveling Exhibition Service, which will be on display at the Pioneers' Museum, 215 S. Tejon Street, April 18-May 17. The exhibit's central theme is that the Anasazi, a mysterious prehistoric Indian culture that flourished in the American Southwest, did not become totally extinct, but is reflected today in the life and customs of the modern Pueblo Indians. The Museum will supplement the SITES exhibit with items from its own excellent Mesa Verde and Pueblo crafts collections.

An information booth will be located at the entrance to Armstrong Hall and educational fliers will be available for handout. A food booth will also be set up, serving such traditional items as Navajo tacos, fry bread, Indian fruit pies and Indian tea.

For more information, call Carol Shannon at the Pioneers' Museum, 578-6650 or Ruth Holmes at Colorado College, 473-2233, extension 602.

International Week Previewed

CC ethnic groups have organized a cross-cultural International Week from April 13 through 18 to promote global awareness through speakers, exhibitions, and events.

International Week, explained chairperson Cri Chandrarianni, will "promote an awareness of the world for the campus and community." Fellow organizer Sindi Medar-Gould added that the week's activities provide "an alternative program to just drinking beer." She said, "This is an opportunity for students to get aquainted with other cultures. We're promoting the existence of countries most people have never heard of."

The week includes such events as the presentation of international films, discussion with a United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) representative, the production of a German play, a slide show by CC students who have visited Japan, and various cultural poetry readings. (See attached calendar for more events, as well as times and places.)

China, India, Burundi, Costa Rica and Germany are among several countries to be represented.

An outdoor international festival and show will culminate the week on April 18. Regional dances, music and poetry will be presented, and a national costumes fashion show will display the dress of people throughout the world. Additionally, students will get a chance to sample free foods and snacks from several countries. "Different countries of the world will be presented," said Medar-Gould. "We'll be specifically highlighting areas and regions from around the world."

Also of note, Professors Marilyn Turkovich and Peggy Mueller of the ACM/Chicao Urban Education program will be on campus to discuss cross-cultural communication. Besides visiting various classes, the professors will also present two campus-wide workshops. "Perspective Consciousness: A Framework for Thinking Globally" on April 14 will help the audience become aware that their views of the world are not universally shared, according to the Venture Grant application requesting funding for the programs. Then, on April 15, "Dimensions of Cross-Cultural Awareness" will discuss levels of cross-cultural awareness and, through an international student panel, help break down pre-conceived notions about various cultures, explains the Venture Grant application. Organizers believe Turkovich and Mueller "will provide a valuable complement" to the week's activities and give the week "lasting impact."

Although all events are free and open to everyone, a voluntary collection will be taken up at all activities to help South African students currently in refuge in Tanzania.

The International Student Organization, East ASIA, Russian and German houses, Black Student Union and Movimento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlan (MEChA) have planned and organized the week.

INTERNATIONAL WEEK SCHEDULE

MONDAY, APRIL 13

3:30 Loomis Upper Lounge: a slide presentation on Japan by CC students John Flanagan, Leslie Scott, and Ingrid Thompson

7:00 Loomis Upper Lounge: "The Ideas Underlying the New International Order" by U.S. liason to UNESCO Joseph Mehan

8:00 Armstrong Basement Theatre: German play presented by the German House/German Department

See p. 3 for rest of schedule

The Cat Is Here"

—Technology Confronts Tutt

tt Library has taken a major stride rd modernization. Culminating a year plan, the library has just emented a computerized catalog k the Cat") system, one that has olutionized and given new dimension book order. Said John Sheridan, ary director, "The system will provide er access to library information and erviceable to all campus terminals." he Cat device is presently acting as a plement to the card catalog, having thousand entries dating from 1977 to explained Sheridan. "Eventually it replace it," he continued. The posed time is summer's end when all aining books will have been logued into the system. Six terminals now available to students. "Later will be terminals on all levels and on bridge," said the head librarian. He d, "These are available now, and we ourage the students to use them and us get the bugs out of the system." aps," correction papers, have been vided by each terminal to make note ny "bugs" (errors, flaws) observed by he new system has reduced (in some removed) many of the stigmas buted to the pain-staking book-ching process. One major change lies e reduction of the time factor, owed to a matter of seconds. Also, gs under any heading are give a more plete and accurate treatment. What more, the system can inform the ther whether the book is checked out ot, and if so, when it is due. And of course the information found in the present card catalog system is also provided by the Cat system.

Lessons, lasting approximately thirty minutes, on how to use the system are being given everyday at the library. "We'll have these classes as long as there is a demand," said Sheridan. Interested students are asked to sign up for these classes.

Sheridan said, "CC is one of the first liberal arts schools to have a system like this." The larger schools have been forced to incorporate it in their system because of their large size, he explained. He added, "We're eighteen months to two years ahead of the other ACM schools." Sheridan looks to eventually connect CC's Cat system with that of Penrose's, thereby developing an inter-library loan program.

AKLILU DUNLAP

Enthusiastic librarians! Photo by Jane Bierman

International Week Schedule

Continued from p. 2

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15:

3:00 Gates Common Room: "Dimensions of Cross-Cultural Awareness" and panel discussion with international students by ACM Professors Turkovich and Mueller

7:00 Gates Common Room: "Politics and Culture" (discussion on Russia) by Russian immigrant and author Yuv Aleshkovsky

8:00 Armstrong Basement Theatre: German Play (see above)

TUESDAY, APRIL 14:

7:00 Gates Common Room: "Perspective Consciousness: A Framework for Thinking Globally" by ACM Professors Marilyn Turkovich and Peggy Mueller

8:00 Armstrong Basement Theatre: German Play (see above)

THURSDAY, APRIL 16:

7:00 Cossitt Gym: Mexican and Latin American dances presented by CSU student dance group

FRIDAY, APRIL 17:

7:00 The Hub: International Movies—"It's a Small World" and "Sugar Cane Alley"

SATURDAY, APRIL 18:

1:00 Armstrong Quad: International Show and Festival, featuring dances, music, a fashion show, poetry reading, and snacks. (If bad weather, Cossitt Gym.)

BILL PORTER

DOMINO'S PIZZA ®

TWO 12" ONE TOPPING PIZZAS FOR $9.14

(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.

Continued By Popular Demand

Limited Delivery Area
Our drivers carry less than $20

AVOID THE NOID
CALL DOMINO'S PIZZA

30 minute guarantee

If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off your order.
One coupon per pizza.

Fast, Free Delivery
Good at listed locations.

One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!

For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same!), and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings.

Two 12" pizzas will only cost you:

Superb cheese	$7.95
1 topping	$9.14
2 toppings	$10.33
3 toppings	$11.52
4 toppings	$12.71
5 toppings	$13.90
6 toppings	$15.09

Twice the pizza for one low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minute or less, GUARANTEED!

Offer may expire anytime

635-1511

DOMINO'S PIZZA DELIVERS ® FREE.

All Pizzas Include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.

Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95

Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers, Extra Cheese (1 item) Double Cheese (2 items) Thick Crust, Extra Sauce

Each Item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19

Ask about our Group Discount (on 5 or more pizza orders).

We accept checks.

Prices do not include tax. Our drivers carry less than $20.00.

Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.

Boswell On Social And Ethical Categories

Continued from p. 1

In Catholic Europe, good citizenship came to be associated with orthodoxy, correct opinion which was determined by the church. A council, formed by the patriarchs of the church, voted to determine matters of social and ethical conduct. This vote was believed to reveal the absolute TRUTH. The social customs and propriety, "what is and isn't done" became associated with what is and isn't true. This was problematic in that a few people determined standards which all must adhere to; the "whole system was deformed by creating universals from a limited base." Minorities began to be persecuted because not being part of the moral whole necessarily means not being part of the social whole. Laws were past against Jews and Homosexuals. Literature from this period contains passages which associate them with murderers and arsonists.

In the Modern Era good citizenship and orthodoxy have been subsumed under the concept of conformity. Medical and psychiatric institutions are the new councils which formulate standards of social and ethical good. The range of tolerance towards minorities varies with the perception of the degree of abnormality. It is significant that previous to the modern age Jews and Homosexuals were treated similarly. "The same things are objected to, the same law codes are applied against both." Why have Jews attained normal status sooner than Homosexuals in the modern United States? The answer to this question is seen when it is understood that the focus of the modern attitude has shifted. "Religion itself is not part of the study of what is normal, the bodies that determine the normal are not interested in religion."

Dr. John Boswell—remarkable insight. Photo by Jane Bierman

Boswell further explicated the development of social and ethical catagories by suggesting another scheme for looking at the status of minorities. Minorities can be viewed as different but equal, as existing within the normal range of variation. The way different sects of Protestantism are viewed is an example of this. When what it is that makes minorities different is viewed as inferior, they are seen as inferior insiders. They are still perceived as part of the natural order, yet they have lower status. Women, although not a minority, have been viewed this way. The final catagory is the outsider. Minorities are not tolerated because they are seen as existing outside the normal or true order of things. A society which views homosexuals as choosing a degenerate form of sexuality makes them outsiders.

"Why is anyone the object of social division and isolation?" Boswell felt any justification for the occurence of persecution seems to be adamantly unreasonable. The standards of social and ethical good which we subscribe to are entangled in a web of historical circumstance. When these beliefs are seen as exclusively and absolutely true, difference is transformed into abnormality. In completing his lecture, Boswell appealed to the audience to remember the plurality of voices which make up the world, to realize the relativistic nature of our own opinions, and to create a world more tolerant of differences.

BARRY CARROLL

Eight Block Technicalities Considered

The Academic Program Committee of Colorado College has been working to develop appropriate guidelines for the implementation of an eight block year. The committee recently formalized its tentative guidelines and now is looking for feedback from all segments of the College community. Please contact Mr. Trevithick, 103 McGregor, Box 26, with suggestions and questions. Constructive comments would be of great value in the committee's deliberations.

Preface The committee would like to emphasize the Tentative Nature of these guidelines, which are currently being reviewed and revised by faculty and departmental committees.

The work of the Committee was guided by the following principles:

(1) Availability of non-block learning opportunities both to compensate for Credits and Excused Grades and to allow exceptional students to take more than the 32 units required for graduation.

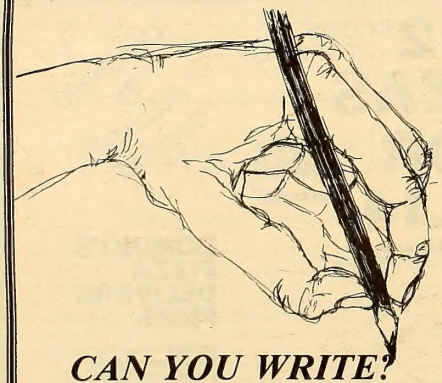
(2) Development of rigorous independent study, semester and year long seminars and lecture classes, and collaborative research opportunities.

(3) Protection of both students and faculty from excessive and unequal overload.

(4) Continued commitment to the teaching of block courses.

(5) Affirmation of the unique character of a Colorado College education, which depends on the availability of small classes to everyone, freshmen and seniors alike.

Continued on p.



CAN YOU WRITE?

EVER FELT THAT YOU WERE LONG ON CREATIVITY, SHORT ON CASH?

DON'T BE A STARVING ARTIST!

WIN UP TO $50

AWARDS FOR: POETRY FICTION
POLITICAL ESSAYS

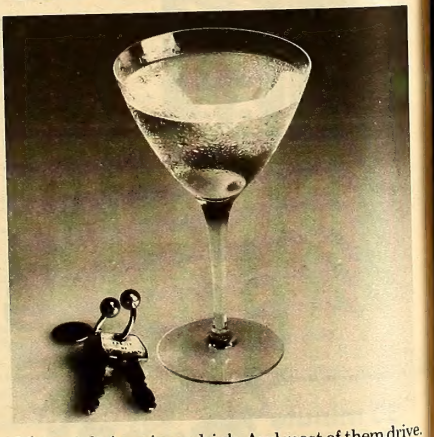
DEADLINE IS APRIL 22ND

See Announcements (Back Page) For More Details

WINNERS PUBLISHED IN FINAL ISSUE OF

LEVIATHAN

If you can't stop drinking, don't start driving.



Most adult Americans drink. And most of them drive. While it is best not to drink before driving, experience proves that not everybody follows this advice.

Recognizing this fact of life, many safety officials now say to motorists: "If you're going to drink, use common sense. Know your own limit, as well as the speed limit, and keep well within both."

We, the people who make and sell distilled spirits, heartily support this stand. In fact, we've prepared a booklet called "Know Your Limits," which includes a handy chart for your guidance. It's yours for the writing.

If you choose to drink, drink responsibly.

7-88: The Year of Southern Africa

mmittee formed to increase community awareness

an outcome of the recent Board of ees meeting a committee has been ed to further educate the College munity on the issue of South Africa southern Africa. The Board of ees perceived the debate on campus ding divestment to be unbalanced, therefore announced on March 14, they have "authorized the inistration of the College to provide ient funds for an appropriate, on g debate on the issue."

lenn Brooks currently leads this mittee which is comprised of essors Fox, Livesay, Hecox and drickson, Assistant Director of ncial Aid Nancy Kent, students Liz ey, Heidi Schmidt, Scott Reynolds, l Breyfogle, and Liz Payson. The p hopes to increase community reness about the great number of s regarding South Africa and thern Africa. Both Hecox and alum Fitzgerald, who travelled to South ca as a Watson Fellow, emphasized ecessity of including the nations of thern Africa in any educational effort to the interrelated nature of the s.

he formation of the committee arose a meeting called by President dam Riley to see if in fact College est did exist in creating the hanisms necessary to foster the ing discussion the Board desired. At March 24 meeting initial confusion ted from the fact that some tioned the necessity of this new mittee when the Shareholder onsibility Committee was already in tance. But the point was raised that focus of the Shareholder onsibility Committee was not just th Africa, but instead it convened in r to investigate the specific stment practices of the College.

urther issues raised included the by Professor Owen Cramer if in there was "anyone responsible in the ntry who would advocate continued stment?" President Riley assured fessor Cramer that not only did there such individuals in the United es, but also among the liberal white ilous of South Africa as well as ng the Black South African munity. Mat Case, of the CCCAA, ever, questioned the necessity of her education citing the many mples of previous educational forums nted. Case believes the "the campus ucated enough to take a stand, we trad] need to educate the Board."

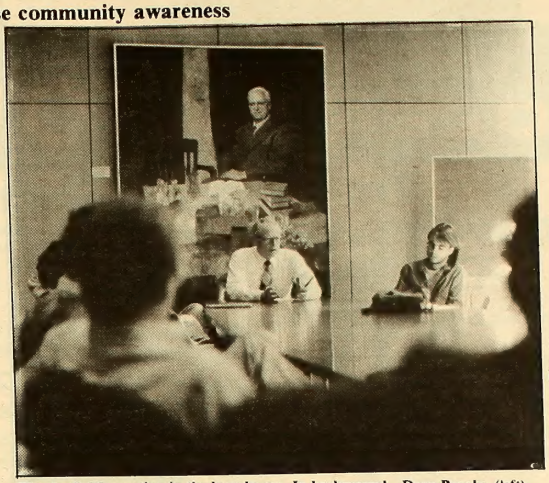


Photo by Jane Bierman

The April 8th meeting in the boardroom. In background—Dean Brooks (left) and Ian Campbell.

The decision to place Dean Glenn Brooks in charge of creating the committee was one point easily agreed upon at the March 24 meeting. Therefore Dean Brooks brought together the previously mentioned group of individuals on April 8th to begin the necessary planning for educational events. Dean Brooks characterized the role of the committee as fulfilling an educational gap in the CC curriculum. The "focus [is] not on the investment issues of CC," but instead will look at the great number of issues regarding southern Africa.

Yet pinpointing this geopolitical region as the topic of such a program came under further scrutiny. Tim Fitzgerald questioned the necessity of such a committee dedicated to just South Africa since equally pressing issues exist in the world milieu, such as Poland. Many concurred with Fitzgerald, but believed that the implementation of a committee on the South African issue could act as both a precedent and catalyst for the discussion of other such issues. Later he emphasized the importance of fully understanding the reasons of forming such a committee. According to Fitzgerald, South Africa embodies a whole range of pertinent issues and therefore could prove positive as an area of inquiry, but once again he stressed the necessity of clearly understanding the objectives of the committee.

Nonetheless with the clear support of the Administration the potential for increased education focusing on southern Africa seems like an obvious outcome of these meetings. Yet the logistics are still in the works and as of now the particulars of the educational process are undecided, but Dean Brooks has instructed the committee members to think about potential events and to present them at the next meeting on April 21.

IAN CAMPBELL

Adam Burke And College Receive Awards

Adam Burke, a junior from Highland Park, Ill., has been awarded a $2,500 scholarship in the Time Magazine college achievements competition.

Burke, 20 and a political science major, is one of 20 winners nationwide, all of whom are to be featured in an April 7 special issue of Time.

The magazine cited him for "academic excellence and achievement outside the classroom" and noted that the annual awards are "to recognize the achievements of the nation's most outstanding college students."

Burke's community service currently includes serving as president of the area chapter of BACCHUS—acronym for Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students, a national organization. He also recently did independent research on teen suicide, spending more than five months surveying area high school students about that topic.

"I feel very fortunate that the things I've wanted to do—working with BACCHUS and doing the independent research project—I've been able to do here at CC," Burke said.

The Time winners are slated to be flown to New York City to receive their awards in a March 31st presentation.

* * *

The Colorado College viewbook—a 40-page booklet with text and pictures generally describing programs, policies and activities of the College—was awarded third place in the CASE (Council for Advancement and Support of Education) Mid-America District VI publications competition.

Designed for use by the College's Admissions Office, the publication received the Award of Merit in its category, in competition with similar publications from 58 educational institutions.

* * *

Unrestricted grants totaling $1,800 have been given to Colorado College by the Sears-Roebuck Foundation, Chicago, to be used as the College deems necessary.

The school is one of 950 private, accredited educational institutions across the nation which are sharing in $1.75 million in Sears Foundation funds for the 1986-87 academic year.

INTERN POSITIONS AVAILABLE IN ADMISSION OFFICE

4 intern positions open for Summer and School Year

* 1 Full-time Summer '87
* 3 Part-time School Year 1987-88

Applications and job descriptions available in Admission Office

Contact:
Lloyd Peterson, x348 for further information

the Stagecoach Inn
702 Manitou Avenue
On Fountain Creek in Manitou Springs

Don't Forget the Stagecoach Inn for Easter!
Make Your Reservations Now

Brunch 10 - 2
Dinner 4 - 8

Reservations 685-9335
Banquet & Catering Facilities For All Occasions

the Date Bar a Restaurant
Serving UNIQUE HOMEMADE RECIPES

10% off with CC ID

Serving Breakfast & Lunch
Mon.-Sat.
7 am - 4 pm
24 E. Kiowa 578-5693

Hertz
You don't just rent a car. You rent a company.

Call for Weekend Rate and Eligibility

315 N. Weber
473-2444
8-6 Mon-Sat
Appointments possible at any other time

5% discount with Ad

More on the eight block plan

Continued from p. 4

We welcome this opportunity to begin the campus-wide effort of planning and implementation and look forward to further serving the faculty in whatever manner is deemed necessary.

Credit

1. Semester-long courses will ordinarily receive ½ unit of credit per semester but may receive up to one unit of credit. Year-long courses normally receive one unit of credit.

2. Semester and year-long independent study, collaborative research, and reading courses receive ½ unit credit for each semester.

3. Adjuncts continue to receive ¼ unit of credit.

Student Overload Restrictions

1. Students may not count more than two units of credit from semester or year-long courses toward the 32 units required for graduation (as per Motion I). This latter rule does not apply to block-long independent study courses for 1 unit of credit and adjunct courses for ¼ unit of credit.

2. Participation in any semester or year-long independent study, collaborative research or directed reading courses (as per Motion I) requires sophomore standing. In order to take classes as an overload, students must obtain permission from the Dean's office.

3. Students may not take more than one semester-long course during a semester and no more than two in a given year. Students may not take more than one year-long course in a given year.

Student Access

1. During the first year of implementation (1988-89), class-size limitations for semester and year-long courses could be relaxed by agreement of the Instructor, the Dean, and Department chairs. This would allow flexibility to modify class-size.

2. Departments are encouraged to make available to sophomore students, a greater number of independent study and "Topics" courses (i.e., relax some of the pre-requisites on advanced level directed readings and collaborative research courses).

Registration Procedures

1. Registration for all semester and year-long courses will be at no extra tuition charge to students.

2. Pre-registration for semester and year-long courses will take place during March pre-registration. Course changes and the registration deadline for Fall semester and year-long courses will be during the first week of block 1. Course changes and the registration deadline for Spring semester-long courses will be during the first week of block 5.

3. Students who wish to drop a semester or year-long course must do so before the end of the second block of the course.

Scheduling

1. Semester and year-long courses should be scheduled after 3:30 p.m.

2. Semester-long ½ unit courses should be limited to no more than two meetings per block.

3. Flexibility on the part of faculty teaching semester and year-long courses is necessary to allow for student absences in the event of field trips, extracurricular activities, athletic events, etc. Course lectures and presentations should be recorded or otherwise made available to students who may not be able to attend a specific class meeting.

Staffing

1. Departments should manage their staff resources to insure that: (1) block-teaching is not sacrificed; (2) faculty overload is restricted; and (3) there is availability of a suficient number of non-block courses.

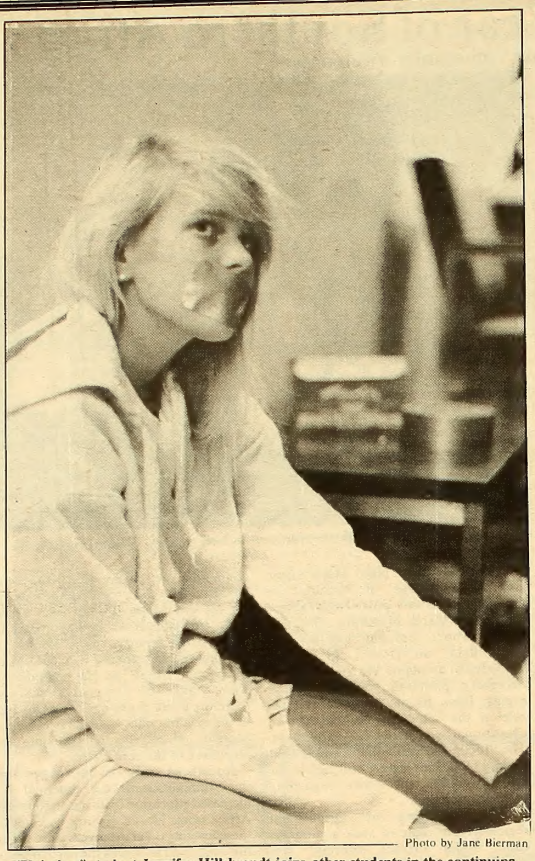

Photo by Jane Bierman

"Voiceless" student Jennifer Hillebrandt joins other students in the continuing protest outside President Riley's office over CC's investment practices in South Africa.

2. In order to provide flexibility and opportunity for students to take independent study, directed readings, and collaborative research courses, most faculty must be willing to make as an overload 3 or 4 openings per year available to students.

Faculty Workload Adjustments

1. Those faculty teaching semester-long courses receive one-block equivalent after courses equal to one unit of credit (and this can be done in the course of two years).

2. Faculty may receive workload adjustments for independent study, directed readings, or collaborative research projects if in the course of two academic years they supervise ten or more students (or the equivalent).

Curricular Balance/Access

It is suggested that:

1. Low enrollment courses necessary to the major not be offered every year.

2. Independent readings, tutorials, research blocks, thesis blocks, etc., which enroll only a few students, be taught as an overload, while the instructor is teaching a regular block course.

3. If more than one section of a course is offered, and these are under-enrolled, the number of sections be reduced.

4. Courses which normally fall far short of their full enrollment not be team-taught.

5. AP:A and AP:B courses not be dropped, unless they are consistently under-enrolled.

6. General Studies and other non-departmental courses should not be dropped, unless they are consistently under-enrolled. Some, however, might be restructured: i.e., reduced from three to two blocks, taught by fewer instructors, etc.

7. Writing Emphasis courses, including Freshman Tutorials, not be dropped. An effort should be made to increase their number.

PARTICIPATING TOYOTA DEALERS

COLORADO

Aurora
Mark Toyota
444 South Havana Street
(303) 340-2170

Boulder
Tom Lyons Toyota
47th & Pearl Parkway
(303) 443-3250

Colorado Springs
Gene Osborn Toyota
5597 N. Academy Boulevard
(303) 598-2222

Durango
Bob Sellers Toyota
20541 U.S. Highway 160 West
(303) 385-4822

Englewood
Burt Toyota
5460 South Broadway
(303) 761-3222

Fort Collins
Colorado Import Motors
Toyota/Volvo
1113 North College Avenue
(303) 534-2613

Glenwood Springs
Bighorn Toyota
152 West Sixth Street
(303) 945-6544

Golden
Stevinson Toyota
15000 West Colfax
(303) 277-0550

Grand Junction
Import Motors
2578 Highways 6 & 50
(303) 242-1221

Longmont
Longmont Toyota
116 South Main
(303) 443-6325

Pueblo
Pueblo Toyota
2801 Highway 50 West
(303) 543-1719

Thornton
Douglas Toyota
1650 West 104th Avenue
(303) 466-1921

WYOMING

Laramie
Ken's Toyota Kars
2222 Grand Avenue
(307) 742-7423

TOYOTA CLASS OF '87

NOW IT'S POSSIBLE TO BUY OR LEASE A NEW TOYOTA WITH NO DOWN PAYMENT.

Graduates: If you've received a verifiable job offer, we want to get you and your new career off to a great start—with a brand-new Toyota.

BUY IT OR LEASE IT. Toyota Motor Credit Corporation and your participating Toyota dealer are now making it possible to get the credit you deserve with two Class of '87 "quick approval" financing programs.

If you qualify, you can buy or lease a new Toyota and generally no down payment or security deposit will be required.* What's more, we can even process your loan within *24 hours. See your participating Toyota dealer for program specifics.

To apply, you'll need a current driver's license and proof of employment or job offer. You may find it helpful to bring along any bank or credit card numbers. Once you're approved, you can take your choice of the most exciting line of new cars and trucks Toyota has ever offered, including the all-new Corolla FX16 GT-S Liftback.

So come on down to your participating Toyota dealer today. Fill out an application, and then buy or lease your new Toyota. Purchase or lease arrangements must be completed by June 30, 1987.

A new career and a new Toyota. Who Could Ask For Anything More!

LEASE EXAMPLE: 1987 Standard Bed Truck, model 8200, based on manufacturer's suggested retail price. 48 monthly payments of $131.77,† totaling $6324.96.† End-of-lease purchase option, $2813.16.† No further end-of-lease liabilities, except abnormal wear and tear and excess mileage.

*No down payment required on eligible models, provided the amount financed is not more than the Toyota manufacturer's suggested retail price, plus the cost of factory-installed optional equipment and required tax and license fees.
Loan approvals M–F, 8:30–5:00.
Proof of insurability required and no negative credit history. Employment to begin within 120 days of loan approval date.
†Amounts may vary according to location; actual dealer price may vary.

TOYOTA MOTOR CREDIT CORPORATION TMCC

Toyota Standard Bed Truck

Toyota Corolla FX16 GT-S Liftback

TEST-DRIVE A NEW TOYOTA AND RECEIVE A TOYOTA CLASS OF '87 T-SHIRT.

Come in and test-drive any new Toyota before June 30, 1987, and show us your student ID card.†† We'll mail you an official Toyota Class of '87 T-shirt.†††

††All college students with valid student ID's are eligible.
†††Limit one per person while supplies last.

WHO COULD ASK FOR ANYTHING MORE! TOYOTA

Get More From Life... Buckle Up!

TOYOTA CLASS OF '87 TEST-DRIVE COUPON

Bring this coupon to your participating Toyota dealer for your free test drive. After your test drive, we'll mail you a Toyota Class of '87 T-shirt.

This coupon valid until June 30, 1987. Offer good while supplies last.

D-003

© 1987 Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc.

Watson Fellows Reveal Destinations Cont.

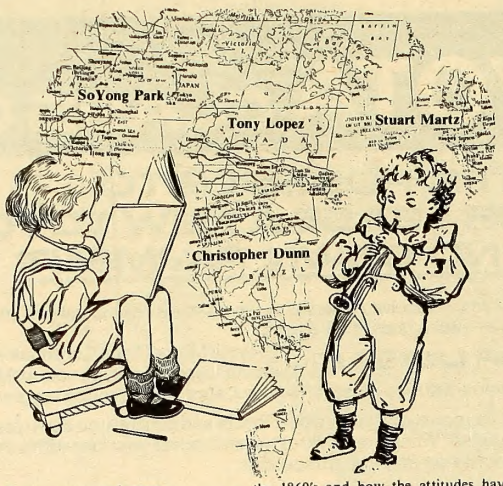
Cont. from p. 1

also address the questions: to whom do these pagan religions appeal, especially since the practice of Candomble and Xango seems more pervasive among the urban middle class as opposed to the rural lower class? Further, what are the implications or "repercussions," as Dunn says, of middle class involvement in these practices?

Dunn anticipates that next year will be a particularly interesting time to be in Brazil and explore these issues, as 1988 marks the centennial year for the emancipation of slaves in Brazil. The discrimination against blacks is still prevalent in the working environment, yet socially, racial differences seem minimalized. The increased awareness of existing racial tensions or the alleviation of those tensions will add another dimension to Chris Dunn's socio-historic study.

Anthony Lopez is also treating a socio-political problem, but one with an entirely different focus within another culture. Lopez will be doing a comparative study of the lives of the Sioux Indians, who migrated to Canada in 1862, from what is now Minnesota and the Sioux that remained in the States and who reside on the Crow Creek Reservation in South Dakota, from where Lopez himself traces his ancestry. He will study the differences of the treatment of the Sioux Indians under the Canadian and American governments.

Lopez describes the reason for the division of the tribe and the migration to Canada. In 1862 the Sioux "uprising" or "Minnesota Massacre" occurred, a demonstration of protest against the American government's treatment of the Sioux people. After the uprising the American government proceeded to impose even further restrictions upon the Sioux and their territorial rights. They were confined to a military-occupied region where they were surveyed and their freedoms imposed upon.



The "most hostile and nationalistic" sectors of the tribe, the East Sioux, fled to Canada where they were not forced to endure the same cultural and individual oppression experienced by those who remained in the States. The East Sioux were allowed to maintain more of their traditions and become more "autonomous" than their counterparts in the Dakotas; they adapted to their new environment and conditions without the Canadian government dictating their every move.

Anthony Lopez is interested in exploring further the differences that existed between the Canadian and American treatment of the Sioux during the 1860's and how the attitudes have changed since then. The scope of his study will address the cultural and social effects of the "first interactions of the Sioux with the white man." History is an on-going, evolving state, not one which is confined to a particular era or particular events, affirms Lopez. The political-history established in the 1860's is one that still pertains to the 1980's.

Stuart Martz intends to pursue an entirely different type of project; his chief interest is music and the music he wants to study will take him to Ireland. Martz plans to do a lot of "playing" while abroad, of instruments, that is. He is going to learn more about Celtic music and has expressed a special affinity for the acoustic guitar, the fiddle, and the bodhran, an instrument typical to the southern part of Ireland.

Martz's study will take him to the south Conemara Gaeltacht where he will be immersed in Gaelic culture, history and language. Martz knows of three or four main dialects spoken in southern Ireland and he hopes to perfect his knowledge of the dialect(s) spoken in Carraroe, Ireland. He will be studying "sean nos," a complicated singing style which is an accompaniment to some traditional Irish dances.

Martz has already established several contacts at his destination, having previously traveled in Ireland on three different occasions, for about a total of five-six months. When questioned about the current political situation in Ireland and any apprehensions about being there, he responded, "There is no political situation..." that is to say, "there is violence in the Republic of Ireland, [illegible] in Northern Ireland, which is still British territory." Needless to say, Martz anticipates a peaceful journey, inspired by Gaelic tradition and music.

SoYong Park will spend her year abroad studying the lives of a matriarchal society located on an island off the coast of Korea. She will examine the roles of the women of Cheju-do who have traditionally been responsible for earning the money to support the family, as well as attending to various household duties. The women on this island work 2.5 hours more per day than do their male counterparts.

What are the sociological implications of a society where the women are the "bread-winners?" If they demonstrate some kind of economic "superiority" to men, then how does this affect the traditional feminine role of being subservient to males in a social context? These are some of the questions that SoYong Park plans to address.

In Korea there is no real freedom of speech or press and the government is essentially "a military dictatorship" according to Park. How do these variables further affect the lives of the women of Cheju-do? Park had originally considered studying the student underground political movement in Korea, because the current political situation is so crucial to an understanding of how the Korean people conduct their lives or are allowed to conduct their lives.

It goes without saying that the Watson students who have been awarded Watson Fellowships are deeply committed to their topics which they have chosen to study and are eagerly anticipating their departure after graduation. Anthony Lopez reminds us that Watson Fellowships are not limited to a select few; of course, the actual grants are restricted in number, but the ideal is to pursue independent research abroad can be had by all. Lopez encourages those in the CC community who have the resources to take the initiative upon themselves and conduct a project in a foreign country. "There are a lot of good ideas," he says, we just have to pursue them; "anybody can do it."

MARY BUTCHER

Course In Rome Offered

A unique course, "Rome the City" (AH 200), will be offered by the Art Department during block nine. Taught by Professors Edith Kirsch and Ruth Kolarik, the first two weeks of the course will be spent on campus, then the class will reconvene in Rome. Students will each research a work of art in Tutt library and then discuss it with the class in Rome.

Students interested in taking the course should see Professor Kirsch or Kilarik as soon as possible. It is recommended for students with some background in art history who are planning to travel in Europe this summer. It is probably not a good course for seniors who would want to return for graduation. There is no program fee, and expenses connected with instruction in Rome, i.e. museum admissions, bus fare, etc. will be covered. This is made possible by the Art Department's Berg Endowment. Transportation from Colorado Springs to Rome, food and lodging must be paid by the students. Students might expect to pay approximately 1970 for round trip tansportation from Colorado Springs to Rome, TWA Apex fare. Travel to and from other points and at different times during the summer will vary. Reasonable accomodations will be reserved in Rome. Living expenses in Rome will run approximately $300. (If there is any likelihood that conditions in Italy will not be safe for travel, the entire course will be taught on campus.)

Art Dept.

MDA Superdance!

$3 at the door
free food and beer

3 bands including
Order & Progress and the Bo Weevils

4 pm - 2 am in Cossitt Gym
All profits will benefit Muscular Dystrophy

Saturday, April 11th

Welcome Back to a new beginning!
Come and see our beginning.

Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm
Sat. 11-5 pm

THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE

311 N. Tejon
Downtown
Just North of Platte

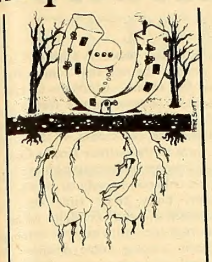
phone:
635-2118

Ellipses and Hyperbole



I'm sorry to say, I am no stranger to the bus ride from Denver to the Springs. Every time I smell diesel fumes, I suffer an attack of delayed stress syndrome. Signs flash before my eyes that read, "this coach is bathroom equipped for your convenience."

For our convenience, they place an occupied sign at the front of the bus that lights up every time someone goes into the bathroom, just in case there is any doubt about the intentions of the person who just walked down the aisle.

Generally, the person who just walked down the aisle is uncomfortable even before the little light announces his position. Anyone who would willingly enter a Trailways mobile bathroom must, by definition, be desperate.

For the most part, the bathroom remains unoccupied, and the light blinks on and off only because the door is swinging open and closed with the lurchings of the coach. The light serves to highlight the sign directly above that reads, "smoking is allowed in the last five rows only."

The closed air conditioning system of the coach (for our convenience) ensures a maximum distribution of secondary smoke and carbon monoxide. The air quickly becomes soup thick but not quite thick enough to dampen the spine tapping wail of the mandatory child.

And the air is not only thick with pollution, it is also thick with characters. You never know who is going to sit next to you. One time my row partner was a military mechanic, who worked on helicopters.

He explained to me that the very top bolt on a helicopter's wings—you know the bolt that connects the airfoils to the mast, just above the swash-plate-he informed me that this bolt is called "The Jesus Nut," because if it comes loose you get to meet Jesus.

My last sojourn with Trailways topped "Ol' Jesus Nuts" by far. It started with a woman-child who sat at the front of the bus and insisted on yelling gory details about her operations across the aisle to a hard rocker, who responded with even more gory details about his operations.

For a while, it looked like the rocker was winning the competition. Then, the woman-child played her trump card and started to talk about her caesarian section. I could hardly breath.

I couldn't understand why those two just didn't sit next to each other and talk in lower voices. I started to sweat at the prospect of this woman deciding to abandon any pretense of speaking exclusively to the rocker.

I was certain, as her narration grew louder, that she would stand up in the aisle and display her scar with the perfunctory air of a stewardess pointing out the emergency exits.

It was about this time that it became clear to me that the man directly next to me, the one wearing the red hunting cap, was a neo-Nazi. I should've guessed when he asked "are you a Catholic, a Jew, or is this seat occupied?"

I said I was Scottish, a half truth that is bolstered by my red hair, and spent the rest of the trip worrying about the other half of the truth. I realized that the only indication of my Jewishness was a can of passover macaroons at the bottom of my laundry bag.

As the woman-child was arguing that a C-section scar is probably twice as long as a hernia scar, the Nazi offered me a stick of gum. He hated to ride the bus, and it was clearly the fault of an international conspiracy that he had no choice.

I was afraid to refuse his gum, lest he suspect that I was a member of the Rockefeller-Rothschild connection, but at the same time, I was not about to expose myself to alien gum. I decided the best way to deal with this guy was to play dumb. I also pretended to stick the gum in my mouth.

I nodded in absequious way to his incessant diatribe and did my best to move my jaws as though they were engaging a wad of gum. After explaining that a "secret brotherhood" is the only solution, he started to tell me about his Yoga. Yoga? This man wants to find his spiritual center and then go burn a cross?

Then, he took a piece of gum, and I realized that my pantomime chewing was completely unconvincing in comparison. As the occupied light blinked on and off, the woman-child did stand up and show her scar. Sick from the air, I vowed to walk rather than ride this ghastly bus again. I stood up, looked the Yogi-Nazi in the eyes and yelled, "Does anyone want a macaroon?"

AARON SHURE

A nice place to visit, but...

Austin, Tx.: "Hoppin'"

It's not just for rednecks anymore

Austin, Texas. My heavy rhythm hometown. Home to house-rockin bluesmen Stevie Ray Vaughn and the Fabulous T-birds and well as muscial mindworms such as the Butthole Surfers.

But then it doesn't really matter who was born where or where they had their first gig. Austin's a scene. It's musician-friendly. Much of that friendlyness is due to the University of Texas' 50,000 students. Most of whom have ample green to shower upon the clubs, restaurants, and mixtures of the two (Midnight sushi bars were the rave a few months back). Yet there's something that goes beyond the simple cash flow; something special.

A local comedy troupe "Ester's Follies" expressed it best when they named the river city "retirement capital of the world...for young people." Austin was one of the cities carried along by the Sixties. That we subsided and the city was left dry and soon thirsted for something new. It was about a decade ago that the first shock (yes there really was a time when spiked hair shocked teens and adults alike) wave of punk hit Austin. Raul's Club was the first power generator, providing an outlet for local bands and housing road shows.

I recall my early attitude towards bands with names like "The Psychedelic Furs." It was just a little too much for my fourteen-year-old mind to grip onto. But after hearing the Circle Jerks being cranked out of a cheap box every morning on the bus I started to listen. Before I knew it I was head over heels in love with the Clash's first album; hooked for life, or at least adolecence.

The process I went through repeated itself enough times for popular sentiment to change from the initial recoil to a sense of intrigue. The first seeds of "Wanna-be's" we're germinating. I remember how ticked off the punk girls at my high school were at Madonna for splashing the "Vintage lace dress with thirty-six bracelets on each arm" look all over MTV, making their treasured wardrobes trendy overnight. But that was then, this is now. Where is this big little music town tonight?

As usual, things are totally different but basically the same. Blues, R.E.M. school of music ("New Sincerity" appears to be the official title) and Funk/Rap appears to be dominating the scene. There's a lot of Trash Metal but they have a hard time finding gigs since they stormed the outdoor walls, knocked holes in the walls and smashed all the toilets at one of the better clubs. While there are few good local reggae bands, any worthwhile act stops in Austin. I could go on and one listing clubs and bands. Suffice to say that if you had been in Austin last Saturday you would have had a choice of ninety-one bands at seventy-six clubs. According to Austin radio (which is ironically pathetic) there was more live music per capita last New Year's than any where else in the world. It's a pretty hoppin town. But you know what? It's almost too much. With that much choice one quickly becomes overly critical. You don't want to do what's fun, but what's cool. Every rose garden's got thorns. Just gotta tow that line while stayin' outta step.

TULIO BROWNING

YAKITORI

Serving Lunch and Dinner
Monday - Saturday

•

Sushi Bar

•

Cocktails

•

10% Discount off any entree
(with your CC I.C.)

16 E. Bijou • Downtown • 578-0915

Hardcover and Paperback
"Hurt" Books
$1.49 each

Originally Priced
$15.95 - $19.95

Colorado College Bookstore
McGregor Hall

Revising CC's Honor Constitution

"Constitutional Convention" ponders possibilities

Since the beginning of this year the Honor Council has planned to revise the current Honor Constitution. The greatest challenge in this endeavor was agreeing and focusing on the particular areas of revision. Saturday, March 7, council members, equipped with coffee and red pens, gathered in Palmer for a preliminary "constitutional convention." Prior to the convention they had received suggestions from Dean McCleod, Prof. Margi Duncombe, and Dean Nelson Cisneros. Four hours later, the Council had narrowed its focus to three possible areas of revision.

First, the system sorely needs a succinct statement of what the Honor Council is. Such a statement would have to include three areas of academic honor: testing situations; writing papers and homework; and peer relationships (i.e. actions which deprive other students access to materials they need).

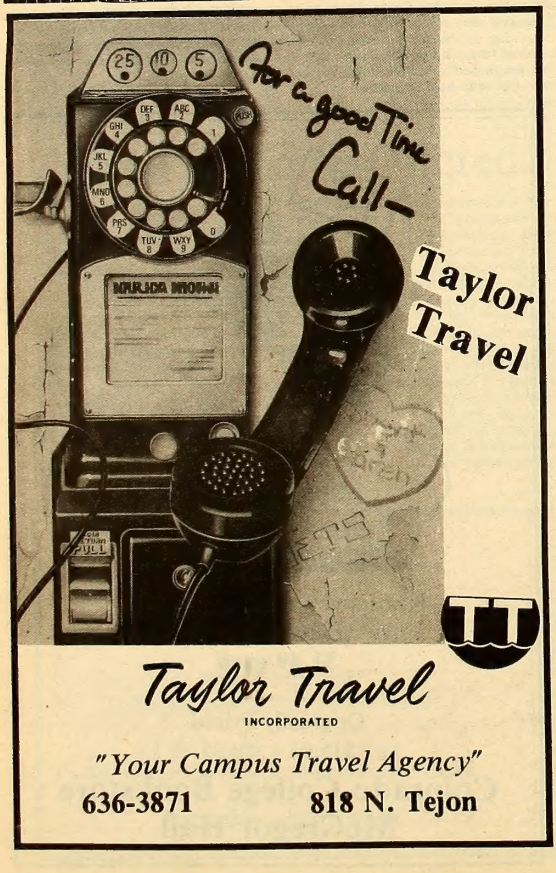
Second, some of the council confessed its disappointment with the current punitive aspect of the Code. The Honor System is one in which learning from one's mistakes is encouraged; two violations are required to suspend a student from the institution. However, the council has witnessed cases in which the violation is despicably egregious. Should someone who orders a thesis in the mail, and copies it word for word deserve a second chance? And should such a person deserve to enjoy the privilege and trust of unproctored exams? The following system was proposed as resolution. The Honor Council would have discretion, depending on the flagrancy of the violation, to vote to recommend suspension or expulsion to the President. A recommendation for expulsion would require a unanimous vote.

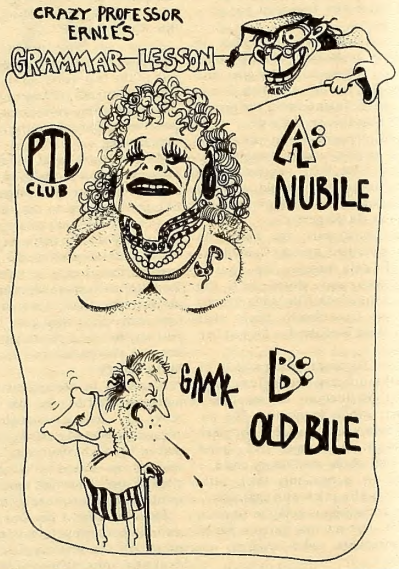
Further, the Council questioned the present system's penalty for first offenders. That is to say, after a first conviction the student's name goes into a confidential file, and the council recommends to the professor whether the student ought to fail the class. While the confidentiality is an integral aspect of the code, the Council would like to strengthen the warning to first offenders. It proposed that a convicted student should automatically fail the class in which the violation occurred.

Third, the convention raised questions concerning our current election process. Many students and some council members criticize the council for being overly self-selective. Currently, the student body chooses from a pool of nominated candidates. The Honor Council interviews those with the highest votes and makes the final selection. One possible resolution would be to reverse the process. The council would interview those nominated and present a smaller candidate pool to the student body for the final selection. Another resolution might be to invite student leaders from other campus organizations to partake in the interview process. Thirdly,—and to be honest, the one that sounds like the most fun to me—would be to hold the candidate interviews in a forum setting, open to all members of the student body.

These are just some of the possible revisions to the current Honor Code. To expedite matters the council is working to draw a coherent agenda to present to the student body some time next year. Nevertheless, the council wishes to encourage the entire campus community to begin voicing some opinions. Two hundred years ago open and vigorous debate turned out an impressive document. If you feel strongly about one of the proposals mentioned, write the Catalyst or the Honor Council. As they say on Donahue, 'We'd like to hear from you.'

TOM ORI





THE ANTLERS HOTEL
Colorado Springs, Colorado

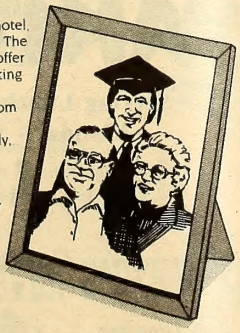
Picture yourself at The Antlers Hotel for graduation.

Colorado Springs' finest...for only $60!

The Antlers...Colorado Springs' only Four-Star, Four-Diamond hotel, located just nine blocks south of The Colorado College, has a special offer for families and friends of graduating students.

- Single or double occupancy room rate of only $60
- A portrait of graduate and family, compliments of The Antlers
- Complimentary valet parking

Call Cynthia at The Antlers for reservations...we'll make this special event picture perfect!



4 S. Cascade Avenue
Chase Stone Center
Colorado Springs,
Colorado 80903
(303) 473-5600
(800) 232-2323
Operated by The Broadmoor Management Company

Mobil Travel Guide 1986

Four Diamond Award 1986

©1987, The Antlers

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CC Deserves Our Support

To the Editor:

For many the Board of Trustees' decision not to vest creates a dilemma: how to continue opposing ul decision? Margaret Duncombe's solution, pressed in her letter in the last issue of the Catalyst, to sacrifice, if necessary, all other purposes of the llege to the cause of divestment. She urges eryone—faculty, alumni, other potential donors—divest from CC" by withdrawing their money. She admonishes students "to talk with...prospective dents in their hometowns," presumably to courage them from coming to CC. What other fference can one make? Since the intent of Professor ncombe's letter is to enjoin all employees, friends, supporters of Colorado College to withhold ntributions until the College divests from mpanies doing business in South Africa, one can agine that if enough contributions were withdrawn if enough students were persuaded by faculty and tent students not to enroll, the Board might be ced to change its views on divestment. But what if College is brought to its knees before the Board of stees is brought to its senses? What then?

However deeply felt and morally motivated these nctions are, I fail to understand a logic which nes the totality of Colorado College by its estment policy or a logic which deduces that king for the impoverishment of the College can anyone. Instead of threatening the destruction of orado College in order to save it, wouldn't it be re useful to continue the same relentless persuasion cess which has already gained innumerable verts within the College community, while also ing the Board to set up special scholarships for uth African blacks, a policy more likely to offer ctive support for those engaged in the South can struggle than a policy of undercutting support Colorado College?

But the real snare in Margaret Duncombe's posal is that it beckons us all to succumb to the lure ingle-issue politics—a deadly political virus which quickly destroy an entire body politic—whenever individual moral agendas are in jeopardy. cerents of single-issue politics judge everything on basis of a single moral dimension. In such a nochrome political world, nothing else matters or ts. There are no "perhapses" or "maybes" or "what The anti-abortion movement is an all-too-familiar mple of the ravages of single-issue politics. What alls us, I hope, about the anti-abortionist vement is not that it sees abortion as "murder" sonable people can disagree about that), but that it ges all politicians, all political programs, ything on whether it supports or opposes tion. The heat generated by single-issue politics erates the limits which ordinarily constrain ical conflict.

There are, unfortunately, many things to protest in world; there always will be. Today it is divestment; rrow it will be an equally demanding moral ern. But how can we continue to be open to erns beyond ourselves while still acknowledging a ety of obligations, obligations which pull us in e than one direction? Colorado College deserves continued support despite its current divestment ey. Many things go on at this institution and not all hem are shams. At the very least, the college ides a free environment in which students and ty can study about, organize for, and, finally, ose whatever they think needs opposing. But if for compelling moral issue which needs our tion we are willing to risk the very institution h helps draw it to our attention and mobilize but it because some who speak for that institution not bend when we want them to bend—then we neither ourselves nor our causes.

Sincerely,
Eli Boderman

Do You Know What You Are Eating?

To the Editor:

Along with two other students, this block I am participating in an independent study at Malachite Small Farm School. A large amount of our time here at Malachite is spent gaining a better understanding of the problems of agriculture (or more appropriately agribusiness) in our country, and how the people at Malachite farm have attempted to deal with the problem. We are learning about sustainable organic methods of gardening and farming that attempt to conserve energy and eliminate wastes as much as possible.

The problem, as I have come to understand it, is that American agriculture has jumped on the space shuttle of technology in an effort to gain maximum efficiency and profit. With this effort has come the end of small family farms, rural communities, and healthy chemical free grains, meat and vegetables, which have been replaced by the products of agribusiness such as large corporation owned acreages of grains and vegetables that have been infested with chemical fertilizers, pesticides and herbicides. As well as meat products that, due to the unnatural confinement of large numbers of animals, have been injected with antibiotics which now currently contribute to the ill health of people in society.

In our readings and discussions I've learned that our blind faith in technology and human superiority have led us into a dangerous situation. We depend on large amounts of non-renewable resources to grow our food. Fossil fuels are used for the creation of chemical fertilizers and running of machinery even with rising prices hindering their "efficiency." By means of fossil fuels, we pump water from underground aquifers at a rate faster than that of natural replacement. Every year thousands of tons of top soil are permanently eroded away from our fields due to modern planting, plowing and irrigation methods. The depletion of these non-renewable resources presents a problem for future availability of food, and yet we continue to rely on these methods.

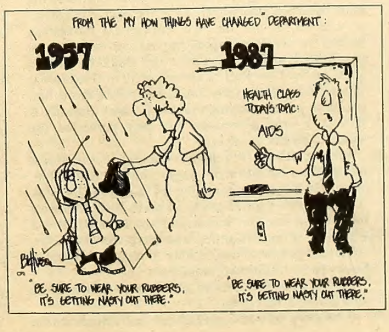
Here at Malachite they farm the "old fashioned" way. That means that they conserve, in order to be truly efficient, by using draft horses to plow, plant and harvest instead of using tractors that burn fossil fuels. Rather than buying expensive chemical fertilizers they make use of the manure so generously supplied by the farm animals (who are allowed to breath fresh air and eat wholesome food). The vegetables and grains grown here are free of chemical herbicides and pesticides. Hand weeding, cultivating with horses, and natural "pest predators" work well to control noxious impostors.

At Malachite the people try to work with the land, not against it. It is their way of attempting to get back to a solid agriculture that works for the future. We can all learn from an experience like this one about the most important aspect of our lives, food. My experience here has taught me to think twice about what I'm eating and where it came from.

If you are interested in learning more about organic farming and Malachite Small Farm School write or give them a call about the programs they offer. (Malachite Small Farm School, ASR 21, Gardner, Colorado 81040, (303) 746-2389.)

If you are interested in what we have been doing down here this block come to our slide show and presentation sometime eighth block.

Betsy Wright-Clark



FROM THE "MY HOW THINGS HAVE CHANGED" DEPARTMENT: 1957
1987
HEALTH CLASS TODAY'S TOPIC:
AIDS
"BE SURE TO WEAR YOUR RUBBERS, IT'S GETTING NASTY OUT THERE."
"BE SURE TO WEAR YOUR RUBBERS, IT'S GETTING NASTY OUT THERE."

DEBATE!

To President Riley,

In light of the Board of Trustees' decision to disregard the recommendations for divestment by the CCCA, faculty, the Shareholders Responsibility Committee, twenty-one student organizations and 1000 signatures, we feel that the campus has a right to hear, and the Board has an obligation to defend, the Trustees decision to continue investing in companies that do business in South Africa. The Board's written statement on divestment does not adequately address the complexities of the issue and ignores most of the arguments put forth in the CCCAA position paper.

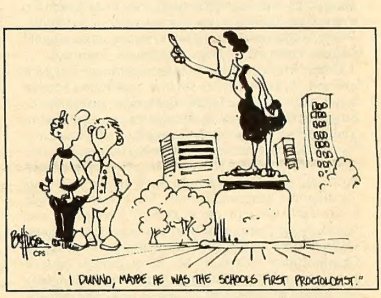
We understand that the Board is concerned with the "one-sidedness" of the divestment debate on campus. Since the Board, having made its decision, must be very well informed on this issue, we call upon the Trustees themselves to share with the campus the arguments for continued investment in South Africa.

We request the Administration to assist the CCCAA in the structuring and planning of two events with one or two Trustees in which the campus can hear and question first hand the Board's reasons for their decision.

The first event must take place during the first two weeks of eight Block (by April 17) and must be scheduled and confirmed by April 6.

The second event must be scheduled during the first two weeks of ninth Block (by May 15) and be confirmed by April 17.

The CC Community Against Apartheid



CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETER LOACH, News Editor
DAVID EVANS, Features Editor
MUNIR MEGHJEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
•
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETER SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
•
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
•
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Cutler Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 extension 673. The Catalyst is printed tri-monthly from September to May except during holiday periods.

Cutler Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its education programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local laws.

Editorials appearing in the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 400 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Rastall Center, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

A work of considerable length may be submitted as a guest commentary. Persons interested in submitting commentary should contact the Catalyst at 632-4999 or 473-2233 ext. 673.

The Catalyst reserves the right to edit or cut letters to the editor and guest commentaries.

President Reagan:
Two More Years?

BY ANDREW DUNHAM

Will President Reagan serve out his full second term? Las Vegas, which does not make bets on such future possibilities, would probably give even odds that he will not. Wall Street, which does attempt to predict the future, is booming.

First, roughly 15 percent of 76 year old men die within two years. While Ronald Reagan is blessed with a characteristic that tends to prolong life (wealth), he is also under a great deal of stress and responsibility. His "Shucks, I can sleep through anything" attitude may allow him to avoid the stress.

But can he avoid the law? Congress, in the Bolan Amendment, for a time made it against the law for the government to aid the Contras ("the moral equivalent of the Founding Fathers" RR called them, and remembering Washington's and Jefferson's slaves, perhaps we should agree). People in RR's White House have allegedly been breaking that law. Did Reagan know about it? Can Special Prosecutor Walsh prove it? Additionally, as Tallyrand said in a different time, "it was worse than a crime, it was a blunder!" So, most importantly, what might the political consequences of Reagan's blunder be?

The evidence implicating Mr. Reagan is so far weak and purely circumstantial. The possibility of a conviction or stronger evidence of guilt depends on the character of those surrounding the President, the abilities of Walsh and his staff, and, since Reagan is upper class and white, on whether he is in fact guilty. What is the circumstantial evidence that Ronald Reagan knew about illegal aid for the Contras?

Other Presidents have known about and indeed ordered illegal activities such as murdering foreign heads of state, overthrowing foreign governments, bombing Cambodia, etc. Presidents are supposed to know about foreign policy activities of potentially enormous consequences. That's what they're there for. And it has become commonplace, even accepted and expected, that Presidents do such things to try to maintain the American empire. The President spends hours each week in meetings with intelligence and defense and foreign affairs advisors (three quite separate functions in the United States Government Organizational Chart). So Mr. Reagan would have to be an unusual President not to know, which obviously he is. Thus, the presumption of his knowledge remains merely circumstantial, let's say odds of 50-50, that he was directly involved or knew about breaking the law.

To weaken the case against him even more, let's agree that Ollie North is a can-do kind of guy, a real American Hero, and so could quite plausibly have shown the private enterprise to have thought up this whole thing on his own, gotten the various bureaucracies to participate—"hell no we don't need no receipt for these missiles, take 'em"—and sent the proceeds through Swiss banks to the Contras. But could he have succeeded without others knowing about it?

As North's immediate supervisor Poindexter almost certainly knew about the illegal diversions from the Iran ransoms to the Contras. It seems plausible that the Donald Regan who, by all accounts, ran a very autocratic operation and boasted that he knew everything that went on in the White House, also knew about this illegal activity. If Don knew did Ron know? I recognize that Mr. Regan suffers from narcissistic grandiosity, called himself the Chief Executive Officer of the government, and could easily have kept it all to himself. But my bet is that, like the good organization-man he is, he played it safe, covered his ass, and got at least verbal agreement from Mr. Reagan. Perhaps RR's advisors explained what was going on and asked him if he approved this illegal diversion of Ayotallah money to the Contras, and Reagan's head nodded forward.

This is obviously not even evidence, let alone proof, but it should at least not surprise us if RR knew about or approved the diversion of funds to the Contras. Other Presidents have routinely done as much or more (I still wonder why, if RR really was as ignorant as he now claims and really wanted to find out the truth, he didn't simply call in North and Poindexter and ask them what was going on before they left the White House). Assuming for the moment that Mr. Reagan did know, can it be proved? That depends on the honor, loyalty, not to mention willingness to go to jail of North, Poindexter, and Regan. Since those three are the kind of rugged American individualists who made this country great, they may well squeal if Walsh offers them a sufficiently attractive deal.

It will not be easy trying to govern as the revelations slowly creep up from North to Poindexter to Regan towards Reagan, even if finally the revelations show the President really didn't know anything. The revelations, and indictments, will be coming out all summer, day after day after day, in televised Congressional hearings and in court from Walsh's prosecutions. The Tower Commission, appointed by Mr. Reagan (with Tower rewarded afterwards with a job for a job well done) give undoubtedly the most sympathetic review RR could or will get, and it was a political disaster for him and damaging to Republican 1988 hopes. Walsh and the Democrats will be much more critical. And while the public seems largely indifferent now, several indictments of the President's men may alter that.

Leaving aside what all the revelations will do to the old man's health (he was reported to be despondent, a good sign since it shows he is still partly in touch with reality), what will it do to his ability and desire to be President? Mr. Reagan is an optimist, but his upbeat style may well not be effective for his problems ahead.

Finally, let's look at the context within which all this will be happening. The Republicans will increasingly see Reagan as a liability rather than as their ticket to majority status (that hope really died in November even before Contragate). Business is increasingly worried about anemic growth, the trade deficit, and their perhaps root cause, the Federal budget deficit; certainly the latter is unlikely to be adequately addressed, much less resolved, under this President. Thus there will be less resistance to his stepping aside than would normally be the case. Nancy will be worried about what is happening to her man, both physically and to his place in history; he won't be having as much fun as in the past; and Republican officials and supporters will be very worried about their prospects.

In this context, President Reagan may regretfully decide that his failing health makes it impossible for him to fulfill his duties as he has in the past, he'll ride off into the sunset, and the country will have another Happy Hollywood Ending: President Bush. □

Andrew Dunham is an Associate Professor of Political Science at The Colorado College

David Makarechian

Evangelism And The New Right

Praise the Lord.

It had to happen sooner or latter. The bible banging, self-righteous, give-us-money-or-burn-in-hell pulpit pounders have finally been exposed. Literally.

Smiling Jim Bakker, founder of the Praise the Lord/People That Love Club, admitted to drugging and seducing one of his flock. Jim's lovely wife Tammy, a cross between a Dolly Parton with too much make-up and the wicked witch of the west, blamed the devil for her dependence on prescription drugs and has checked into the Betty Ford Center. Jimmy Swaggert, who "earned" $142 million dollars last year, is trying to move in on the Bakker empire so he "can receive all of God's tithings." But Ronald Reagan's friend and advisor Jerry Falwell has taken over Bakker's PTL Club, and is staving off the Swaggert take over.

No, this isn't a return of "the dirt" column. Admittedly, the story of the scandalous evangelists is entertaining, mindless reading, but it has political ramifications, also.

At first, the connection between the big-money god squad and the New Right seems absurd. But one cannot overlook the religious re-awakening that corresponded to the new political emphasis on morality. The Republican's emphasis of school prayer, banning abortion, and crack down on pornography are evidence enough. The movements are intrinsically related, and on the decline.

The 1970's represented the bottom of the barrel in American politics. The White House featured a disgraced Nixon, an unelected, incompetent Ford, and an inexperienced Georgian with charges of advisors on cocaine. America felt dirty, and it cleansed itself with the New Right landslide in 1980: Control of the Senate, record inroads in the House, and Mister Traditional Values Himself, Ronald Reagan, in the White House.

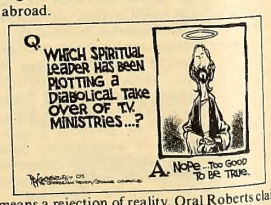
New, evangelical movements rode the crest of the new American emphasis on morality. The Bakker's reached millions through the airwaves, and built a 2300 acre theme park with part of their revenues. Jimmy Swaggert's show reached more than 2 million households. Robert Schuller reached 1.7 million households in his weekly "Hour of Power." Jerry Falwell's Liberty Foundation (aka Moral Majority) now claims 4 million members. Oral Roberts claimed 1.1 million followers, and worst of all, Pat Robertson, a Republican presidential hopeful in 1988, reached 468,000 people daily through the "700 Club."

History has taught us that those who claim to be the most righteous always seem to be the least. Regardless of whether or not the new evangelical movement reflects the new Washington emphasis on morality, we didn't need to find out about Jim Bakker's past to question the New Right's commitment to "traditional values." Indeed, the Iran-contra affair did a more than adequate job of showing that New Right morality is skin deep—the movement has only perverted the values it claims to advance.

But a review of the religious scandal does reinforce the abysmal condition of today's political leadership. Just as the TV evangelists used the wrath of God and their own self-righteousness to scare their followers into supporting the "ministries," the New Right is a collection of opportunities who have convinced the American people of their ability to restore the United States to its traditional morality.

So just what does it mean to trust one's faith in those who promise miracles?

It means a lack of commitment. Individuals within any reactionary movement seem to assume ever larger personal power. One who feels that he is responding to a mandate of the people would be likely to reject personal accountability completely. Just as Jimmy Swaggert discredited TV evangelists by trying to move in on a rival's action, factions in the Reagan administration discredited the anti-terrorist policy of non-negotiation to remove the American captives held abroad.



It means a rejection of reality. Oral Roberts claimed that an 800 foot Jesus ordered him to construct a medical center at his University, and that he would die if he didn't receive the money. Ronald Reagan inscribed a Bible to members of Iran's parliament.

It means big lies and manipulation. First Bakker denied any involvement in the sex scandal. Then he admitted it. Then he admitted it but asked forgiveness (which of course the Lord has granted). First Reagan denied involvement in the Iran arms sale. Then he admitted it. Then he admitted it and asked our forgiveness. Do you see a pattern developing?

Trying to establish a direct link between TV evangelism and current politics is certainly ridiculous. However, identifying similarities between two reactionary movements is not. One can laugh at the absurdity of the exposed, paranoid men of the cloth as they stave off more devil's work on their shows in the upcoming weeks, but at the same time, the incident should serve as a timely guide to American politics: emphasize reason over reaction, and keep the Jim and Tammy Bakker types out of office. □

Victor Greto

The Hart of the Matter

Governor Charles Robb of Virginia, Democrat, has an interesting and telling notion of the race for President of the United States in 1988: "We're competing ultimately for the same turf, for the same value system." Robb is a "populist" Democrat, that is, one who avoids the ideological implications of Democrat-Republican divisions. He and many other "revisionist" Democrats (like Bruce Babbitt, Governor of Arizona, a possible candidate who supports a Means Test to determine who is poor and who is not) see the candidates who are helping mold America, the United States, into a one-party society, who believe they are honestly reaching home to the "silent majority" of Americans who are the meat and backbone of this country.

And who knows, they are probably correct. Even the more liberal Democrats who will run for President, such as Senator Joseph Biden, are uninhibited supporters of the "system," who encourage and support (this is Joe Biden here) line-item veto proposals, the Gramm-Rudman fiscal cop-out, anti-busing, and so on. The great liberal front-runner in the Democratic nomination race, Gary Hart, runs on the illusion that he is the great "anti-political" candidate, contemptuous of the ideology and doctrines of his party and the Republicans. Which is fine. Hart is a liberal pragmatist, yet the admission of being one is the admission of being a "politician" in the most profound sense of the term: a politician is a walking bundle of compromises, pragmatic, nose high and deep into the air of the country. Hart is smart. If people are tired, or get tired, or are in the process of getting sick and tired of Reagan's and the Right Wing's preaching about ridiculous things like school prayer, are tired of seeing Falwell's fat jowels spew out fundamentalist claptrap and hearing their President applaud, then Hart's got the right notion. People will then, the theory goes, tire of ideology, remove themselves from the question of Right and Left to that of Effective and Ineffective. Yet this removal is an absurd illusion. Effective for whom and how? Do we believe anymore that what is good for General Motors is good for the country? "Effectiveness," for me, is a clue word for what will engender and embellish the system as it is now. This helps define for us what "effectiveness" means—conservatism.

Hart's voting record is, however, unequivocally liberal, yet he will not run on liberal dogma (a plus), but on what's good and effective for the country. Is Hart, then, anti-political? Hardly. If he gets away with it, plays his cards right, he'll be President Hart, the consummate politician. He will not have the mediocre acting ability old Reagan had, his eyes (perhaps, for who knows with true pragmatists?) will not well with

IT ALWAYS MAKES ME FEEL GOOD TO KNOW THAT NO MATTER HOW THIS IRAN MESS TURNS OUT, I CAN COUNT ON YOUR SUPPORT, GEORGE....
DON'T BLAME ME I VOTED MONDALE
USA
2

tears as he looks sympathetically at the unblinking camera's eye and asks the country to vote his way. In fact, Hart seems just the opposite, a bit bloodless, cold, a reasoner above all else—but I would say that is in his favor. Maybe that same "silent majority," the ones who will be sick of dogmatic ideology, will be sick of having its heart strings pulled so ceremoniously again and again by a President who can turn on the waterworks whenever he feels like it, and over the most ludicrous issues, from killing nasty Nicaraguans to school prayer.

(Jesse Jackson has my vote if he can somehow finagle the nomination; but, I think, as a "serious" candidate (which means one who can appeal to the "mainstream") he has many problems, not among the least that he's black, that he's a preacher, and that he's the most liberal the Democrats get.)

I would be a bit afraid for Hart if it weren't for what the Republicans are holding up against him: Bush? Haig? They've got [illegible] Bush can barely talk for all the asskissing he's done, and Haig is such a dinosaur, one of the old President's men back in '73, that I sometimes wonder if the Republicans are serious. Yes, there is Jack Kemp, the candidate who thinks that SDI is the "greatest peace initiative of the century," and Bobby Dole, who called Reagan's preposterous press conference a "hit...out of the park." Shows you what kind of a great President he'd make, all form and no content.

Yet, in spite of all this, will the Republicans prevail? Perhaps. The Republicans will run under the banner of the continuing "Reagan revolution," you know, that teetering failure that is now awash in the Irangate scandal, showing it in its true colors. But there are many alternatives for the Republicans: they could remember the Phillipines election and fix it all; or they could make a video of Bush or Haig lifting weights, doing pushups and chinups like that idiot Marcos did for his deranged supporters in Manila. Then the great "silent majority," the "American people" the politicians plead to in times of trouble and approbation will come through for them, afraid of Hart and his liberal pragmatic ambiguity, that cold face of his, and vote for "stability." "Security," the "American Way." Why not? When in the eye of the storm a man cannot see the turmoil around himself unless he gets up from in front of the television and makes an effort; hell, it's fairly calm where he is. The middle class, the silent majority, the American whom the politicians appeal to, is shrinking at an increasing rate. The upper and lower classes are growing, the lower, obviously, much faster. The middle class refuses to see this phenomenon. So be it. But even if they do elect Hart or some other Democrat to the Presidency, will that stop the process? Is competition for the "same turf...the same values" a way to truly change things for the better? The heart of the matter is that it is not. In all probability there will be a change of uniforms on January 20th, 1989—and that is all.

Postscript: the above quotes, and some information, were taken from William Schneider's cover story in the April issue of the Atlantic Monthly. The opinions and the adjectives attached to several politicians' names are mine. □

Michael S. Mehan

The Bottom Line

Lusty Marines and Bugged Embassies

Just about everyday you can feel it in the air, growing greater every day, filling the soul and intoxicating the mind. Spring , the season of rebirth, when a sleepy earth is given a new lease on life and the trees and flowers come back to life after the long desolate months of winter.

For a scandal beleaguered President, cold and harsh were the winds of winter that swept over the streets of Washington in what was the longest and most arduous winter in Ronald Reagan's Presidential career. The warm sunshine and opening buds must come as a great relief to the President after the previous dark months from November to March when his presidency hung by a thread. However, the fresh start promised by the bright skies of April may have been covered over by new clouds of scandal.

With the new season comes new problems threatening to undermine the progress in U.S.-Soviet relations that was somehow made during the Iran-Contra storm that pounded the White House. However, the recent spy scandal involving horny Marine guards at the US Embassy in Moscow, and the bugging of the new embassy building in Moscow by the Soviets could prove to be a two sided coin for the Administration.

It seems that Lieutenant Colonel Oliver North was not the only U.S. Marine to turn sour in the last few months. Not only did the sneaky Colonel successfully serve to undermine his president, but lower ranking Marines guarding the US Embassy in Moscow also gave Uncle Sam a good kick in the ribs. It seems that the "Few and the Proud" have turned into the "Few and Horny" in Moscow as the marine guards at our embassy there sold out to Soviet agents for a little nooky-nooky. Sure, that's a fair price, a tumble in the snow bank with Olga for access to state secrets! The two guards accused of this little sex for secret trade, Marine Sergeant Clayton Lonetree and Corporal Arnold Bracy, are on embarrassment to the marines, and a disgrace to the United States. And I always thought it was sailors who were supposed to rape and pillage the lady folk on land!

If this was not enough for our already weakened national security, due to several major spy scandals over the last year, the Soviets have to add insult to injury and bug the living day lights out of our new embassy. Although not a surprising move, I mean if you let the Soviets prefabricate parts of your embassy away from the construction sight, it is just too tempting for them and, of course, your walls are going to end up wired better than Radio City Music Hall.

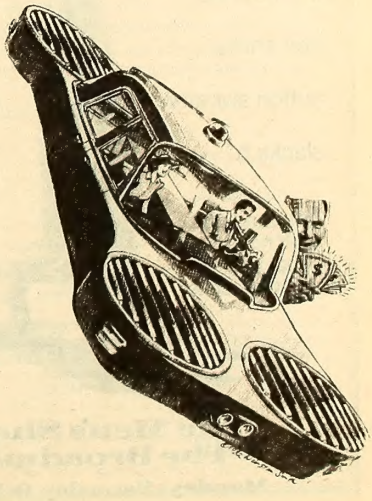
The Reagan Administration must be given credit, however, in the way it is handling the whole situation. Let us think back on the record of the administration's paranoid spy accusations against Moscow. First they accused the Soviets of bombarding the embassy with microwaves. Then there was the "Yellow dust" scandal when we accused the Soviets of sprinkling pixy dust on our people in Moscow so they could keep better track of their movements. Looking back on this history and the Reagan of the good old "Evil Empire" days, we can see that Reagan has come a long way.

Instead of ranting and raving about the situation and throwing the possibility of an agreement in the Intermediate Nuclear Forces talks into a sudden deep freeze, the Administration is wisely staying on schedule by not cancelling George Shultz's trip to Moscow. The possibility of a comprehensive treaty banning intermediate nuclear weapons is far more important than to waste on an issue of diplomatic game playing that could be better cleaned up on the side.

By telling the Soviets that they cannot move into their new embassy in Washington, the Administration is making it clearly known that we will not stand for any funny business on the part of the Soviets, and it will strengthen Reagan's hand at home.

Unfortunately, as we have learned in the past few months, nations spy on one another, be they friends or foes. Both Washington and Moscow will always try to learn the others' deep dark secrets. The means, however, have gone beyond placing a drinking glass on the wall and listening in on the conversation. At a time when we are in the process of such delicate negotiations as the intermediate nuclear weapons treaty, we must be constantly on our guard, and while not losing the opportunity to ban medium range missles, we cannot compromise US national security. The bugging of our embassy is a disgrace on the faith of the Soviet government, but since when has the Soviet government cared about being caught at a little spying? Therefore we must demand a new embassy be built and the old one be scrapped in order to make our point clear, if you are going to play the spy game, you are going to get burned. In the mean time, the Soviets should not be allowed into their embassy. Make them meet in mobile homes in Washington, or in the streets, the subway, I do not care where, just inconvenience them like we will be inconvenienced in Moscow.

As for our lusty Marine guards, boys will be boys and if we are going to continue to have Marines as our guards I would suggest that we assign older, married men who could bring their wives with them, rather than young bucks who are just lookin' for fillies. If not, then heavy doses of salt peter and plenty of cold showers may be the only way to keep our state secrets, secret. □



Betty Blue

The film "Betty Blue" has received extremely mixed reviews since its release here in the states. Written and directed by Jean-Jacques Beineix, who became known through his first film "Diva," the film is a tragic love story starring Jean-Hughes Anglode and the gorgeous Beatrice Dalle. Much of the criticism I have read has consisted in noting, for example, that the actors spend a disproportionate amount of time on screen unclothed, without ever posing the question of whether their nakedness follows a rigorous necessity within the film. This sort of criticism really can't be taken too seriously. Other critics have complained that the ending of the film is a direct plagiarism of "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest." A tragic story shouldn't be judged on whether it has been told before, but rather whether it is told well and with something of the Universal.

Is Beineix successful in evoking a sympathetic reaction in the viewer, of whatever emotion? This question is perhaps the key to the film and also to the negative reviews it has received. The power of the film lies in its evocative capability. An example from "Diva" will illustrate: the scene in which the Vietnamese girl skates around the blue studio with the wave machine, or the one in which the hero walks through Paris on a rainy day with the diva he loves and idolizes are moving whether one has been to Paris or not.

To be moved by this sort of film-making, or course, requires that the viewer eliminates any distance between himself and the film. It is really not a matter of intellectually appreciating "Betty Blue." One must come to it, as any good romance, if not a little stupidly, at least innocently. Beineix pointed this out in an interview in Chicago magazine in January. "Betty Blue," much more so than "Diva" or his second film "The Moon in the Gutter," requires that the viewer submit himself to the director and abandon his own psycholigical distance. Reviewers, presumably finding it difficult to review a film without distancing themselves from it, have attacked the film for such stupidities as an overabundance of Beineix' familiar neon hues. This is criticism? How many artists can claim to have found their own colors, the sight of which provokes an instant "Beineix?"

The film tells the story of Zorg, a 30 year old doing odd jobs at a beach resort in the south of France and writing in his notebooks, and Betty, who lives on the very edge of life. The story traces her extreme passion and the tragic impossibility of her survival, on the one hand, and the possibility of Zorg's artistic birth on the other.

Beineix has integrity. Freely admitting that he desperately wanted "37°2 le matin" (the film's French title referring to a pregnant woman's elevated body temperature) to be a commercial success after his disasterously received second film, Beineix has nonetheless made a personal film, which may move the viewer because the author is relating feelings that have personally moved him. "Betty Blue," playing at the Tiffany Square theatres, is a must.

NICK NESBITT

ALBUMS SUPPLIED BY BUDGET TAPES & RECORDS

The Smiths — Louder Than The Bomb

"Burn down the disco, hang the blessed D.J., because the music that they play, IT SAYS NOTHING TO ME ABOUT MY LIFE," squeals lead singer Morrissey in the song "Panic." Ironically, this song has received substantial airplay in England. In the past, the Smiths have combined their personal and bitter lyrics with haunting, relatively inaccessible music to match. On "Louder Than Bombs," the Smiths maintain the lyric bite, yet now instead boast surprisingly accessible tunes to back them.

For about half of the new cuts, they whip out rockable, Beaty Anthems. On the other end of the spectrum, poignant and bitter lyrics are teamed with Johnny Marr's gorgeous acoustic guitar work to produce a few of the Smiths' prettiest tunes to date. A third element to this 24-track "specially-priced" double album may disturb some die hard fans... Almost half of the songs have been previously released, either on an album or as a single's B-side. As cheap as it may sound, it makes for a wonderful anthology-of-sorts, and the old songs are mixed with the new in good taste.

Side one is a relentless (except for one song) medley of hard-driving danceable anthems that feature booming drums and metallic guitars. These cuts almost sound more like The Alarm than the Smiths. As usual, however, the lyrics are abrasive, in contrast to Morrissey's soothing voice. On "Is It Really So Strange," Morrissey sneers "Oh yes you can kick me and you can punch me and you can break my face, but you won't change the way I feel—'cause I love you." On "Sheila Takes A Bow," he pleads "Boot the grime of this world in the crotch, dear—and don't go home tonight." After a few listenings, I finally decided that the music on these cuts isn't necessarily incompatible with the lyrics. However, once again we confront that evil word Sell-Out. The cuts here are not lyric sell-outs, yet perhaps instrumental sell-outs, for they do seem to beg for commercial airplay. No matter how hard I try not to like these KILO-ish cuts, I catch myself wanting to hear them over and over again. After all, it's still the Smiths... These may not be their best songs, but they're still pretty phenomenal.

My sentimental favorites on this album are the mellower new ones. Each is beautifully produced and hauntingly arranged with Marr's echo-y acoustic guitars and Morrissey's calm monotone voice. The most poignant of these is "Unloveable," where Morrissey cries "I know I'm unloveable, you don't have to tell me. Message received loud and clear. Don't have much in my life, but take it—it's yours. I wear black on the outside because black is how I feel on the inside." "Stretch Out and Wait" is a smooth and erotic ballad that perplexes us once again as to Morrissey's sexual interests (he's supposedly a celibate homosexual): "Stop ignore all the codes of the day, let your juvenile impulses sway," drones Morrissey. "Half a Person" and "You Just Haven't Earned It Yet, Baby" are classy, addictive ballads. "Ask" is probably the poppiest, most fun cut on the album, yet the lyrics are sobering: "If it's not love, than it's the bomb that'll bring us together." "Golden Lights" is a fun psychedelic cover of an old tune complete with a 60's underwater voice effect and some backup female vocalists. These cuts are what make the album a must, for they more than make up for my partial indifference to side one.

Mixed in with all the new material on the last three sides, we hear a few old classics like "Hand In Glove" (their first British hit, which snaps "the sun shines out of our behinds"), "Girl Afraid," and "These Things Take Time." Also included here are the three prettiest tunes from the album "Hatful of Hollow"—"William, It Was Really Nothing," "Please, Please Let Me Get What I Want," and "Back To The Old House."

The Smiths have stumbled upon a pretty ingenious marketing concept for this album. The anthology-style collection of old tunes combined with the new, accessible material makes for a good first Smiths album for virgin ears. The new cuts may not be as solid as songs on old (for the most part), but they are still definitely quality-laden enough to lure any old Smiths' fan into buying the album.

"Hang the D.J.," Morrissey demands just under 20 times. Whether or not they want to, I think the Smiths will finally break onto the American commercial airwaves with this album. The D.J.'s that Morrissey wants to hang so badly may just give the band the popularity it deserves. I like to think they would never sell out...but then again...remember Morrissey saying last year "Fame, fame, fatal fame—it can play hideous tricks on the brain—but still I'd rather be famous than righteous or holy, any day."

MARTY BROAN

SURF'S UP!

Catch A Wave Wearing The Coolest Fashions For Spring '87!

jams, shorts,
swimtrunks,
knit shirts,
cotton sweaters,
slacks &

bermudas,
polo shirts,
sportshirts,
windbreakers,
sportcoats.

We can outfit you no matter what your destination is.

The Men's Shop at The Broadmoor

Monday - Saturday 9:30 - 5:30

Hair Designers for Men & Women

RAPUNZEL

Style cuts, Cellophanes, Perms & Color.

Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.

Stop in or make your appointment:

827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

An Awareness of Form

In our continuing coverage of the Senior Art Shows, sometimes the artists speak for themselves. Julie James, artist and volleyball player, talks about her show, in Armstrong starting Monday, April 13. Liz Crawford's show also starts Monday in Packard. It will be reviewed in the next issue.

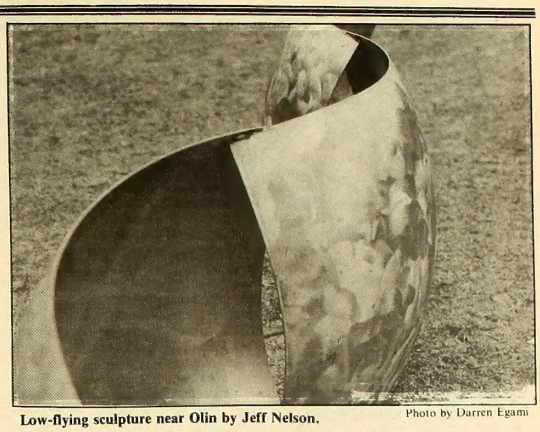
We all know how much better it is to feel when we get a personally signed business letter. We feel good because we know the person responsible for the ideas in the letter actually took a pen in hand and signed his or her unique, one of a kind signature. Yes, this is a simple example, but it is the same concept in which artists work. The uniqueness of each artist cannot be duplicated or Xeroxed - each peice is a one of a kind image of the artist. Now you know why some paintings and sculpture are sold for thousands or millions, a small price for the artistic spirit of another human.

There is something spiritual, exciting, and threatening about art. There are thousands of opinions on what good art consists of, but something I have learned over these past four years is that art is someone's chance to demonstrate a new perspective on objects, scenes and figures we experience everyday. There is nothing more valuable nor more impressive than someone's individual uniqueness and spirit expressed through a tangible object. Who ever "invented" the concept of artistic expression presented us with an unsurmountable gift.

I have very simple motives behind my art. I do not want to intimidate or confuse the viewer, I just want everyone to be more aware of natural objects that we see everyday. My goal this year was to pay attention to nature's shapes and patterns whether they be the overall outline & image of a tree, the subtle shapes of rocks or just the feeling of an object.

Hopefully through my art, my deliberate awareness of form will be apparent and after you have seen my show you will walk outside and feel differently about nature's shapes and contours.

JULIE JAMES



Low-flying sculpture near Olin by Jeff Nelson. Photo by Darren Egami

Lise's Lithograph Located

"I feel whole again," Lise Grace told me earlier this week, "it was as if a part of me was gone."

Not long after the last issue of the Catalyst was distributed on Friday, March 20th, a litho entitled "The Swamp" was stolen from Lise's senior art show, forcing her to take down an impressive group of works early from Packard Hall. She immediately put up flyers around campus informing students and faculty of the distrubing incident, and luckily it touched upon the thief's conscience. "The Swamp" was found in a paper bag in front of Jackson House one hour before Lise left for a well-deserved vacation. "It made my spring break," she smiled.

It is horrible that Lise was put through such grief over someone's inconsiderate act, and it has caused the Art Department to crack down on security.

WATSON Your Turntable

Chris Dunn, Senior, History
The Partridge Family Album

Stuart Martz, Senior, Ethnomusicology
Whippersnappers, "Promises"

SoYong Park, Senior, History
Joan Armatrading, "Track Record"

Tony Lopez, Senior, Sociology
Songs of the Congo, Sung by the Children of the Congo

GATES SHOWTIME SERIES

The McLain Family Band

Appearing in 62 countries and 50 states, the McLain Family Band teams up with the Colorado Springs Symphony for a night of knee-slappin', toe-tappin', downhome BLUEGRASS music.

IN PERSON!
Friday, April 17 8:00 p.m.
Pikes Peak Center
Tickets from $5 to $25

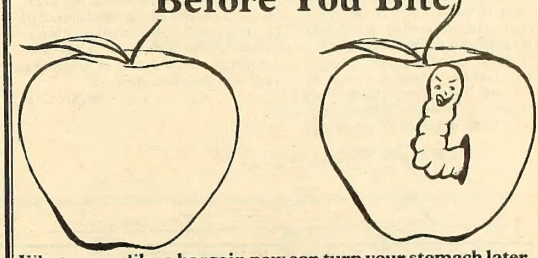
Symphony Box Office
1014 N.Weber
633-0333

Pikes Peak Center
190 S. Cascade Ave.
520-SHOW

For Group Rate Information Call the Symphony Box Office.

GRIFFIS/BLESSING INC.

Compare Apples to Apples Before You Bite



What seems like a bargain now can turn your stomach later.

We offer a unique array of properties and services and can tailor a lease to meet your particular financial and service needs. It might actually save you money - as well as some unpleasant surprises.

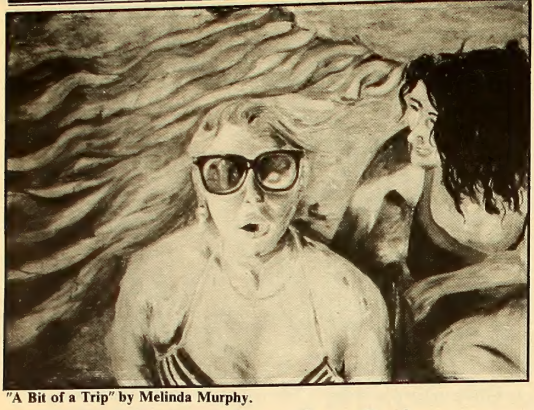
Just a few of our FREE advantages:

1. Bi weekly maid service
2. Assistance in locating sub-tenants
3. Security Systems
4. Hot tub
5. Fire places
6. 24 hour plumbing & heating service
7. Washer/dryers, dishwashers
8. Prompt return and accurate accounting of damage deposits

When the pipe breaks at night and your organic chem final is the next day, make sure you know who to call....the same people you should call today.

GRIFFIS/BLESSING Inc.
520-1234

Remaining Units:
3: two bedroom
2: four bedroom
1: six bedroom
7: 3 bedroom
2: five bedroom
1: seven bedroom



"A Bit of a Trip" by Melinda Murphy.

Unusual Setting for Scissors

Senior art shows tend to fall loosely into two catagories. Some deal predominantly with a central theme - an exploration into an idea or a medium. Others focus more on the development of the artist, usually in a variety of media and themes. Melinda Murphy's show, which is currently up in Armstrong hall, is, in the artists own words, a little of both. "When I began working on my show I didn't have any particular theme in mind," says Melinda, "but after working on it for so long, and seeing the pieces as a group, I feel that there is definitely a strong figurative unity."

The unifying force in at least eight of the eleven pieces is clearly sexual, and in all but one of these it is clearly feminine. What the artist has done in two mixed media pieces, three lithographs, and two of her oils is give new life, and sexuality, to commonplace objects. In a lithograph of a pair of scissors, one of the show's simplest and strongest works, an ordinary object is stripped of color, taken out of its normal setting, and put in an unusual position. A pair of scissors on end is not enough to change ones perspective on the object, but when one blade is clearly marching off the edge of the page it doesn't take much imagination to conjure up a metaphor for human form and human action. By itself the scissor lithograph is not necessarily sexual. Seen in the context of the "Eve" lithographs, "Tulips," "Garlic Press," and the phallic "Tweezers" pieces it does take on added meaning. The degree to which one takes the sexuality of the above works is of course highly individual and depends greatly on forming a connection between the separate pictures.

Of the remaining four pieces the two abstract, mixed media pieces are the strongest. While the theme of female sexuality is less easily ciphered in "Hyper-Vigilante" and a smaller untitled piece they do present the basic theme. "Hyper-Vigilante" is by far the show's most expeditious work in both color, form and size. Its vivid colors and suggestive forms are not only balanced within the work, they also provide a balancing contrast to the stark colors and relatively rigid forms of some of the other pieces in the show.

Melinda's show will be in Armstrong Hall until Saturday, April 11.

BEN LEAF

The Motion of Dreams

Susanne Bratt studied art at CC in an unusual way, blending two frequently disparate majors. She wrote her art history thesis last year and completed her art studio requirements this year. Her senior art show is in Packard until tomorrow, 4/11, and her work reflects her studies in non-Western, expressionist, and abstract art, executed in paintings, hand colored lithographs, and drawings.

Those styles are juxtaposed in her show, even within individual pieces. For example, in the lithograph "The Dream," the figure of the dreamer is as representative as her drawings of nudes, while the dream occurs in semi-abstract tribal fetishes, cave-art-like animals, and primitive masks. "We respond to what is representational first," says Susanne. "In my work I tried to create a tension between the abstract and the figurative."

The cave-art images recur throughout Susanne's work—simple images carrying a complex metaphor. The cave is the unconscious, and it is also a womb-like shelter from the shock of light. In our post-modern world, that shock is not a part of our everyday lives, and a lot of the "shock value" of contemporary art is there to recreate it.

But the simple primal images and the complex meanings are more than aspects of a piece of work: "Most of my time at CC I've been trying to build a technical vocabulary—which takes a lot of concentration, a lot of time looking at nature. For the senior show you're supposed to use that vocabulary to say something more personal."

"I was thinking about motion. In a way I think that's what my show is about—about the idea of motion going in some places and stopping in others." This is especially apparent in an abstract painting called "Riverbed 2." The time you really notice motion is when it's stopped, such as when rocks block the smooth (and invisible) flow of the stream.

Susanne's "technical vocabulary" is eclectic. Her paintings and drawings are technically polished and aesthetically pleasing. Her lithographs demand response, and at times are primally disturbing. By looking at Things slightly differently (and non-Westernly), she takes you away from your conventional perceptions and, at the same time, reminds you of them.

"We all have images in our unconscious. But it takes a while to be able to draw 'out of your head' without coming up with the same thing every time, and without it being too generalized. It also takes a lot of time to 'untrain' yourself about what you think art is."

ERIC BREITBARD

"Peacocks and Bulls" by Susanne Bratt.

4/10,11 "And Miss Reardon Drinks A Little" Cossit C Friday's performance is at midnight, Saturday's at 8:15 pm. Free admission.

4/16,17,18 "And Miss Reardon Drinks A Little." All performances in Gates Common Room at 8:15 pm.

Be one of Northwestern's valuable summer imports.

Concert under the stars on Northwestern's lakefront campus
Decided to stop being a slouch this summer. Signed up for three courses at Northwestern's Summer Session. Im in great company--class-mates from Brown, Oberlin & Penn. Really stimulating.
Oh! Heard from the College - yes, the credits transfer and no, I didn't make dean's list.
SUMMER SESSION '87 • NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY • 1-800-ENRLS-NU
SUSAN NERO
2920 CHAPEL H
DURHAM, NC
06
NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY 2

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
SUMMER SESSION '87

2003 Sheridan Road
Evanston, Illinois 60201

Please send my free copy of the Summer Session '87 catalog with financial aid and registration information. (Available mid-March)

Name

School Address

City

State Zip

Home Address

City

State Zip

Wish you were here.
Send the coupon or
call 1-800-ENRLS-NU
(Inside Illinois call 312-491-6250)

SS 3

Jerry Wang

CC's Rick Boh, shown here against Michigan Tech, scored the winning goal in Team Canada's 4-3 win over the Soviet Union.

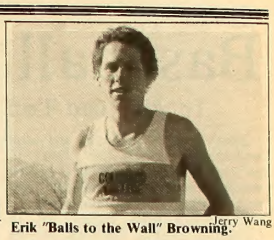
Boh Beats Soviets

In a preview to Calgary in 1988, the Soviets and Team Canada faced off for game number five in a five game series. The game was tied, 3-3, midway through the third period when Canada's Rick Boh beat Soviet goalie Mikhail Shtalenkov to score the gamewinner.

Colorado College's Rick Boh continues to display his prowess on the ice after trading his Tiger jersey for a Canadian sweater. The Tiger senior left the CC campus at the end of seventh block and headed home to the North country. Boh, the Tigers leading scorer this season, joined up with Team Canada for a three week tour of the country playing against the Soviets and other European teams.

Boh moved from the center position he had played for the Tigers during his college career to right wing for Team Canada. His first series with the team was the five games against the Moscow Selects. Canada dominated those matches, posting a 4-0-1 record.

Browning Blazes to 8th



Jerry Wang

Erik "Balls to the Wall" Browning.

Fueled by some good ol' home cookin' and charged by some hot licks from Iron Maiden, Erik "Browndude" Browning sizzled to an impressive 8th place finish out of 28,341 racers at Austin's Capitol Road Race March 29. Despite 34 degree temperatures and 20-25 mph winds, Erik blazed to a personal record of 30:51 in the 10,000 meter event that has now surpassed Atlanta's Peachtree Road Race as the largest in the nation. Erik's effort left him about one minute behind winner Patrick Sang of Kenya who finished 8th in last year's NCAA Division I Cross-Country Championships.

Although hampered by the fact that "you just don't get psyched for any road races," Erik's time would have been good enough to qualify him for nationals (10,000 meter national qualifying time: 30:52) had it been run on a track. Unfortunately, since the season's remaining 10,000 meter qualifying races will be run on Thursdays, Erik's studies (don't kid yourself, this guy's a serious student) will prevent him from taking the time off to further pursue 10,000 meter qualification.

Erik's only serious chance at qualifying now becomes the 5,000 meter event. While his PR of 15:02 is well shy of the 14:42 necessary to qualify, his performance at Austin is encouraging. While he veritably lumbered to a 15:44 first 5,000, Erik stormed to a 15:07 second half that could spur him on to even bigger and better things. But, as he has been prone to injury when performing the necessary speed training for success in the 5,000, Erik will have to suck it up "cuz I'm just a puss right now."

Over 8th Block Break, Erik and fellow trackster Scott Kang (who will attempt to qualify in the 1,500 meter event) will journey back to Austin for the Texas Relays, an event held for the sole purpose of qualifying racers for nationals. Although "Browndude" says of his chances, "nah, I'm not predicting a damn thing," racing in his hometown could very well be the perfect setting to earn him national qualification.

PHIDDIPIDES

Josh & John's

STILL DELIVERS
ICE CREAM
This week only NO delivery charge!!
(offer expires April 17)
630-0299
Delivery on the hour ● 1 qt. minimum 11 am - Midnight

patagonia®
Baggies™ Shorts

Mountain Chalet
CC's Outdoor Connection
266 North Tejon 633-0732
Downtown
© 1987 Patagonia, Inc

Funny looking Birkenstock sandals

You've probably heard of them. They're the sandals that more than three million people swear by. The sandals with a 210-year tradition. Funny looking, sure. But Birkenstock shapes to your feet like cool, soft sand, making them the most comfortable sandals in the world for work, home and play. They give you proper support without getting in the way of normal foot and leg movement. They improve your posture and circulation to let you walk healthier, more naturally. And they last and last. Birkenstock. Made funny looking so you can smile more wearing them. 20 men's and women's styles in preferred colors. $27 to $74. You've gone without them long enough.

Birkenstock®

(DEALER IMPRINT)

© 1985 Birkenstock Footprint Sandals, Inc.

Baseball

Tough Road Trip

Sunny beaches, tan bodies, and warm weather, all these are ideal in playing...BASEBALL. While everyone was enjoying themselves doing what CC students usually do for Spring Break, the CC baseball team headed out to California. Despite the ideal playing conditions, the Tigers were only able to win one out of five games, but, thanks to the women's tennis team, managed to enjoy a relaxing vacation.

The Tigers' only victory came against Pacific Coast Baptist College. First time starting pitcher Rich Lawton recorded his first win with a 16-8 decision over the Eagles. Russ Salas led the Tigers' offensive attack, pounding out five hits in six at bats as the Tigers completely destroyed the Eagles' pitching staff. Unfortunately, the Tigers were not able to keep the momentum going as they dropped their next two games, 12-4 to Northwest Nazarene and 5-0 to Claremont College.

After a day off for some fun in the sun, CC decided to play ball as they faced Occidental College. Starting pitchers Todd Meisinger and Dana Rademacher combined their talents to throw one of the best games this season. Not only was the pitching strong, but CC produced the hitting to go along with it. Senior co-captain Kevin Larabee was the sparkplug for the Tigers' hitting machine, going three for four at the plate and coming through in clutch situations. Also making their contributions were senior Alex Contreras, who went two for two on the day including a three-run home run, and junior Mike Yost, whose two hits also included a three-run blast. Despite the Tigers' efforts, and some bad judgment calls, CC fell short, 8-7, in extra innings.

After the disappointing loss to Occidental, the Tigers came back the next day to play Pomona College. According to the old adage, "when it rains, it pours," Pomona poured out eight runs on eight hits in the first inning. Despite the Sagehen onslaught, ace reliever Charlie Ricco showed his stuff by shutting down the Pomona hitters, allowing only two hits the rest of the game. Once again, senior Kevin Larabee dominated the plate, collecting three hits for the day, but

CC could only pull back three runs in the 8-3 loss.

The Tigers probably played their best baseball yet this season in California as both pitching and hitting came together. Now, with the second half of the CIBA (Colorado Intercollegiate Baseball Association) left to play, the Tigers should be able to end the season on a positive note. Also, special congratulations to three Tiger players who earned recognition in the CIBA for having batting averages in the top twenty. They are: Mike Yost (.406, 8th), Alex Contreras (.393, 13th), and Charlie Ficco (.354, 17th).

ALEX CONTRERAS

Photo Special!
Every Monday!
coupon
FREE
SECOND SET OF PRINTS
Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!
This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon.
Limited time offer.
819
Kodak Colorwatch System
Kodak
Ektachrome
200
WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!
College Pharmacy
833 North Tejon • 634-4861

Dean's Drivel

Last Monday in Las Vegas, boxing's latest "Fight of the Century" lived up to its billing as underdog Sugar Ray Leonard earned the WBC middleweight championship with a stunning twelve round split decision victory over defending champion Marvelous Marvin Hagler. Leonard, fighting for only the second time in five years, has now won titles in three different weight classes. Hagler, whose last fight was a victory over John "The Beast" Mugabi nearly one year ago, had been undisputed middleweight champ since 1980 (he was recently stripped of the WBA title for not fighting the association's top-ranked contender) and hadn't lost at all in nearly eleven years.

Leonard assumed control early in the fight. Dominating the first two rounds, Sugar Ray utilized advantages in both hand and foot speed to thoroughly confuse and frustrate Hagler while scoring at will with both hands. Hagler threw only 54 punches in the first two rounds after averaging more than sixty per round in each of his two previous bouts. By the end of the fourth round, Leonard was ahead 4-0 on two score cards (Jo Jo Guerra and Dave Moretti) with Lou Fillippo scoring the fight even to that point.

Hagler rallied in rounds 5 through 9, with the fifth being the only round he won on all three cards (Leonard won rounds 1, 2, 6, and 11 unanimously). But even when Sugar Ray appeared tired and allowed Hagler to wade inside, he made the champion miss and managed to punctuate most of the toe-to-toe exchanges with flashy and effective combinations. Although he knew he had to make Leonard pay when he got him to stop moving, Hagler appeared too slow and too tired to land the damaging blows he needed to turn the fight around.

Leonard's performance in the bout's final three rounds showed he was the true champion. With Hagler desperately applying constant pressure, Sugar Ray took everything Hagler could offer and consistently delivered what appeared to be sharper and more effective punches. In a fight where the supposedly rusty Leonard was expected to be worn down by the stronger Hagler, Sugar Ray instead showed superior fitness at fight's end, refusing to succumb to Hagler's superior yet dropping firepower.

Strategically, Leonard fought a perfect fight. He moved and jabbed effectively, and made Hagler look silly chasing him around the ring. Sugar Ray seemed to always have Hagler moving the wrong way, making the champion miss badly on numerous occasions. And when he stopped moving, he held Hagler behind the arms and broke quickly, scoring with lightning quick combinations. Leonard was able to lean back and move his head away from Hagler's punches, a defensive technique traditionally considered dangerous but perfected and made famous by Muhammed Ali. And when Hagler came into Leonard's body in his most effective thrusts, Sugar Ray made the champion pay with blisteringly fast shots to the head.

Although some experts scored the fight for Hagler (The Associated Press, among others, had Hagler ahead), Leonard was a deserving winner of the bout. He dictated the pace of the fight, and seemed at the same time able to dictate both the offensive and defensive flow. While Judge Jo Jo Guerra's assessment for Leonard ten rounds to two wasn't representative of the action, the basis for his decision is obvious. In other title bouts, the champion gets the benefit of the doubt in a close fight (Larry Holmes fight a few years ago against Carl "The Truth" Williams a case in point), but Leonard's situation negated any advantage Hagler might have had in this respect. He was flashier, was able to taunt Hagler, had the obvious support of the public and especially the crowd on hand, and was just eminently the more likable of the two fighters. These factors alone can't account for such an obvious difference in Guerra's scoring, but they certainly could have given Sugar Ray an advantage in scoring the toss-up rounds.

In any event, as sportscaster Tim Ryan so correctly stated after the fight, Sugar Ray Leonard's magnificent achievement would not have been diminished had he ended up losing the decision. He showed that pure athletic ability and intelligent preparation are superior even in the face of tremendous odds, and that there is still such a thing as class in professional sports. And he proved that he is one of the greatest champions, on par with Muhammed Ali in terms of both boxing skill and ring presence, that boxing has ever known. Though his victory over Hagler showed that he is this era's best boxer and capable of just about anything, we can only hope that this memorable effort will be the last to entrench Sugar Ray Leonard as one of the greatest athletes of our time.

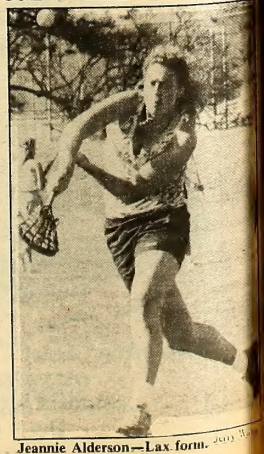
Stein Stalwart in Net

While most people were recovering from Spring Break, the CC Women's Lacrosse Team cruised to a 10-9 victory over Thomas Jefferson's varsity team last Tuesday. Top scorers were the ever-reliable Sue Hill and freshman Susannah Lawson, followed by Karen Haffke and captains Jen Hendee and Jeanie Alderson. Outstanding defensive players were Jeanie Alderson and Margo Gray, with an amazing performance by Ellen Stein in the goal. The game was highlighted by excellent cuts, a strong defense, and impressive stickwork by all.

Coach Michelle Giarratano and five of the Tigers are headed to sunny California this weekend to compete in the Western State Invitational Tournament. Captains Jen Hendee and Katy McNitt, goalie Carter Pratt, and outstanding freshmen Susannah Lawson and Margo Gray are the lucky players, so be sure to wish them luck!

The team returns home next Friday, April 17th, at 5:00 pm on Stewart Field, so be sure to come down and watch the Tigers take on CSU!!

KATIE MCNITT



Jeannie Alderson—Lax forw.

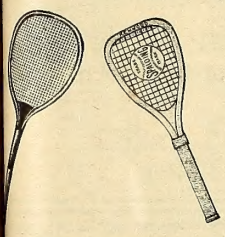
Tennis Trips

Women's

spring break the women's tennis made their fourth annual trip to ifornia. For the past four years the has traveled to southern California mpete against both Division II & III ms from the area, and Colorado lege has succeeded in establishing a ificant reputation.

This year the team returned from the 7- ip with a 2-4 win/loss record, which wer than the previous years. They their first two matches quite easily, ating Univ. of San Francisco (II) 7-2 Principia College 6-3. The Tiger en then dropped their next four ches to Claremont College (6-3), mona College (5-4), Occidental lege (7-2), and Univ. of Calif.-San go (8-1).

The competition was tough and the ers lost many third sets and close tie kers. They did not have the edge they ded to win those close matches.



All of the teams we played have ams that are year round, and many of m had already played as many as 20 ches. After playing only 3 matches re spring break we were not ured. We weren't match tough," said or Melissa Forbes.

The entire team agrees that they did not feel as strong as they have in the past due to the several cancellations that occurred in March because of the snow.

Five matches still remain for the team this season, and they are preparing themselves both mentally and physically to finish off the season with five straight victories. The next home match is Tues. April 14 against the Air Force Academy beginning at 3:30. Come out and give them some support, as all fans are greatly appreciated. "We haven't given up yet, said co-captain Kathleen Delaney. "We'll pull it out!"

SARA RYAN

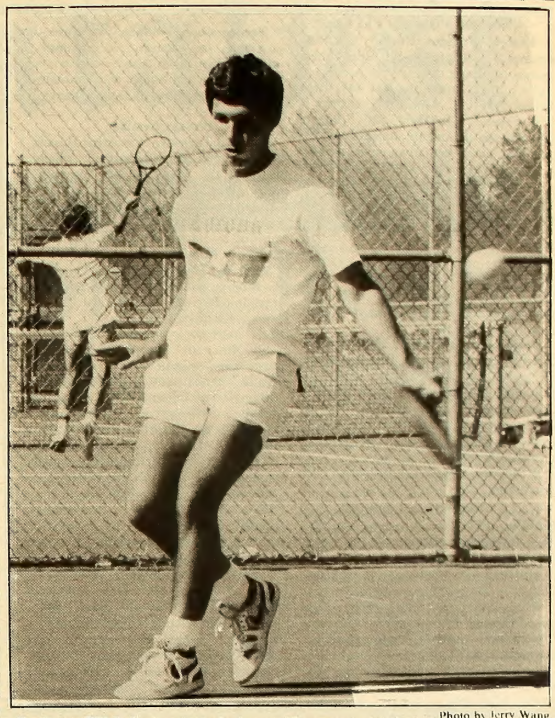
Men's

Over spring break the men's tennis team travelled to Phoenix for a series of six matches against out of state schools. The trip started off well as the Tigers picked up victories in their first two matches against Grand Canyon State and Mesa, both by scores of 6-3. The singles lineup carried the matches, with the team winning four of six singles matches against Grand Canyon and five of six against Mesa.

After their two initial wins, CC dropped four straight matches to Gustavus Adolphus' two teams, Redlands, and Claremont. The Tigers won a total of only eight individual singles or doubles matches during this stretch. Coach Bartz explained that, "Gustavus Adolphus, Redlands, and Claremont are all among the top eight teams in the nation. They are much stronger teams than we have played in the past on our Spring Break road trip." So it seems, but it is still difficult to explain the fact that no team member had an overall winning record, and only one, George Wilmer, had a winning record in singles. For some of the team, the tennis part of the trip was something that should best be forgotten (John Duncan included, as he sported an impressive 1-11 record overall). But there are many matches yet to come, including DU on Wednesday and Air Force on Saturday, so the team has plenty of time to get back on its feet.

And as for Phoenix, Jon Born summarized the trip with the right attitude: "Tennis? Huh? The weather was great!"

JOHN DUNCAN



Freshman Bill Poll gives the safe sign and happens to hit the ball. Photo by Jerry Wang

FREE WASH! NO LIMIT!

DURING DUDS'n SUDS GRAND OPENING

DUDS'n SUDS HAS REINVENTED THE SELF-SERVICE LAUNDRY!

- Clean, comfortable & carpeted!
- Friendly, helpful attendant!
- Refreshments and snack bar!
- Convenient drop-off service!
- Entertainment — lounge area, big-screen TV, pool table and more!

FREE WASH Offer Ends April 24th.

Experience Duds'n Suds and you'll never go back to your old laundromat again! Plus, during Grand Opening, WASH FREE — NO LIMIT! So, bring a mound of clothes!

DUDS'n SUDS Good clean fun!

W. UINTAH

UINTAH STATION

DUDS 'N SUDS

1635 W. UINTAH

7am-10pm

Michelle®

122 North Tejon

Everyday is Special at Michelle's

Mondays	☆	2 FOR 1	Ice Cream or Yogert Cone
Tuesdays	☆	FREE	Petite Sundae with any Sandwich or Burger
Wednesday	☆	2 FOR 1	Hot Fudge Sundae
Thursday	☆	FREE	Petite Sundae with any Sandwich or Burger
Fridays	☆	2 FOR 1	Ice Cream or Yogurt Cone

Give lucious, hand-packed, milk chocolate Easter eggs to someone special or just treat yourself. Only at Michelles— your downtown SWEET SHOP.

CC ID Nights!

15% off ice cream & menu items Sunday thru Thursday (does not apply to in store specials)

ANNOUNCEMENTS

AWARDS FOR EXCELLENCE

Evelyn Bridges Poetry Contest: Interested students should submit their poems (no more than ten per person) to John Longo (Armstrong Hall 244) on or before 5:00 p.m., April 22. First prize is $50; Second, $30; Third, $20. Students should type the poems, staple the pages together, place them in an envelope with a pseudonym on the outside, and attach a second envelope with the same pseudonym on the outside and their real name and phone number in the inside.

Adelaide Bender Reville Fiction Prizes: Submit entries to Adrienne Seward through the Humanities Office. First prize is $30; Second, $20; Third, $20. Follow the pseudonym proceedure outlined above. Deadline for submissions is 5:00 p.m., April 22.

Peter Lehman Political Essay Award: Submit entries to the student center Leviathan box by 5:00 p.m., April 22, following the pseudonym procedure listed under Evelyn Bridges. Entries (please limit to twenty pages) may range over the broad spectrum of political science disciplines.

Winning entries published in Leviathan.

Tuesday: April 14th, 8:00-8:30 a.m. Meditation - Shove Chapel. Music, silence, mystical and/or other writings (enter by northeast door).

April 14th, 12:00 (noon). Religion Majors Meeting - Shove Chapel.

Wednesday: April 15th, 12:00 noon. Shove Council Meeting.

Thursday: April 16th, 8:00 - 8:30 a.m. Meditation, Shove Chapel.

Friday: April 17th, 12:05 p.m. Worship Service. Speaker: Prof. Roliero Morgan.

Needed: One roommate for 9th block possibility for summer. 130 a month + utilities, own room, share bath w/one other person in house w/roommates. Great location - back of Jackson parking lot. Call 632-5123.

Biology Seminar

April 14, Tuesday, *Catherine Houck, CC Biology Major will speak on: A Field Study of the Mexican Ash [Fraxinus uhdei (Wenzig) Lingelsheim] on The Nature Conservacy's Kamakou Preserve, Hawaii: An Example of the Threats Imposed by Introduced Plant Species to the Native Rainforest.

April 16, Thursday, *Dave Thorsett, CC Biology Majoy will speak on: The Hepatic Lesion Associated With Hyperpolyaminemia.

All seminars are to be held at 12:00 noon in Olin Room 100. Brown bag lunch and refreshments served.

Health Enhancement Wellness Classes

May 7 - Optimal Nutrition, A Different Perspective. Speaker: Dr. Barbara Shears, Naturopathic Physician. (Rm. 52)

May 14 - Fit or Fat? Speakers: Jenna Rochat and Judith Gravestock, Nutrition Consultants. (Rm. 21)

May 21 - Planetary Pathology. Speaker: Dr. Barbara Shears, Naturopathic Physician. (rm. 21)

May 28 - Listen to your Body . . . The Mind/Body connection. Speakers: Judith Underwood, M.A., Trans Personal Body Therapist and Cathy Stahl, Licensed Massage Therapist. (Rm. 21)

All Classes at the First United Methodist Church, 420 N. Nevada. 7-9 pm. $3 admission per class. For more information call 630-1108.

Cutler Publications

is still accepting applications

for

Nugget Editor

(or Co-Editors)

Anyone interested please contact:

Lelia Deykin x282
(Acting Cutler Board President)

Heidi Dowd x282
(Nugget '87 Editor)

1987 Nugget

ONLY

$17.50

don't let the memories slip by...

yearbook order form 1987

NAME _____

CAMPUS ADDRESS _____

SIGNATURE _____

Make checks payable to: Cutler Publications OR put it on your student account and we will bill your parents. Check one:

— paid by check {please put checks in envelopes}
— student account

Please return to the Nugget box at the Student Center

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 17 April 1987 Volume 21, No. 10

Fire Guts Loomis Room

ring out the remains. Photo by Jerry Wang

Early yesterday morning fire alarms screemed throughout Loomis Hall, informing the sleepy-eyed residents that indeed a room on 3-north was being consumed in flames. It was at approximately 4:10 a.m. that Robert Magill awoke to the smell of smoke, and seeing that the flames were already out of control, ran into the hall and pulled the alarm.

Members of Loomis staff fought the blaze with fire extinguishers, and just as the smoke became too thick, the fire department arrived to quelch the conflagration within an hour.

The cause of the blaze has been attributed to the amassing of many electrical appliances through extension cords to only two outlets. Claude Cowart, Director of the Physical Plant, offered a probable scenario of the pre-dawn event. He believed that an oscillating fan had, through vibrations, toppled off a stereo speaker, jamming the blade and thus burning out the engine, which in turn ignited a nearby couch. Cowart further commented that if Megill "had inhaled more smoke and not awoken, he may have been seriously injured." Cowart stressed that "the danger of too many electrical appliances in the rooms is quite real," and hoped students would take heed.

Comments concerning the responses of the Loomis staff and students to the early morning alarm have been nothing but praise. Hall Director Gertner had released a memo, concerning fire potential and the steps to be taken in case of one, after spring break. He had noticed a "lack of student concern" over fire hazards during seventh block, as a trash can fire followed by abuse of fire extinguishers and a slow student response to a false alarm attested. The memo seemed to do the trick as students and staff leap to their feet and swiftly evacuated and accounted for everyone within minutes of the alarm. Coward lauded the students "mature and proper" response, while Gertner described the evacuation as running "like a well oiled machine"—the result of "RA training and general sensitivity by the students." The alarm and smoke detection system "worked beautifully" according to Cowart, as he had had the system and equipment "checked and maintained regularly."

On a lighter note, those grogy Loomis residents wandering around today have a belly full of donuts and juice—rewards from the Loomis staff and SAGA for their alertness this morning.

PETER LOACH

urkovich, Meuller Lecture n Global Perspective

hicago Urban Education Program ctors Marilyn Turkovich and Peggy ller startled listeners in the Gates mon Room last Tuesday night by nging their global perspectives and ging them in simple exercises. lled "Perspective Consciousness: A mework for Thinking Globally," the re was presented in conjunction with rnational Student Week.

Turkovich and Mueller began the re by asking listeners to quickly list first 10 events in human history that e to mind. Turkovich then asked that sted events be located in the century which they occurred. As might be ected, the majority of events on the ence's lists were occurred from 1500 to the present. Turkovich and ller pointed out that a similar concentration had occurred in most of the other groups they had lectured to, explaining that this result was indicative of the western world's skewed perspective of time and human history. According to Turkovich, "Our concept of 'other' time in human history shows up as blank periods in our minds. What is missing is a perspective of the history of other cultures, and it is up to you to fill in the blanks."

For their next exercise, Turkovich and Mueller had listeners draw a map of the world in under two minutes. The lecturers then asked which continent most participants had started drawing first; the predictable result being North America, though with some major exceptions. Turkovich and Mueller

Continued on p. 2

Anonymous Anti-Gay Posters Found On Campus

Late last week a group of students dubbing themselves "Students Against Unnatural Sex Acts" taped posters condemning gays and Gay Awareness Week to windows and walls across campus.

Claiming that "the community at large does not support gay rights as an active movement," the students set forth six objections to homosexuality:

1.) We object to the pilaging (sic) of the English language by destroying [illegible] innocence of decent words such as gay, queer, fag.

2.) Bisexuals are destroying the normal interaction between males and females by introducing the existence of fatal diseases such as AIDS.

3.) Same gender intercourse is an unnatural act. It can neither effect the reproduction nor the continuation of the human race.

Continued on p. 3

Examining CC's Ethnic Diversity

ith the school's small ethnic ulation and high minority attrition istory, the minority status at CC has a focus of great concern. The care sensitivity surrounding minority tment and prejudice reflect this al interest.

e demographic make-up of CC's nty population is roughly: 4%-anic, 3%-Asian, 3%-Black and 1%-e American. Together, these groups titute about 11% of the entire student , considerably less than those of schools and ideal expectations. 1980 installation of a post in the nistration to deal exclusively with rity issues marked the growing ciousness of this subaverage ethnic sentation in the student body. Lloyd rson, Jr., the current holder of that , explained that the school's rity representation is "not bad compared to other ACM schools" and is, in fact, even more diverse, having a representation across the fifty states. Further, he added that this problem is not a-typical of such schools, considering that minority students tend to be financially and culturally isolated from private schools.

Financial need is a major cause of the small minority population. "Both the economic climate and the current [Reagan] administration have contributed to the erosion of minority students," explained Peterson, "especially of Blacks and Mexican-Americans." However, CC's minority attendance, despite past fluctuations, is presently in an upward trend. This is attributed to new and more personal recruiting methods and a strong financial aid program. And those reasons for the school's declining attrition are neither academic nor financial, but cultural. The admission staff finds this commendable in lieu of the current economy. To resolve the cultural barrier, however, the administration is working to institute more cultural programs in the various curriculla; the area of housing, for one.

Another point of concern, in regard to deterence in attendance, is a discriminating environment. Most students and the administration don't feel this is a problem at CC. Said one Jewish student, "The only racial experiences I've had, have been with other Jews. People who cut down Judaism and themselves, as if apologizing." Another responded, "Sometimes, when a black issue or black subject comes to discussion, I feel I'm obligated to partake when I'm not even the slightest bit interested. Peterson explained where "prejudice is an attitude,

Continued p. 10

INSIDE

Senior Class Elections
Page 5

Can Career Mongers Really Love?
Page 8

Gresham Riley:
Letter to the College Community
Page 11

Canst Thou Readeth This?
Page 15

Tom Kay — Tough Love
Page 17

What's News?

Analyzing Current Issues

"Woman Pregnant With Daughter's Triplets" sounds like the typical catchy headline for a National Enquirer cover story. Instead it recently graced the front page of the New York Times. The already complicated issue of surrogate motherhood has become even more befuddling in South Africa where Pat Anthony, a 48 year old grandmother is now in her third month of pregnancy carrying triplets for her own daughter.

Surrogate pregnancy has become a puzzling national topic recently with the landmark decision on the Baby M case in New Jersey. On March 31, Judge Harvey R. Sorkow awarded custody of Baby M to her father, Willian Stern. In doing so, he stripped Mary Beth Whitehead of all her maternal rights. She had given birth to the baby after being artifically inseminated with Mr. Stern's sperm.

Whitehead was recently awarded visitation rights while the case is entangled in appeals cases.

The recent attention to such cases has brought tough ethical questions to the surface. Breathtaking medical advances and biological technology are making alternative births possible for more and more people. Undoubtedly, the issue of surrogate motherhood will continue to challenge our courts and social institutions. How will our society and the law grapple with the issue?

Whose rights should we give first priority to in these difficult cases? Should women be allowed to "rent out" their bodies for profit? What if they breach their contracts because, as with many surrogate mothers, they become too emotionally attached to the child they are carrying to part with it when the nine months are up? Should surrogate mothers pay damages, as with other service agreements if they fail to uphold their contracts?

And what about the baby? Since the 1974 Supreme Court decision legalizing abortion, fetal rights have become a new legal consideration. Surrogate motherhood raises a similar set of issues. Should the child go to the most fit mother/parent regardless of any birthing contracts?

Churches are asking whether the concept of surrogate motherhood is even moral itself. In a recent Vatican statement, the Catholic church registered its disapproval of surrogate pregnancy, stipulating that "any conception other than that which [is] the result of natural sex acts between married couples [is] 'morally illicit.'" (New York Times, 4/9/87).

Why is surrogate pregnancy so distasteful and difficult to handle legally? Does it indicate that our society is coming to view children more and more as property to be haggled over? Are parenthood and motherhood rights or privileges?

Often, we want to separate the law from morality, but issues like surrogate motherhood are taking ethical dilemmas straight to the courts. What kind of answers will we find? So far, the court seems to be upholding contracts whether they be among family members or between a woman and a couple. Undoubtedly the issue will continue to challenge judges around the country.

Tune in next week for "Bamboo Mothers Human Child for Bruce Willis and Cybil Shepherd."

NEWS EDITORS

News Briefs

Correction

The article describing the ninth block course "Rome the City" taught by Professors Edith Kirsch and Ruth Kolarik, listed $1,970 for round trip airfare. This was a mistake—the actual fare would run approximately $970.00 for round trip transportation from Colorado Springs to Rome.

Vandalism on Campus

At 5:45 a.m. on Saturday, April 11, a CC security guard discovered that one of the newly unveiled outdoor sculptures and one of the CCCAA shanties had been vandalized. The sculpture, on the southwest side of the library, was slightly bent but has been reassembled. CCCAA members rebuilt the shanty on Tuesday, April 14. Security officials said the vandals are unknown, and there are no current leads.

CCCAA and Alumni Meet

On Sunday, April 12 representatives of the CCCAA met with the National Alumni Council and other alumni in an attempt to increase alumni awareness about the divestment movement on campus. The NAC agreed that the alumni as a whole might profit from education and information regarding the many issues prevalent today at CC, including divestment. The only stumbling block is how to disseminate this information. The Tutt Alumni House is currently undertaking research to decide upon the most efficient method by which to convey this information. The three options under investigation are; newsletters, letters or possibly an insert for the June College Bulletin.

Global Perspective's continued from p. 1

pointed out that the results of this demonstration affirmed that, for most people, knowledge of the world begins near hme and becomes less and less concrete as its scope is widened. According to Turkovich, "We are fundamentally grounded in time and space. We can only judge history and the world through our own reality - it is up to us to paint in the areas we know little about."

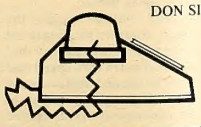
For the lecture's final exercise, Turkovich and Mueller had the audience first list their most pressing personal concerns, then their global concerns. The results of this exercise were found by comparing the similarity of the two lists. Not surprisingly, for most of audience, the list differed to a degree. But what was surprising was a comparison of the audience's responses with tabulated answers to this exercise given by 20,000 correspondents from around the world. Thus, while responses at Tuesday night's lecture ranged from "Paying for my education" to "Protecting the environment," by far the concern most expressed in the global survey was mere survival. Turkovich and Mueller pointed out that for most Westerners, economic security prevents survival from becoming a real worry, but that for much of the rest of the world, survival is a constant struggle.

Next, Colorado College professor Adrienne Seward recounted an experience that she had had with a homeless black woman in Washington DC. "I realized how difficult it is to understand others because our concerns are so vastly differentf. She had the notion that I couldn't even imagine what her life was like," said Seward. "She's right - but although I couldn't understand her life, I found that I could at least respect her life."

Photo by Jane Bierma

Turkovich summed up the lecture/demonstration by suggesting a manner in which to approach international problems: "Our local framework determines who we are and what we think. Therefore, we must attempt to think globally, but act locally - the impetus for global change will arise from our local experiences."

DON SILVER



Spice Up Easter Sunday This Year
With Champagne Sunday Brunch
10:30 am - 4 pm
Delicious Entrees From The Menu
Homemade Pastries & Salad Bar
Easter Sunday Specials
• Green Chili & Cheddar Omelettes • Rib Ey & Eggs •
• Breakfast Burrito • Mexican French Toast •
• Sour Cream Chicken Enchilada • Eggs Benedict •
• Hueros Rancheros • Stacked Enchilada •
• Chilaquelas • Lunch Favorites — And More!
Priced $2.95 - $7.50
Join Us For Dinner Easter Sunday 5 pm-10 pm
222 N. Tejon St. • Downtown • 636-2311

Michelle®
Give lucious, hand-packed, milk chocolate Easter eggs to someone special or just treat yourself. Only at Michelles—
Your Easter Bunny Headquarters
122 North Tejon

Beidleman Livens Crowd

On Sunday, April 12th, Dr. Richard Beidleman delivered the "last lecture" of his life at the Loomis Last Lecture series. His methods provided an entertaining yet informative talk concerning means to achieve excellence in life.

Unlike what has been referred to as his "old-mell" style of delivery, Beidleman requested that his lecture notes be shuffled by a student and then handed to him one by one. On the cards were written ideas which he wished to express. As each card was presented, Beidleman provided a quick series of comments and anecdotes to illustrate his point.

Although in one's "last hour" such things may be done. Yet few people besides Beidleman can do this so well. Often bringing his audience near the point of tears with his lighter, Beidleman was still able to discuss topics such as diligence and the long pursuit of education. Beidleman also discouraged viewing money as the ultimate goal in life. Beidleman discouraged the use of money, however, as a way of helping others as well as himself.

If Beidleman had one general negative comment about students it was their obsession with television. He cited the popular pastime of recalling episodes of "Gilligan's Island" and "The Brady Bunch" as proof of this preoccupation. Beidleman referred to T.V. as "the modern opiate to the people" and coined the term "T.V. overkill." By this he meant that there are many more television programs available than hours to watch them. He compared this to "nuclear overkill," our potential to destroy the world more times that we can imagine.

As the last grains of sand fell through the hourglass Beidleman closed his lecture by urging students to make a positive contribution to the world. Paraphrasing the words of Kennedy he stated, "Ask not what the biosphere can do for you, ask what you can do for the biosphere."

Although the "last hour" is only a premise, Beidleman's true finale is rapidly drawing near. As many already know, next year will indeed be his last. Those who haven't experienced a class with "Dr. B" have only a few opportunities left to see what they have been missing. With the retirement of Professor Richard Beidleman, students of all disciplines will lose one of the truly great educators of this institution.

Richard Van Buskirk

Poster continued from p. 1

4.) The flaunting of homosexuality by certain individuals is an offensive display of grotesque, unnatural, and inexcusible mannerisms that the community as a whole should not have to endure.

5.) Any group that attempts to gain support by forming an association between a commonly worn article of clothing, such as blue jeans, and that group's ill-begotten cause, is a group which exemplifies a weak and unsupportable cause. Any support perceived (sic) by this group by persons wearing blue jeans is coincidental and inconsequential. The community at large does not support gay rights as an active movement.

6.) Doing each other up the butt is disgusting.

A sexually explicit line drawing posters has proven negative. Although most of the posters were ripped down by Friday afternoon, discussion about the posters spread throughout campus.

English Professor Adrienne Seward said, "It seems there has been a flurry of anti-gay, anti-black attacks across campus. This is a very cowardly noxious act."

Senior Ted Craig observed, "the reactionary ignorant nature of the posters did more to put forward the gay liberation cause than anything else during Gay Awareness Week."

Political Science Professor Damian Fernandez said that the very fact that the students "did this anonymously shows how narrow minded they are. They're not willing to confront people outright with their opinions."

Continued on p. 20

Josh & John's
Naturally Homemade Ice Cream

STILL DELIVERS
ICE CREAM
This week only NO delivery charge!!
(offer expires April 17)
630-0299
Delivery on the hour ● 1 qt. minimum
11 am - Midnight

DOMINO'S PIZZA

TWO 12" ONE TOPPING PIZZAS FOR $9.14
(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.

Continued By Popular Demand

Limited Delivery Area
Our drivers carry less than $20

AVOID THE NOID
CALL DOMINO'S PIZZA

30 minute guarantee
If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes, present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off your order.
One coupon per pizza.
Fast, Free Delivery
Good at listed locations.

One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!

For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same!), and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings.

Two 12" pizzas will only cost you:

Superb cheese	$7.95
1 topping	$9.14
2 toppings	$10.33
3 toppings	$11.52
4 toppings	$12.71
5 toppings	$13.90
6 toppings	$15.09

Twice the pizza for one low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minute or less, GUARANTEED!

Offer may expire anytime

635-1511

DOMINO'S PIZZA DELIVERS® FREE.

All Pizzas Include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.

Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95

Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers,
Extra Cheese (1 item)
Double Cheese (2 items)
Thick Crust, Extra Sauce
Each Item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19

Ask about our Group Discount (on 5 or more pizza orders).

We accept checks.

Prices do not include tax. Our drivers carry less than $20.00.

Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.

Candidates for Senior Class Offices

Voting by Juniors April 20 and 21

Photos by Jane Bierman

Jeanne Lewis

I would appreciate the opportunity to give my time and effort to the class of 1988. The position of treasurer will enable me to do this. Academic pressures and other commitments can intercede a committee's success. My commitment to my class, however, is very strong and I intend to give a great deal to the class of '88. Working well with others is an integral part of an officership. Previous experiences in my sorority and other campus organizations have trained me in this area. I am an economics major with extensive experience in budgeting and money management. I look forward to a great senior year and I hope to represent you as treasurer.

Karl Ossentjuk

I decided to make a run for the office of Senior Class Treasurer because I frankly enjoy handling lots of loot and want to make the final year we'll spend at CC a great one. I was Assistant Grand Treasurer in my fraternity and assist in the management of the cash income at Tutt Library. I am familiar with the procedure involved in the preparation of proposals for funding of special events. I feel I can definitely meet the basic responsibilities of this office, but am also seeking this office because I possess a genuine interest in giving my all to promote a festive senior year for the class as a whole. Class distinction at CC tends to be minimal due to the Block Plan and number of courses that are open to all students. Although I find interacting with people of different ages very rewarding, it would be beneficial, and even fun, if the Senior Class "interacted" among themselves through functions such as FAC's, barbecues, ski retreats, and nights at clubs.

Thank you, and please vote on Monday or Tuesday.

Bob Zadalis

I am running for the office of Senior Class Vice-President. In my efforts, I wish to better unite the Class of 1988 and to make it as much fun as possible. I have much experience in organizing and initiating large class projects (high school vice-president, Kappa Sigma Vice-President). I have many ideas for making our class as strong as it can be. Working with administrators, alumni, the community and other students would be nothing new to me. I am more than willing to listen and everyone's ideas will be seriously considered. The input of all Seniors is needed. After all, it is our Senior Class. This would be a fun challenge and one that I would be very willing to apply myself to. I encourage all to vote on your class officers!

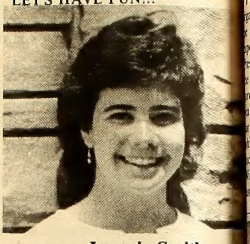
Winston Hait

I am running for the position of President of the Senior Class of 1988. The main basis of my platform is communication. I feel I can successfully work to establish and keep open lines of communication between the Administration and the Senior Class. I feel this should be done for two reasons: One, the voice of the Seniors must be able to be heard by the administration. All of us will have been exposed to a lot of changes over our four years, be it divestment, the eight block plan, or the new Worner Center and the Administration needs to know our reactions to these changes.

And, two, the administration must be able to reach us with its ideas of change and reform. After having the privilege of attending the National Alumni Council (NAC) Forum the weekend of April 10-12, I was amazed to see how many of the 65 alumni leaders from across the country were extremely upset and felt left out over the lack of communication the administration had with them over the issues of divestment and the eight block year. Some even felt the administration was purposfully not telling them anything to hide some deep, dark secret. I propose to let everyone "see the light." I propose to set up a direct line of communication with the administration and pass that information on to the rest of the class next year and in the years to come so the problems explained above can be avoided in the future. And as Senior Class President, I would be a voting member of the NAC and would be able to let the desires of the Senior Class be heard at the bi-annual meetings.

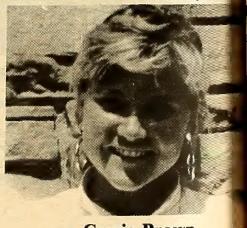
I also believe we should continue to have group events, but they should not be centered on alcohol. Let's take advantage of our area of the country. How about a Senior Cookout in Cheyenne Canyon at a baseball game? I think we should bring back the Senior Class Weekend. Some of the Alumni at the NAC Forum told me some great stories of past ski trips and the wild times they had on them. I think we should also try to have a white water raft trip, or even a back backing trip. These can help develop cohesion of the class participating in activities off the campus while at the same time making the most of the great outdoors.

As Senior Class President I can keep our class to keep in touch with the thoughts of the Administration and the class' voice be heard. If you know me you know I can. If you do not, then let me tell you I am President of the Student/Alumni Association and I have experience working with the Administration and Alumni in letting all sides know what the others are doing. Next year will be my last here, so let's get out there, get to know our classmates better before we journey off into the "real world," and LET'S HAVE FUN!!!



Jeannie Smith

As a part of the class of 1988 I would be honored to represent you as best I could. I feel that I could accomplish the duties of the secretarial position effectively. I have had previous experience in this particular area and am willing to put the required amount of time into it. I am looking forward to a fantastic senior year.



Carrie Brown

Short and sweet but to the point: I'm psyched for senior year and will do my best as class secretary.

Hertz

You don't just rent a car. You rent a company.™

Call for Weekend Rate and Eligibility

315 N. Weber
473-2444

8-6 Mon-Sat

Appointments possible at any other time

5% discount with Ad

-ATTENTION SENIORS-

Commencement Announcements
now available
65¢ each or 10 for $5.95

Order Class Rings
$130.00 - $526.00
$15 Deposit

Colorado College Bookstore
Rastall Center

the Stagecoach Inn
702 Manitou Avenue
On Fountain Creek in Manitou Springs

Don't Forget the Stagecoach Inn

Make Your Reservations

Lunch 11:30-2:00
Dinner 5:00-9:00
Sunday Brunch 10:30-2:00

Reservations 685-9335
Banquet & Catering Facilities For All Occasions

andidate Profiles Continued

Debbie Roark

I would like to serve as your Senior ass Vice President because I believe in future of the class of '88. I want to further unify the class next year and ntain that bond as a class after we duate.

I've held leadership positions in other anizations on campus which I feel give the necessary qualifications and erience to be an effective Vice sident. For example, I am currently President of the Gamma Phi Beta nity and was the Social Chair last r. I am also the current Vice President the Student/Alumni Association, ich has taught me the importance of a cessful and cohesive graduating class. th your support, I'd like to make our t year at CC a memorable one!

Adam Burke

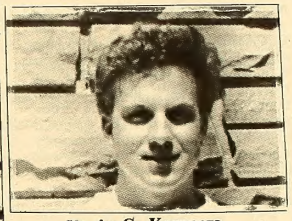
As we near the end of our junior year, e are increasingly reminded that 1988 ll mark the end of our undergraduate volvement at CC. I believe that senior ar should provide some of the most warding experiences of our collegiate reers.

Creative programming and the contributions of the graduating class play an important part in this experience. As President of BACCHUS, I feel that I have developed the programming skills necessary to design events that are both fun and informative. In organizing the Colorado College Alcohol Awareness Week, which was selected as one of the top five programs in the country, I learned the importance of recognizing the diverse needs of the student body. The Class of '88 is a talented group of individuals with varying interests and concerns. I believe that it is vital for the Class President to be receptive and sensitive to the requests of the seniors.

Additionally, the senior class is capable of contributing to the continuing development and growth of the college. Through planned action, the Class of '88 can effect positive changes for the Colorado College community.

I would consider it a privilege to serve next year's seniors as Class President. I firmly believe that through challenging programs and student involvement, we can be remembered as a group of committed individuals who cared for the Colorado College and left it a better, stronger place than it was four years ago.

Thank you for your consideration.



Kevin G. Kempers

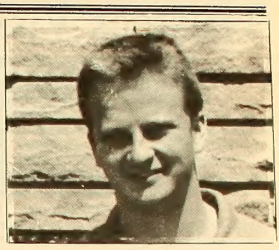
As President, along with the other officers, I would like to reunite the class of 1988. Over the past three years, since the first day of freshman year we have gone our separate ways. The only time we felt like one class was during our freshmen orientation. I would like to help restore some of the unity we had back then, for our last year at Colorado College.

Through the organization of different events, such as gatherings at local taverns and class meetings we need to get reaquainted with our fellow class mates. Our senior year should be the most memorable. Despite our theses, and employment woes, we can make our senior year at Colorado College the best there ever was.

Thank you

Allison Anderson

God awakened me last night, or was it Gresham (never mind?!), he handed forth to me the Eleventh Tablet proclaiming my destiny as the Senior Class Vice-President. This destiny must be fulfilled lest God will send forth his wrath upon the Colorado College community by implementing a Seven Block plan, year-long dialogue, and locusts. (Big hairy ones too!) So a vote for me is a vote for God and your own pitiful salvations.



David K. Katz

Senior Year should be a memorable year for all of us. As a senior, I'd welcome the opportunity to assist in managing the Senior Class Budget, and to work for the Senior Class. I'd like to help make it a great year for all of us, and by being Class Treasurer, I think I can do just that.

YAKITORI

Serving Lunch and Dinner
(Monday - Saturday)

•

Sushi Bar

•

Cocktails

•

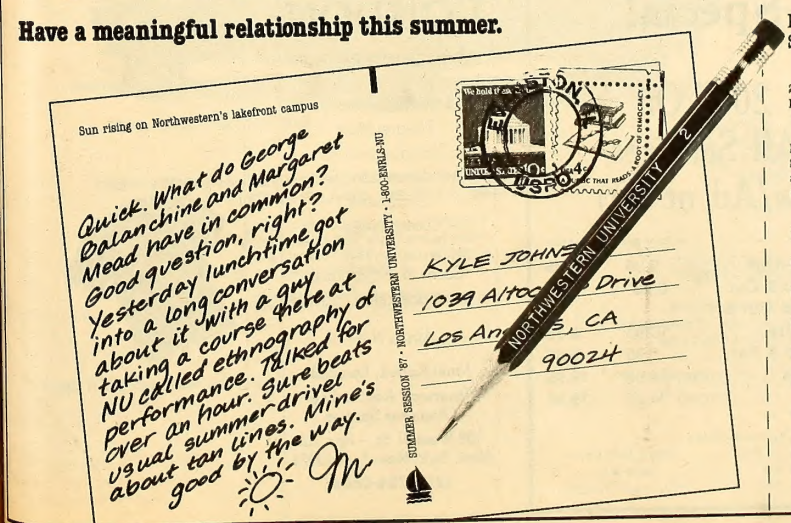
Take-Out and Delivery

•

10 % Discount Off Any Entree
(with your CC ID)

16 E. Bijou • Downtown • 578-0915

Have a meaningful relationship this summer.



Sun rising on Northwestern's lakefront campus
Quick. What do George Balanchine and Margaret Mead have in common? Good question, right? Yesterday lunchtime got into a long conversation about it. With a guy taking a course here at NU called ethnography of performance. Talked for over an hour. Sure beats usual summer drivel about tan lines. Mine's good by the way.
KYLE JOHNS
1039 Alto Drive
Los An S, CA
90024
NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
SUMMER SESSION '87 • NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY • 1-800-ENRLS-NU

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
SUMMER SESSION '87

2003 Sheridan Road
Evanston, Illinois 60201

Please send my free copy of the Summer Session '87 catalog with financial aid and registration information.
(Available mid-March)

Name

School Address

City

State Zip

Home Address

City

State Zip

Wish you were here.
Send the coupon or call 1-800-ENRLS-NU
(Inside Illinois call 312-491-5250)

SS 4

Trustees Visit to Campus Discussed

Divestment Controversy Continues...

In response to the CCCAA's (Colorado College Community Against Apartheid) request for an open debate with members of the Board of Trustees concerning the College's investment policies in South Africa (published in the April 10th Catalyst), the Administration has taken steps to develop campus-wide discussions involving the trustees. Due to being in the developmental stage, however, decisions concerning the format of the student/faculty/trustee interaction have not been made.

Upon receiving the request from the CCCAA, President Riley enlisted Dean Brooks to meet with some trustees and get an initial reaction. On Tuesday April 7th, Dean Brooks met with board members Gary O. Loo and Gerald H. Phipps in Denver. Brooks said that these two members and the Board have a "geniune interest in the issues and questions of South Africa," and approve of holding some initial meetings with students and faculty to further pursue the possibilities of some "open, reasoned discussions."

On Tuesday, April 14th, a number of faculty, staff, and students met with Board members Phipps and Bill Hybl. It was noted that the Board has no obligation to discuss their decisions with the CC community, but as student and CCCAA member Matt Case noted, "in the liberal arts tradition, they should." Case added that it was immediately clarified at the meeting that possible discussions would not "just concern CC and its investment policies," but that the many issues surrounding South Africa, if not the southern Africa, would be the focus.

In regard to the April 14th meeting, a number of positive comments and observations came out. The group, which represented a myriad of opinions on the complex set of issues involved, produced a "well balanced and thoughtful discussion," commented Dean Brooks. Matt Case added that those involved "took their positions concerning the issues on a very personal level." Brooks further remarked that the meeting "helped the trustees involved see the issues more clearly," and that "the restoring of conversation" between opposing positions was very important in promoting further discussions.

Opinions on the rate at which the CCCAA request is being handled have varied. Matt Case felt the whole process is "moving very slowly and ambiguously toward eventually having Board members on campus for open discussions." Dean Brooks, however, finds the administration's response quite timely, and noted the present geographical diversity of the Board members as an obstacle for rapid decision-making.

While the structure of possible discussions or debates remains undecided, steps taken this past week have opened lines of communication among the students, faculty, staff and board members. At present, all interested parties will await the official reaction of the entire Board, as they are currently being informed of the new developments.

PETER LOACH

ATTENTION: ARTISTS

LEVIATHAN is sponsoring a $50[00] purchase award for your artwork to be placed on permanent display in the Worner Student Center.

Entrants should submit necessary information:

to Leviathan Box at Student Center
by Monday, April 20, 5:00 p.m.

- name, phone #
- title of work
- medium
- description (subject matter, dimensions, etc.)

Artwork should be delivered to Packard Hall (east end of 1st floor) between 12-2 pm, Wednesday, April 22 and picked up by 5:00 pm.

Questions? Call Kristin Ward at 632-5264

Submissions will be judged by members of the Art Dept. faculty.

Student Special

20% Off
All Services
(w/Ad or ID)

	REGULAR PRICE	YOUR PRICE
Just—A—Cut	5.95	4.75
Shampoo & Cut	6.95	5.55
Shampoo, Cut & Blow Dry	10.95	8.75
Shampoo & Set	7.95	6.35
Colorings	(from) 24.95	19.95
Perms	(from) 24.95	19.95

NO APPOINTMENT NECESSARY
GREAT EXPECTATIONS
PRECISION HAIRCUTTERS

New Spring & Summer Hours
Mon.-Fri. 8-8
Sat. 8-6
Sun. 11-5

6 Southgate Road
(Southgate Mall)
520-9957

Family Hair Care
with the Personal Touch

LONDON

SUMMER INTERNSHIPS

Law/Accounting
Theater/Arts
Communications
Journalism
Computers
Languages

Earn up to 8 credits
in these and other courses.

Apply Now:

Janet Kollek, Director
American Academy of Overseas Studies
158 West 81 St. – Box 112
New York, New York 10024
(212) 724-0804

PARTICIPATING TOYOTA DEALERS

COLORADO

Aurora
Mark Toyota
444 South Havana Street
(303) 340-2170

Boulder
Tom Lyons Toyota
47th & Pearl Parkway
(303) 443-3250

Colorado Springs
Gene Osborn Toyota
5597 N. Academy Boulevard
(303) 598-2222

Durango
Bob Sellers Toyota
20541 U.S. Highway 160 West
(303) 385-4822

Englewood
Burt Toyota
5460 South Broadway
(303) 761-3222

Fort Collins
Colorado Import Motors
Toyota/Volvo
1113 North College Avenue
(303) 534-2613

Glenwood Springs
Bighorn Toyota
152 West Sixth Street
(303) 945-6544

Golden
Stevinson Toyota
15000 West Colfax
(303) 277-0550

Grand Junction
Import Motors
2578 Highways 6 & 50
(303) 242-1221

Longmont
Longmont Toyota
116 South Main
(303) 443-6325

Pueblo
Pueblo Toyota
2801 Highway 50 West
(303) 543-1719

Thornton
Douglas Toyota
1650 West 104th Avenue
(303) 466-1921

WYOMING

Laramie
Ken's Toyota Kars
2222 Grand Avenue
(307) 742-7423

TOYOTA CLASS OF '87

NOW IT'S POSSIBLE TO BUY OR LEASE A NEW TOYOTA WITH NO DOWN PAYMENT.

Graduates: If you've received a verifiable job offer, we want to get you and your new career off to a great start—with a brand-new Toyota.

BUY IT OR LEASE IT. Toyota Motor Credit Corporation and your participating Toyota dealer are now making it possible to get the credit you deserve with two Class of '87 "quick approval" financing programs.

If you qualify, you can buy or lease a new Toyota and generally no down payment or security deposit will be required.* What's more, we can even process your loan within *24 hours. See your participating Toyota dealer for program specifics.

To apply, you'll need a current driver's license and proof of employment or job offer. You may find it helpful to bring along any bank or credit card numbers. Once you're approved, you can take your choice of the most exciting line of new cars and trucks Toyota has ever offered, including the all-new Corolla FX16 GT-S Liftback.

So come on down to your participating Toyota dealer today. Fill out an application, and then buy or lease your new Toyota. Purchase or lease arrangements must be completed by June 30, 1987.

A new career and a new Toyota. Who Could Ask For Anything More!

LEASE EXAMPLE: 1987 Standard Bed Truck, model 8200, based on manufacturer's suggested retail price. 48 monthly payments of $131.77,† totaling $6324.96.† End-of-lease purchase option, $2813.16.† No further end-of-lease liabilities, except abnormal wear and tear and excess mileage.

*No down payment required on eligible models, provided the amount financed is not more than the Toyota manufacturer's suggested retail price, plus the cost of factory-installed optional equipment and required tax and license fees.
Loan approvals M–F, 8:30–5:00.
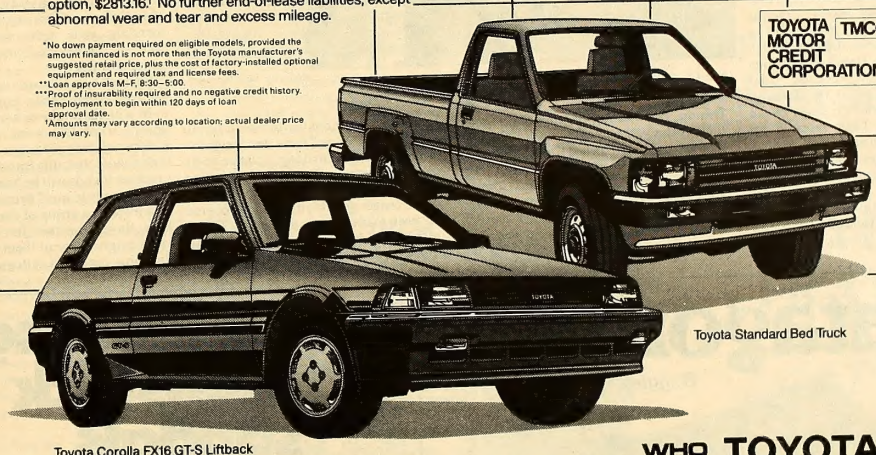
Proof of insurability required and no negative credit history. Employment to begin within 120 days of loan approval date.
†Amounts may vary according to location; actual dealer price may vary.

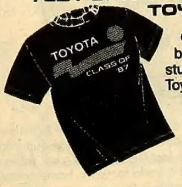
TOYOTA MOTOR CREDIT CORPORATION TMCC



Toyota Standard Bed Truck

Toyota Corolla FX16 GT-S Liftback

TEST-DRIVE A NEW TOYOTA AND RECEIVE A TOYOTA CLASS OF '87 T-SHIRT.



Come in and test-drive any new Toyota before June 30, 1987, and show us your student ID card.†† We'll mail you an official Toyota Class of '87 T-shirt.†††

†† All college students with valid student ID's are eligible.
††† Limit one per person while supplies last.

© 1987 Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc.

WHO COULD ASK FOR ANYTHING MORE! TOYOTA

Get More From Life... Buckle Up!

TOYOTA CLASS OF '87 TEST-DRIVE COUPON

Bring this coupon to your participating Toyota dealer for your free test drive. After your test drive, we'll mail you a Toyota Class of '87 T-shirt.

This coupon valid until June 30, 1987. Offer good while supplies last.

D-003

Careers and Relationships: A Two-Way Tie for Last

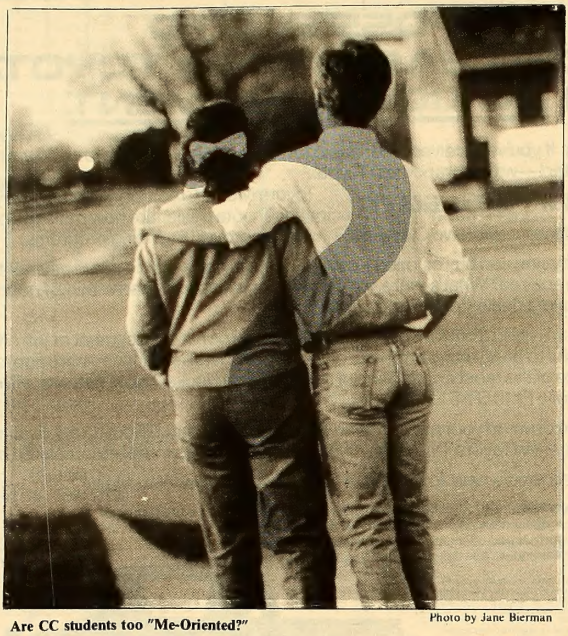
What does the future hold for CC's couples?

Recently the New York Times printed an article about college graduates entitled "Alone Together: The Unromantic Generation." We have inherited a stereotype which characterizes us as career minded individuals who would not give someone the time of day unless we benefitted. This has become a popular generalization which now calls for inquiry. No one would deny that we are in the midst of a ME-Generation which is in the midst of a ME-culture. But are Colorado College seniors extreme in their career choices at the expense of inter-personal relations?

Nancy Nish, Director of the Career Center, believes CC students who speak to her about future possibilities are exceptions from the normal herds of job hungry seniors attending large, state universities. Nish thinks that a liberal arts education on a small scale shifts the world-orientation of students toward "curiosity and not just careers." Assistant director of the center, Kim Grassmeyer, is surprised by the frequent limitation of career locations due to personal relationships. "Someone will only look for work in Minneapolis because that is where their 'significant other' is living," says Grassmeyer. The current situation which confronts a graduating senior deciding about work and a relationship has produced workshops by the Career Center on "dual career couples." According to the Career Center, CC students are looking at work options which will not exclude their personal relations with others. The old model of a single income family has given way to new possibilities for both love and work.

Graduating Biology major Catherine Houck is fortunate to have found a companion and a career direction which co-mingle. Last year, Houck and Biology major David Rolph received dual Venture Grants to travel to Molokai, Hawaii and conduct a field study of the Mexican Ash tree. Their research no doubt benefitted from their shared knowledge of biology and the mutual support of romance which makes scientific method all the more bearable. After graduation, Rolph may land a job at the Nature Conservancy on the island of Molokai while Houck plans to continue her research on Kawaii. In any case, their near future lies together in biology and Hawaii.

The popular image of graduates as solely career minded is further weakened by Gian Basili and his fiancee Allison Grimm. Basili is finishing his studies of biology this year while Grimm, a 1986 CC graduate, has returned to Colorado Springs after a short career jaunt in the business world on the East Coast. Although he receives some harsh criticism about "commitment," Basili believes his relationship "provides an optimistic outlook on the future." Basili explained that there is much misunderstanding today about the positive elements of a serious monogamous relationship. "There are moments when it can feel like confinement," says Basili, "but it is really enjoyable when looking to the future to plan for both of us." Gian was insightful to point out that making a choice to be with one person is only a limitation insofar as one dwells in the options which are no longer possible now that a decision has been made. This is a recurrent theme in both relationships and careers: to decide on one path is to limit possibilities, yet what is often neglected is that the act of decision will necessarily open new options which cannot be forseen.



Are CC students too "Me-Oriented?" Photo by Jane Bierman

While some graduates are including lovers in their future plans, others are making strong efforts to continue friendships after the explosion of graduation. David Williams and Eric Johnson, both Geology students, are preparing for a summer long bicycle tour through northern states and Canada. Williams mentioned that with his circle of friends, few, if any, were pursuing career tracts. In fact, it was Williams' opinion that most people he knew of were planning to "hang out," some capacity and allow the friendships which were started at CC to guide future plans.

"A recurrent theme in both relationships and careers is that to decide on one path is to limit possibilities"

Adhering to this theme, English major Dickson Musselwhite has dedicated himself to "selling all of my property and making a bundle in Alaska over the summer," and is joining a CC alumnus for a sailing adventure in the Pacific. Musselwhite is careful not to make the mistake his brother made of launching an early career in law, although it is questionable whether his propensities lie in this area anyway. Regardless, Musselwhite has his priorities set and is spending little time worrying about "getting established," in a respectable social stratum.

Senior Dave Edwards is not suiting up for Wall Street either. Edwards is going to be with his family or a while when they uproot from Oklahoma and move to California. "My sister is a sophomore in high school and this transition to a new group of friends will be hard, so I want to be there to help out." Presently, Edwards is living with a group of close friends who have stayed together for the past four years despite some of them graduating or dropping out of CC altogether.

Continued p. 9

patagonia®
Baggies™ Shorts

Mountain Chalet
CC's Outdoor Connection
266 North Tejon 633-0732
Downtown
© 1987 Patagonia, Inc.

Funny looking Birkenstock sandals

You've probably heard of them. They're the sandals that more than three million people swear by. The sandals with a 210-year tradition. Funny looking, sure. But Birkenstock shapes to your feet like cool, soft sand, making them the most comfortable sandals in the world for work, home and play. They give you proper support without getting in the way of normal foot and leg movement. They improve your posture and circulation to let you walk healthier, more naturally. And they last and last. Birkenstock. Made funny looking so you can smile more wearing them. 20 men's and women's styles in preferred colors. $27 to $74. You've gone without them long enough.

Birkenstock®

College Shoe Shop
632-6161 • 831 N. Tejon

© 1985 Birkenstock Footprint Sandals, Inc.

First Decathlete Shoots For Nationals

Tor Petersen, a sophomore from North Kingstown, R.I., will become Colorado College's first-ever decathlete this weekend when he competes in 10 track and field events at the University of Northern Colorado.

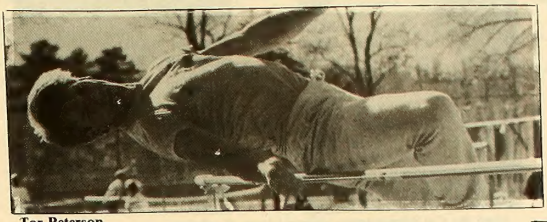
According to Frank Flood, head coach of the CC men's track team, Petersen will enter the 100 meters, long jump, shot put, high jump, 400 meters, 100-meter high hurdles, discus, pole vault, javelin and 1500 meters spanning two days (Friday and Saturday) in Greeley.

Petersen, 6'2" and 190 pounds, also will compete in another decathlon the following weekend in Azusa, Calif.

"Last year we started to see how he might be capable of something like this," Flood said of Petersen. "He wasn't really outstanding at any one event in particular, but he was able to do just about everything.

"We talked about it a lot and , gave him some books to read when he went home last summer. He spent the summer working real hard back in Rhode Island. When he came back here last fall, he was a lot better. Right now he's better than he's ever been."

Petersen's goal is to qualify for the NCAA Division III national championship meet May 20-23 in Naperville, Ill. In order to do so, he needs to compile 6,300 points in either of the two decathlons. In a pentathlon last month at the University of Colorado, he earned 3,300 points, leading Flood to believe he has a great chance of achieving his goal.



Tor Peterson

Petersen, the nephew of former National Football League stars Bobby and Donny Anderson, ran his first decathlon a year ago. He is one of two members on the Tiger track and field team with a shot at going to nationals. The other is sophomore Charles Puga (Denver, Colo.), who finished first in the shot put last weekend at the University of Southern Colorado Invitational meet in Pueblo. Puga's toss of 49 feet, 1 1/2 inches there was considerably short of the 51-7 national qualifying standard, but he has approached that figure in other meets this season. In other track news, CC's annual home meet (originally scheduled to take place at the Olympic Training Center on April 25), has been cancelled due to excessive insurance requirements.

SPORTS INFORMATION

Careers and Relationships Cont.

Continued from p. 8

Obviously, the popular belief that our generation is merely introverted and money hungry is somewhat overstated. Clearly the interests of more than a few seniors extends beyond economic and status considerations. Business/Economics was the most popular major last year but Biology, History and English were not far behind. Furthermore, the extent to which graduates pursue what they have studied is not considerable.

Of course it would be equally inaccurate to claim that all seniors are indifferent to traditional career choices. Many students find themselves with loan payments, extreme parental pressure, or simply a good opportunity, all which place them in the established working world. But even in these cases, the situation is not as desperate as the New York Times article leads one to believe. A graduating Anthropology major with student loan payments dangling over his head was able to find a summer job with a construction firm working on an archeological survey team. But his debt does not interfere with his future priorities which he sees as "Colorado powder skiing and a motorcycle in the summer."

A senior in Political Science was able to get a journalism internship in Washington D.C., and although he does not consider himself an overly career minded person, it is a special opportunity which he could not refuse. For some seniors, the working world is an invitation to a host of new experiences which will obviously include social contact and new friendships.

This is obviously not an exhaustive survey of seniors and their post graduate plans. Yet, remember Spring has arrived, and it is clear from a quick glance across the quad that career decisions are not keeping seniors from enjoying the sunshine and all the diversions which accompany warm temperatures.

SCOTT ALLEN

A Very Happy Unbirthday To All Of You

except for the unfortunate ones who have a birthday today. Come to the Lotus Eater Boutique and get yourself a very special unbirthday present and presents for all your friends with unbirthdays today.

We have it all and you know it.

Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm Sat. 11-5 pm

THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE

Downtown on Platte Between Tejon & Cascade

phone: 635-2118

The Guinea Pigg

Ethnic Art, Clothing & Jewelry from South America, Africa & Asia.

In Old Colorado City 2510 W. Colorado Ave. 633-0584.....

Hair Designers for Men & Women

Rapunzel

Style cuts, Cellophanes, Perms & Color.

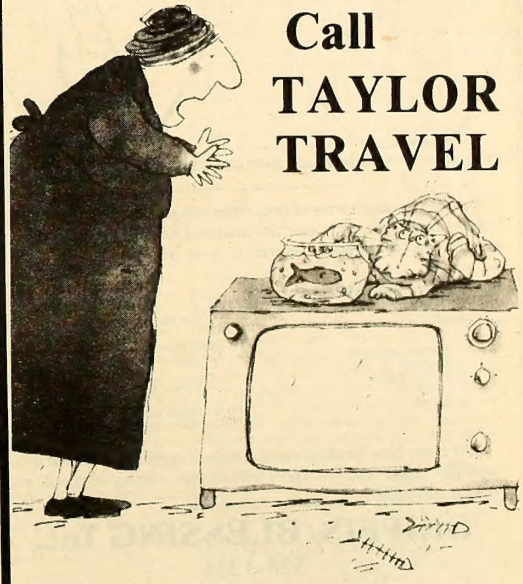
Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.

Stop in or make your appointment:

827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

Fishing for the lowest fares?

Call TAYLOR TRAVEL



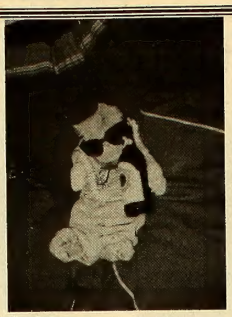
818 N. Tejon 636-3871

Ethnic Diversity Cont.

Cont. from p. 1

racism is an action" and that there is little incidence of the latter at CC. The isolated reports of racism, (writings on walls, verbal abuse and such), have occured during periods of attention on minority issues; Gay Awareness Week and Black American Month, for examples. The implication is such that measures can be taken against racism, but the problem of prejudice relies on education for resolution. "These are conservative times," said Peterson, "but our students seem to deal with it well. It (prejudice) hasn't caused students to leave."

AKLILU DUNLAP



Mimi the Cat demonstrates various states of sobriety.

Photos by Brigid McBride

A Nice Place to Visit, But...

Portland, OR: Diversity Amidst Drawbacks

So you've never been to Portland, Oregon? The jewel of the Pacific Northwest? Yes, yes it does rain a lot there, but that's not important right now. You may know more about Portland than you think you do.

If you've seen the poster of the man in a trenchcoat "exposing himself to art," you've seen Portland's mayor, Bud Clark (the bronze nude female statue can also be seen right in downtown Portland, a lust object of many vagrants). Mayor Bud, a former bar owner, is a lively, bearded fellow, fond of biking to work and wearing lederhosen.

Portland is full of such diversity. It has its share of yuppies (find them at the "Y" or the 24-hour Safeway on Jefferson St.), punks (Pioneer Courthouse Square or the Galleria), flamboyant types (NW Portland or the City Club), and hippies (Saturday Market or Reed College, The Campus That Time Forgot).

The diversity itself is remarkable, as is the tolerance of these individuals to exist somewhat peacefully with each other in the same city. Even in the Baghwan Shree Rajneesh's heyday, a red-clad Rajhneeshee could walk unharrassed in downtown Portland, if you discard laughter and Rolls-Royce jokes as harrassment. Generally, religious fanatics are welcomed into the city more so than, say, people from the suburbs or from California.

Portland often reflects attitudes of the entire state, because any Portland native identifies with issues that affect Oregon as a whole. Especially concerning the environment. Oregon passed the first returnable bottle bill in 1971, and currently, legislation is pending on bills which would regulate the use of plastics

Jerry Falwell was incensed when the Rolling Stones skipped Portland on their last tour.

(imagine a city devoid of disposable diapers and whose 7-11's use only paper bags).

As Oregon's major metropolitan area, Portland also sets the trends for the state. Portland was the center for the Oregon Marijuana Initiative, responsible for decriminalization measure on last November's ballot, which voters defeated overwhelmingly, in any case.

The city blooms each June with the Rose Festival, an almost 80-year-old celebration which throws everyone into a two-week frenzy of parades, sports events and contests. The festival is consummated by the Grand Floral Parade, for which devout Portland citizens will line the streets 2 hours early in the rain to get a front-row seat.

Is Portland a small town? Certainly not. Is it a big city? Not that either. Portland vacillates, taking on the characteristics of both. It's clean. It's friendly. There's still a chance that you will run into people you knew in high school walking down the street. Yet Portland also has tall buildings, shopping malls, big companies and McDonald's. It's almost, but not quite, the Big Time.

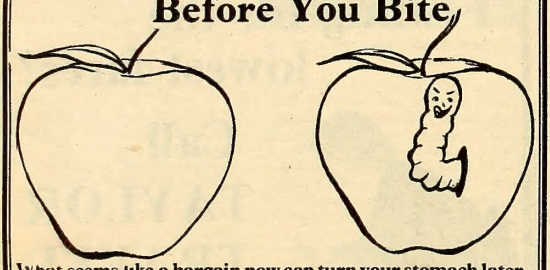
Drawbacks? Well, Portland lacks a major concert hall. The Memorial Coliseum, site of Trailblazer games, transforms into a reverberating echo chamber when filled with music. The Rolling Stones, David Bowie and Bruce Springsteen all passed Portland by on their last major tours. Well, what can you expect from a city that produced Quarterflash. Seattle's just a three-hour drive away.

So, grab a Henry Weinhard's and walk along the banks of the Willamette (rhymes with damn it) River. You're just an hour or so away from the mountains and the Pacific Ocean. Come visit Portland. And don't forget your umbrella.

KATIE WELCH

GRIFFIS/BLESSING INC.

Compare Apples to Apples Before You Bite



What seems like a bargain now can turn your stomach later.

We offer a unique array of properties and services and can tailor a lease to meet your particular financial and service needs. It might actually save you money - as well as some unpleasant surprises.

Just a few of our FREE advantages:

1. Bi weekly maid service
2. Assistance in locating sub-tenants
3. Security Systems
4. Hot tub
5. Fire places
6. 24 hour plumbing & heating service
7. Washer/dryers, dishwashers
8. Prompt return and accurate accounting of damage deposits

When the pipe breaks at night and your organic chem final is the next day, make sure you know who to call....the same people you should call today.

GRIFFIS/BLESSING Inc.

520-1234

2 : 1 bedroom
3 : 2 bedroom
7 : 3 bedroom
2 : 4 bedroom
2 : 5 bedroom
1 : 7 bedroom

Greenstreets Lounge
Proudly Presents
The Famous Ink Spots
8PM-12AM
Tues. April 14th - Sat. April 18th
$2.00 Cover
NO COVER - If you have dinner in Greenstreets
RESERVATIONS REQUESTED
GREENSTREETS
599-7727
Adjacent to the Hilton Inn at I-25 and Garden of the Gods

THE DISPARAGING EYE

A Journal of General Interest

VOLUME 3, NUMBER 3 APRIL 17, 1987

U.S. Competitiveness at Stake

BY BRIAN SMITH

In last December's issue of The Eye I wrote a rather optimistic article about life in the United States. Basically I said that most Americans had much to be thankful for and that the future held even greater promise. I portrayed an integrated world economy in which the United States plays a key part. I mentioned that the world economy, to which we are a key member, will continue to become more dynamic and competitive. A key statement on this subject was this: The United States will have to compete in order to survive.

But more and more people fear, perhaps rightfully so, that the United States cannot compete in the world market as successfully as before. The United States now imports roughly 30% more goods and services than five years ago. Computers and semiconductors once comprised our most promising sunset industries. But our share of computer exports have declined during this decade. Moreover, the U.S. semiconductor industry has lost a substantial share of the world market to Japan. In the automobile industry, Japanese workers productivity reaches a level roughly twice that of American workers. In a recent U.S. News and World Report poll, about 90% of the respondents felt that America's competitiveness has declined.

If the United States does not compete as effectively as before then American society will experience a decreased standard of living. Incomes will decline and fewer good jobs will be available. America's status and power in the international political arena will fall as well.

Is America, in fact, becoming less competitive? Do we face an uncertain future with a declining level of material well-being for all? If America has and will continue to become less competitive, what brought it about? To begin one need only look at two factors, both of which have occurred in the last twenty to twenty-five years. First, this country has experienced a lower level of confidence in its institutions. People no longer possess a belief that institutions can accomplish their objectives. There exists less and less confidence in both "institutional ability" and "institutional integrity." We not only feel skeptical about Congress' or G.M.'s ability to perform adequately, we doubt as well their willingness to act in the public good.

I, like other members of this society, have never been a big fan of institutions. Our forefathers also possessed a mistrust in institutions. This distrust is a part of the American psyche. But we realize institutions must exist in order to perform functions which individuals cannot. Too much antagonism and alienation toward institutions frustrates their ability to carry out functions. How can government know what the people want if the majority of the people don't even bother to vote?

Perhaps more importantly, we have lost confidence in ourselves. Businesses, in order to meet and surpass foreign competition, no longer seek to innovate. Instead, lobbyists descent upon Washington and speak of the need for "protection" from "unfair" foreign competition. Labor unions also seek protections from "underpriced" foreign labor rather than becoming more flexible with management over wages and benefits. (Union wages in this country have consistently outstripped gains in worker productivity. This makes our products more expensive and less valuable on the world market.) And consumers hesitate in buying American-made products, because foreign goods (be they Japanese automobiles and consumer electronics items, French wine and cheese, Italian pasta, Spanish leather, Korean shoes, etc.) are perceived as having a higher quality at a given price.

Maybe we need not worry about a slippage in our competitiveness. After all, the American economy, still by far the world's largest, has created 10 million new jobs during this decade alone. Western Europe's economy has "lost" over a million jobs. Inflation, which rose a scant 1.1% last year, is at its lowest level in over 25 years. American productivity rose 4.4% last year—a promising boost to say the least. Some say our anxiety has been caused by factors beyond our control, such as the structural transformation of our economy (from blue-collar, unskilled to service and knowledge-based) and the rapid escalation of the dollar to our government's stupidity and fiscal irresponsibility. If this scenario rings true, then the worst may have passed. The dollar has fallen substantially (and continues to fall—possibly too fast) and the degree of structural transformation may slow down.

My being the eternal optimist, I tend to take the latter views. But in order for America to retain and enhance its competitiveness in the world market, we as individuals, and our institutions, must do several things. First, businesses must adopt a more quality-conscious, long-term outlook. American-made automobiles, though better than the quick-rust, junkyard variety of the 1970's, still break down more than their Japanese counterparts. American business must start taking a riskier attitude and be willing to sacrifice short-term profits for long-term innovation and quality improvement. Given recent productivity increases, the tide may in fact be turning.

Koop On Condoms

BY BILL PORTER

Once again, the Reagan administration has proven how in touch with the real world it truly is. Faced with a disease of such epidemic proportions that 220 people will die this week alone, our national government has again chosen to put on its official "moral majority blinders."

With a cure for AIDS still at least five years away according to most medical experts, the need for public education has become desperate. Surgeon General C. Everett Koop, realizing this, has proposed that schools teach children about the use of (gasp!) condoms as a part of an AIDS-prevention program.

And here's where Reagan's far-right cronies have entered the debate. Education Secretary William Bennett accused Koop's thought-out, pragmatic policy as being "clinically correct but morally empty." He was particularly upset that discussions on ways to prevent the spread of AIDS inevitably seem to legitimize that dirty three-letter "s" word.

Come on, Bill. Wake up and smell the coffee. Behavior that spreads the disease is not changing—especially among heterosexuals. San Francisco's AIDS Foundation cites studies showing that 66 percent of the city's straight population does "not feel personally threatened" by the virus. And the American Journal of Public Health points how high school students throughout the Bay area remain confused and ignorant. All this despite a disease that will kill off more Americans by 1990 than the Vietnam and Korean wars combined.

Concrete, preventive steps must be taken to slow down the spread of the virus. We all know about the facts, figures, and statistics of AIDS. Now it's time to transform all this information into an effective public education campaign that teaches people how to avoid becoming one of the statistics.

That's precisely what Koop attempted to do by suggesting condoms as a practical, though pragmatic, solution.

Teenage sex, casual sex, good sex, bad sex, one-night-stand sex; it'll always be there. Sorry Bill (and condolences to you too, Reverend Jerry), but sex is a permanent part of our culture. And, as ludicrous as it sounds, people won't stop doing "it" simply because they face a life-threatening disease. One CC student even anonymously admitted that he was more afraid of catching herpes than anything else. Clearly, teaching people about the existence and use of condoms proves the most effective, and indeed the only, way of controlling AIDS.

Perhaps Reagan could take some advice from his English prototypes in Great Britain, where Margaret Thatcher's government proved you don't have to be conservative and ignorant at the same time. Despite lagging several years behind the U.S. in AIDS incidence, the rightist administration has chosen the right choice: a major campaign advocating condom use. Quite frankly telling British citizens, "Don't die of ignorance," the government has flooded the market with public service announcements, radio ads, and billboards explicitly outlining steps to avoid AIDS contamination.

With this in mind, it's time America's conservative right came down off their cloud and faced reality as well. AIDS will not go away by itself, and neither will sex. A solution to the problem must reflect this awareness. And while advocating the use of condoms cannot be the only answer, it certainly is an integral part of it. Surgeon General Koop has had the courage and foresight to both face these facts and design a program that will best deal with these facts. Certainly, advocating condom use, to a certain extent, does imply a condoning of "loose" sexual practices. But it's time Bennett, Edwin Meese, and the rest of Reagan's short-sighted administrators stopped making this medical issue a moral one.

Speeding Toward Doom

BY DAVE MAKARECHIAN

Last week, leftist Colorado Governor Roy Romer, in a ceremony with all the pomp and public spending typical of his party, raised the first of the state's new speed limit signs for rural highways. Through the auspices of House Resolution #2, the Surface Transportation and Uniform Relocation ASS-istance Act of 1987, the federal government has graciously given us permission to drive 65 miles per hour in rural America. In other words, the State has admitted its mistakes of the 1970s: (1) You don't need to conserve energy by making people drive more slowly—all you need to do is deregulate, and (2) Americans still don't and never will respond to Government dictum—people drive as damn fast as they want to.

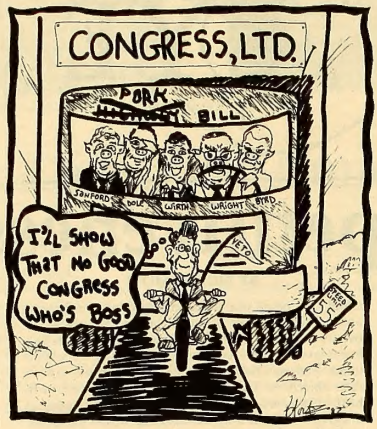
That's the good news.

The bad news is that through H.R. 2, the government has made a whole new set of mistakes—mistakes which become even more acute in the context of the 1980s. The highway bill is a random collection of pork barrel spending projects typical of the ultra-liberal, big government, tax and spend philosophy that arises from a Tip O'Neil-Ted Kennedy-type mentality. It's something that one would expect a Jimmy Carter to approve of in the mid 1970s, when the nation didn't really know about budget deficits. It doesn't appear to be a product of a legislature that proports to be fiscally responsible.

But fiscal irresponsibility notwithstanding, the bill also serves as a text-book example of why federal spending programs don't work, and are an especially untimely solution to the nation's transportation problems.

But just how much will the highway bill cost taxpayers? That's part of the problem. Even the government doesn't know. Rather than keeping to a tight budget which would have fit the bill into the Gramm-Rudman Deficit Reduction sequence, Congressmen have left most of the allocated funds uncontrolled, creating opportunities for graft and special interest projects. Of the dollars allocated for 1987, $890 million lack control. Upon distribution to states in the form of matching funds, local legislatures will be largely free to spend the money however—and on whatever, they wish.

This sounds like a good deal for the states, but they have to pay the price, too. Certain demonstration projects mandated by the bill require funding from local sources—Congress arbitrarily decided where funds should be spent, then grossly overspent.



H.R. 2 also proves that the days of the pork barrel didn't end during the Tammeny Hall years—but are alive and well in Washington D.C. Influential Congressmen are just as skilled as ever in channelling federal funds to their home districts. Such provisions in the highway bill give new meaning to the word absurd. Here are just a few:

The bill provides $10.3 million to study and design a tunnel for the port of Miami, even though federal and local governments have already spent $23-32 million to design and build a new bridge that the tunnel is supposed to replace.

The bill allocates $1.44 million to build three parking garages in Chicago to "demonstrate" that parking garages reduce unsafe parking on the streets.

And the bill provides $6.6 million to landscape about six and a half miles of turnpike near Henderson, Nevada. A little over a million dollars per mile for shrubs. Make sense?

In light of the government's irresponsible transportation spending, more and more taxpayers are questioning the collectivist transportation solutions. In other words, less taxpayers are willing to subsidize large, wasteful—and largely sleazy—pieces of legislation. An irresponsible national legislature necessitates local solutions to local problems.

Just how unfair is the allocation of tax-dollars to transportation projects? Everybody must pay a penny per gallon fuel tax to subsidize mass transit spending provided for in the bill. But only 20 cities receive any of the funds. Worse, still, 14% of the revenues go to Los Angeles for a 4.4 mile Metro Rail extension—working out to approximately $198 million per mile.

The typical liberal defense of the seemingly unfair allocation of funds is the redistribution of the wealth: Give to each according to need, take from each according to ability to provide. But recent studies of transportation spending have proven that to be crap. Because of the government's tendency to spend more money on upper income mass transit, such as light rail and commuter trains, and because of the poor's tendency to ride the bus (almost exclusively), upper income riders get a larger mass transit subsidy than do the poor.

H.R. 2 has been called the most significant defeat yet for President Reagan. But clearly, the real loser is the American people. The only winner is the politician who can brag about the local improvements he made in his district. Regrettably, the new, 65 miles per hour speed limit in H.R. 2 will only speed the government's trip toward economic ruin.

STAFF

Brian Smith & Norm Leahy .... Editors-In-Chief

Juan Calderon & Bill Porter .... Art Editors

Karl Ossentjuk, Steve Geraghty & Dave Makarechian .... Associate Editors

Karen Willoughby .... Copy Editor

Contributors: Gord Whitaker, Todd Erickson, Joe Hrbek, Matt Sanidas, Greg Archer and, yes . . . . Wayne D. Rudner

Linda Shireman & Linda Imhoff .... Typesetters

GAY RIGHTS

See Page 8

The Ed's Box

This country is currently faced with a crisis of policy. We stand on the brink of either being able to stop the spread of totalitarian oppression or of facing the possibility of America alone in the world.

The issue, of course, is not a new one. The United States has been faced with the problem of ideology for over forty years. Ever since the Allies acquiesced to the Soviet enslavement of Eastern Europe, this country has been at odds with how best to keep the spread of totalitarianism in check.

For a long time, Truman's ill-fated doctrine of containment held sway. What it gave us were two horrible wars and a nation that had run out of confidence in its ability to protect the free world. We also fell into the dangerous trap of supporting dictatorships as our agents in the struggle.

Then we fell into a period during which we would only support those countries of superior moral character.

In the end, America became confused and virtually impotent in the foreign arena. The question today is how to proceed without making our problems worse. How can we make policy decisions? Who should we support?

The answers to this little thought process which We've begun aren't easy; they require much serious analytical thinking by the State Department and the rest of our foreign policy-makers in Washington. But we've turned on the thought processes ourselves. To begin, we would venture to say that a general consensus exists on halting and perhaps even turning back the advance of communism.

But how to do it? Clearly on the international level communism is on the decline economically and, to a lesser extent, politically. (Witness the economic reforms in that behemoth of a nation known as China. In that same country, witness student calls for greater freedom of expression.) Even the Soviets have spoken of the need for 'reform.'

Nevertheless, Marxism-Leninism's appeal lies in its self-proclaimed intent of economic equality. To those in the Third World who see opulence & corruption next to their downtrodden proverty, one can understand the appeal. Yet as most people would agree, Marxism doesn't bring about greater equality, but it does destroy any notions of individual liberty and dignity.

American foreign policy must maintain its historic (post W.W.II) of controlling this scourge to humanity. Communism has lost respect in the Third World; capitalism and democracy are gaining new respect. We must facilitate this movement in any way we can. We must support allies who realize the dangers of communism as much as we do. A prime example: Costa Rica obviously wants to prevent the spread of Sandanista-style governments in Central America. But Costa Rica, as a Central American country, possesses more familiarity with the region than we do. Thus, in our central American policy, we must coordinate our actions to fit the needs of Costa Rica. Our interests are the same, so why not cooperate?

This example also applies to other regions of the world. Other examples abound.

Our support of the Mujahadeen in Afganistan against the Soviet invasion, our support of the Chadians in their fight against the Libyan incursion and our backing of the democratic government of El Salvador show that we have the capability of making good policy decisions.

Our failures include Chile and South Korea, but the possibility exists for a new outlook on our part. Individual case analysis is a viable alternative. Our past experience should be enough to convince us that absolutes serve no one, least of all our national goals.

Next week, as April finds us putting out two issues of the Eye, we will quickly look at other areas of crisis in our society. Stay tuned and please consider this edition of the Disparaging Eye.

Brian M. Smith

Norm Leahy

Brian Smith

Little Big Leagues: When Dad Strikes Out

BY STEVE GERAGHTY

Just last Saturday morning I happened to drive by my old elementary school on the way to my home. On this Saturday morning, lots of people had forced themselves to get their heads off of the pillows and the bodies out from under the blankets to get good seats at the baseball field that day. (Hard to believe that K-Mart and Target make that many lawn chairs.) It looked like a double header was going to be on the agenda for this day, but the same teams didn't play two games in a row like the pros do. Four teams would get the opportunity to play on this Saturday—and four fathers would get to pitch.

Which is what caught my attention. Sure, the kids look real cute and all in those white pants and red shirts (with FIRESTONE emblazoned across their chests, and extending well around to their backsides, undoubtedly leaving little room for a last name). And they also look real cute when the ball goes between their legs everytime, or when their best friend's dad strikes them out at the plate. You might ask why fathers are out on the mound, and I might answer because all of the pitchers are injured, and the rules allow it. Then again, I might tell you the truth, and tell you that the little kids are too small to be able to throw a strike often enough to keep the game interesting. Yet still the kids are out there on a Saturday morning, trying to beat their equally-sized opponents who, it just so happens, are about the same size as the bats with which they swing.

Yet why are all of these kids really out on the baseball diamond? Is it because they enjoy playing baseball, or is it because their parents enjoy them playing baseball. I would argue that mom and dad's happiness with the decision rules over any thoughts that little Bobby might have. And if Bobby's father gets to coach and pitch, all the better for everyone, right? Wrong. In today's world, the little kids are almost being forced to grow up too quickly; the days of just being a kid and playing with wood or sand or mud or wiffle-balls are over. Now you need to sand the wood so that you and dad can build something usable; sand and mud only make you dirty; wiffle-ball games are for wins and losses. And Little Leagues are for fathers.

Little Leagues were mostly likely established to get a large group of youngsters together in an organized fashion to have some fun. Not every child had a neighborhood full of peers, so now every kid had the chance to play if he could find the transportation. They got together, scored a few runs, booted a few grounders, threw a few wild pitches. And had fun. Then one day, something went wrong. I don't know who was responsible, but winning and fun became synonymous terms in Little Leagues (maybe it was Al "Just Win Baby" Davis). Pretty soon after, the weaker hitters and fielders spent more time in the dugout and less time doing what they signed up to do. Sure, everyone got to play; but kids are not so stupid that they can't count innings. The Championship trophy became the only goal, and the coaches (dads) knew that practice (and many of them) was the key to success. I will admit that losing isn't as fun as winning, but the difference doesn't have to be that great between the two.

However, parents don't want to watch their children lose all of their games. So the ones who think they know what they are doing start running the entire show. "When this happens, do this. Why? Because I told you so." Instead of teaching the kids some things about the game, parents invade it and control its every move. Mistakes don't teach lessons in Little League, they just make mom and dad and the coach angry because if they all add up, the win column doesn't increase in number. And the more control the kids have of the game, the more mistakes are going to be made. Then someone made another great Little League "discovery." The sooner they begin playing, the fewer mistakes they make when they are older. Experience will always win, right? (Makes you wonder why more than one team has won the World Series, since the first team to ever win it had to be considered superior to all the rest in that experience.)

Which brings me to my thoughts as I drove by the field and saw the fathers having to pitch in order for the league to work: ridiculously young to begin playing games that don't begin in a backyard. I saw two problems on that field: one that probably created such a situation, and the other that oftentimes is caused by it. Dad never got the chance to play on a little league team, and his son isn't going to have that missing from his life. Or dad did play, but wasn't that good and his son is going to be many batting average points better. Or dad's team lost in the championship the last year before dad had to play high school ball, and his son isn't going to be on the number two team. You get the point. Dad is still living out his fantasies, and now he has the complete set of playing pieces and instructions. This can only lead to two things: disappointment and burnout. Disappointment is the one that occurs more often. The child ends up having less talent than dad, but the pressure on the kid is worse than what dad suffered. Or the child is talented, yet winds up being one of the large percentage of high school athletes to not continue as college scholarship blue chips. Kids not participating in sports in high school or college is not always a bad thing—some have already had careers that span a decade before they even get the driver's permit. Why risk a loss of enjoyment of sports just so that dads can spend their Saturday mornings pitching in Little League games? Certainly the rewards of waiting just a year or two longer far outweigh that one risk. My advice to those parents so comfortably seated on lawn chairs that morning watching fathers be the pitchers would have been simple—let the kids play ball in the backyard, where the only basecoaches they'll ever hear are inside their very own heads.

DEADLINES:
The CC Non-Experience

BY WAYNE D. RUDNER

A funny thing happened to me last block: I encountered multiple deadlines for a single project. Is not this a world where usually only one deadline occurs per goal, and death results for those who fail to meet its pre-ordained time? Not at The Colorado College.

As a "journalist," I welcomed the time extension when this article's deadline was postponed several days. But then it was postponed again. And then a third time.

"John, the trouble with CC is that deadlines never seem to be met. I mean, if the students expect to be successful in just about any chosen field in our hardcore business environment, they will have to learn how to finish on time."

"Wayne, CC just does not give that much practice for accomplishing assigned tasks with penalties for tardiness. Sure, deadlines are established, but how many times were you able to turn an assignment in late?"

"Every paper I wrote."

Just then the phone rang and I was asked to "finally" complete my article for the upcoming Disparaging Eye. I had less than two hours to achieve my objective. What better topic for discussion, I thought, than: are we prepared for clock crunching in the business world?

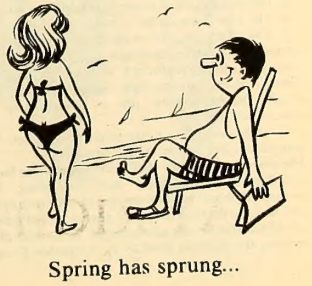
Now for those who know me well, I accept your obvious criticism—my hypocrisy. Admittedly, I find trouble in meeting college deadlines. (When it pertains to a money-making requirement, time is my ally.) The average CC student has never encountered extreme penalties for missing curfews established by a boss; how will we handle the emotional pressures of working "under the gun?" Not with the present faculty policies (although the block plan does an admirable job in toning our skills). A liberal arts education, as opposed to large-specialized universities, promotes learning through entirety. That means, if the student better understands his/her assignment with extra time for preparation, so be it. Personally, I find this philosophy totally acceptable and logical...and love it! But this will not suffice further down on Tejon Street.

Money (often corporate), not a grade, is the best reward for pulling all-nighters and experiencing burdening emotional strains to succeed in a time clinch. Bad habits acquired at college must now be tossed aside for new and better ones. The most effective means to meet a deadline involves understanding all facets of the assignment beforehand, and then move very efficiently towards achieving the goal. As a result, the recipient will recognize the proficiency in your work and you will not be fired. Still, when asked to accomplish several tasks at once, always weigh your potential (and the penalty for tardiness) and never be afraid to say no.

Advancements in technology have not only increased the amount of deadlines, but have decreased their completion time as well. The invention of the pen began the industrial revolution for curfews. No longer was the pencil adequate in speed for accomplishing written chores—the pen wrote smoother and faster. Then came the typewriter, and then the computer, which made pens almost obsolete. Now we can send actual documents over wire so a businessman in Tokyo will receive the same print and information. Increased speeds in processing and transferring information—i.e. faster deadlines—has become the norm. Can CC students cope with such rapidity?

My fellow graduates, do not let the aforementioned wisdom impede your progress for financial success. Social upbringing, your own motivation and desires, type of business environment and geographic location (expect no pressures in southern California) all influence one's emotional balance when "beating the clock." Just remember, whenever finding difficulty in approaching a deadline (be it research or an appointment), pick up the handy cellular car phone and tell the boss you were out of town and will meet him shortly—your plane just arrived at the airport...late. He'll understand.

P.S. I finished this article an hour after my final deadline, and it was submitted too late to appear in the last "Eye." But, hell, I figured, that's okay. There's always this issue—when you're on a roll.



Spring has sprung...

Evangelism and Hypocrisy

BY GORD WHITAKER

"Let not many of you become teachers, my brethren, for you know that we who teach shall be judged with greater strictness. For we all make many mistakes, and if any one makes no mistakes in what he says he is a perfect man, able to bridle the whole body also
— James 3:1-2

Have you heard the latest theory concerning the death of Jesus? It seems that he could not raise the 4.5 million dollars God asked him to in order to build a new temple. Therefore, God "recalled Jesus home."

Without question, this latter idea is perverse and oversteps the boundaries of good taste. However, what is one to think when a leader of the flock, Oral Roberts, announces that God wants him to raise 4.5 million dollars for missionary work or he shall be "recalled home." In essence, it is spiritual blackmail. Hundreds of thousands of Oral Roberts supporters will lose their leader if they do not donate enough money.

Fortunately, Robers quota of 4.5 million was met. But do you know where a substantial amount of this 4.5 million came from? Jerry Collins, an owner of two Florida dog tracks donated 1.3 million to Oral's cause. Along with Collin's gift came some advice to Oral Roberts. "Now he doesn't need hara-kiri." So what does he need now, Mr. Collins? Collin's reply, "maybe some psychiatric treatment."

Now I may only be a college major in world religions, however, it takes no genius to sense several faults concerning Oral Roberts. First of all, evangelicals consider gambling a sin. How can Oral justify accepting 1.3 million dollars of sinful money. Perhaps, he was not ready to "return home." Second of all, when a racetrack owner tells your minister that he needs psychiatric treatment, I would be extremely wary of my leader.

Now what exactly does this religious scandal mean to me? Well, as an unemployed, senior religion major the whole affair inspires me. I can become filthy rich as a television minister. Sure I will be concerned with Bibles but you can bet I will be concerned with the bucks as well. Last year alone, television and radio evangelical programs accounted for 2 billion dollars worth of revenue. Sounds like a worthwhile profession to me. Well it sure beats being a poor street corner evangelist.

But let's use a little foresight. All of these television evangelists are battling for prime time. He who can afford it gets it. And what would be a better way to stir interest into one's religious show than controversy and best of all scandal. For example, let's examine Jim and Tammy Bakker's PTL club.

We all know that Jim was "wickedly manipulated" to enjoy an afternoon of sex. And as for Tammy, well she is doing just fine as asn outpatient of The Betty Ford Center. Unfortunately, Tammy took a great liking to prescription and over-the-counter drugs. Anyhow, their club, the PTL, controls the third largest amusement park in the world. Next to Disneyland and Disneyworld, the PTL's Heritage U.S.A. is the largest amusement park in the world. It averages six million visitors a year. Well, Heritage U.S.A. wanted to recreate England's Crystal Palace of 1851 at an expense of $100,000,000. The question was how could they finance such an undertaking when the PTL's annual revenue is only a mere 129 million dollars. In today's society, there is no better advertising than a scandal and that is what the PTL got. Jim's adultery and Tammy's drug dependency focused a great deal of attention to the PTL and somehow to the fact that Heritage U.S.A. needs 100 million dollars. Oh, if you are concerned about Jim and Tammy, they are doing just fine in their Palm Springs, California mansion.

I am abiding time just waiting for Godscandal II. I find it just as entertaining as the wrestemanias—and cheaper. The sobering thought that comes to my mind however, is one of these clowns running for presidency. A television evangelist at the helm of the U.S.A. Maybe, I am selling old Pat Robertson short. Who knows, he might solve the national debt by soliciting funds from his campaign supporters.

In all fairness, I suppose I should defend television evangelism to a certain degree. America was founded in order to avoid religious persecution. Religious liberty and freedom were essential to the original Fathers. And so it is in the Constitution of America. However, I find it difficult to imagine Jesus and his disciples collecting coins rather than saving souls.

In conclusion, I guess television evangelism is part of the American way. If you are too lazy to walk to Church, turn on your television and watch it. Why not enjoy Church in your own home? Dress like you want to and have a snack during the service. Only, do not let those clowns con you into feeling guilty. Do not let them exploit your feelings to the point that you support them financially, unless of course it is a tax write off. Instead, write them a nice letter, or say a little prayer for them. Be a good Christian and support them spiritually. Maybe then, these television evangelists will realize that they will have to make money the old fashioned way. Make them EARN IT!

FRANCO STUDENT UPRISING

A Story of Success

BY GREG ARCHER & MATT SANIDAS

In this issue, we would like to recap the problems and the events of the French student strikes of late November and early December of 1986. The main problem according to the demonstrators was a proposed plan of educational reforms proposed by Mr. Monory and Mr. Devaquet. It is our belief that the strikes were the direct result of the diverse political views that we discussed in our last article. Ideally, this article will present the problems as faced by both the government and the educational sector through a chronological over-view of the demonstrations and reactions that included the death of one student and the resignation of one of the ministers of education.

Beginning on November 22, sparked by earlier strikes in outlying areas of Paris, the students belonging to the "Independent and Democratic National Union of French Students" (UNEF-ID) met in the Richlieu lecture hall at the Sorbonne in order to unify all demonstrators with a rallying cry. The students were protesting for a number of reasons centered around the governmental reforms of the educational system. These reforms included:

1. Plans to lay off over 4,400 educational employees.
2. The shortening of the school week.
3. The elimination of a number of optional subjects.
4. The loss of status for primary teachers.
5. The shortening of vacations and later return to school after summer vacations.
6. The ruling majority's decision entrusting a member of the extreme right National Front, Jean-Claude Martinez, the job of overlooking the educational budget.
7. Universities have the freedom to set their registration fees within certain limits.

The students expressed their frustration at the lack of government concern over their well-being. They recognized many faults with the educational system and realized that the proposed governmental reforms would not remedy the ailing system. As a result of this meeting the students decided on November 27 as the day for an organized/unified national protest which would coincide conveniently enough with the National Assembly's debate on the proposed Devaquet reforms.

November 27 proved to be perhaps one of the biggest student protests in French history. It was estimated that over four hundred thousand students gathered in provincial cities while over two hundred thousand students demonstrated in Paris. As a result of these demonstrations, the Parliament postponed discussion on the proposed Devaquet reforms. In response to this statement, the national coordination of universities on strike called for another national manifestation on the fourth of December. At this point Prime Minister Chirac demanded a revision of the proposed reform concerning three problematic points as observed by the protestors: the rights of inscription, the selection and national character of the diplomas.

The success of the November 27 march was topped by the success of the December 4 demonstration where over 500.000 marched nationally behind their rallying cry. At this point, the demonstrators were supported by the CGT (Confederation General du Travail) and the FEN (Federation de L'Education Nationale). On the next day, the Minister of Education, Mr. Monory, took the matter into his own hands by reevaluating the proposed reforms. However, he also discussed new plans for the renovation of the various educational problems that, according to him, were very apparent. In reaction to this televised statement, the demonstrators commandeered the heart of the Sorbonne in Paris. This exploded into a violent clash between protestors and police officers where three students were injured and one student was killed by the peace keeping force.

On the sixth of December, the man responsible for the proposed reforms, Mr. Devaquet, turned in his resignation. Also, the education minister, Mr. Monory, hoped that the spirit of compromise would not be dampened by the recent demonstrations and waited for open discussions with student representatives concerning the problems that arose during this hectic period of French educational history and national unrest. On the eighth of December, Prime Minister Jaques Chirac decided to repeal the proposed reforms altogether in an effort to restore order to his country. This marked a victory for the protestors just as it did in 1968.

Even though Chirac calmed the possibly disastrous situation by repealing the reforms, he did not address the fundamental problems inherent in the educational sector. This coupled with other political faux pas has lowered the public view of Chirac and his party. One could argue that Chirac was the scapegoat for the faulty Devaquet reforms. In any case, he did stop any further confrontations between the demonstrators and the "peace keeping force" and should be commended for his actions. On the other hand, President Mitterrand enhanced his public image even though he only played a passive role during the public outburst. If one views these events from the outside, it is easily seen that French students seem to be more willing to fight with their lives for a cause they feel is just. This is not to say that American students are any different but we can obviously see that their protest brings about more substantial results. In view of past events on campus, it is evident that the students do not have the same amount of pull when trying to influence a bureaucratic body such as the Board of Trustees.

Perhaps, the success of the French demonstrators can be attributed to the diversity of political views in modern France. As we have mentioned before, France is populated by a diverse group of people in which each group, either racial or political, tends to have its own political ideals. Therefore, this would give the French students the freedom to express their beliefs. It is also necessary to note not only the unity between French students as seen by their demonstrations but also the respect they have for diverse movements. Hopefully, future student protests in the United States will be able to boast the same success as their French counterparts.

JUAREZ
A Lesson In Happiness

JOE HRBEK

By simply crossing the Rio Grande River (the der separating Mexico and the United States) by ans of a bridge, I entered a new and totally different rld. This past spring break, I ventured down to rez, Mexico, just south of El Paso, Texas.

To prevent what many call "culture shock," I was rned of the extreme poverty conditions in Juarez forehand. A friend told me, "You will see children und naked because they are so poor."

At first, it seemed as if what I had been told about it uld be true. Just upon entering El Paso, the view s stunning, yet horrifying. To the north stood ed the American city of El Paso, with its tall fice buildings made of rich brick and mirrored glass. slight turn of my head to the south brought me to ss on El Paso's extreme opposite: the town of arez. Missing were the beautiful buildings like in El so. In fact, Juarez virtually has no skyline at all. All at was visible were the dull-colored brick d cardboard shacks which littered the. untryside. The countryside was not bright and erry, but gray, like a desert.

I spent a week in Juarez. My purpose was to aid in e rebuilding of a deteriorating church in the Felipe geles section of town. The comments of my friends e the one I quoted above added to what I had eady pre-conceived about Mexican border towns. fortunately, such conceptions are widespread ong us "gringos." And, unfortunately, many of se conceptions are wrong.

First of all, we think the Mexican dream is to imately become American. A lot is said about the gal alien problem, and how so many Mexicans are ssing the border to enter our land of prosperity. is fact must be, we say, because of the Mexican ople's desire to either become like us, or one of us. If y aren't crossing the border, so also we believe, they whatever they can to Americanize themselves. They en to our music, copy our fashions, and copy

From moment number one after I entered Felipe Angeles, however, I realized these conceptions I had of the Mexican people were false. Before my foot could leave my car and touch Mexican soil, I was greeted by about twenty-five curious Mexican children, all speaking in their Spanish dialect to me. Ignorantly, my first reaction was to communicate with them in English, for surely they would understand it, I thought. But, I soon learned that none of them spoke any English. In fact, throughout the whole week I was there, aside from the vendors in the markets, which are predominarttly for American tourist use, I ran into only one or two Mexicans who even cared to try to speak English.

This fact is significant. Here I was, within walking distance from the United States of America, and the people that were around me could not even correctly annunciate the words "Ronald Reagan." Nor did they care to try. This reality carried over into all of the other aspects of their lifestyle. They did not sing tunes recorded by Madonna, or Huey Lewis after each meal, but ones of Hispanic heritage. The well-known "La Cu-cu-racha" was sure to surface, and of course it did. Their dress is similar to ours, but not close enough to even think that they might be trying to copy Americans.

Another misconception common in America is that the Mexican work ethic is less than that of ours in the United States. True, I met Antonio, 16, and Francisco, 15, both of whom did not attend school. When asked why they were not in class on a weekday morning, they replied "Porque no me gusta," (because I don't like it) or "Porque no quiero," (because I don't want to). But Antonio and Francisco were individuals, and they would have been the first ones to admit they were lazy.

Taken as a whole, however, the work ethic of the Mexican people puts Americans to shame. Five-and-six-year-old kids would grab my shovel away from me and take over my backbreaking job of mixing cement, not because I asked them to, not because they were told to, not because they even had anything to do with the church we were working on, but simply because they felt like helping me. The same was true with many of their fathers.

Moreover, in the community in which I stayed, the people must build their own houses. Thus, they are masons. They are carpenters. They are plumbers. In addition, they are automechanics. They are school teachers. They are bakers. They are farmers, and more. Few Americans can boast of such a wide repertoire of skills.

The greatest misconception of all, though, is that life in a Mexican border town such as Juarez cannot be happy. We tend to pity our neighbors to the south. Even our gestures of goodwill grow from our feelings of sorrow for them when considering their circumstances.

But instead of relying on multi-million dollar shopping centers, computer video-games, cable T.V., and other trinkets we rely on to have fun, they make do happily with less. The children there receive just as much enjoyment out of a deflated soccer ball as American children do with their shelves of fancy toys. For the teenagers, maybe instead of a night of dancing at a 3.2 beer club, which is common among Americans, the evening's events will consist of hanging around the folks and singing to the tune of dad's accordian or guitar. In sum, they may not have as much to have fun with, but they have as much fun.

Misconceptions can be poisonous. They can easily get in the way of our personal growth and development. Americans have many wrong conceptions of Mexican life. We see them as having very little, and this may be true. But the falsities lie in our belief that the number of material possessions is directly analogous with the degree of happiness. The community of Felpe Angeles, Juarez, Mexico proved to me that this equation is not trustworthy. Happiness does not lie in how much we have, but in the appreciation of what we have.

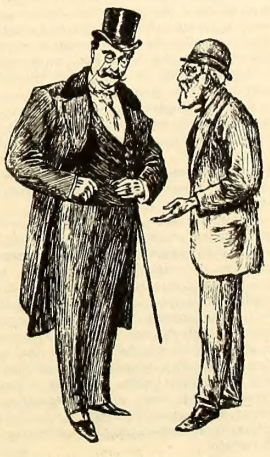
Brazil Writes a Blank Check

BY ROBERT JURKIEWICZ

Is it a game or is it politics? On Tuesday, March 3, 87 the Wall Street Journal reported that the country Brazil decided to halt all payments of its proximate $67 billion dollar foreign debt and about $ billion in short term credits and money market posits. So isn't this sort of deja vu considering mething to this extent happened in 1982 in Eastern rope? The Polish debt crisis. What is the United ates going to do in this situation? The U.S. and its nkers can do nothing but hope and pray that Brazil ll pay off its foreign debt. They have no leverage, hough they do have two choices. One is to give azil another shot at refinancing their loans and the her is to demand payment. Brazil on the one hand ll not pay its debt until it is able to reestablish some se of harmony within its economic society. So the uation calls for the bankers to attempt to refinance e loans; really what it means is just to give the azilians a nice gift. That is all the U.S. and its nkers can do for Brazil and her Latin American ends.

U.S. policy in the past has been to help support veloping nations in order to be able to stimulate pitalistic, anti-Soviet ideals. Why not? We can lend rd currency to these countries and in a sense we can ntrol their economies because their country is being ded by foreign capital. What a political ploy? But ll, there's more. Now that we have seen the Polish bt crisis and the Brazilian debt crisis and there are obably more to follow, haven't the tables been rned? Who has the edge? Certainly not the pitalistic giants; rather, it is the developing countries his world that now hold the cards that control our e. We are but mere pawns in the hands of these debt cken nations. One may ask the question, why did give loans to these developing nations? Politics, l or economics, depends on where you sit. Any nker that could have believed that with his loan the untry of Brazil or others like it would be able to me out of its depression within a short period of time st have been on drugs. The bankers of that day and were going on false statistics when countries such as Brazil predicted that their economies would grow from three to four percent yearly. The bankers never considered how politics would play in this, they were only concerned with the end result. But one cannot assume an end result if one does not understand the underlying facts of a government such as Brazil or Poland. Both countries are in a developing economic stage, although Brazil is much further along than Poland. Yet both have approximately the same goals. They were to expand the economy and export more than they imported. However what both countries failed to see was that to achieve an independent or self sufficient economy they would have to import better machinery and technology than they had from the West. So in the process of this cycle both countries achieved a high level of dependence on foreign—primarily Western—capital. As they imported more to achieve better exports they found themselves in the opposite boat. They had over-extended themselves on the credit and debt markets with no foresight to the fact that much more capital would be needed to achieve the goals previously set. The economies were not gaining three to four percent yearly.

That brings us to the present situation, where Brazil has over-imported and under-exported which led to an inability to pay its foreign debt. Let me add that this country is a major exporter in the world economy. It is the number one exporter of arms in the world. They will be able to pay their debt off soon. So why is the U.S. and its banks and the rest of the banking world on the edge of their seats? Because these developing countries have reversed their positions, they are now the kings of the game and no longer the pawns of the fuedal capitalistic money mongers. They have turned the tables on us, they hold all the cards. What if the U.S. and its banks demand their money? All Brazil has to say is "Hey, we're not going to pay and you lose $67 billion dollars, oh well." Yet if Brazil doesn't pay it is stuck with the possibility of never again borrowing from the West. But the situation now is not whether they will pay their foreign debt, but the question is when. All we can do is hope and pray that it will be soon because we are only pawns in a political contest; or is it a game show, no one is quite sure. But the hard facts are that the U.S. and other Western countries must realize that they no longer control the international debt crisis, but it is the countries in crisis that hold all the marbles. We must now face reality and hope for the best.



Works By Smith And Solzhenitsyn

BY BRIAN SMITH

This review will focus on Hedrick Smith's The Russians and an article by Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, Misconceptions About Russia Are A Threat To America. Solzhenitsyn and Smith provide firsthand insights about the Russian psyche and life inside the Soviet Union.

Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn begins his article by putting forth some strong introductory statements which have the effect of immediately capturing the reader's interest. One wants to continue reading to find out why "the West today finds itself in a deep crisis;" why communism is hostile to mankind and why coexisting "with communism on the same planet is impossible." Solzhenitsyn has, of course, experienced first-hand what life under communism is like.

Solzhenitsyn touches on several points and topics. He begins by stressing the complete difference between the U.S.S.R. and Russia. He rightfully states that Russia ceased to exist as an independent nation after 1917 and instead became part of the U.S.S.R. Russia is technically one of fifteen republics of the Soviet Union. The gist of Solzhenitsyn's article rests on two basic statements. First, he vehemently and continuously separates Russian and the Russian people from the Gulag of communism. He criticizes Western intellectuals for grouping the two together. Throughout his article, Solzhenitsyn writes (in a nationalistic tone) of 1000 years of Russian history. He writes of past Russian achievements in literature, the arts, and other cultural endeavors. He also briefly refers to the now-forgotten friendly relationship between the United States and Russia during the 18th century.

But more importantly, Solzhenitsyn speaks of communism as breaking the backs and destroying the souls of the Russian people and their splendid past. In his words, "Russian national consciousness today has been suppressed and humiliated...It is the unconsciousness of a man whose long illness has brought him to the point of death."

Solzhenitsyn's first argument leads into his second ominous point - namely that Western misperceptions about Russian history, its people and modern-day communism pave the way for the ruination of the Western world. He continually shows bitterness toward Western misperceptions of czarist Russia and the Russian people. Solzhenitsyn writes that czarist rulers were not nearly as oppressive as the modern-day Politburo, stating: "...the Kremlin leadership is immeasurably indifferent to and remove from the Russian people...whom, when the need arises, they will mercilessly drive to destruction in the millions."

Frankly, Solzhenitsyn is appalled at the West's past and present spineless actions, as well as our unrealistic and idealistic view of the Kremlin. He calls the notion of moderates in the Politburo a "myth." He also chastises the West for its silence, both during the butchery of the Stalin era and the continued repression occuring today. Solzhenitsyn goes so far as to say that the Western diplomats have aided and abetted the evil of communism to the point of no return. The only thing saving the West from disaster is the "rift" between China and the Soviet Union.

People living under the Soviet system have "a far shrewder understanding of the inhuman nature of communism" than Western politicians and so-called 'experts,' according to Solzhenitsyn. Past and present Russian nationalism does not necessarily correspond with love of communism or the Politburo's objectives. As he states: "It is not the average Russian who feels compelled to hold other nations captive, to keep Eastern Europe engaged, to seize and arm far-off lands; this answers only the malignant needs of the Politburo." Therefore, Western policy should change from past practices. According to Solzhenitsyn, the West should somehow ally itself with the Russian people and be completely distrustful of the men in the Kremlin.

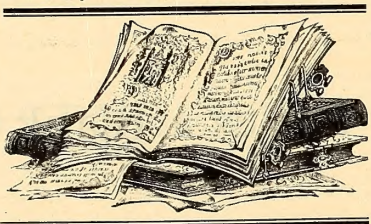
In essence, the West should ally itself with the oppresed Russian population (and others living under communist rule) by making sacrifices and confronting communism. (Confronting communism means forcibly stopping its existence, either internally or externally.) Solzhenitsyn believes that a policy of detente props communism up and propels its existence. He feels that the West should discontinue any policy of detente whatsoever, and instead engage in a 'hands-off' policy, so to speak. If the West stops assisting the Soviet Union and other communist countries, cutting them off economically, then conditions will eventually deteriorate to the point where those communist regimes will self-destruct from internal dissent.

Solzhenitsyn comes across as a Russian nationalist who bears an extreme hatred toward communism. Since he has experienced life first-hand in that worldly hell known as the Soviet Union, his points probably possess a certain degree of validity. His article served to reinforce my belief that American and European policy toward the Politburo has been less than successful. Western silence on past and present Soviet atrocities (the Ukranian famine, the war in Afghanistan, the massacres in Hungary and Czechoslovakia) is a disgrace.

But Solzhenitsyn loses credibility when he promotes autocracy over democracy. His call for autocracy coincides with his strong Russian nationalism; portraying himself as some embittered dissident who longs for a return to the days of czarist Russia. For those of us who are fond of neither authoritarianism nor totalitarianism, Solzhenitsyn almost completely discredits himself. He appears to allude to life in czarist Russia as simply outstanding, compared to life under totalitarian rule. I'm not sure if his comparison has all that much accuracy, however.

With regards to living standards, for example, I would venture to say that the Russian people enjoy a much higher standard of living than they had under czarist rule. They probably now enjoy less liberty than they did under czarist rule, but the various Russian czars were also oppressive. Joseph Stalin certainly had his counterpart in Ivan the Terrible. Perhaps czarist Russia would be less of a threat to world peace than the modern-day Soviet Union, but how can one prove this? Furthermore, I'm not sure if the Russian people would so willingly overthrow the present communist rulers and revert back to authoritarian rule, as Solzhenitsyn seems to imply.

In short, Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn certainly puts forth some valid points concerning Western 'blunders' vis a vis the Soviet Union. But his article concerns itself with emotional idealism rather than pragmatic realism. Solzhenitsyn writes of how things could and perhaps should be, rather than writing of how things really are. He yearns for days gone by, but the times for which he yearns will most likely never return.



Hedrick Smith, on the other hand, examines the Soviet Union as it really exists. Smith draws on his own personal experiences, relating to the reader almost every aspect of Soviet life. Unlike Solzhenitsyn's emotion-filled commentary, Smith's book is composed of reasonable objectivity. Yet Smith's book had more of an impact, at least on this reader, because one can see for himself how the Soviet system operates. Solzhenitsyn writes of the evils of communism; Hedrick Smith provides a first-hand glimpse of life inside the Soviet Union.

Reading The Russians, I couldn't help but feel a sense of anger, joviality, contentment and dumbfoundedness. My anger relates to the Soviet system itself - to the complete hypocricy and lack of individual human dignity found in the Soviet Union. The first two chapters of the book relate rather provacatively the real story of the Soviet system; a life of privilege for the few; a lack of basic consumer goods and minimum housing standards for the many. Of course those in the middle - mid-level bureaucrats for example - live neither the privileged lives of the elite party officials, nor the subsistence level of the working class. But isn't the raison d'etre of Marxism-Leninism to create an egalitarian, classless society?

When Smith devotes some time to discussing the oh-so-efficient agricultural sectors of the economy, one has to almost laugh. Is this the same economic system which, in the words of Nikita Kruschev, would 'bury' the West? The Soviet Union's collectivized system of agriculture is so inefficient that even though collectivized farms make up more than 99% of all farmland, only 73% of total Soviet farm output comes from the collectives. The rest comes from private plots (1975 figures).

To take another example of efficiency at its utmost, let's examine the Soviet industrial system. In Smith's book, one foreman described the typical month as divided into three 'decades' consisting of 10 days each. Thanks to the wonders of central economic planning, most enterprises don't have all the material they need for the first decade. Parts start arriving during the second decade, but operations do not go into full swing until the third decade. Optimistically, all the necessary supplies have arrived at the advent of the third decade and complete chaos takes place. "Immediate work starts in many sectors simultaneously," in order to meet the monthly quota put forth by the economic planners. Quality of workmanship takes a back seat during the frenetic pace of the third decade. Soviet consumers shy away from goods produced during the third decade, for they usually do not work very well. According to the forman, this erratic system is the norm rather than the exception.

These two examples displaying the inefficiency of the Soviet economy are not a mystery to either the elites or the masses. Those citizens with the privilege, power or cash shy away from domestic Soviet goods and instead buy either foreign or black market goods. Soviet citizens know full well the inferiority of scarce Soviet consumer products. That is why the black market exists - to fill in gaps and help meet pent-up consumer demand. Its G.N.P. is roughly one-fourth that of the regular economy, and it picks up the necessary slack.

The Soviet economy is absent of any incentive mechanisms whatsoever. In a nutshell, the economy's lack of incentives all go around in a circle. First, the leaders of the country who are in charge of the factors of production, channel the country's resources into heavy industry and the military. Consumer goods subsequently get shortchanged. At the same time, enterprise managers have very little autonomy and are essentially told to meet their monthly quotas. So where is the incentive to work productively? Usually a ceiling exists on wages and even when a worker manages to receive a raise or a bounus, there is not much that he/she can do with the money. Consumer goods are scarce. The ones which are available to the average Soviet consumer are shoddy because quality is not encouraged. The Soviet's so-called classless society isn't classless at all. The economic system is laughingly inefficient. But worst of all, a complete lack of freedom and liberty exist in the Soviet Union. Smith's book clearly shows that Big Brother is alive and well there.

Suspicion and secrecy prevail. People cannot read or say what they want. One can never be sure if the KGB or the police are listening or watching. Perhaps worst of all, Soviet citizens are only exposed to what the state wants them exposed to, in the way of music, art, drama, literature and overall education (call it indoctrination). What I found most ironic in The Russians was Smith's examples of the elites - the true believers of the faith - having greater access to a wider variety of literature, music, etc.

What is so dangerous about the Soviet state isn't the inefficient economic system, but the Orwellian nature in which the state operates. People who speak their mind put themselves in danger of persecution. And because the Party has control over the flow of information, the nightmare of control through one-sidedness and brainwashing turns somewhat into reality.

Contentment and dumbfoundedness entered my mind after reading The Russians. This book reaffirmed my belief of how lucky I am to be living in the United States. But my dumbfoundedness stems from the Russian people's total submission to its Orwellian, Big Brother apparatus. They obviously love their country, but do they love themselves as individuals? Lockean liberalism and Jefforsonian democracy obviously never reached Russia.

Russians may be better off materially than ever before but what about dignity? They see the hypocrisy and the complete lack of liberty, yet they present no willingness to challenge and change the way their government operates. In spite of reading The Russians - and remembering Smith's discussion of the humility, patience and insecurity of the Russian people - I cannot understand how the Russians (and Estonians, Latvians, Lithuanians, Georgians, etc.) can bear to live under their system. Moreover, I will never comprehend how or why the men in the Kremlin can live with their hypocrisy, as well as their inhumanity.

Holy Father: Did you catch Gord Whitaker's article on Page 4 ?

Whither Baby M

BY KARL OSSENTJUK

New Jersey has an additional claim to fame other than Bruce Springsteen. Worldwide attention was recently focused on Hackensack, N.J. as Judge Harvey "Best Interests" Sorkow read his decision in the controversial, 32-day non-jury Baby M. case. After decks of emotional publicity, commercial surrogacy is one step closer to being formally established as a legal way of acquiring babies. Judge Sorkow, presiding over the first test of a surrogacy agreement in an open trial, ruled sweepingly in favor of the biological father, William Stern, and against the biological mother, Mary Beth Whitehead.

Judge Sorkow's ruling was focused on two aspects of the case: the custody of Baby M., and the validity of the surrogate contract. The contract involved an agreement by Mrs. Whitehead to be inseminated with Mr. Stern's sperm and to give birth to a baby that would then belong to the Sterns. The Sterns were seeking such an arrangement because Mrs. Stern felt it would be unwise to have the baby herself due to her child multiple sclerosis impairment. Everything appeared to be hunky-dory—Mary Beth would make off with a keen 10 grand and the Sterns would have their Yup pup.

The Big Guy, though, was seemingly irked by the whole contractual affair, and decided to make matters difficult by having the kid come out healthy and adorable. Mary Beth found herself unable to hand over the little asset, and refused the agreed upon price tag on the newly delivered merchandise. (After all, a picture of a bunch of yellow flowers was now "worth" 10 million clams. Who could blame her if she sought to up the ante?) The dispute, though, revolved around custody, not monetary reward, and so the fate of the child was in the hands of the Almighty Sorkow. What was "best" for Baby M. was left solely to his interpretation.

Judge Sorkow rejected arguments that the contract might violate public policy or laws preventing baby selling, and declared the contract valid. He stated that a father cannot buy "what is already his." It was maintained by Honorable Harvey that the surrogacy option was protected under constitutional privacy guarantees that include the right to procreate. Sorkow specifically noted in the case that the contract was not automatically enforceable because when conflicts arose the "best interests of the child" are paramount. "Expert" witnesses were called to discredit Mary Beth's character, and expose the problems within the Whitehead household. The Whitehead's had experienced numerous financial setbacks (strike one). Her husband, Richard, was a refuse collector and had a history of alcoholism (strike two). And, it was discovered that Mary Beth, a high school dropout with two children, darkened her greying hair and could not remember the correct words to pat-a-cake (strike three).

The Sterns, on the other hand, were torn from the cover of Parents magazine. William "the Conqueror" was a successful biochemist (and a sharp dresser), and his wife, Elizabeth "the Great" was a pediatrician. (Golly Gee, Wally!)

Sorkow openly called Mary Beth "manipulative, impulsive and exploitive" as well as "untruthful" and asserted that she was overly possessive of her children. Best interests? Ah, yes. Judgment for the plaintiff in the amount of one innominate 12-month-old capital investment.

Almost three out of four Americans polled expressed support of Judge Sorkow's decision in the Baby M. case. The New York Times—CBS News Poll reported that 74% of the 1,045 adults interviewed by telephone from April 5 through 8 said the baby should go to the biological father, William Stern.

In an interview published in New Hampshire Sunday News on April 12th, President Ronald Reagan said he feels the New Jersey court decision regarding custody of the infant to her father was the right one. Asked why he backs up Sorkow's decision, Ronnie replied: "Well, (Ron's favorite word) an agreement has been reached...The agreement was violated by one party. The individual who had made the arrangement could not have a child otherwise. And the surrogate mother in this case can have a child at all and has had them, and it just seemed to me that it was wrong for her to then turn around and make the decision she did." Although Ronnie's response is as fuzzy-washy as we've all grown accustomed to, he touches on the key factor in this case—namely that an agreement was made between the two parties and Mary Beth openly violated that pact. The surrogate contract stipulated that Mary Beth would bear the child conceived by William Stern and herself, willfully give it to the Sterns, and accept the $10,000 agreed upon for her service. Mary Beth breached her contractual agreement as a surrogate mother. Regardless of the moral issues surrounding surrogacy, a case such as this should be decided within the framework of the law.

Unfortunately, history has shown that a judgment on such ethical issues is not that straightforward. Certain value judgments must be made in cases like the Baby M. case. The parties are battling for an "object," the child, that will be significantly affected by the decision, and yet she does not possess the ability to speak up on her own behalf. Consequently, the probable benefits to the child in the environment of each of the two opposing parties must be assessed and the best interests of the child must prevail. This was the criterion that Judge Sorkow utilized in his settlement of the Baby M. case. Sorkow concluded that the child's best interests would be served in the Stern household. Thus it was her best interests, and not the existence of a contract, that led him to award custody of Baby M. to William Stern.

Judge Sorkow tackled the value judgment concerning the custodial question in the case, but refused to address the broad philosophical issue of the ethics of surrogacy by ruling it out of order in his court. (Wise move, Harv.) The morality of womb-hiring, which is seen to place the emphasis on the father's genetic link, is a major concern of women's organizations in the United States. The plea from adoption agencies is that there are thousands of children, not newborn infants, that are in search of parents. Inquiries from infertile couples have increased since Baby M. publicity, and an estimated 500 surrogate births have already taken place in the short time span that such agreements have been in existence. About a dozen states have legislation on their books, with some of the bills setting out to legalize surrogacy and others to outlaw it. States are wrestling with numerous proposals, that include removing the profit motive or allowing a surrogate mother to change her mind up to a month after the birth. Within the next few years it appears as if state legislators will spend considerable time hashing out the surrogacy issue. The result will probably be several different rulings throughout the country on the legality of such agreements, and surrogacy will differentiate the states into "surrogacy states" and "anti-Baby M. states."

SMITH from page 1

Second, increase cooperation between businesses and academia. Obvious examples abound: businesses can provide more research grants for colleges and universities. Academic institutions can, in turn, serve as consultants to businesses and help business market jointly developed products. Businesses can also cooperate more with one another. The communications industry provides a perfect example of how inter-industry cooperations and knowledge-sharing have made the U.S. a world leader.

Third, we need more give-and-take between labor and management. Unions, as stated earlier, must become less concerned with milking management for everything and become more concerned with increasing productivity. Management, for its part, must cooperate more by listening to what non-managerial workers have to say and also providing a greater degree of autonomy.

U.S. workers must become more educated in general. Our educational system as a whole continually lags behind those of other developed countries. As a society, we must start seriously evaluating our educational institutions. Parents must play a greater role in their kids' education. I could go on but the solutions are obvious and so is the problem; we do not give education the role it deserves. If the American labor force remains less educated than everyone else, America will never compete effectively.

Finally, Washington must do three things: avoid the stupid, backfiring, cheap political scourge of protectionism, start adopting the concept of fiscal responsibility and put a halt to the damaging mergers and acquisitions wave which has swept corporate America. American policy-makers, if they really care about their constituents, will avoid the temptation of protectionsim and also begin to bring revenues more in line with expenditures. Threatening trade practices only serve to destabilize the world economy, hurt efficient U.S. exporters (while propping up inefficient U.S. industries) and drive consumer prices higher. Fiscal irresponsibility keeps interest rates artificially high and brings down our standard of living in the long run.

Furthermore, by putting greater restrictions on merger activity, our policy makers will do business a big favor. Managers can concentrate more on innovating and less on wondering whether or not their business will be taken over. If America wants to maintain and enhance its standard of living, then we as a society can do it. We only need adopt some different ways of doing things.

Please see related cartoon on page 8 . . .

WHO IS THE WINNER ?

FROM ABROAD

BY TODD J. ERICKSON

I know it's an overused cliche, but then it wouldn't be used if it weren't true. "I didn't know what I had until it was gone." I didn't think London, England would be different from Colorado Springs, USA. Yet with six million people living in its boundaries, London is one of the largest cities in the world. Tourists (like me!) come from all over the world to visit London—so it must be a civil place. Another cliche comes to mind at this point: "It is a nice place to visit, but I wouldn't want to live there [not even for five months—lucky for me that I'm spending one month in other parts of Europe.]"

The reason that I don't like living here is that this city has an attitude problem. And six million people simply cannot have an "Attitude Adjustment Party!" Simply put, Londoners do not like foreigners, especially those with American passports. Maybe it's a Revolutionary War hangup; defeat can be a tough thing to swallow. Whatever the reason, Londoners show a low regard for us. In Colorado Springs, I could walk down any street, come upon someone I had never seen before, say hello and smile, and in return I would receive a hello and maybe a smile, but some type of greeting at least. I never thought about it too much until I tried it in London. One person I greeted thought I was begging for money, another thought I was a gigolo, and a third just scowled and continued walking. The people of London are very introverted and don't seem to have time for silly things like being nice or courteous. Even the shopkeepers don't like us. I feel like they think they are doing me a favor when I buy something from them. Many times I have passed people and heard them mumble something about the "bloody Americans." And a few times in pubs I have been accused of causing all of England's problems—just because I am an American sitting next to a drunken Englishman.

When this happened, I tried to disguise my nationality by acting British. I wore drab clothes, never shaved, and drank a lot. I even faked a British accent for awhile. Then I realized that that might be the reason why the English despise us; I tried to act like one of them and be one of them instead of being myself. Now I wear my American college sweatshirts and my Super Bowl T-shirts as often as the dictates of clean health allow. I even shave every once in a while. It may sound like cheap patriotism to you, but it means an awful lot over here: I'm proud to be an American. And despite all of the current administration's problems about covert operations, budget deficits, and increasing trade imbalances, and even despite a couple of jokers named Pat Robertson and Oral Roberts (along with the other clowns of that circus), the USA is still the best country in the world. Be proud.

Todd is a Colorado College student currently enrolled in classes at Richmond College in London, England.

WHY GAY RIGHTS?

BY DAVE MAKARECHIAN

Gay rights at Colorado College.

Wear your blue jeans, it's just another cause—just another oppressed group...it's the liberal arts at its best, right?

Right. And that may be part of the problem. The liberal arts has had a tendancy to channel ones' views in a pre-decided direction, and to prevent an objective analysis of situations.

As a supporter of unlimited freedom for all members of society, and as one who views society as an objectivist—formulating my opinions by relying only on myself, and rejecting the brain washing slogans of politicians and spokesmen for special interest groups, I reject strenously to the term "gay rights."

But how can a live-and-let-die, I'll-mind-my-own-business-you-mind-yours type liberatarian object to the term "gay rights?"

Gay awareness at CC Fine.

Gay rights at CC. Not Fine.

Easy. I oppose any philosophy or code of ethics that bestows rights on groups of individuals because of certain characteristics the group may have. For one who views society as an objectivist, there is no such thing as "gay rights." There are only human rights.

A "right" is a morally defined, integral part of the foundations of society. Society, considered as a group of independent decision makers, cannot bestow rights. Independent decision makers have ostensibly defined the rights of our society in the liberal-western tradition, and freedom is our primary value. And since individuals in society build upon the foundations of the liberal-western tradition, one cannot expect to get a right. Individuals earn their own rights—by exercising their freedom, and by making their own decisions. Any individual, or groups of individuals, have morally defined rights—but no individual gains rights because of any particular characteristic that the individual or group has. There are not "gay rights"—there are only human rights.

But what about discrimination by individuals or organizations because of certain characteristics of individuals or groups of individuals?

It's silly, unrational, and distasteful. I oppose it, and I would never do it.

But to one who views situations objectively, and prescribes unlimited freedom for all groups in our society, I recognize that the freedom to make ones' own decisions includes all members of society. The freedom to choose ones' own sexual preference has equal value for homosexuals and heterosexuals. And the freedom not to discriminate has no more value than the freedom to discriminate. Individuals earn their rights by making their own decisions—and those are the only rights that as a society we should respect...not the rights of any group that professes to have rights simply because they demand recognition for a distinguishing characteristic.

And any group that demands such "unearned" rights are degrading themselves, and scoffing at the values of our society. Spurning the rights earned as individuals making decisions for themselves for "rights" granted for a collective twisting of the foundations of society is an admission that one is deserving of no rights. Society respects the rights of individuals. Only.

Gay awareness at CC. Fine.

Gay rights at CC. Not fine.

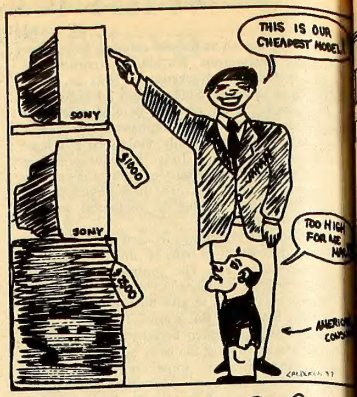
I don't care about what goes on in any bedroom but my own. But I do care about what goes on in our society. For the good of any movement, lets continue to earn our rights as individuals—and not to prostitute our perception of rights for the advancement of one particular group.



WHO REALLY FEELS THE PINCH?

So little depends Upon the Brown Shanties,
Smeared with Graffiti,
Besides the emerald pines

with apologies to
W.C. Williams

Fishin' Hat

BY JON-MARK C. PATTERSON

I have always wanted to write a real-folksy, down-home essay. Unfortunately, I'm not one of the city and I'm not one of the country—my family comes from somewhere in-between. Still, I looked for something down-home about me that I might tell everyone about. Perhaps I might share some simple wisdom that could straighten this ol' world out—like those columnists in the "G-T" do.

Well, "Live and Let Live," "I'm OK, You're OK," and "I'd Like to Teach the World to Sing" were all taken. But I soon hit on an answer. Let me tell you how it happened.

You know "Goober" on The Andy Griffith Show? The guy would have looked like Cary Grant next to my reflection.

I had just stepped out of my room one Sunday morning at about 11:59. I was too impatient to shower; I was hankering for some runny scrambled eggs. Not surprisingly, I was wearing a hat low over my eyes. This was not just any hat—it was one of my collection of fishing hats. I have three of them in various degrees of disrepair and various shades of red, white and blue.

This was the scene. At the moment I entered the hall, my waiting friends burst into laughter. Puzzled, I inquired about the nature of their mirth. Between gasps, they managed to point at my head and get "hat" out before they collapsed into giggles again.

I raced to the bathroom and looked in the mirror. I looked stupid. You know "Goober" on The Andy Griffith Show? The guy would have looked like Cary Grant next to my reflection. The flipped-up front brim added to the overall moronic effect.

Could you nuke a guy wearing a friendly fishin' hat?

I could barely stop laughing, but I managed to allow myself some contemplation. Then, the homily I had been looking for came into focus: The world would be a much better place if we all wore fishin' hats.

There's just something about the aura that a fishin' hat gives a person. The wearer is immediately perceived as decent and well-meaning. Look at Henry Blake on M*A*S*H. The guy couldn't remember his own name, but everyone loved him and was very sad when his plane was shot down. Heck, who knows what might have happened in 1984 if the Democrats had forgotten about the issues and had simply had Mondale wear a fishin' hat in front of the cameras.

Could you nuke someone wearing a friendly fishin' hat? International relations would be a cinch, and the whole world could kick back, drink a few beers, and watch a baseball game or two. No one could be uptight or unfriendly or unfair while wearing a fishin' hat and dealing with other loose, friendly, honest, fishin'-hat-wearin' folks. Peace and harmony would reign, and humanity could advance to a final destiny of total understanding.

OK—so Andy Rooney I'm not.

Don't do that!

The Eye will be back again next week!

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter to the College Community From The President

To the Editor:

In recent days a shameful notice, "Students Against Unnatural Sex Acts," was posted on campus. In addition to being shameful, it was cowardly (those who wrote the notice did not identify themselves), and it was close to illiterate with misspellings and near-malapropisms). I assume that the flyer appeared in response to Gay Awareness Week activities.

During the same period of time one of the public sculptures on campus was vandalized, and a shanty constructed by the pro-divestment activists was demolished. In a recent letter to the Catalyst, a student charged that the Board of Trustees had chosen to kill Black South Africans by its decision not to divest.

Last spring, posters which announced meetings for the discussion of the proposed termination of the Business/Economics major were destroyed. And, a student employed by the College to post notices about campus events was harassed by other students, ostensibly because among the notices were ones related to the "Out and About" group.

While some of these acts could have been performed by "outsiders," the evidence suggests that there are members of the College community who cannot tolerate, in acceptable ways, differences of opinion.

The time has come for me, as President of the College, to condemn these incidents and charges which are antithetical to the values of a liberal arts and sciences college. The values in question are pluralism, openness to a diversity of beliefs and values, a commitment to rational discourse and inquiry, opposition to force and intimidation, and the relationship of adversaries in good faith.

The arrogance of certainty is a state of mind which is unacceptable within an educational community.

The rejection of others because they are different cannot be a part of an institution which believes that diversity contributes to creativity and the search for truth.

Acts of violence—verbal or physical—and vandalism cannot be embraced as appropriate responses to disagreement in the place of reasoned discourse.

The understandable need to act on our beliefs and values cannot undermine the very community which makes possible the kind of critical inquiry which has brought us together.

Arthur Koestler, author of Darkness at Noon, reflected on his seven-year participation in a "true believer movement": "—to be able to see several aspects of a problem and not only one, became a permanent cause of self reproach. We craved to become single—and simple-minded. Intellectual self-frustration was a simple price to pay for achieving some likeness to Commrade Ivan Ivanovich."

And in the same vein the Italian novelist, Ignazio Silone, wrote: "What struck me most about the Russian Communists, even in such really exceptional personalities as Lenin and Trotsky, was their utter incapacity to be open in discussing opinions that conflicted with their own. The adversary, simply for existing to contradict, at once became a traitor, an opportunist, a hireling. An adversary in good faith is inconceivable to the Russian Communist. What an aberration of conscience this is, for so-called materialists and rationalists absolutely in their polemics to uphold the primacy of morals over intelligence! To find a comparable infatuation one has to go back to the Inquisition."

Koestler and Silone are worth quoting, not because they are critical of the Communist Party of the 1930s from which they were cast out, but because they remind us of values which are central to our very existence: being able to see several aspects of a problem and not only one; fairness in discussing opinions which conflict with our own; the ability to relate openly to adversaries in good faith; and the application of intelligence to moral dilemmas.

I call on all members of the Colorado College community to join me in condemning acts of provincialism, violence, and arrogance. And, in keeping with our tradition I ask you to reaffirm the primacy of tolerance for diversity, informed discussion about complex issues, and patience with regard to institutional change when there are profound divisions of opinion within the community.

Gresham Riley
President

Discrimination and the Bylaws

To the Editor:

Some of the questions I have been asked concerning the petition that was circulating during Gay Awareness Week have compelled me to write this letter. Two questions have come up over and over again, first "Is there really discrimination against gays and lesbians at CC?" and secondly "Will putting a clause in the Bylaws saying that no one will be discriminated against on the basis of sexual orientation really do anything?"

The discrimination against gays and lesbians on campus is pervasive, but incidents are rarely reported due to the fear instilled by the very homophobia which causes such discrimination. For example, the woman who hung up the posters for "Out and About" was physically harassed while hanging up posters, was followed home, and received threatening phone calls. These posters announcing the "Out and About" group have been blatantly torn down all year long preventing those who might benefit from attending the group, and thereby hindering the gay minority in developing solidarity. An RA who suspected two women of being lesbians wanted them to move off her wing. The "Out and About" group recently held a potluck to which gay alumni, faculty and support staff were invited. Many members of the support staff, and faculty were afraid to come despite the fact that the potluck was not during working hours, for fear it would have job repercussions. Intolerant attitudes which led to such incidents have been further reflected in the perverse and extremely inaccurate depictions of gays in the Catalyst, on posters and by professors in the classroom.

Further discrimination is shown by the very fact that most people feel it would have been better for the "Out and About" group to remain quiet rather than "making their sexuality an issue." I have heard people say repeatedly that Gay Awareness Week merely made an issue where there was never a problem before. This is a direct denial of the most pervasive discrimination on campus: the erasing of consciousness of gay issues; the absence of any discussion of the gay minority in the classroom, even in classes in which the subject matter deals with discrimination and civil unrest; the absence of programming aimed to include both gay and straight people in the residential halls, etc. Those people who feel that there is no discrimination on campus need to ask themselves whether they have ever seen two men walking along holding hands. Do you really believe that there are no gay male couples on campus? Why should gay couples be forced to hide their affection where their straight counterparts are not?

Adding a clause which clearly states that the Colorado College will not discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation will provide a measure of protection for gays and lesbians, and may help to challenge certain homophobic attitudes on campus. A similar petition went before the Board of Trustees last year, but was rejected on the grounds that such a clause wasn't required by law. This is the very reason that such a clause is needed—it would provide gays and lesbians with necessary legal protection not guaranteed by Colorado state law. In addition, gays and lesbians who are considering coming to CC or seeking employment here will be more apt to consider CC seriously if they feel our school provides the type of protection necessary to live their lives comfortably. Above all, foresight needs to be a consideration in our deliberation of this clause. Considering the tremendous increase in homophobia we are now experiencing in our society we may well witness a significant rise in violence against gays and lesbians on campuses—shouldn't we try to prevent such violence at CC?

The question of whether or not to add this clause to the Bylaws will go up again before the Board when they meet in June. It is therefore necessary that we get a large percentage of the college community to sign the petition before this meeting. The petition will be circulating in the dorms and there will be a copy in the student center as well. I urge everyone to sign the petition, so that gays and lesbians at CC will no longer have to remain the invisible minority in order to enjoy the personal security which all members of this community should have the right to enjoy.

JILL SCHWAB

Fight Against Discrimination

To the Editor:

The struggle against oppression is far from won. I am continually becoming more aware of the accuracy of that statement. Those who work to create, as Dr. John Boswell called it, "a world more tolerant of differences" have become the victims of hostility and harassment. I cannot believe the negative, intolerant, and repulsive reaction to Blue Jean's Day, in coordination with Gay Awareness Week, by a group calling itself Students Against Unnatural Sex Acts. I cannot believe that such minds exist that would form such a group. But they do. And that is why I must write this letter. That is why we all must fight against discrimination. It is time that we, as individuals and as a community, speak out against intolerance.

This group assumes that what is "normal" and "natural" to some persons should be "normal" and "natural" to everyone. This universalistic viewpoint is wrong. The terms "normal" and "natural" are both relative and indeterminate. A belief that is based on conformism to "normalcy" or "naturalness" is invalid. Rather, we should appreciate one's opposition to conformism.

Although one does not choose to be homosexual, just as one does not choose to be heterosexual, one can choose to fight against the discrimination exemplified on this campus and in the world. One who makes that decision should not only be tolerated but supported and applauded. We are a community of differences. Let's respect that.

Sincerely,
Patsy Thimmig

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETER LOACH, News Editor
DAVID EVANS, Features Editor
MUNIR MEGHJEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETER SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Cutler Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 extension 673. The Catalyst is printed on recycled paper monthly from September to May, except during holiday periods.

Cutler Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its education programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local laws.

Editorials appearing on the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 600 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Rastall Center, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

A work of considerable length may be submitted as a guest commentary. Persons interested in submitting commentary should contact the Catalyst at 632-4999 or 473-2233 ext. 673.

The Catalyst reserves the right to edit or cut letters to the editor and guest commentaries.

OPINIONS

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Gay Awareness

To the Editor:

By the time this letter comes out in print, the uproar over Gay Awareness Week will have subsided. The persons who provided us with the most blatant outward expression of prejudice against the Gay men and women on our campus will have returned to their ignorant, homophobic worlds. The unsigned posters they hung listing what they deemed as points proving the "unnaturalness" and "disgustingness" of homosexual relationships will, with any luck, have disappeared from the walls of CC's buildings.

For Colorado College's homophobics, life will have returned to normal. Once again they can return to their "faggot" and "dyke" jokes, and continue to deny that there are any gay people at The Colorado College. They will continue to deny that they are friends with any gay persons, that they know any gay people, or God forbid, that any gay man or woman may even live next door.

For the gay population on our campus, quite possibly as many as 200 men and women, life may return to normal, also. They may continue to feel the necessity to remain annonymous, in fear of the blatant prejudice on the CC campus. Prejudice like the scrawling of "FAG" all over the Gay Awareness Week posters throughout campus. Prejudice like the tearing down of more than 20 Awareness Week posters in Loomis Hall. Prejudice like the "alternative" signs provided by CC's homophobics. Prejudice so strong that Out and About meeting times and places must be kept secret for fear of harassment.

It is my hope that the gay population will not have to return to their normal lives. I hope that the outstanding events sponsored by the CC gay community and supporters will have opened the eyes of some of those who had, out of ignorance, daily attacked, and belittled their fellow students and faculty. I hope that the overwhelming number of people who attended the film "Parting Glances" and/or John Boswell's lecture of "Jews, Gay People, and Bicycle Riders" will speak out to others and attempt to destroy the myths and irrational fears of the homophobic population. For those people who express anger, believing that it was manipulative to choose blue jeans on Friday to show support for Gay Rights, I feel compelled to comment.

How did it feel on Friday to wake up, grab for your favorite jeans, the ones you would normally wear, the ones you wanted to wear, and then to remember that wearing jeans on Friday meant that you supported Gay Rights? You knew that if you wore jeans people would look and wonder "is that man or woman gay?" You were probably most uncomfortable —you knew what you wanted to do, but maybe you felt pressure to do something else, like wear a suit or a dress. My guess is that that feeling was similar to the one gay students and faculty feel everyday.

Everyday they, too, probably want to act naturally, to not need to hide, but in order to protect themselves from comments, stares, and harassment they must continue to struggle. Thanks to those who planned blue jeans day. For one day the rest of us were forced to deal with a small sample of the pressure you feel each day.

I encourage the CC community to take a stand against discrimination and prejudice on our campus. Therefore, I encourage students, faculty and alums to support the addition of sexual orientation to the non-discriminatory clause of Colorado College.

Michelle Chalmers '89

Respect for Art

To the Editor:

People sometimes feel envious of visual artists, because artists are seen as living free from many restrictions concerning behavior, dress, and attitudes that are imposed on other elements of adult society. Artists are frequently looked upon as child-like, existing in a seductive fantasy world of color, form, and unrestrained emotional expression. These opinions come as a surprise to most artists, who find it necessary to be enormously self-reliant, disciplined, and resilient in the face of wide spread misinterpretation and occasional hostility.

This fact has recently been brought home emphatically for our art students. The vandalism to a sculpture installed here as part of an outdoor sculpture show was extensive enough to require removal for repairs. At the same time, an identification sign accompanying a senior art show fell victim to obscene graffiti. Within the last few weeks, a lithograph was stolen from a senior major's show in Packard Hall, while another student's work was stolen from a Tutt Library display. These incidents have understandably shocked our students, who find it difficult or impossible to believe that their work could elicit an illegal or violent reaction. Those of us with more experience are also upset, but realize that such behavior is unfortunately predictable.

It would be convenient to shrug off these events, attributing them to traditional spring high spirits. This would ignore an underlying and more serious dilemma. As a society, the United States has cared little about visual matters in its history, and we pay a heavy price for this ignorance. On a large scale, we must endure a manmade landscape that often inspires aggression, tension, and isolation. On a small scale, we condone the regular belittling and occasional destruction of art. It would be inconceivable that a senior thesis in history would be vandalized, and if it were, it could presumably be retrieved on the computer. When we destroy a work of art, we irreversibly extinguish something unique.

Art students at CC now realize that what they do is of real consequence, even though the reaction may be inappropriate and hostile. I also hope that the larger community appreciates that respect for art is an essential, rather than peripheral issue.

Sincerely,
Carl Reed
Chairman, Art Dept.

Problems with the 8-Block Plan

To the Editor:

I'm writing in response to the article "Eight Block Technicalities Considered" in the 10 April, 1987 issue of the Catalyst. I don't see how CC could be moving toward an eight block year if the "technicalaties" were truly being considered.

(1) Availability of non-block learning experiences... This is presented as if it were a favor to the students. But we chose CC because of the block plan. We could have gone to any other school in the world (except Cornell in Iowa) if we were looking for non-block learning experiences!

(2) Development of rigorous independent study, semester and year-long seminars and lecture classes, and collaborative research opportunities. This works against the main idea behind the block system—that it is good to concentrate on one class at a time and eliminate all outside distractions. The Eight Block Plan will seriously compromise the principles on which the Nine Block Plan is based.

(3) Protection of both students and faculty from excessive and unequal overload. While it is true that the year will be shorter, it must be pointed out that the daily pressures on both students and faculty will be increased. It is these daily pressures which have caused a new system to be proposed. How can the Eight Block Plan expect to be successful when it is intensifying the most serious drawback of its predecessor?

(4) Continued commitment to the teaching of block courses. It would be a much stronger commitment to block courses if CC would reinstate its nine block year! The Eight Block Plan is a strong step toward a semester system since it will place much more importance on the roles of semester and year-long adjuncts.

(5) Affirmation of the unique character of a CC education... Once again it would be a stronger affirmation if the system were left alone. The class size will increase under the Eight Block Plan and it will be more difficult to get into required courses. Some courses required for major will no longer be offered every year, so the student will be more restricted in scheduling his/her courses.

Students and faculty have been pointing out some of the major difficulties associated with a nine block year. These drawbacks are inherent to any block system. The Eight Block Plan will create new problems for students and faculty, but will not solve any of the old problems.

Christopher Moon

Michael S. Mehan
The Bottom Line

Arms Control Makes Europeans Nervous

The possibility that the United States and the Soviet Union will be able to negotiate a treaty, banning medium range nuclear missles and short range, tactical nuclear weapons in Europe has the NATO countries, especially Britian, France and West Germany, more than a little nervous. It seems that the Europeans sincerely desire arms control until it becomes a reality.

Our faithfull allies may take heart in the fact that with all the hype about bugged embassies and traitorous Marines, the talks in Moscow this week between George Shultz and Soviet leaders went nowhere. As is becoming the pattern, General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev handed us yet another arms control proposal, in which he stressed a nuclear free Europe and the strictest measures of verification, and Secretary of State Shultz packed up the proposal in his brief case and said the United States would examine it. In other words, we have once again rejected a new Soviet proposal.

The Europeans originally wanted the American missles in Europe as a deterence to the growing Soviet/Warsaw Pact conventional weapon superiority. The Europeans questioned whether or not the United States would be willing to sacrifice its own territory in defense of Europe by launching its InterContinental Ballistic Missles against the Soviet Union in the case of an invasion from the east. However, now the political needs of a beleagured President Reagan seem to overshadow the defense needs of Western Europe, causing a bit of hyper ventillation among our NATO allies.

What would a treaty encompass, as now proposed by the Soviet Union? It would call for the elimination of all medium range nuclear missles, those with a range of about 600 to 1,500 miles, from Europe. The Soviets and the US would remove and dismantle their existing forces and shut down facilities in each nation the build such weapons. Also included in the deal, now, is a proposal to eliminate all tactical or battlefield nuclear weapons, those with a range of about 100-500 miles, from Europe. This has remained a point of contention due to the Soviet edge in numbers in tactical weapons, and now Gorbachev has sweetened the deal by placing them on a block with the medium range missles.

If a treaty was signed, then the Soviets would eliminate about twice as many missles as the United States, they would have eliminated an entire weapons option, they will have lost a military edge against NATO, and the removal of nuclear weapons from Europe could mean relaxation of tensions between the US and the USSR and progress in other areas of arms control. Therefore the Soviet proposal is attractive to the US.

However, if we remove the missles then we leave Europe open to superior Warsaw Pact conventional forces and uncertain about US commitments to defend them.

For forty years now we have "protected" the Europeans. In all the talk about deterence and impending Soviet invasions of Western Europe, we tend to forget that both France and Britain have their own nuclear capabilities. Britain has a submarine fleet comprised of old Polaris missle subs and new Trident submarines all carrying trident missles. Fun fact on the Trident: one Trident nuclear submarine is capable of knocking out every city in the Soviet Union with a population greater than 100 thousand. The French have a nuclear force of over 150 missles.

They have their own nuclear capability, however, the question is do we want France and Brittan to become large nuclear forces? Do they want to and can they afford to? Then again, as US taxpayers, we must ask ourselves, isn't it time the cheapskate Europeans protected their own skins? How long should we foot the bill for them? Missles are not cheap, you know. Secretary of State Shultz said we would make no commitment until we discussed the new Soviet proposal with our allies. But what kind of allies are they? They constantly bad mouth the US, they murder us on the international markets, they buy our currency, increasing our budget deficit, they do not support our policies world wide. Also remember, the French would not allow US planes to fly over them when we struck Lybia a year ago, and they protested the missles in the first place. And now they want them. I mean, who needs them, right? We spend hundreds of millions each year to provide military protection for them while they take our money they save and use it to bury us economically, some allies.

If signing an arms control agreement means furthering US-Soviet relations, making our President look strong, opening the way to other arms control areas, and saves us money, why not sign it?

However, we do not want a treaty for treaty's sake. We must look at all aspects of any arms agreement. If removing nuclear weapons leads to a more unstable Europe, as our allies quiver from the distant rumble of Warsaw Pact tanks, throwing NATO all higgledy-piggledy, then it may not be worth it. We have to think whether we want to help relations with the Soviet Union at the cost of hurting them with our allies.

We should weight any agreement very carefully. A nuclear free Europe is the first step in a nuclear free world, therefore, we should not pass by the opportunity to negotiate a deal with the Soviet Union. There may be a time to put US-Soviet relations above the bickering of the European allies, and it may be time for our allies to "grow up."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Faith And Tragedy

the Editor:

his column of last week, Dave Makarechian drew oral parallels between the religious and political t. I wish here to register several complaints about article and to treat the issue at a less superficial of understanding.

ly first complaint is with the tenor of the article, ecly Makarechian's evident relishing of the dal. Certainly, there is tremendous irony in the dal and as a long-time critic of the electronic urch, I must say that I am somewhat pleased to see exposure of a corrupt ministry — a ministry that gan with humility or at least sincerity before falling the abyss of selfishness. On the other hand, as a stian, I am dismayed by the unfavorable light that th of the electronic church and the present scandal w upon the Christian faith. Indeed, Makarechian to treat these issues with the kind of sensitivity deserve. Critics who revel in the scandal put nselves in the same chair of hypocrisy that they demned Jim Bakker for occupying; in faulting kker and others for self-righteousness those critics nselves now evidence self-righteousness.

econd, Makarechian's treatment of Pat Robertson ccurate and unthoughtful. Makarechian strongly ntifies Pat Robertson and his ministry with the e dubious endeavors of Bakker, Jerry Falwell, my Swaggart and Oral Roberts. Such an ociation is not entirely well-founded, however. For ance, when interviewed concerning the scandal, bertson replied something to the effect of: "Christ is doing a bit of house cleaning. I'm glad to see it."

Such is a healthy view, a view which recognizes the problem but acknowledges the essential integrity of the Christian faith. Moreover, Robertson's audience is less than fifty percent of that of the other evangelists and it stands to reason that his income is proportionally less than the other evangelists'. Yet, Makarechian cites Robertson's audience as 468,000 (and lists Roberts' and Schuller's audiences as 1.1 and 1.7 million viewers respectively), but does so with the misleading phrase "worst of all." Robertson is hardly the worst offender.

One further note; while Robertson certainly is not the best (or even viable if we are to consider his lack of political experience) candidate for president, he does have a Yale Law degree and has chosen to try to be president, rather than trying to influence the presidency clandestinely. Again, we note the important differences between Robertson and the other evangelists mentioned.

The point I wish to make regarding this mistreatment of Robertson is not necessarily in support of the Robertson ministry, but to emphasize that the evangelical movement is a wide and varied one, one that does not easily lend itself to generalization. It is a dangerous fallacy to speak of the evangelical movement as a monolithic and coherent whole. In his discussion of the scandal, Makarechian commits this fallacy and in so doing seems to project the corruption of the Bakker scandal onto the Christian faith as a whole. Makarechian thus fails to recognize that a large strain of the evangelical movement is not only not pro-Reagan, but is rather politically liberal as well.

Third, Mr. Makarechian portrays the political right as a simple pawn of the religious right. While a certain (in some ways strong) connection exists, I submit that the religious right and the political right have been victims of one another. All too often, the Reagan administration has used religious sympathies for wholly political purposes, a practice which has been equally detrimental to democracy and Christianity.

Certainly, the present scandal — and the scandal of the electronic church generally — is distressing. And unfortunately, it is the whole of the Christian faith which will suffer for the faults of a few. I wish to close by drawing several lessons from the scandal.

Most importantly, we must remember that putting faith (in the most serious sense) in a human being is extremely dangerous, whether that person is a religious or political figure. A faith placed in a human being is a misplaced faith which will inevitably be disappointed or lead to great ill. Second, we note the frailty of all individuals. Indeed, humanly speaking, Bakker and company are not to be ridiculed but pitied. Their activities are truly sorrowful when viewed from a thoughtful position.

Third, we see how not to deal with the problem of sin. Bakker should have never denied his doings. Rather, seven years ago he should have come forward and confessed his sin to the church and to his constituency. Though it might have caused a shake up at the time, a confession would have been the biblical response and would have illustrated the fallability of human beings and the need for grace of all, even the 'pious.'

In the end, we see that the real correspondence between the religious and political right is not the predominance of "reaction over reason" as Makarechian writes. Such a term is itself unreasonable, for reactionary or conservative movements can certainly be reasonable. Ultimately, the correlation lies in the fact that both the religious right and the political right are ideologies. And once a body establishes itself beneath an ideology, it makes maintenance of the ideology the primary goal — or god if you will — rather than truth. It was the need to maintain ideology that led the Reagan Administration into the frivolity of the evident Iran-contra cover-up, and it is the maintenance of ideology which has kept Jim Bakker from publicly professing his guilt for seven years. The thing to learn, as theologian Dietrich Bonhoeffer intimates in his Cost of Discipleship, is that we can put our faith neither in individuals nor in ideologies.

—Todd Breyfogle

Victor Greto

The Perfect Laundromat

orced to do my clothes at the local laundromat the er day, I was compelled to ask myself several estions about them: why is it that all laundromats the same? Is there a rule somewhere out in space, or their rules which state that the lights have to be so awful bright? Or that in all probability (there are exceptions) a washing machine or grinning dryer eat one of your quarters? Or that you must see the of American domestic life in them, from old women curlers in their hair, to young harried women with ming children, to the single guys with open tondown shirts and hanging phallic chains? And about the person in charge? Must he or she ys be fat, have straight, greasy hair, and be eating ething?

amazes me how the idea of a laundromat applies so readily to the concept of the perfectibility of ence, or man. Does it amaze you too?

et's just look at the facts. From Greece's Platonic through to Christian theologians of today, fectibility" has been a prime goal, a goal worthy of constant attention and attainment. The pre-atics, like old Homer, had, I think, the best idea: created gods as fallible as the pitiful human beings worshipped them; they were immortal, yes, they a great deal of power, sure, but they were not scient, all-powerful, you know, like the Wizard of they weren't perfect. Yet along came Plato who ed about the Forms of things and how "reality" imply these ideal Forms' shadows, and then we into trouble. The soul of a human being, Plato was "like the Forms," and to perfect himself man first subdue his body—through the exercise of on—to reach the "Form of God." However, not yone could reach this level of perfection; only e Souls who had undergone a hard and prolonged ation: you know, the elite. "Ordinary" people t be able to attain "civic goodness," but not fectibility.

sus told us to be perfect (Matthew 5:48), and , the Alexandrian who was instrumental in ding the Jewish tribal, jealous personal god, ehh, the metaphysical power and vision of the k philosophers, made perfection attainable to Christians through faith, grace, and later, with Aquinas, through the balanced combination of faith and free will, that is, if you only committed venial and not mortal sin.

So what, you're saying? What your worm's eye view of the history of the concept of "perfectibility" have to do with laundromats? Hang on a minute.

Pretending I was Plato, I thought about what could be the "perfect laundromat." What was the "laundramatness" of laundromats? Did the nature of laundromats, its soul, if you will, demand there be such bright lights? That there be lonely, sincle people who frequented them, mothers with screaming children, men with open shirts...? And with those lights must we see every skin flaw on our fellow human being's countenance?

Another example: what is the "perfect" man in our society? A homeless vagrant who wanders the streets looking for jobs, shelter, a pitance of self-respect, and huh?

OH LIGHTEN UP I SAY PUT MORE RELIGION IN U.S. HISTORY CLASSES
God Out of Schools
MORE ABOUT PURITANS HANGING QUAKERS...
...CHRISTIAN WHITES LYNCHING CHRISTIAN BLACKS...
CPS
...PROTESTANTS RIOTING AGAINST CATHOLICS...
...AND ALL OF US KEEPING JEWS OUT DURING WORLD WAR II.
WITHOUT RELIGION THERE'D BE NO ATHEISTS.
Gospel of Schlomb

unemployed mother of three? Well, no. How about an ambitious type businessman who plays with stocks, carries a briefcase (one of the newer ones with all those technological safety features), goes home to a wife—just about every night—watches television, reads the paper, says a prayer on Christmas and Easter, kisses the kids goodnight and then falls asleep? We're getting warmer, aren't we?

"Perfectibility," in any non-metaphysical sense, is the art of fitting oneself harmoniously into a greater whole, becoming, so to speak, a tool, which helps the greater machine of society work as smooth and as free of kinks as possible. "In American Society, you, sir, are a perfect citizen"—a compliment? Perhaps.

Thus, without its metaphysical baggage (which is very hard for us to release or lose at the airport) "perfectibility" a relative state which may only exist in one person's mind (or others so uniformly inclined) during one moment of time, supported by all his assumptions, prejudices, loves, hatreds, feelings and thoughts. Perhaps just a bit in need of qualification. The next time you hear the word "perfect," quickly ask yourself: "for what purpose? according to whom?"

So, can a laundromat be any more perfect than the way they are now? For me, no way. Just the other day, drying a mountain of clothes, just for the hell of it, I gazed at my reflection in the glass of the dryer. First I just watched the clothes tumbling round and round; actually, considering where I was, it was quite exciting. But then I looked into my own eyes, at my own face. And with that bright light shining so unflinchingly, I saw each pore and wrinkle and leftover acne my face contained.

O humility! What more perfect lesson to be learned in such a place, then that one is like another in all one's flaws and loneliness—it was a lesson Plato would have blushed at too.

Dave Makarechian's column did not appear this week due to limited space. His column will grace the Opinions page again next week.

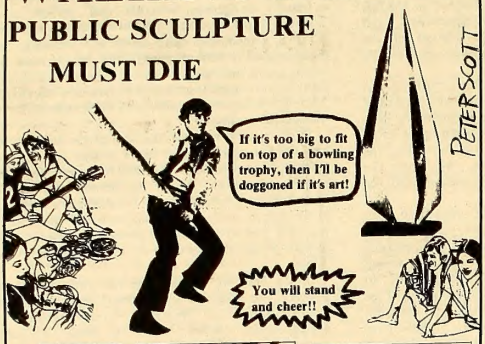
—Opinions Editor

The Latest Threat To Clean Living College Americana May Be Big Enough To Ruin A Perfectly Good Lawn,

But Sheriff Buford Pusser's Bat Is Bigger!

WALKING TALL IV:

PUBLIC SCULPTURE MUST DIE



STARRING

GOD HIMSELF

COLD HEARTED COMMUNIST ARTISTS

LUSTY MOBS OF FREEDOM FIGHTERS

GATES SHOWTIME SERIES

The McLain Family Band

Appearing in 62 countries and 50 states, the McLain Family Band teams up with the Colorado Springs Symphony for a night of knee-slappin', toe-tappin', downhome BLUEGRASS music.

IN PERSON!
Friday, April 17 8:00 p.m.
Pikes Peak Center
Tickets from $5 to $25

Symphony Box Office
1014 N.Weber
633-0333

Pikes Peak Center
190 S. Cascade Ave.
520-SHOW

For Group Rate Information Call the Symphony Box Office.

Richard Frohock and Cornelia Forster-Gress in Romulus the Great, a German play in German.

Three Shows This Week; Theater Workshop Kept Busy

After a successful calander year whicl culminated with the impressive production A Sampler of American Musical Theatre, Theatre Workshop elected a new board in February to serve for 1987.

Under the direction of chairperson Rob Peck, secretary/publicist Lisa Lane, treasurer Brigid McBride, technician Michael Broh and an outstanding board, TW is sponsoring three current performances in addition to the playwriting contest which should produce a show for ninth block.

And Miss Reardon Drinks a Little, by Paul Zindel, is in its second and final week of performance. Directed by Nina Essman, this poignant social comedy opened in Cossitt "C" to a healthy audience. This weekend it plays in Gates Common Room (both Friday and Saturday) at 8:15 p.m. The performances last weekend received excellent reviews from various CC critics-at-large. The show, graced with strong character actors and plenty of dramatic surprise, keeps its patrons on the edge of their seats. The new location of Gates Common Room promises to throw an interesting new light on the play.

A Comic Occurence plays Friday and Saturday nights at 7:00 in Cossitt "C" Produced by Rich Lawton and Rob Peck, this nightclub-style production showcase eleven pieces of comedy, from Monty Python sketches to stand-up artists to a bizarre "conceptual dance" piece. Bleachers in Cossitt "C" will provide more seating space and the early show time will allow students to get the laughter out of their systems before the President's Ball! The production is dedicated to humor in a rather slapstick vein: no room for snobby stuff here. Several popular funnymen on campus have prepared new exciting material for the show and a few newcomers to the scene are making debuts.

Old Times, by Harold Pinter, will take place in Cossitt North Studio on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, April 20, 21 and 22 at 8:45 p.m. This familiar work stars Ted Hubbard, Brigid McBride and Shannon Absher. Patrons should come with open minds ready for some entertainment; as director Lara Travis stresses, "we're doing a play. We're not doing (in a dark, emphatic voice) Pinter."

Due to the intimate settings for all shows, seating is limited and based on a first-come, first-served system. No tickets required.

What's On

Pascal Gasirabo, Junior, Mathematics/Language
Bob Marley and the Wailers, "Survival"

Kristin Mernitz, Senior, Art Studio
Martin Luther King Jr., "I Have a Dream"

SKYWAY VIDEO

Rentals & Sales

577-9047

Hours:
Monday-Thursday
10:30-7
Friday & Saturday
10:30-8
Closed Sunday

- Foreign Films (Excellent Selection)
- Classic Films
- Operas
- Musicals

As well as an extensive selection of

- Current Releases

— No Club Or Membership Fees —
Tuesday Special - $1.49 Rentals
Sunday Rentals - Free

Skyway Plaza • S. 8th & Arcturus
(feel free to call for directions)

atch Ye Olde Theatre

the moste gracious readers of this honourable newspaper, being men women devoted to the study of the ill arts, and thereby known as men women of intelligence broad and elites wholesome and full in matters ellect and other such, these wordes ddressed, in hope of bringing to pleasure and profit, in generall.

Lords and Ladies, if there be in dorms or classroomes, or in the nus generally known to you, any man oman interested, or if indeed you noble selves might find interest or ure in hearing they servants relate Tales of Caunterbury, penned so long by Geoffrey Chaucer, and two icians also, playing out upon the sundry characters from that moste hy booke, in costumes full and rously coloured, then markest thy calendars for the 23rd, 24th, and of April, some six days hence. The ain, in a figurative sense, shall by gement rise at 8:15 P.M. proper, the relation of the tales by rote ory commencing immediately after. Your august and noble ence, etc., at one or another of these performances would do much ur to they servants, and give them pleasure also, if being present ld not create for you trouble, nor venience, nor pain in any way soever afflicting thee.

thou assured of a production fully ated on the Main Stage of stronge Theatre, with support ckall, directoriall, musickall, and eographic, and players well rsed in every particular; in ement no less than in dialogue. Five y tales shall they relate, couched in good humour and great ment, in verse metrical and rstandable to gentlemen and women where. The Miller, the Reeve, the oner, the Wife of Bath, and the Priest each shall tell his tale and with five players also enacting the nters on the stage before thy very and Chaucer, speaking on occasion thing expository. Musicians two accompany them withal, to delight s one tale unfoldeth to the next, and t of diverse sundry other folke, who er speak nor sing, but stand on stage ease thine eye. Garbed shall they be rics bright and colourful, and finely woven as to rival even that of fabled Arachne, cut and sewn most skillfully after the fashion of fine medieval dress. Lights shall there be brighter than the stars in heaven, changing with greater spectacle even than the moon in her phases as she passes from new to full to new again, vying with the very Sun above for brilliance. Last here to be mentioned but in no wise least among the marvels of this production, seest thou will a set of tiers and stairways, sturdily constructed by craftsmen and women so noble and so good withal that their names shall appear, along with diverse sundry others, in a printed programme for your instruction. Of tiers shall there be six and of stairways five, and ladders two for climbing where ever stairs will not suffice, of of such dimension and such aspect, and of such magnitude withal, as to reach nearly two stories into the air, the topmost tier being of dizzying height, from which the players will perform feats of acrobatic survival. And pieces movable also shall there be, carried on and off again from the stage as necessary, for they pleasure and enlightenment, as they illustrate the tales thereon related.

Direckted are the Tales by the noble and gracious Pamela Riley, who, in her wisdommef and good sense of homour, hath rendered them into English modern and clear in most every particular, and trimmed from their majestickall and in no small way intimidating length much that is highly descriptive or rhetoricall, morally profitable or otherwise tedious, for your delight and entertainment, except for some opening lines from the Prologue General, to be performed in the origianll Middle English. The five tales all shall be performed on each evening, an interval of something near fifteen minutes duration falling, for your convenience, between the third tale and the fourth, being those of the Pardoner and the good Wife of Bath, respectively. Forgetteth thou not that the curtain shall rise at 8:15 P.M. on the 23rd, 24th, and 25th of April each night, for thy diversion and amusement, and feareth thou not, my Lords and Ladies, lest thy ticket be expensive, for it shall be free of charge at the Student Centre, if thou presenteth thy student I.D., and so reasonably priced otherwise, that you could afford to bring thy brothers and sisters, aunts and uncles, godparents, etc., etc., etc.

ANDREW LEMAN

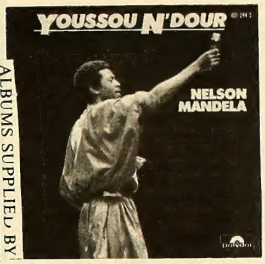
International Unique

At the end of Peter Gabriel's "In Your Eyes" off his So album, a jubilant African voice rings out in the chorus. The voice belongs to Senegalese singer Youssou N'Dour. Although he recently has gained some recognition in the U.S. by opening up for Gabriel on his tour, Youssou is already known as a master musician in his homeland and in Europe.

His own style of music is called Mbalax which combines local rhythms from his Dakar home, traditional sounds and the power of western music. With the help of his band Etoile de Dakar he has produced an energetic album dedicated to and entitled Nelson Mandela. (Did that get anyone's attention?)

From the start it is easy to tell that this album is far from ordinary. In fact, the different Mbalax sound and Youssou's native Wolof language (most of the album isn't sung in English) are quite a shock at first.

The album opens with "N'Dobine" which includes a fast-paced beat and horn work that show a strong Cuban influence.



ALBUMS SUPPLIED BY BUDGET TAPES & RECORDS

Further along on side one is a song called "Wareff" in which he explains that people should explore the beauty of their own country before travelling abroad. Although there are strong baselines and a heavy drum beat, nothing can hide Youssou's powerful well-pitched voice.

The next song, "Magninde," changes the pace of things a bit with a slower rather jazz-like sound. The subject matter is the sadness associated with death but the usual joyful edge still shines through.

Just when you might be easing into the Mbalax sound of Nelson Mandela, Youssou throws you a curve with his version of the Spinner's "Rubberband Man." I have to say that this one puts the original to shame. The strong instrumentation and backing vocals retain the American soul sound while the English lyrics sung with a Wolof accent give the song a new humorous twist.

The album ends with the title track. He wrote the song not only to express his own political views, but also to paint a better picture of the South African situation for the people of Senegal. The song again reveals the fascinating Mbalax style. The guitar and trumpet solos have a jazz/reggae feel, but the chant-like singing make it, like te other songs on the album, totally unique.

Although the extremely different type of music on Nelson Mandela initially makes it somewhat inaccessible, after a few listenings I really started to enjoy the skillful and very lively songs despite the fact that I couldn't understand anything Youssou N'Dour was singing. It may sound corny but yes, this album does prove that music is an international language. Give it the ol' liberal art's try.

KATIE DALSEMER

Your Turntable

Scott Allen, Senior, Philosophy
Micky Dread, "Pave the Way"

hica Berens, Senior, Art History
Lazaris, "Power of Dominion"

Budget
Tapes and Records
Give the gift of music.
327 North Tejon
Colorado Springs
471-4419

COLLEGE PHARMACY
PHOTO CENTER SPECIALS!

This Easter, we've ended the hunt for low film developing prices.

COUPON
COLOR PRINT FILM DEVELOPING
(C-41 process only)
12 EXPOSURE ROLL..... $2.29
15 EXPOSURE DISC..... $2.99
24 EXPOSURE ROLL..... $4.49
36 EXPOSURE ROLL..... $5.99
Offer good on a single set of standard size prints. Limit one roll with this coupon (not valid with any other coupon). Limited time offer. Ask for details. Coupon redeemable at this store only. 2297
833 North Tejon
We use Kodak PAPER ...for a Good Look 634-4861

Exploring Art's Shores

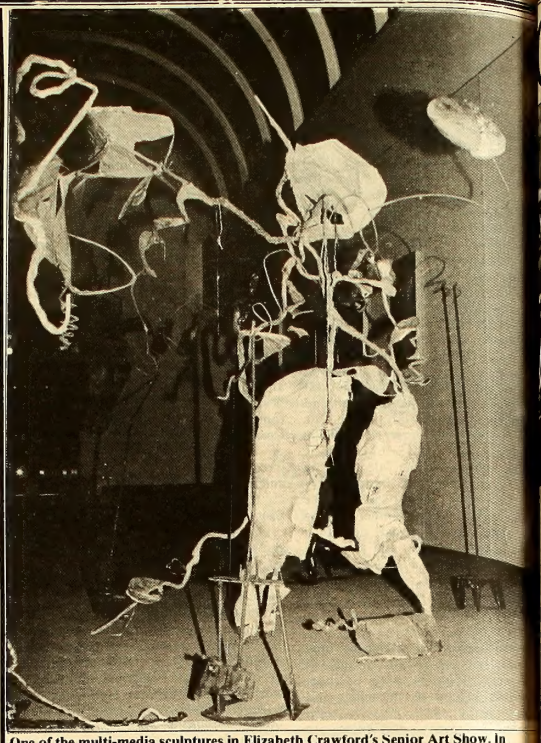
My senior year as an art major has essentially been spent attempting to find a satisfactory definition of the boundaries of art. Such a boundary may be impossible to define. It is precisely the impossibility that makes the attempt so interesting. I do not profess to have an answer. Such a definite answer would destroy the very nature of art. My show is merely an attempt to display my search and my current conclusions as to my own definition of artistic expression.

As I progressed through the year, I became progressively intrigued by the role of the mind in art. Toward this interest I have tried to produce art that is conceptual in nature. As a result my work has become visually more minimal as I begin to place a greater emphasis on the conceptual aspect of art. This is not to say that I have rejected the role of visual communication in my work. I feel that the visual quality of a minimal piece is of utmost importance, for it is the form that embodies the concept. Without a tangible form a concept is only half realized.

The concepts embodied in some of my pieces are not always easily recognized. This is a deliberate attempt to draw the viewers into the work and force the viewer to formulate his or her own conclusion. Such a task is not easy and will not necessarily result with the viewer liking the piece, however an attempt will hopefully give the viewer a greater appreciation of my work.

It is not my wish that my work be universally accepted or even understood. Such universality would create complacency by not forcing the viewer to establish his or her own ideas about the nature of art. It is precisely individual interpretation that makes art interesting. Conclusions drawn by the individual will result in heightened awareness of an individual piece, art in general, and ultimately one's entire surroundings.

JACK RICHARDSON



One of the multi-media sculptures in Elizabeth Crawford's Senior Art Show. In Packard until April 17.

Tulio On Tapes

Mix Tapes. A somewhat college phenomenon. Yes, they do exist in the world, but the life they love is the leisurely college existence. Some are created in the heat of the moment, without proper attention. They get no pretty graphics, become unlistened too and unloved. Then there are those celebrity tapes. Someone does it right for 90 minutes. The dance tape so live you can't leave the dancefloor. The one-on-one tape so sweet you just got to get together.

But what is it that makes the masterful mix? Rule #1: Know your audience. While nightclub crowds might go nuts over the first notes of New Order or Prince, most CC students will stay in motion for the first verse and then quickly bail. The best tapes are chock full of songs you forgot you loved: "Brickhouse," "Superfreak," "Lowrider," with gems like those there is no excuse for parking on the dance floor.

Self-restraint is the key factor in the making of a sweet dance tape. Just because you think it's the hottest dance cut ever doesn't mean it will rock the house. Just think how stupid you'll look dancing by yourself and then record something else.

Sometimes half the fun is making those cute collages and thinking of some clever/silly title that'll look good in silver ink. "Starsongs for ———" "Music for Midnight," "Get Off Your Ass and Jam."

Sometimes songs are so good they're put on way too many tapes. Will we ever be able to dance to "Burning Down the House" again? Probably hear it at a party ten years from now and go off the wall.

So hey, if you're living in a dorm, realize it double as a music library. You won't get this chance again. Besides, it's about the best way to avoid homework that doesn't run up a bar tab. "When the mode of music changes, the walls of the city shake." —Plato. Shake it!

TULIO BROWNING

Julie James' Senior Art Show focuses on a fresh & intriguing view of naturally occurring forms. Some of her works are directly representative, while others (like the diptich above) are creatively interpretive. In Armstrong until April 17.

Confusion and Coherency

One of the more interesting senior art exhibits of the spring is Elizabeth Crawford's on display in Packard Hall the week of April 13-17. The show consists of a group of nine wall pieces including oil paintings, collages, and works combining other media such as charcoal and pastel. The normal procession down the main corridor of Packard Hall is interrupted by a group of seven statues of metal, wood, papier-mache', and mixed media.

Although previous shows have been described as being "unified by a common theme," most have not approached the complexity apparent in Elizabeth's show. The whole show is pervaded by a complexity from the use of different media to the way they are applied in her works. The colors in the paintings and sculptures are not bright and pure, but are mixed in many layers which contributes to the mystery of the works. Often one can make out figures of women, articles of clothing, animals, organs of the body, and other objects whose identity cannot be assured identified. The artist has created a s which contains a great deal of ambigu in relating her motives and themes.

The fact that the statues grouped in middle of the room interrupt the us flow down Packard's main corridor c be interpreted as Elizabeth's attempt impede a person's regular process, natural reaction to the interruption is effect of all of the works in the show. viewer tries to decipher images a themes in Elizabeth's show, but is unab to because of the intentionally deva ambiguity which contributes to unsettling feeling of confusion, tensio and anxiety.

Elizabeth Crawford's show captivate the unsuspecting spectator pass through Packard Hall. It is intriguing its technique and themes. One can help but believe that the show is just beginning of many demanded of artist.

CAMPBE

We like to print the artists' statements the Friday before their show, but this is such an articulate expression of creative motivation that it merits publishing.

In my work, I search to express a vitality between destruction and creation. I experience the pull of these two realms as a basic force in my life and in nature. Life seems to be pregnant with simultaneous moments of birth and deterioration, a surge of both vitality and stagnation. An oscilation within which I believe pure creation and joy can be found. Such experiences have no predictable form, I roam through a need for the beautiful to the ugly and the clumsy to the lyrical. I search for an area between description and static confusion, between my moments of lost wandering and before I start making sense reigning coherency. To cultivate express the explosive energy possible between these two realms be my dream. I don't pretend that work evokes such energy, but it search of these expresses that I gro my work.

ELIZABETH CRAWFOR

Senior Art Shows from April 20- Jack Richardson in Armstrong (see "preview" on this page). Tim Healy a Sally Kelly in Packard.

Controversial T.K.

Jerry Wang

owing his "softer side," CC head lacrosse coach Tom Kay politely offers enior defenseman Jack Foster the time, but Jack, hurt by "T.K.'s harsh " praisal of his new haircut, bows his head to weep.

The average CC lacrosse fan holds a very carefree attitude toward the game. You can come with a friend, have a beer, and enjoy the outdoors. A very different attitude, quite obviously, is held by Tom Kay, head lacrosse coach at Colorado College.

"Once the first whistle blows to begin the game, as a coach my role is basically to see the strengths and weaknesses of our team and the other team and point them out to the players." Tom feels that the ability to communicate is one of the most important aspects of his job. He modestly admits that he is only moderately successful at getting the players to perform how he wants them to. He adds, however, that the level of lacrosse at CC is not yet good enough where players can spontaneously perform a new play from a diagram. To overcome this, one of Tom's goals is "to be able to adjust to every team on a specific basis and work accordingly."

Coach Kay admits he is a very tough coach to play for, and that he demands a certain level of performance from each player. This can be attributed in part to his very extensive lacrosse background. Before entering high school, Tom had eight or nine years of playing experience. His successful high school career was followed by four outstanding years in net for CC (1972-76). His performance for the Tigers earned him All-American honors. In 1978 he became assistant lacrosse coach, and he has been head coach since 1979.

Through his years of experience, Tom has obtained an outstanding working knowledge of the technical game. However, he feels the most important contribution a coach can make is communicating the working aspects of the game to his players. "The best attitude a coach can have is the ability to verbalize the sport to the players, and I try to make sure my players can understand what I'm telling them and have them verbalize it back to me. That to me is the coaching experience."

The respect coach Kay receives from his players varies. Freshmen seem to have the toughest time with him, while seniors appear to appreciate his style more. One member of each class was asked to comment on his coach. The remarks of the players become more favorable from freshman to senior.

Freshman player: "He really knows the game, but sometimes I find him hard to understand."

Sophomore player: "He's the best coach I've had and he really knows his stuff, but sometimes he lacks in positive reinforcement."

Junior player: "His goal is to win. His technique may not be the most effective, but it's effective."

Senior player: "I think he could coach anywhere."

Senior player: "He gets respect, he gets the job done."

Coach Kay is undoubtedly tough in terms of his coaching style. He describes himself as a "task master." When asked if he's a tough coach to play for, Kay responded, "I think a lot of freshmen have a hard time playing for me because I'm very demanding, but as they get into their sophomore, junior, and senior years, I'm much easier to play for than they think. I'm just particularly hard on the newcomers. It takes them [the players] a year or so to get to know me and see that softer side."

Kay displays a tough, disciplined coaching style on the field. Off the field he describes himself as "more forgiving." He does, however, have a genuine concern for his players, not only as athletes, but as students. He says not only the lacrosse

Continued on p. 19

DU Overcomes

The second outing between the olorado College Tigers and the niversity of Denver Pioneers took place t Saturday in Denver. Earlier in the ason the contest resulted in an 18-1 ger victory. Saturday's result was mewhat less satisfying.

With 2:03 gone in the first period DU ok a 1-0 lead, a lead the Pioneers would in the entire game. DU found the cket again with 4:39 remaining in the st quarter with an impressive power ay goal.

Sophomore midfielder Ross ohrmann nearly put CC on the board ith a whistling shot in the remaining conds of the quarter, but an impressive U netminder came up with the ball.

The second period went DU's way gain when they connected at 4:46 into e quarter. The goal was the result of a ppy Tiger breakout which left senior tminder Devin Standard some twenty ds from the net. Senior defenseman ack Foster temporarily replaced tandard between the pipes but was able to make the save from the alert oneer who recovered the ball for his am. This goal can be best described as nnecessary and it seemed to discourage e attitude of the team more than any her goal in the game. Less than one nute later, DU attackers made the ade again, creating a 4-0 deficit for the gers.

An outstanding effort by midfielder ill Trousdale resulted in CC's first score e in the second period. From behind e opponent's net, Trousdale worked his an back and forth, finally breaking to e front and jamming it home past a nfused DU goalie.

Trousdale's goal gave the Tigers a small emotional boost heading into the second half. But all was forgotten when the ball returned to its familiar resting place, inside the CC net just 49 seconds into the half. Tiger frustration was becoming apparent in the form of penalties. DU's sixth goal occurred during a delayed penalty for interference.

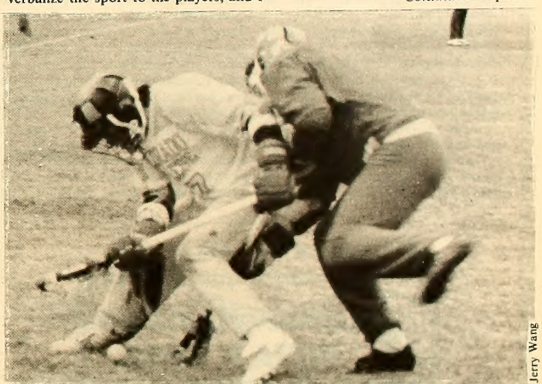
CC's best showing came late in the third period. Ball control, movement, and the tempo of the game were all controlled by the Tigers. Many shots were unleashed and finally one by freshman Mike Alkaitis beat the DU netminder with 4:41 remaining in that third frame.

The Tigers struck again, 2:50 into the final period with a nice shot from rookie Chris Allison. But the Pioneers seventh goal, the first in a string of five consecutive Pioneer scores, the last coming of 8:12 of the final period.

With 5:12 remaining, Alkaitis scored his second of two goals on the day. The final score: DU 11, CC 4.

The big problem Saturday seemed to be a lack of mental preparation. Previous to the game, all but one player interviewed predicted a strong CC finish. The over confidence of the team in the locker room turned against the Tigers once on the playing field and hence, the 11-4 loss. To bounce back from the loss Head Coach Tom Kay intends to make his team recognize the problems by "going back to the basics." Looking at the uneven situations which caused the defeat are also on Coach Kay's agenda for Monday.

JOHN KINLIN



Jerry Wang

CC's Dave Byron struggles to maintain control of the ball during CC's 18-1 victory over DU earlier this year. CC lost the return engagement, 11-4, last Saturday at DU

California Stickers

Six representatives from CC's Womens Club Lacrosse Team, together with women from Denver, UCSB, and Berkley, combined their skills and returned victorious from a weekend of playing in Sonoma Valley, California. Of eight women's team's attending, the Colorado team took third place in the Michelob Western States Lacrosse Tournament - losing only to Berkley and Stanford who took first and second place respectively.

CC alum and coach Michelle Giarratano held the midfield together as well as refereeing several other games. Susannah Lawson led the attack as high scorer/assists, followed by captain Jen Hendee's running power and stickwork. Margo Gray and captain Katy McNitt were tremendous defensive forces with their communication, possession of the ball on the "draws," and interceptions, and Carter Pratt had an excellent weekend in the goalcage. These six and the rest of CC's team have been practicing hard and are ready to take on CSU today [Friday] so come lend your support!! Put on your sunning clothes and be at STEWARD FIELD AT 5:00 PM — SEE YOU THERE!!

Dean's Drivel

Last Monday, April 6, ABC's Nightline news program commemorated the fortieth anniversary of Jackie Robinson's entrance as the first black player in baseball's major leagues with a tribute to the baseball legend. But the real issue of the program involved baseball's sad paucity of blacks in major league front office and management positions. Al Campanis, long time Los Angeles Dodger vice-president, was a guest, providing his impressions of Robinson's career (he was a former teammate with the Dogers when they played in Brooklyn), and insight into the problem of racism in major league baseball.

Watching Campanis talk about the severe lack of blacks in management positions was truly sad. When asked why there weren't even close to a representative number of blacks in front office positions around the league (approximately one-fourth of major league players are black), Campanis replied that blacks "may not have some of the necessities to be, let's say, a field manager, or perhaps a general manager." Nightline host Ted Koppel couldn't believe what he was hearing, so he gave Campanis a chance to extricate himself from the mess the statement got him in. Campanis responded with, "they are tremendous athletes, with God-given talents, and they are really great people...but why aren't their more black quarterbacks?...Why are black men, or black people, not good swimmers? Because they don't have the buoyancy." Said Koppel later, "I don't know how many times I could ask the same question...I really couldn't believe he was saying what he was saying." Campanis apologized for his comments the next day, as did Dodger president Peter O'Malley, but Campanis resigned that Wednesday under pressure from the Dodger front office.

What makes the whole fiasco especially sad is the situation of both Campanis and the Dodgers. Campanis was a great "baseball man," and well respected by most everyone in baseball. The Dodgers, with the highest percentage of minorities (blacks, hispanics, and asians hold six of twenty-eight Dodger front office positions) in front office positions in the league, are one of the most successful and respected organizations in the league. But what is happening around the league if even the best personnel and organizations appear racist? Fifteen of the league's twenty-six teams don't have a single minority in any management position, and six others have two or less. Overall, a USA Today poll showed that only 30 minorities are included in 879 top major league management postions. Even with Commissioner Peter Ueberroth calling for more minorities in management postions at last December's winter meetings, all fourteen members of the administration staff at the league office itself are white.

The question remains after forty years of "integration" in baseball: why aren't obviously capable minority people being employed in major league front offices? Why isn't a Don Baylor, who was acquired by the Boston Red Sox largely because of his "leadership" qualities, or a Willie Stargell, the obvious leader and team motivator of the 1979 Pittsburgh Pirate World Championship team, and now a first base coach with the Atlanta Braves, being considered for a managing job when newly retired white players like Larry Bowa (San Diego Padres' new manager) are? Unfortunately, it seems that until blacks can find a way to infiltrate major league ownership, it will remain nearly impossible for them to be at least representatively present in management positions.

Baseball, although its race problems, in light of the number of minorities participating as players, are obviously severe, should not be singled out as the only problem industry. Even in professional football, another industry with a large percentage of black employees (players), no black has yet to be named as a head coach, let alone any higher management post (there have been three black major league managers). Somehow, after all these years, white America still holds fast to some of the ridiculous myths about blacks that have made it so hard for them to be recognized as equal members of our society. Racism persists in the falsely originated and even more falsely perpetuated illusions that blacks are physically and not intellectually capable beings. Many people claim "but we've made tremendous progress," but any such "progress" seems insignificant if the underlying myths about blacks continue to dominate society's treatment of them. It seems that, unless America can shed some of the images of blacks it claims to have discarded but that actually still dominate its subconscious, the nation will be doomed to a hideous progression of such racial prejudice that has finally surfaced in major league baseball.

DEAN CAMPBELL

Tennis

Men's

The men's tennis team has bounced back from a rough Spring Break to win 2 of its last 3 matches. Last Wednesday, DU came to town and was consequently punished 7-2 by the Tigers, who were definitely due for a big win. Last year DU beat CC twice by scores of 8-1 and 9-0, so Wednesday's win was a confidence-building upset for the Tigers. The match against DU also marked the first time this year that the Tigers have swept all three doubles matches.

On Saturday the 11th, CC met Air Force at home. Play began at 9:00 a.m. and, without saying more, it was over with in time for lunch at 11:30. One anonymous team member explains, "Yeah, we started way too early, 9:00, yeah, that's why we lost 9-0."

The Tigers turned the tables on Tuesday, as they travelled to Golden to play Mines. The trip started off on the wrong foot. John Duncan had some problems getting out of bed and George Wilmer had to eat a bowl of cereal, almost causing the team to forfeit due to lateness. Some crafty highway maneuvers by coach Ken Bartz got the team to Golden on time, where they pummelled the Miners 9-0 on their own turf. Special congratulations go to sophomore tennis celebrity Steve Claypool who stepped in at number 7 for the Tigers to pick up his first career win.

This weekend CC is hosting a tournament between the Colorado Schools that the Tigers have competed with this year. Singles and doubles draws will be played out all day Friday and Saturday. Next week the Tigers round out their season with matches against Regis, Metro, and DU. On Saturday, CC will compete in the conference tournament at Mines, where they will be favored to do well. What a bunch of studs.

JOHN DUNCAN

Women's

The women's tennis team started off their post-California season with an impressive 9-0 victory over C.S.U. on Monday. The match was played through cold winds and snow flurries, but the Tigers put those factors aside and pulled out an outstanding victory. With the exception of no. 5 singles player Meredith Clark, who lost her first set but bounced back to win the next two, the match was quite easily, all of the other matches were won in straight sets. The victory defended a title that awarded Colorado College once again with a trophy for which the two schools have competed for the last six years. This match marked the Tiger women's fourth consecutive victory over C.S.U.

The outcome of Tuesday's Air Force match was not as successful. Going into doubles the score was tied 3-3. Three of the six singles matches went three sets and CC was victorious in only two of them. No. 3 Stacey Wing and no. 6 Joni Axt both pulled out their third sets, but no. 1 player Sara Ryan lost her third set 6-3. The other of the three singles wins went to no. 4 Melissa Forbes in straight sets. CC needed to win two of the three doubles matches to take the match, but they were only successful at the #2 doubles spot. The final score was 5-4, which was an improvement from their 7-2 loss to Air Force at the opening of the season, but it was still a disappointment. The next match is to be played Friday the 17th against Missouri State.

SARA RYA

N.Y. Mets
&
N.Y. Yankees
Shown At Greenstreets
Lounge
599-7727

More Pizza for Less Dough

HungryHowies PIZZA & SUBS

TWO PIZZAS ONE PRICE

FREE FLAVORED PIZZA • Garlic • Buttered • Sesame • Poppy • Rye

EXP. 5/7/87 — More Pizza for Less Dough

Two 10" Small Pizzas
(Cheese Only)
only $5.24 #1D980
Additional 2 Pizza Toppings 83¢ Each
Not valid with any other coupons. Delivery Extra.

EXP. 5/7/87 — More Pizza for Less Dough

Two 14" Large Special Pizzas
(pepperoni, mushrooms, ham, green pepper, onions) No Substitutions
all for only $14.12 24 SLICES
With This Coupon • Delivery Extra
One Coupon Per Order #1D980

475-8241 (ate - two - four - one)
1625 W. Uintah
Uintah Station

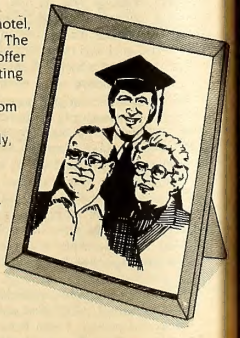
THE ANTLERS HOTEL
Colorado Springs, Colorado

Picture yourself at
The Antlers Hotel for graduation.
Colorado Springs' finest...for only $60!

The Antlers...Colorado Springs' only Four-Star, Four-Diamond hotel, located just nine blocks south of The Colorado College, has a special offer for families and friends of graduating students.

- Single or double occupancy room rate of only $60
- A portrait of graduate and family, compliments of The Antlers
- Complimentary valet parking

Call Cynthia at The Antlers for reservations...we'll make this special event picture perfect!



4 S. Cascade Avenue
Chase Stone Center
Colorado Springs,
Colorado 80903
(303) 473-5600
(800) 232-2323
Operated by The Broadmoor Management Company

© 1987, The Antlers

CC Cyclers

Long hours of training in cold and ow beginning in January paid off as the olorado College Cycling People made ir debut in the Rocky Mountain llegiate Cycling Conference last ekend in Ft. Collins and Laramie. The son opener was held at "the Oval" on CSU campus, and included mpetitors from the Air Force ademy, DU, CU, Colorado School of nes, Wyoming and CSU.

Racing action began with the men's "B" egory, where the less experienced ers tested their skills and spilt their od. "A veritable crash-fest!" remarked is Merriam, the team's coach, as he ched his riders dodge one of the six shes which marred the sixteen mile e. Agressive riding at the front of the k by Dave Peeters, Terry Ashby, and rgan Dewees proved an effective ans of crash evasion and paid off with h placings of 2nd, 3rd, and 4th pectively from a field of forty-six.

Women riders Allison Gromme, Becky rp, and Denise Collins showed real ache as they were treated to a fast ed introduction to the sport. Sharp d in the team with a 6th place finish.

In the final event, the men's "A" race, five most experienced riders from h school battled it out. The CC riders k their cue from the "B" race and again ed at the front of the pack. In the end, rehearsed team work netted CC four he top five spots, with Eric Borgnes nging home the win, followed by Garrett Ito in 3rd, Ted Anderson 4th, and Chris Merriam somewhere behind them (in 5th).

The high expectations that had been set for Sunday's race in Laramie were curbed by the inevitable Sunday snowfall. After hearing that the tire chain law was in effect, more intelligent members of the team stayed at home, being unable to procure chains for their bicycles. Serious boneheads Terry Ashby, Garrett Ito, Jeff Shomper and Chris Merriam were undaunted by sub-freezing temperatures and blowing sleet, and set out to test themselves against the elements. Thirty-five miles later the racers rode in on their icicles, with Ito and Merriam taking 6th and 7th in the "A" category, and Shomper stylishly capturing 12th in the "B" race.

Racing action continues for the CC bikers this Saturday with a hillclimb hosted by Colorado School of Mines, and culminates with the league championship May 3 at our own campus nestled here at the foothills of the Rockies. BY JEAN DEGRIBALDY personnel, but also the entire athletic department "has nothing less than the best intentions for Colorado College academically. We put academics first."

Lax

Continued from p. 17

Tom Kay's style of tough on the field and caring off the field makes for a great coaching combination. Under the supervision of Kay, lacrosse at CC seems to be heading in a positive direction. As the one senior player said, "He gets respect, he gets the job done."

JOHN KINLIN

Cutler Publications

is still accepting applications

for

Nugget Editor

(or Co-Editors)

Anyone interested please contact:

Lelia Deykin x297
(Acting Cutler Board President)

Heidi Dowd x282
(Nugget '87 Editor)

1987 Nugget

ONLY

$17.50

don't let the memories slip by...

yearbook order form 1987

NAME _____

CAMPUS ADDRESS _____

SIGNATURE _____

Make checks payable to: Cutler Publications OR put it on your student account and we will bill your parents. Check one:

— paid by check {please put checks in envelopes}
— student account

Please return to the Nugget box at the Student Center

Announcements

Livesounds is organizing its 1987/1988 committee. Anyone interested should attend a meeting this Tuesday at 5:00 pm in Palmer 122.

Juniors Don't Forget to Vote. Monday April 20th & Tuesday April 21st in Palmer, Olin, Tutt Library, Tutt Alumni House, Bemis, Taylor.

Biology Seminars. April 21, Tuesday * Stephanie Holmes, CC Biology Major, Problems in Speciation and Identification in the Genus Salix in the Pikes Peak Region.

April 23, Thursday * Gian Basili, CC Biology Major, Study of kilC Gene Function in the Host Range of the Promiscuous Plasmid RK2.

All seminars are to be held at 12:00 noon in Olin room 100. Brown bag lunch and refreshments served.

* Attempting to graduate with distinction in Biology.

Colorado College Students Interested in entering the annual Evelyn Bridges Poetry Contest should submit their poems (no more than ten per person) to John Longo (Armstrong Hall 244) on or before the deadline, 5:00 p.m., April 29. First Prize is $50; Second, $30; Third, $20. Students should type the poems, staple the pages together, place them in an envelope with a pseudonym on the outside, and attach a second envelope with the same pseudonym on the outside and a slip of paper inside with their real name and phone number. Prizes will be announced at the annual Awards Convocation in May.

ANCHOR SPLASH—May 9. Sign up in Bemis and Taylor during lunch and dinner, Monday thru Friday, April 20-24.

Video Workshop Film Festival. — Friday, April 17, Armstrong 300 at 7:00. Last Year At Mariendbad. Saturday, April 18, Armstrong 300 at 7:00. Films starring & made by students and independents, David Armstrong and others. Open discussion. FREE popcorn.

NOTICE TO ALL PREMEDICAL STUDENTS: There will be an important meeting of interest to all premedical students.....

Wednesday, April 22, 1987
3:30 P.M. OLIN HALL, Room 100

Ray Herr, visiting instructor for our Freshman Seminar 180, "Science in Medicine" this block, will conduct a panel discussion on the topic "Getting into Medical School . . and what it is like when you get there."

Ray, who is a CC grad and has just finished at CU Medical School, will be joined by several of our graduates who are now attending CU Medical School. All four medical school classes will be represented by this panel of medical students.

You will have an excellent opportunity to learn about medical school from those who are now experiencing it. This is your chance to find out "all you ever wanted to know about medical school but never had a medical student to ask."

Summer Camp Jobs Available— Resident Camp in Steamboat Springs, Co is now taking applications for general camp counselors: minimum age 19—having completed sophomore year with a desire to work with young people in a western ranch camp environment. Wilderness school instructors: minimum age 21 with documented skills in mountaineering, climbing, first aid and water safety. Senior Wrangler: minimum age 23 with with experience in teaching western riding and the care and training of horses. One full week of staff training required of all staff members. Season dates June 6-Aug. 21. Room and board plus salary. Spend a summer of significance with us this year. Write for an application: Bear Pole Ranch, 32305 RCR 38, Steamboat Springs, CO 80487 or call: 303-879-0576.

FOR SALE! Round trip ticket to Wash. D.C., leaves Colorado Springs May 6th and returns May 11th. For more information call Betsy at 473-1679.

Buy Your '87 Nugget

(See pg. 19)

FRANK CARLUCCI
National Security Advisor

8th & 9th Block HOME STRETCH! Nationally renowned stretching expert Bob Anderson will be giving a presentation on the proper way to stretch. Come ready to participate—wear loose clothing! Gates Common, Tuesday, April 21st, 6:30-8 p.m.

FOR SALE: Stereo equipment and assorted furniture, reasonably priced must sell. Call Bill at 471-3751.

HEY JUNIORS!

Thinking about interviewing with recruiters on campus next year as part of your job search?

Seniors who use the Career Center's placement services must attend two informational seminars. Why wait for the fall rush? Attend this spring!

Junior Seminar I - Thursday, April 23th
Junior Seminar II - Thursday, May 7th
6:30 to 8:00 p.m. - Gates Common Room

THE CAREER CENTER

Ticknor Hall, South 473-2233, ext. 426

Need a tune-up for the Dean's Cup? Get Ready for the...

BACCHUS Spring Fun Run (5K)

Thursday, April 23
Registration 3:00
Start 3:30
(CC Track)

Registration Forms Available
Monday, April 19 In
Bemis, Taylor, Mathias, Slocum & Loomis

Prizes From:
Old Chicago, Northport, FINN's, Jose Muldoon's

ALL entrants will receive a free shake at the Hub.

Prizes provided by Concept Restaurants & Saga Food Service

Poster continued from p. 3

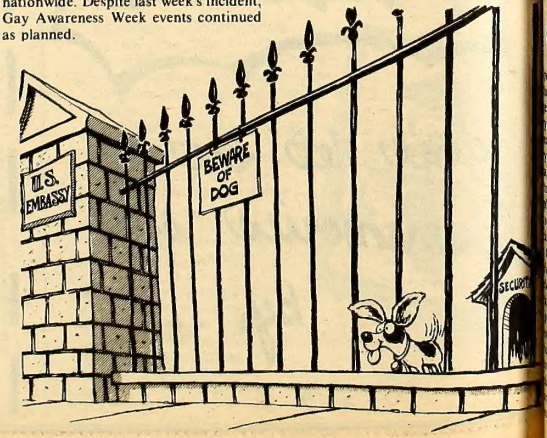
Fernandez pointed out that there are intolerant people everywhere and that even at CC, where tolerance and education are promoted, incidents like this can occur. "We have to stand up and voice our opinions to show that we won't be intimidated [by such actions]," he said.

Last week's posters followed a series of discriminatory incidents at colleges nationwide. Despite last week's incident, Gay Awareness Week events continued as planned.

Fernandez also recommended that members of "Students Against Unnatural Sex Acts" read John Boswell's book 'Christianity, Social Tolerance, and Homosexuality," p.11-20 so they might enlighten themselves about "what is natural and unnatural."

ERIC JOHNSON AND
ALEC REKOW



The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 24 April 1987 Volume 21, No. 11

Panel Discussion on Divestment

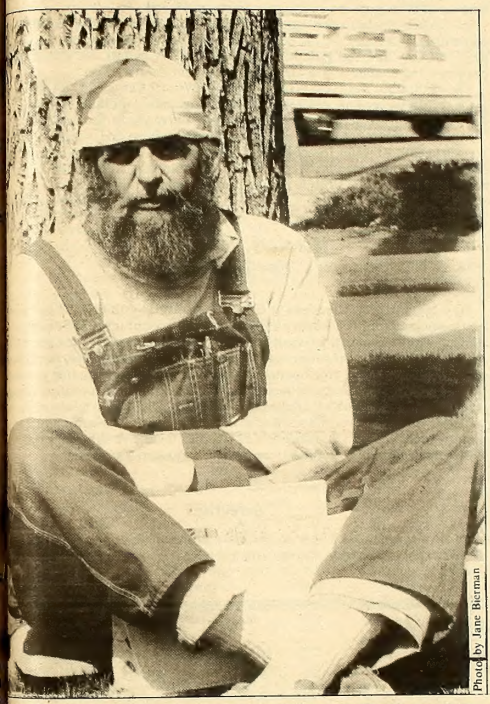


Photo by Jane Bierman

...rles Hyder, who has been fasting for over 200 days in Washington D.C. ...esting the nuclear arms race, met with the press last week in Acacia Park. A ...o-physicist and former NASA employee here in the Springs, Hyder has also ...ounced his candidacy for the Presidency in '88—hoping to make nuclear ...rmament a central issue.

Trustees will join student/faculty forum

Members of the Board of Trustees will discuss the reasons behind their recent divestment decision, on May 7 at 3:15. This discussion stems from the request of the CCCAA for such a forum (Catalyst, April 10). The CCCAA believed that the Board, in the tradition of the liberal arts institution, should "share with the campus arguements for continued investment in South Africa."

Members of the CCCAA, Administration and other concerned faculty and students met with Board members Gerald Phipps and Bill Hybl at Dean Glenn Brooks on April 14. This meeting provided the groundwork for the upcoming panel discussion.

The Southern Africa Education Committee was delegated with the responsibility of preparing the panel discussion. At this meeting it was decided that the panel will be composed of two Board members, two CCCAA representatives and two members of the College community opposed to divestment. Each individual will have the opportunity to make a five minute opening statement regarding their reasons for divestment/investment. Then the discussion will be opened up for members of the audience to pose questions or make statements.

Also, a set of ground rules were discussed. Most importantly questions for the panel cannot be directed to a particular individual. Instead the question must be phrased openly for any member of the panel to respond to. The need of ground rules emanated from the desire of all involved that the discussion remain constructive. Dean Glenn Brooks emphasized that this is "the beginning of discussion and not the end of it."

In preparation for the upcoming discussion the CCCAA is sponsoring a lecture/discussion led by Linda Mizell Taylor, director of the American Friends Service Committee's Southern Africa Project and Chairperson of the Colorado Coalition Against Apartheid. The lecture will take place May 5th at 4:00 in Gates Common Room.

IAN CAMPBELL

Boston Marathon: Geist Scores Big

Monday, April 21, 1987 is a day not soon to be forgotten by CC student and marathoner extraordinaire Gary Geist. On this day in Boston "Banty" reached a milestone in his young and flourishing career as a long distance runner. His time of 2:32:54 placed him 103rd in a field of 6,276 runners. This is a personal best for Banty. His time is over three minutes faster than his 1986 appearance in the Boston Marathon where he placed 168th with a time of 2:36:57.

The record breaking time and high placement attained by Banty in the 1987 Boston Marathon are impressive. The obstacles hurdled by the young athlete while training for the race are nothing less than astounding.

Nine weeks prior to the race tragedy struck. In a pickup basketball game Banty fell to the ground, straining ligaments in his knee and injuring his ankle. "I knew it was bad, it hurt a lot."

The injury sidelined Banty for three weeks. But during that time he attended physical therapy every day in an attempt to strengthen the leg and resume training.

With just over six weeks remaining until the race, Banty began pounding the pavement again. His first run amounted to only a short jaunt around campus, a distance of only a few blocks. The following day he doubled that and had gained enough strength by the third day of training to complete a three mile course. Each day Banty increased his runs by one mile leveling at 8 miles a day for 48 miles of training with five weeks remaining. He increased his training as his leg became stronger and pumped out 70 and 79 miles respectively during the fourth and third remaining weeks before the race.

At this point Banty began to "taper off," a common training technique among long distance runners that prevents burn out and fine tunes the body before a big race. With two weeks remaining he decreased his training, covering 70 miles while the last week he trained for only 35 miles.

In the five marathons ran by Banty previous to the 1987 Boston Marathon,

...C's Tynan Edits Book on Catholic American Lit.

...ing is here. And, accordingly, ...all's begun. The days have grown ...r. The weather's grown hotter. And ...thing at the foot of Pikes Peak ...ars to be right on schedule, ...thing, that is, except Professor Dan ...n.

...fessor Tynan is not on schedule ...y because he is not on the schedule ...emester, except for one class, ninth ... Having been invited to edit a book ...Catholic American literature, ...ssor Tynan has taken four ...opment blocks. Under the nine ... plan, development blocks allow ...rofessors time from class to pursue ...ts residing outside their normal ...ulum. Although the Project will not ...mpletely finished at the end of this ..., Porfessor Tynan will return to the ...oom to teach American Lit. 20th ...ry 1914-1950 next block.

When finished, the book, "A Biographical Dictionary of Contemporary Catholic American Literature," will be published by the Greenwoodpress Inc., a company that specializes in the publishing of reference and scholarly materials, Greenwoodpress approached Prof. Tynan about the book after reading some of his articles regarding Catholic American literature. Tynan's general area of expertise is American literature. Having grown up Catholic, however, he nurtured an additional interest in Catholic literature. Merging his professional concerns with a curiosity about his heritage, Professor Tynan explored Catholic American literature, eventually developing enough knowledge on the subject to publish. Six of the essays in the book will be Tynan's own, as will the introduction.

Continued p. 7

INSIDE

You've Seen the Library, Now Meet the Family
Page 4

Students Frolic in Costa Rica
Page 6

Block Break Book Brief
Page 12

Yoster's Grand Slam Humiliates Cadets
Page 13

What's News?

Analyzing Current Issues

It is comforting to tuck World War II into its proper place in history books, as if it were no longer affecting us. Two leading news stories this week, however, challenge our impulse to bury World War II.

On Monday, April 20th Karl Linnas was deported to the Soviet Union where he has been sentenced to death for his role as commander of an Estonian concentration camp where approximately 12,000 people were executed. Linnas had been living in the US for thirty six years since 1951. He was first charged with illegal entrance into the US in 1979 when immigration officials charged that he was a war criminal and had entered the US under false pretenses. Up until then, Linnas had been living in Greenlawn, Long Island where he was a land surveyor. Since 1979, Linnas had been engaged in court battles to try to prevent his deportation. A last ditch effort, supported by Attorney General, Edwin Meese 3rd have sought alternatives to sending Linnas to the Soviet Union.

While Linnas is being held responsible for his actions during WWII, the U.S. government apparently is not. Solicitor General, Charles Fried informed the Supreme Court this week that although its decision 44 years ago to uphold the forced evacuation of Japanese Americans from the West Coast, was wrong and the detention was "deplorable," it is now too late for the victims to sue the Government for compensation.

A group of Japanese-Americans filed a suit against the Government in 1983 seeking damages for their upheaval during WWII. During the War, the Government claimed that the relocation was necessary for national security. The Supreme Court had upheld the decision. But since then the wartime action has come to be viewed as racist and unjustified.

"Is it time to exhume the grave of World War II?"

Meese 3rd, sought to gain refuge for Linnas in Panama. Initially, the Panamanian government agreed to accept Linnas, but last week issued a statement reversing that decision.

"Under American law," reports the New York Times; Mr. Linnas—who was born in Estonia and who was stripped of his citizenship in 1981 for lying about his past when he entered the country—must be deported to the Soviet Union if no other country accepts him."

The decision became final on the 20th when the Supreme Court voted 6-3 to refuse to extend an order that had blocked Linnas' forced departure. At 8:00 p.m. that evening, Linnas departed for the Soviet Union.

Linnas' case has inspired strong reactions, especially from the leaders of the Jewish community, most of whom cheered the decision. The Reagan Administration has been divided over the case. According to the New York Times, "Prosecutors in the office of Special Investigation strongly urged that [Linnas] be sent to the Soviet Union, citing what they called overwhelming evidence of his role in the persecution of Jews and others during WW II," others including Attorney General, Edwin Fried cited the six-year statue of limitations as support for his view that the government should not pay damages to the wronged Japanese Americans. Fried's logic drew an angry response from Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall who said, "When you pick up people and throw them out of their homes, is there any difference between that and murder? What is the difference between banishment and hanging?"

Both these recent cases remind us of horrors in the past. With the benefit of forty years of retrospective knowledge, we can now see how we allowed outrageous violations of the rights of Jews and Japanese Americans, among others. What still seems to be challenging us is how to deal with these transgressions of the past. No easy answers surface. Is retribution the answer? Should those who killed wrongfully during the war be killed themselves? Are we being hypocritical in our assessment of fault? What kind of standards can we base our decisions on when dealing with 45 year old actions? Most importantly, are we being consistent?

Should we keep the War buried? Is it resting in peace? Or is it time to exhume the grave of WWII? NEWS EDITORS

News Briefs

Senior Class Election Results

The results of the election for Senior Class Officers for the 87-88 year are as follows: President, Winston Hait; Vice-President, Debbie Roark; Secretary, Carrie Brown; Treasurer, Karl Ossentjuk.

CCCA Notes

We have very little money left, but only one more meeting in which to use it. Groups or individuals with proposals should have these in soon to the Budget Committee, as the first meeting of Ninth Block will be the last at which funding will be granted.

Many worthwhile events will fill the Ninth Block calendar, so don't get stuck without something to do as the year comes to an end.

CCCA has finished selecting student representatives to the Student-Faculty committees. Presently, we are midway through the budgeting process for next year's CCCA-chartered groups. Next year's CCCA budget will reflect fiscal prudence and contain a small increase in Student Activity Fees.

The big deal for next year is the opening of Worner Center. CCCA will allot space to campus groups and centralize planning and co-ordination of campus events. We hope to set good precedents for effective use of the new facilities.

Key words for CCCA in the coming year: accountability and communication. We will keep close watch on committee happenings and stay close to big issues as they come up on campus. We want to be certain that students are directly involved in setting CC's future course. Keep watching this space.

JON-MARK C. PATTERSON

DO NOT VANDALIZE
Fire Equipment

How much is your education at Colorado College worth to you? Is it worth one moment of fun? Is it worth playing with a fire hose or other fire equipment? Playing with fire equipment is not only dangerous, but illegal. If you get caught tampering with fire extinguishers, fire hoses, or any other fire safety equipment, not only can CC expel you, but the city of Colorado Springs can fine you up to three hundred dollars and sixty days in prison. This also goes on your permanent record, because you are all adults now, so please behave like adults should.

Decide for yourselves, a few minutes of fun and sixty days in jail plus a three hundred dollar fine or an education at CC. For me the choice seems obvious. Please don't tamper with the fire equipment, it just isn't worth it.

VANDAL

Correction

In last week's issue of the Catalyst, the pictures of Carrie Brown and Jeannie Smith were inadvertently reversed. We apologize for any confusion this mistake caused.

THE EDITORS

Marathon

Continued from p.1

his pre-race meal consisted of Fruit Loops and Pop Tarts. This year he sacrificed the traditional meal for a tasty McDonalds breakfast, which did not hamper his performance in the least.

This year's Boston Marathon "was probably the most controlled race I've ever run" says Banty. "I tried to pace for a 2:32 flat marathon of 5:48 miles. I paced just perfect up to about 19 miles." At point he reached the Newton Hills. Th a series of hills, the last of which is infamous "Heartbreak Hill" that "re tends to burn out runners." "The hills slow anybody down, but I was pr strong through the hills."

Banty then slowed his pace running minute miles until the final mile when really turned it on. His final time

Continued on p.

AIM HIGH

PUT YOUR COLLEGE DEGREE TO WORK.

Air Force Officer Training School is an excellent start to a challenging career as an Air Force Officer. We offer great starting pay, medical care, 30 days of vacation with pay each year and management opportunities. Contact an Air Force recruiter. Find out what Officer Training School can mean for you. Call

(303)528-1722 Collect

AIR FORCE

STUDY HARD.
TAKE A BREAK AT
THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE.
DO WELL ON YOUR TESTS.
CELEBRATE HOW WELL YOU'VE DONE. AND TREAT YOURSELF TO SOMETHING SPECIAL AT
THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE

Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm Sat. 11-5 pm

THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE

311 N. Tejon
Downtown

phone:
635-2118

THE DISPARAGING EYE

A Journal of General Interest

VOLUME 3 NUMBER 4 APRIL 24, 1987

The Papacy's New Course

BY JOSEPH PICKLE

The visit of Pope John Paul II to Chile this month may prove to be the turning point in his reign. Since his elevation to the Chair of St. Peter, John Paul has travelled widely. In this he follows the example set by Paul VI. It has become essential for the Pope of Rome to be visible throughout the world and cognizant of the world into which the Church is sent. Worldwide travel by the head of the Roman Catholic Church has been necessitated by the proliferation of voices within the church that challenge the authority of the Roman See. This challenge is not direct; very few Catholic theologians are calling for the displacement of the Papacy as the center of the administrative life of the Church. Nevertheless, there has been a tendency to insist that local churches and national bishops and even lay groups may provide teaching leadership for the church independently of the Pope. Such a position would have been unthinkable before Vatican II, the council which was called under the leadership of Pope John XXIII and Pope Paul VI. Since Vatican II, the ferment of ideas and insights and the willingness to enter into active involvement in the political, social and economic life, particularly in the third world, has marked the pluralization and diversification of Roman Catholicism. John Paul's personal and intellectual opposition is to resist such diversification and such decentralization.

John Paul is regarded by many, inside and outside the Roman Catholic Church, as a conservative (or reactionary) Pope. The effect of his leadership thus far has been to strengthen centralization of authority in the Vatican curia. This return to centralized hegemony after a period of theological and practical decentralization and growth of indigenous movements throughout the world has been regarded with alarm.

Even as the more traditional, conservative, administrative style and the disposition appoint conservative to reactionary bishops and archbishops in various parts of the world John Paul, himself, has insisted on the church's role in the quest for social justice and has said many things that would make conservative appointees shudder.

On his way to Chile where he was to be, at least in part, the guest of General Augusto Pinochet, the Pope called the Pinochet regime a dictatorship, and compared it to that of Marcos in the Philippines. When he was asked whether the church could play a role in the transformation of Chile from a dictatorship to a democracy comparable to the role it played in the Philippines, the Pope replied, "I think it is not only possible but necessary because this is part of the pastoral mission of the church."

John Paul has distinguished between dictatorial systems, such as that in Poland, and dictatorships. Within dictatorial systems the church must adapt and adjust to circumstances that cannot immediately be changed. In a dictatorship, the church must work to bring about a return to democracy as soon as possible. This is pretty heavy stuff!

In his first trip to Latin America, early in his reign, he confronted liberation theologians directly, insisting that there was no place in Roman Catholic doctrine for Marxist analysis or theory. Thus the conservative Pope. The same Pope at the same time insisted that traditional Catholic teaching required that the wealthy land owners and capitalist leaders of Mexico and Central America must participate in movements for land reform and social justice. Critics suggest this just substituted pious sentiment, easily ignored by wealth and power, for practical grass roots movements of social justice and revolution. The fact remains John Paul has spoken out for social justice at every turn, even as he has moved to regain control over the teaching office and the doctrinal formulations within the Church.

One might compare John Paul II with Pope Pius IX, elected as a young liberal in 1846, who turned out to be the most reactionary of all modern Popes. While analogies jump to mind, much is different. Pius dealt with a European church in a period of reactionary political restoration; John Paul faces an ever widening, ever unraveling, international social and political framework in which diversity and plurality are inescapable realities. Both have come to office amidst powerful revolutionary currents and both have surrounded themselves with reactionary counsel. But the Vatican Council of 1963 repudiated the Vatican Council of 1871; the Johannine vision of the second council is the inescapable precondition of today's Papacy. Even the "first among equals" finds himself engaged in dialogue with others.

John Paul went to Chile in part to restore the authority of the Papacy in areas where there is conflict between various bishops appointed by the Pope and his immediate predecessor. It was a pastoral visit to symbolically establish the wholeness of the church and its solidarity with the lowliest and simplest Christians John Paul is concerned about Latin America because it is the hothouse of the most extensive alternative theological perspective to his Papal centrism. Liberation theology flourishes in the oppression and persecution of "Christian" dictators. It challenges the comfortable assumptions of the wealthy and powerful in the name of the Gospel of Jesus, but in the company of unionists and marxists.

But a funny thing happened on the way to Santiago. Had the Pope intended simply to establish the authority and the primacy of his own more conservative appointees, such as Cardinal Juan Francisco Fresno Larrain, the Archbishop of Santiago, over radicals like Bishop Carlos Camus or Father Renaldo Munoz, he would not have begun his visit with a direct attack on the dictatorship of General Pinochet!

The political effect of the Pope's non-political visit was to weaken the Pinochet government's claims on the support of the church hierarchy, and to undercut the capacity of conservative bishops to control the embarrassing political statements and actions of their more radical colleagues. The ecclesiastical effect, on the other hand, was to align the Papacy with those leaders and lay people within the Church who are central to the opposition to Pinochet at the present time. Thereby he has reconciled, for the moment, the parties within the church in Chile. Thus, the Pope has managed to encourage those who have been most critical of him. He has strengthened the stance of the church as a leader for social justice in Latin America. He has, in effect, upstaged the Marxism he fears in the writings of the liberation theologians, with a combination of personal charisma and Biblical homily. The exciting picture of a Pope attacking a seated dictator and standing bravely in the midst of police attacks on demonstrators can be seen as a

See Pickle page 6

Freedom's Blinding Light

BY DANIEL A. ENGSTER

Our country was founded on the ideal of freedom. This freedom was concretely manifested in the protection of individual choice. The early American conception of politics rested heavily on the belief that government should impose as few restrictions as possible on the individual. Governmental power was limited to ensure this end. As the United States has grown, the protection of individual freedom of choice has evolved into an almost sacred belief. Measures that threaten to coerce the individual in any way are decried as tyrannical and illegitimate. Legislation promoting real improvements in health-care and education at the cost of freedom is attacked as being ultimately detrimental to both society and the individual. Free choice is conceived as an end unto itself, inviolate and absolute, regardless of its function. This fanatical protection of individual freedom is absurd. In reality, freedom is only tangentially related to the individual. The idea of an autonomous individual is flawed at its very base. The individual is not to be conceived as an elementary atom, separate from his or her environment. The individual nature is only an internalization of the external reality as presented, or taught, by society. The individual consciousness and unconsciousness are constituted through social interaction and experience. The hopes, desires, abilities, and thoughts of the individual are learned, rather than an expression of the individual's inner 'nature.' In other words, the personality itself is a product of the social environment. For example, artistic tastes and cultural preferences are entirely social constructions. Pierre Bourdieu writes in Distinction: "The encounter with a work of art is not 'love at first sight'...but presupposes an act of cognition, a decoding operation, which implies the implementation of a cognitive acquirement, a cultural code." This sort of socialized preference permeates all aspects of individuals' lives, including sexual preferences.

Individual ability is also learned, rather than a natural capacity. This is especially true in an industrial society such as ours. Numerous studies have

See Engster page 4

Person of the Month

Alexander Haig

BY DAVE MAKARECHIAN

Editor's Note: Every month, to keep the Eye from wandering off too far into the milieu of political theory, the Eye selects a significant newsmaker involved in a current issue or event. Whether good or bad, national or local, big name or little, if he has made news, we will write about him. Nominations for Person of the Month may be submitted to the Eye's editorial staff.

"I am in control here."

Five simple words, but five words that most identify with only one man: Alexander Haig.

This month General Haig earns Person of the Month honors for committing what many feel is political absurdity. Alexander Haig has officially declared his candidacy for president.

No, we're not kidding. In the words of Haig's comedian friend Mort Sahl, the general has officially "thrown his helmet into the ring."

Of course, the thought of a Haig presidency scares the hell out of most people. The general's reputation recalls visions of the final days of the Nixon presidency, a powerful NATO, dirty dealings with Henry Kissinger and the CIA in Vietnam, and an ultra-hardline foreign policy. Haig's name is almost synonomous with secrecy, military force, and above all, power.

A man like this in the White House—now there's a novel thought. If nothing else, the very possibility of a Haig presidency leads one to ask why he's making a run, if he's a serious candidate, and what a Haig candidacy means for the Republicans in 1988.

When asked why he's making a run for the White House, Haig has answered time and time again, "What have I got to lose?" Indeed, what does he have to lose? Since leaving the White House in Reagan's first term, Haig has become a millionaire—he has money to burn, and political consulting in Washington can't be expected to satisfy a former general and commander of NATO.

Haig has hinted that the time may be right (no pun intended) in the Republican party. 1988 promises to be a crossroads. The GOP will either swing back to the New Right control, or will take a more moderate stance in a sort of post-Reagan revolution mellowing. A rebirth of moderate elements is precisely the scenario that Haig will hope for.

Most analysts still see the GOP split into two major camps. On the one hand, there is the Reagan Right—the neoconservatives who established themselves during the landslide early 1980s. On the other hand, there are the older Nixon-Ford-Dole moderates, active in the 1970s but muscled out in the wake of the Reagan Revolution. Most expect that lame-duck defeats for Reagan throughout his second term, especially evidenced by the loss of the Senate in 1986, signal the end of New Right dominance. If Haig can swing enough votes away from Bob Dole-type moderates, and if, as expected, Dole shoots himself in the foot in the highly visible role of Senate Minority leader and White House-Congress moderator, Haig could emerge as a dark horse making a strong run.

But is Al Haig qualified to be president?

If one were to look at resumes only, Haig would appear to be among the most qualified contenders in the race. The sixty-two year old was a popular commander of NATO, former Secretary of State, four star general, and White House Chief of Staff. He has been equally successful in the private sector, establishing himself as a force on lobbying matters, and running a number of large business ventures.

The Haig public persona has definite appeal to some voters. He capitalizes on the bad-ass image—appearing flashy in public, always tan, always confident, and always in control. He has tried to temper hs image, however, creating a "call me Al" campaign, being friendly, and willing to talk.

And Haig is not without a political base. Although his support is miniscule at this time, his political action committee, The Committee for America, has raised $700,000. Haig's military-industrial complex buddies are giving in a big way—his campaign staff expects to have $5 million by next year.

But these factors notwithstanding, the most important element in the Haig candidacy is Haig the man.

The double-edged sword of the Haig campaign is his name recognition factor. He is the first to point out that almost as many people know his name as know George Bush's. However, Haig is also the first to admit that most of this name recognition is negative. The potential for a serious candidacy hinges on his ability to convert negative recognition to positive.

At this point, most Republican experts are discounting any possible influence from the Haig candidacy. Most expect him to spend a lot of money, and to get beat.

But anyone who has ever had anything to do with Alexander Haig knows never to expect anything from the general. In a nutshell, the man always has something up his sleeve.

The thought of a Haig presidency is indeed scary at this point. But the thought of a Haig candidacy is not. He has confounded the Republican establishment time and time again, and has, in every situation he's ever been in, played a decidedly important role. It is time for the Republican establishment to again be shaken up—to jostle out the New Right establishment.

For a task like this, Alexander Haig gets my vote.

The Ed's Box

This week's Eye deals with a variety of issues that we believe to be important to the CC community.

A recurring theme of the Eye this semester has been the condition and future of human freedom. As this is a very vague topic it may be difficulkt for the individual reader to decide just what constitutes a free being. Is it the yellowing guarantees of long dead statesmen? Or is freedom a thing that cannot be codified and thus is the more difficult to grasp?

As members of a society that prides itself on the recognition and protection of what are essentially property rights, are we necessarily the best judges of what universal freedom is? Perhaps not. Being that we also see ourselves as the guardians of liberty in the world, does the aforementioned limitation make our defense a source of oppression?

When we think of the freedoms and liberties that we enjoy as members of the American experiment, we must also realize that these are unique to our system. The sense of freedom in America was created by the combination of 1) economic growth potential, 2) thoughtful, educated leadership, and 3) an inherently liberal minded populace. When our modern state was brought forth, there existed a vast continent that was assumed to have unlimited natural resources. The ability and desire to exploit this region gave the nation a great economic advantage that cannot be realized in the states of today.

Leaders such as Franklin, Madison, Hamilton and Jefferson, who were the unique products of the Enlightenment, gave us the intellectual basis for the creation of an experimental state. In modern times, while there has been no shortage of social engineers promising liberation, there has been a conspicuous lack of thinkers who can actually deliver both change and freedom. The modern world is inundated with zealous guerillas who have stumbled through Marx and determined that violence is the only pathway to salvation. This is indicative of the fundamental lack of a laboratory such as the United States in which experiments in freedom may be conducted without drawing the wrath of the rest of the world community.

If we also take into account the third point, that ours is an experimentally minded populace, then the problems grow greater. Americans are a people forged in the furnace of social change. Our nation was built out of the varied desires and needs for freedom that other societies were incapable of delivering. The exodus of people to our shores is greater today than at any time in our history. It shows us that there is no other state in the world with the ability to cater to the needs of its people in the way we can.

But the question still persists as to whether or not ours is the answer to the quest for human freedom. Dan Engster (one of the original co-founders of The Eye) casts freedom into a negative light in this issue. Dan criticizes the American concept of freedom as a roadblock to the solving of pressing social problems facing society. Specifically, Dan lists egalitarianism as a greater, more noble goal and then the outdated, overly sacrosanct concept of individual liberty. Dan's idealistic version of freedom is one in which there is less exploitation of individuals by other individuals. Presumably, the prescription for reducing exploitation would lie in institutionalized methods. That is to say, the state would be expected to ensure social justice.

Our country is perhaps the most libertarian and prosperous the world has ever known. True, the American "experiment" was conducted under favorable circumstances, the gist of which we alluded to earlier. But our success lies in our belief in the individual, as opposed to the institutional. Our brilliant forefathers experienced the oppression which institutions can sometimes bring about. Granted, institutions have no monopoly over oppression; there exists many oppressive individuals in our world. But institutions are much harder to check and control than individuals.

The point is this: our Founding Father's firm belief in the individual rights and individual potential—and their weariness of institutions have been the key to America's liberty and prosperity. Most of the immigrants coming into America are coming from lands where liberty nor prosperity exists; but where powerful institutions and extreme inequality DO exist. In some of these societies (chiefly totalitarianism) the prescribed goal is in fact individual sacrifice for the "good of the whole." ("Comrade, you MUST sacrifice for the good of the proletariat...) Yes, individual liberties have to be sacrificed so that BIG BROTHER ensures that "the masses" get their fair share.

Yet in these self-proclaimed classless societies, where dependence on institutions reigns supreme, social inequality still exists while individuals are robbed not only of freedom, but also of incentive, creativity, and any optimism for the future. Why is this so? Because institutions take advantage of their power and obliterate opposition. In order for progress to take place—ANY progress, there has to exist a plurality.

STAFF

Brian Smith & Norm Leahy .... Editors-In-Chief

Juan Calderon & Bill Porter .... Art Editors

Karl Ossentjuk, Steve Geraghty & Dave Makarechian .... Associate Editors

Karen Willoughby .... Copy Editor

Dave Fitzgerald .... Layout Editor

Contributors: Prof. Joseph Pickle, Dan Engster, Robert Jurkiewicz, Greg Archer, Matt Sanidas, Suzie Klein, Inger Thomsen, Allison Scott, and Jon-Mark Patterson.

Linda Shireman .... Typesetter

Modern Enlightenment

BY INGER THOMSEN

The Enlightenment, also called the Age of Reason, took place in the 17th and 18th centuries and was characterized by an increased faith in the power of reason to change human life, largely due to the many scientific discoveries which took place during this age, such as those of Newton.

In his First Discourse, J.J. Rousseau posed the question whether this enlightenment—specifically the advancement of the sciences and the arts—was beneficial. Rousseau makes the point that this enlightenment is not the final stage of enlightenment for human beings, and shows that the Age of Reason has not been beneficial for the masses because of two basic problems: the conflict between virtue and knowledge and the conflict between the material and the moral. These same two problems were later addressed by Kant and Hegel when they discussed Reason and have caused basic characteristics of modern liberal political theory.

According to Rousseau, enlightenment began when Man left the state of nature and substituted reason for instinct. The capacity for reasoning is what separates Man from animals. Reason, however, has also led men to decay. As Rousseau quotes from Seneca: "Since learned men have begun to appear among us, good men have disappeared." Through Reason, Man seeks to gain knowledge of, and to control, Nature in order to satisfy his imagination, which increases with knowledge. Once imagination has first been excited by the consciousness of its power over Nature, "one can desire or fear things only through the ideas one can have of them": therefore, imagination can be thought of as the idea which goads Reason onward to gain more knowledge of the world. Consequently, the development of art, science, and culture has been going on since the development of Reason, and are merely manifestations of Man desiring to understand or change Nature to suit his imagination. The advancement of arts and sciences in Rousseau's time was, according to Rousseau, only different in that human beings were now conscious of their process of enlightment; this consciousness "increased [Man's] superiority over the other animals by making him aware of his superiority." This increase in self-consciousness in turn increased Man's imagination and his desire for knowledge. However, thinking and imagining are causes of permanent dissatisfaction among human beings because they enable them to imagine states better than their own. Therefore, Rousseau hopes to increase Man's self-consciousness to an extreme so that Man would feel completely alienated with his present state. This alienation would free the human imagination to conceive of a future state independent of the present. Rousseau concludes that Reason is the only cure for the decay caused by Reason, and therefore philosophers must philosophize to end the need for philosophers.

The decay caused by Reason is due to the incompatibility of virtue and knowledge for the masses. Scientific discoveries excite the imagination and make men equate all knowledge with scientific knowledge, which is the conquering of Nature for Man's purposes. With this excess of imagination, Man forgets virtue and his natural reverence for Nature. Reason is limited by Nature: "progress of the mind has been precisely proportioned to the needs that people...received from nature." But imagination is boundless. Therefore knowledge for the masses becomes "reason without wisdom," and becomes entangled in vice. Knowledge and education "establish a difference between cultivated minds and those which are not," augmenting natural inequality and causing ambition, jealousy, and artifice. In their turn, the vices generate the need for art and science: "the sciences and arts owe their birth to our vices." Rousseau condemns the forgetting of virtue through knowledge. He says that an enlightenment should teach men "not merely pleasant enlightenment, but also salutary teachings." Like the Spartans, when we educate a man, we should do so to "make him good, not to make him learned."

In saying this, Rousseau shows that he values natural virtue over acquired knowledge. He calls pity the "sole natural virtue" which "precedes [Man] in the use of all reflection." Therefore, virtue preceded Reason in the natural state, and acquired science is not necessary to lead a moral life. The only science which is natural to man, and does need imagination to emerge, is the innate science of virtue: "O virtue! sublime science of simple souls...are not your principles engraved in all hearts?"

However, Rousseau is not against science or Reason as such. It is only its motivation and use that is corrupted. Scientific knowledge must not be equated with all of knowledge; therefore, only a few can equate knowledge with virtue—those who keep in mind the ancient ideals of virtue to moderate their imagination. Rousseau is so far from criticizing science itself that he says the only way to stop the corruption and unhappiness of Man is for virtue and science to be united through political power: "virtue, science, and authority...working together for the felicity of the human race."

The second problem of the enlightenment according to Rousseau is the conflict between material and moral, extending the spiritual conflict of knowledge vs. virtue to the physical realm. The arts and sciences can be seen as the external, material manifestation of the internal, moral characteristics of a society. The development of the arts and sciences not only reflects, but affects the moral state of the society. Rousseau tells us that material aggrandizement and luxury always accompany the development of the arts and sciences: "luxury rarely develops without the sciences and arts, and they never develop without it," and that "luxury is diametrically opposed to good morals." The luxury of free time or idleness enables the arts and sciences to grow, and the discoveries of science make daily life easier for people, giving them more free time. The growth of luxury and the multiplying needs caused by luxury result in the decay of Man's morals: "Vices were never carried further than when they could be seen, ...propped up on columns of marble, and engraved on corinthian capitals at the entry of great men's palaces."

For Immanuel Kant in his Essays On History, the Age of Reason is also not true enlightenment; however, it is a step toward enlightenment—the "freedom from tutelage" or complete internal authority for human beings. True enlightenment for Kant is neither for the individual nor even for the individual society or generation; instead it can only be for the human race. Man's natural capacities "are to be fully developed only in the race, not in the individual." For Kant, each age contributes to "general enlightenment," which is cumulative. The individual enlightenment (the acquisition of knowledge to enable freedom from tutelage) of each citizen is only important as it contributes to the general enlightenment process: "it is

Continued on p. 8

Letters to the Editor

Mak Attack

To the Editors:

I found the article titled "Why Gay Rights?" to be confusing and illogical. Possibly I am misinterpreting the author's intent, but I would like to respond to a couple of the articles points that I do not understand.

The article makes the assertion that individuals earn rights, and opposes "any philosophy or code of ethics that bestows rights on groups of individuals because of certain characteristics." I assume that when a reference to rights is made, it means legal rights. Yet, rights are not morally defined, they are legally defined. Therefore rights are never earned, they can only be bestowed by the legal framework of the constitution.

As for bestowing rights on groups of individuals because of certain characteristics, the purpose of the Gay Rights Movement is not to obtain the right to be gay. The Civil Rights Movement did not succeed in giving blacks the right to be black. The Women's Movement did not succeed in giving women the right to be women. How can a biological fact be given a legal right? Activists for the Gay Rights Movement are merely demanding that the rights given to all individuals by the Constitution are upheld. The Constitution already protects individuals from discrimination due to biological characteristics. Gays are demanding the right of protection against discrimination. Discrimination against rights they already hold. Gay rights activists are not asking for special priviledges. The issue is not of gaining rights, but of protecting them.

I also question what unlimited freedom means. If citizens are granted rights by a constitution, they are also confined to it. The right of private property does not include in any way the right to discriminate. For example, the owner of any business may hire whomever she/he chooses, but they do not have the right to discriminate against an individual because of some irrelevant biological characteristic.

The article also speaks of human rights. Who can argue that gay rights are only a facet of human rights? Yet, it should be kept in mind that in the liberal-western tradition it is gays that are discriminated against and must fight to protect their human rights, thus the term gay rights.

Gay awareness is necessary. As the article points out, discrimination is irrational and i would add detrimental to society. However gay rights are also necessary and needed to protect those people which are denied their legal rights. Gay rights at CC, fine.

Shannon McGee

Protest Passe

To the Editors:

When I left school a year ago, the Contra vs. Sandinista and El Salvador conflict was the big issue on campus as it had been for a couple of years, but was already fading out of the lime light being eclipsed by the South Africa-Divestment crisis. So while in Costa Rica, I became more informed as to the facts involved in the conflict in Central America by talking to refugees, Contras, Costa Ricans, and reading the newspapers and other articles. I thought when I came back I would discuss the once hot issue with the politically aware and informed of the Colorado College campus, but as I have said it just is not the in thing anymore. I would like to bring the Nicaragua issue back to life just for a moment since people are still suffering daily in that war. In a sense, I would like to honor and respect the Nicaraguan and Salvadorian peoples' courage to fight, suffer, and if necessary die for their way of life. Yet, nothing really has changed in the situation and the threat of the war escalating and expanding exists and is a real fear in every Central American's mind. A solution has not been found. The reasons the issue became important in the first place have not disappeared, nor will they simply because they do not make the headlines in the United States anymore. Like Sushi, the skateboard, the hula-hoop, and Hawaiian shorts, fads like political issues come and go.

I propose a new fad issue for the politically aware of our campus to take on for next year, but first I would like to review past noble and forgotten causes, some close to home. There were women's rights, save the whale, farms of America, racism, illiteracy, starvation and malnutrition, poverty, gun control, deforestization, acid rain, the homeless, illegal aliens, debt crisis, genocide, civil war and Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia, civil war in Sri Lanka, the Philippines, Lebanon, Ireland, Soviet occupation of Afganistan, and all out war between Iran and Iraq and an infinite number of other forgotten issues.

The new political issue I would propose would be protesting Hawaiian volcanoes, because of the necessity to appease them by sacrificing a virgin yearly. I would organize marches, speeches, possibly investment, have a mini-series, new fashions, music, and hula dancing—you know, the whole spiel. We would have to organize resistance against the volcano goddess Pele, because she, being a real conservative, would object.

I take political issues seriously and like to be well informed on an issue before I take a stand. I only ask that my fellow students do the same. Their opinions can and do make a difference and change policy. Their actions can change lives of others. Protest not because it is vogue but because you believe in it.

Louis Van Dyke

"...Once They've Seen Gay Paris"

BY GREG ARCHER & MATTHEW SANIDAS

Paris. Expresso cafe. Champs Elysees. Parlez francais? Upon arrival in Paris, with Prof. Harvey Rabbin for a month long seminar in French philosophy, we were thrown into the jaws of a cultural potpourri that significantly changed us. It was a helpless feeling but also a feeling of wonder. From the first moment, we developed an inquisitive nature because, from the city's outside, it appears that so much is hidden within. Like any big city, there are the crowds of people, the unending traffic jams, the cliques of bums, the stench of the metro, and the immensity of the buildings. However, Paris is different from all the other big cities of the world because one does not lose the feeling of individuality. Due to the diversity of the population, one can feel free within ones individuality instead of trying to search for a false identity. There are no norms nor are there standards that must be followed. Paris is a city of life where everyone can express his or her own feelings without worrying about the opinions of others. All forms of expression are accepted without ridicule. Therefore, upon our arrival to this thriving metropolis, we were struck by the diversity of the population and its outward expressions that we observed in everyday life.

To begin one must decide what one wants to do. One can never ask the question, "What is there to do?" There is everything to do and so little time to do it. In our case, the importance of drinking and eating led us through the maze of the metro to our destinations. There are so many sidewalk cafes and corner grocery stores that we were never out of resources. In our travels through the sinewy streets, we encountered many restuarants and bars that appealed to our tastes. Although we would have loved to wine and dine in the most expensive, our resources restricted us to the least. We prefered to eat french fries smothered with mustard, drinking our half-liter bottles of Swinkel's beer along the Seine river for a mere $1.25. Needless to say, we were never at a lack of places to eat and drink. After having fulfilled our "gourmandise" for the better things in life, we were faced with the reality of what to do next. Our thoughts were answered by the wide variety of museums and monuments that are located in Paris.

Depending on the time of day, our favorite activities included an afternoon climb to the top of the Eiffel Tower or playing frisbee in the Jardin de Luxembourg. We frequently found ourselves in any one of the many gardens reading modern French literature or just simply enjoying the day. When the weather was bad, we reverted to the indoors. This usually included a self guided tour of many museums and monuments of Paris. In these monuments and museums, we saw the history of France and its great architects and artists. Due to the multitude and magnitude of these historical landmarks, one can easily and often does become numb. This is to say that a comprehensive understanding is difficult to attain because there are so many styles and eras that it becomes hard to distinguish one from another. As a result, the individuality of each is compromised.

But in contrast to the grandeur of these national monuments and museums, we were also treated to the reality of the misery and degredation of the poor. Paris is a city that exemplifies both ends of the social spectrum and everything in between. Through our encounters with the various cliques of poor throughout the city, we observed how a country with such grandeur and colorful history could also support a group of people that can hardly survive except by the pity of others. In our nightly exploits, we frequently were asked for spare change or even the last sip of our drink. It was an incredible experience. We saw so many things that took many years of construction and manpower but we also saw how the community had collapsed during later years. We saw and experienced how a society with its history of wars and eventual European domination had changed with the advent of modern history to a society with its vices. Among these are the sexual vices that are extremely easy to find. One can circle the Port Dauphine for a "menage a trois" or stroll the Ave. Foche for couple exchanging. While walking in the Bois De Bologne, it is not uncommon to find Brazilian transvestites. And on the Rue St. Denis, one can find more prostitutes per square foot than any other area in the world. Needless to say, Paris has changed with the times.

After a month in Paris, we were physically, emotionally and intellectually drained. Paris according to our experience with the diverse cultures, pushes the individual to mold his or her own fundamental ideals to a point where he or she can function within this society of grandiose differences. The diversity challenges the individual to accept as opposed to reject. If one is not able to accept the reality of Paris, he or she is forced to create walls which separate the outside world from the inside world of sheltered values and ideals. In order to fully appreciate Paris. It is imperative to remain open. Whether open or closed, any individual will emerge from the experience with a different perspective of the world. And perhaps this perspective may never be fully realized if the individual denies the existence of DIFFERENCE.

A Hartless Campaign?

BY BILL PORTER

What's a Coloradan to do?

At long last, one of our "native sons" is running for president, and I keep thinking to myself: "Gee whiz! Wouldn't it be swell if a Coloradoan became the leader of the entire United States!"

But then I remember who the person is who's running.

Now, Gary Hart is a nice guy. And he's trying really hard to be our next president. He's had all sorts of thought-provoking forums on important political stuff, and he's even visited Russia and talked with ol' Gorbachev. The Denver Post even did a humongous article a few days ago asking who will be Hart's running mate. Overall, he really seems to have some strong ideas on what needs to be done after the debacle of the Reagan years.

But I just don't know...

I think he's trying too hard to be president, and I really wonder if he can transform all his exciting new ideas into concrete programs.

Everyone talks about how "aloof" and "distant" Hart is. And while this is not necessarily a bad characteristic in a person (remember "Silent Cal"?), you really have to wonder whether Hart is even "in touch" with the people who would elect him. He often seems an idealistic thinker up and away on a cloud somewhere—too concerned with the great problems of world affairs to even notice us small folk. His smile even looks fake.

Hart, however, is making every attempt to get away from these stereotypes. And this is what really upsets me. In desperately trying to be the perfect candidate, he's projecting a false image of himself.

Take a look at his speech officially announcing him as a candidate for the presidency. He held it at Red Rocks park to show what a "love for nature" he has—isn't that overdoing it just a bit? Further, he even refused to wear an overcoat because he was going to be "one with nature;" so instead, he shivered in the bitter wind and snow flurries. Even worse, he made a point of mentioning to everyone how he had memorized his speech and was not going to use cards or a tele-prompter. While this was certainly a nice touch, I think the novelty of it was rather tarnished when Hart stressed how the memorization of this speech would show the American people that he was not aloof. In other words, he's going out of his way and doing things he normally doesn't do to show the voters what he's really like. Does this make sense?

And how about the placement of his campaign headquarters? While national headquarters are here in Colorado, his fund-raising offices are in Washington (talk about terrible disorder and high costs of plane fares/telephone bills). It seems Hart just can't make up his mind. Does he want to be known as a diplomatic, experienced gentleman at the pulsebeat of the nation, or a down-home country hick still in touch with the electorate?

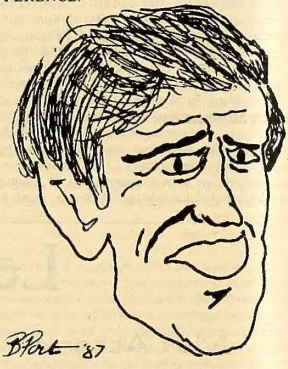
Most importantly, those tacky cowboy boots have got to go. Sorry to shock you like this Gary, but almost no one wears those things any more, even in such an upbeat place like Colorado. They're passe, and they look simply horrendous with a three-piece suit. Besides, when was the last time you led a herd of cattle across the plains?

And then there's Hart's debt. Yes, I realize presidential campaigns are not generally known for their "scrupulous repayments," but one does have to think about the credentials of a man who can't even rent a car from a New Hampshire car dealer. With all this talk of a tremendous national deficit, I've got some doubts about Hart's ability to manage cash. Maybe CC's Karl "Frankly, folks, I just love loot" Ossentjuk could help him out; but that's assuming a lot, as well.

With all this in mind, it's no wonder the National Democratic Committee is scared stiff that he might get the party's nomination. (That previous piece of evidence was discovered by me, your ever-diligent, under-cover reporter in D.C. a few weeks ago.)

Hart just seems too concerned with his image. In spending so much time trying to fine tune it, he's virtually forgotten to deal with the issues. All his exciting "New Ideas" have somehow gotten shuffled around and lost in a bundle of P.R. and hairdressing bills. Instead of smiling to the camera and shivering at Red Rocks, Hart should be constantly and carefully explaining what he plans to do in '88. What is his platform any way...advocation of dental floss?

Now, I'm not a Hart-hater, and this article was not meant as a Hart-bashing type of thing. Heck, I still may vote for the guy. I'm just hoping he'll answer a few more questions before the November elections roll around.



Engster continued

concluded that there is a direct correlation between individual consciousness and individual ability. As stated before, consciousness is a social construction. Specifically, the majority of consciousness formation occurs within the family. Within the family, there is a tendency for parents to produce in their offspring a consciousness specifically tailored for economic positions roughly comparable to their own (see studies by Melvin Kohn). Thus, individuals' ability is pre-determined by the family and sub-culture.

The individual is hardly free. Individual choices are merely the reflections of social tendencies. Yet, this country unrelentingly protects this freedom in opposition to progressive egalitarian reform. Why? Because the facade of freedom has blinded the general public. The disadvantaged in our society feel that they are to blame for their failure and frustrations. Believing in the ideal of freedom, these individuals think: "If I don't escape from the woodwork, it is because I didn't develop my powers enough." Meanwhile, those people who benefit from the system attribute their success to their wonderful personal abilities. The result: both groups believe in freedom, and neither questions the validity of the socialization processes.

Freedom has stagnated our society. It limits real improvement in society for an unreal ideal. Adherence to freedom in the face of other urgent social problems is absolutely unwarranted. Freedom has outgrown its welcome in America; it is time the sacrosanct protection of freedom yields to more beneficial ideals.

Silence and Persuasion

SUZIE KLEIN

One great philosopher once said, "You must either suade it (a ruling power) or obey its orders, and ure in silence whatever it instructs you to endure, ther blows or bonds, and if it leads you into war to wounded or killed, you must obey. "The losopher suggests that you must give up all your ers to an authority. His words offend because they note mindless sheep that shuffle along enduring in ence while a leader herds them wherever the son pleases. A follower can only "persuade" its ing power to do justice. Though the tone is grim, re is some truth to his thoughts on silence and suasion. Social groups in Spain and Mexico show t sometimes silence is effective, while other times it nexcusable.

In Mexican society men and women have two inct roles. The male is the dominant figure who ks outside the home while the woman maintains a oductive family environment. Women busy mselves with going to the market, getting food on table, and advising family members. Men, on the her hand, bring money home, discuss politics, and ovide security. Women avoid projecting their view—nts, unless directed to female friends. Men show ir dominance by telling others their wives' opinions d treating them as objects. She is pretty to look at d pretty to hold. It is also important, here, to notice t the language is a manifestation of male minance. For example you don't say this is my wife, u say this is my woman. You also say that you quered a woman if you won her over. Male minance is a chocolate-covered coating, or more popularly called by Alen Ridding in his book Distant Neighbors, a Mexican mask. And this appearance, or "mask," makes the male seem as though he is in charge of everything. The verbs "covered" and "seem" effectively depict the situation because events taking place inside the private family circle are quite different.

The Mexican mother, instead of the father, actually is the core of the household. She guides and directs, comforts and coaxes. All problems such as a child's bad grades, a demanding boss, a difficulty in payment —are delegated to her. All family members, especially the husband, utilize her sacred advice and commands. She can help those with problems and, in many cases, take control. A Mexican middle class worker, for example, always joked that he was a poor man because all the family bank accounts were under his wife's name. Thus, even though the Mexican woman, in public "endures in silence" and gives up her liberty to the authoritative man, in private she actually commands. She has gained leverage and respect for her silence.

Contrary to being silent, the word "persuade" suggests a more active role. As citizens people must never give up or ignore the right to guide and direct. For example, one can constructively criticize, without breaking laws, by writing a member of Congress, or having group discussions where people pool their opinions. Sometimes, just bringing awareness to a subject causes change. It is the duty of all citizens to help their country perfect itself so it is essential that each person be actively involved. If people ignore this duty they have no right to criticize their government's actions.

One social group, in Spain, has disassociated itself from the community, and therefore has lost all of its authority to criticize. The "Nueva Moda" ("The new style" or equivalent to the American Yuppie) ignores politics and directs its attention instead, to such things as fashions, fast cars, and fine food. During Franco's life, in order to survive, people could not publicly or openly oppose the Franco regime because if they disagreed with Franco they were quickly punished. Unfortunately, after his death some people, such as those in the Nueva Moda, found it possible to brush politics aside. Members of the Nueva Moda ignore who is in power and the ruler's decisions because their lives, they think, do not depend on politics. Since the Nueva Moda isolates itself and lives in its own egocentric world, the group can only suffer the consequences of whatever their government decides to do.

Though the words, "enduring in silence" give negative connotations of being lukewarm or neutral, at times it is better to keep quiet on certain issues. Remaining silent and obeying orders can give an unexpected power to an individual such as the Mexican mother. Yet, on the other extreme, people must never ignore this duty to persuade, criticize, pool thoughts, and direct their family, small community, or nation towards perfection. The people in the Nueva Moda live in a numb self-centered world where their beliefs and actions disregard and jeopardize their nation's future. The trick is to establish a balance between the two, knowing when to remain silent and when to speak out.

Corporatism and Peron

BRIAN M. SMITH

Latin American civilization may be viewed as a endent of Southern European culture and itutions. That is to say, Latin America's iopolitical development has been greatly luenced by the beliefs and traditions which the quistadores brought with them to the New World.
Howard J. Wiarda writes: "In terms of the history Western civilization, Latin America was founded a basis that was precapitalistic, preenlightenment,
-Protestant Reformation, pre-scientific revolution, d prerepresentative government." The Latin erican colonies would maintain their feudalistic, horitarian and oligarchic nature long after the luences of English culture and institutions were oduced into North America.

Latin America's tradition of corporatism, as derived m its Iberian roots, is defined as "...a system of erest representation in which the constituent units organized into a limited number of singular, mpulsory, noncompetitive, hierarchically ordered d functionally differentiated categories, recognized licensed (if not created) by the state and granted a liberate representative monopoly within their pective categories in exchange for observing certain trols on their selection of leaders and articulation demands and supporters." Applied to a political mension, state corporatist systems represent an portant part of Latin American rule, both past and sent. These systmes "...are distinguished by their ensive use of formal mechanisms to regulate the tivities of social groups."

Corporatists reject both capitalist and Marxist ws as applied to Latin America. They feel that in der for development to occur in Latin America, it ust happen within the corporatist culture inherent in society. The role of the state must be central with avoidance of extreme individualsim or class nflict. As I will demonstrate, the reign of Juan Peron sents an example of the role of corporatism in Latin erican politics.

The Ascent of Populism and Juan Peron

During the 1930's and early 1940's in Argentina, a e migration from the countryside to the cities rticularly Buenos Aires) took place. These grants made up a huge number of potential voters.
the Conservatives who were in power at the time re not interested in tending to the needs of these new an dwellers. The conservatives maintained power until 1940. In 1940, the Radicals obtained a Congressional majority so as to check the power of the Conservative president. In 1943 the military deposed the Conservative government and set up a military administration. Gradually, power would become more "...concentrated in the hands of a colonel who was to dominate the course of Argentine politics for the next thirty years: Juan Domingo Peron."

Peron became Secretary of Labor under the new military regime. He immediately began a campaign to win working class support. He helped to form new unions and strengthen the ones already in existence. His Labor Department also expanded in size and was given jurisdiction over a large number of labor-related areas, such as legal, health, pensions and social security programs. The department's expanded role helped Peron to push progressive labor legislation, as well as to enforce existing laws.

Peron was chosen as the candidate of the "hastily formed" Argentine Labor Party in the 1946 presidential election. "Although opposed by a single candidate representing all the nation's other political parties, Peron won."

A Look at Peron — His Downfall and His Resurgence

Juan Peron increasingly moved toward authoritarian rule throughout his nine years in power. He censored the press and harassed or imprisoned opposition leaders. In addition, he increasingly lost the support of the Church (an institution that had initially shown strong support for Peron). "Although Peron had the near total support of the Church in 1946, by 1951 its position had changed to neutrality and by 1955 to complete opposition." Peron initially favored religious instruction in the schools. By 1955, however, his administration had legalized divorce and prostitution. His regime also began to put clergymen in jail and discontinue religious instruction in the schools.

Juan Peron was deposed in September, 1955. He then went into exile for the next eighteen years. But many Argentine people still believed in both Peronism and Juan Peron himself. Peron possessed a high degree of charisma, as well as the ability to consolidate power. As stated by Madsen and Snow: "Perhaps the allegiance of some followers was easily transferred to secondary leaders (of the Peronist movement); but no doubt, there were many others who remain(ed) steadfast in their loyalty to Peron in spite of the fact that he may no longer have been relevant to their needs."

Indeed, the Peronist party managed to remain active in Argentine politics. The party was again legalized in 1958 and won the 1962 elections. In the elections of March 1973, the Peronist candidate, Hector Campora, easily won the election vis vis the rest of the competitors. Upon his inauguration he gave political amnesty and generally moved the government in a leftward direction. After 30 days, however, he resigned and a new election took place. Both the candidate and the victor in the new presidential election was none other than....Juan Peron!

Upon taking power, Peron moved the government back toward the right. He removed leftist governors from office and replaced Marxist administrators in the universities. he also sided with the conservative wing of the Peronists against the more radical, left-wing youth sector. But Peron did not stay in office for very long, for on July 1, 1974, he died. Power was left to his widow, Isabella, whom the military arrested shortly thereafter.

The Peronists remained a political force in Argentina, but in the election of October 1983, the Peronist candidate lost by a relatively large margin to the Radical candidate, Raul Alfonsin. Alfonsin has been in power ever since.

High Premium on Litigation

BY STEVE GERAGHTY

This Saturday, thousands of med school hopefuls will sit in large rooms answering hundreds of multiple guess questions. Their goal is to do well enough to get into a medical school—so that some day they might have an M.D. after their names. There are other people that are cheering for those two letters: moms, dads, siblings, close friends, and insurance companies. Yes, even insurance companies. The more doctors they can insure, the more money they rake in from malpractice premiums.

The hardest hit area of medicine has been obstetrics and gynecology. The insurance premiums for malpractice have become so high in this field that they eat up as much as 50% of a doctor's gross income. Subtract other overhead costs that I haven't mentioned, and the picture becomes even clearer: some doctors can't afford to stay in practice. This is forcing small town doctors (and others) to have to leave their practices, while at the same time putting expectant mothers in the position of travelling hours just to hear that their developing child is fine; or, if there is an emergency, delays in attention and appropriate action become long enough to border on dangerous. And all of this just because insurance premiums have skyrocketed.

Why would the insurance premiums have increased by so much, particularly with small town doctors who have been in practice for decades without any malpractice lawsuits on their records? When the insurance companies figure out car premiums, they rely heavily on statistics. Age group (the older the better), past driving record (no tickets or accidents, no ridiculous premium), school performance (do well there, do well driving too), and marital status (a spouse to show gets big cuts) are all figured in to determine what amount is owed to them every six months. Yet with doctors, all of these criteria are seemingly ignored; an ob-gyn is an ob-gyn, regardless of location of practice or current "track record." Why is this case?

Because people have lost a sense of responsibility for their actions; because nothing is out of our control, somebody can always be blamed for things going wrong. Because the courts have retired the precedent that some cases are just too frivolous to hear. Because juries have stretched compassion to new (monetary) limits. Because lawyers know that any case has the chance to rake in big bucks. Because the press has sensationalized some cases to such extremes that people realize that the "American dream" can be achieved by one simple lawsuit. So they file lawsuits for millions of dollars—in true deep-pocket theory fashion—that the courts expect to hear, and the circle begins again.

A few years ago, three men went out on a fishing expedition. The weathermen weren't predicting the greatest day in the world out on the ocean. Yet still the fishermen went out; after all, their route would take them by a National Weather Service bouy that would give them all the information that they would need. But it didn't because it was broken. The vital information that foretold of the (already hinted at) coming storm was unavailable. The fishermen died in the ensuing hurricane-like storm. So the families of these three men sued the National Weather Service for close to five million dollars—and they won. Thirty years ago, the fishermen would have been responsible for going out on the ocean with a storm possible; today, thanks to technology and weather bouys, the National Weather Service is held accountable for the actions of fishermen.

A few years ago, an airplane made an unexpected "landing" in a suburban New Orleans neighborhood. A number of houses were destroyed, and a number weren't. But that didn't stop those who weren't involved in any of the destruction from filing lawsuits. Their claim was mental distress; the fact that an airplane had crashed in their neighborhood caused them to be emotionally disturbed for some time. The suit reached the courts, but I don't know the jury's decision. That doesn't really matter yet; the fact that it made the courtroom does.

Two years ago, a suit in which the families of two people dead from lung cancer sued the tobacco companies making the cigarettes which their relatives smoked, finally reached the courtroom. The lawsuit claimed that the tobacco companies should have had a warning on their cigarette cartons stating that smoking might be harmful to the smokers health—these warnings coming before any studies had been done on the effects of smoking. The jury ended up deliberating for a few days before finally reaching a decision—the tobacco companies were in no way negligent. Good call. This decision could very well have returned the precedent to the courts that some lawsuits are too ridiculous to be heard. But it hasn't.

The American public has become obsessed with lawsuits. Anything that goes wrong anywhere is now open for a lawsuit. A hot water heater blows up in a house, and the owners can sue. It is irrelevant that the signs were there—indicating that the hot water heater needed to be replaced—the company should never produce a product that might explode, regardless of age. A drunk college student approaches a fraternity party and is turned away at the door. As the student leaves, he trips on the sidewalk and falls, injuring himself in the process. Who is responsible? The fraternity, of course. Obviously the sidewalk was in a state of disrepair. We can only hope that these lawsuits never reach the courtroom.

However, the odds are great that the lawsuits will get there. There are more than enough lawyers in America for two of them to pick up the cases; and there are just as many future lawyers in the law schools. The courts aren't helping this process out either. In accepting as many cases as they do, they are becoming overworked. (Someday in the near future, the number of Supreme Court decisions will be so many that each and every one will become trivialized.) The courts have been abused long enough. And so have the pockets of many responsible Americans. Because a few (actually, many) people have decided that the lottery is won in the courtroom, the average American is dishing out more than enough money on insurance premiums. Before these premiums get so high that some jobs and products (and even parties) become non-existent, Americans need to accept responsibility for their own actions. I, for one, don't believe that we should be accountable for the irresponsibility of others.

Even Grover Cleveland reads The Eye

Pickle continued

continuing, and successful endeavor to reassert control inside the church itself.

At the same time, one can marvel at the education of a Pope. The same pontiff who used the transformation of the Philippines from Marcos to Aquino as a model to be applied in Chile was the one who offered little or no support to the Catholic resistance against Marcos. As Father Munoz has said, even though the Pope has not yet learned that he must not allow himself to be protected by the very guns that are used to persecute his people, it is heartening for the Pope to listen rather than to speak.

In the midst of violence, the Pope saw and heard. He listened to the voice of Carmen Gloria Quintana cry out, "I am the youth burned by the military." The Pope's tears as he watched the police move in with water canons, tear gas and plastic shields were probably stimulated by the tear gas itself, but he did listen, he did see and he did hear.

It is not yet clear whether the radical clergy and lay people in the Catholic Church of Chile will be co-opted by a Pope bent on restoring Papal control over the church at large, or whether the cautious conservative Pope will be co-opted by the sufferings of the poor and the wretched of the earth. One can only pray.

Joe Pickle is a professor of religion at Colorado College.

PRIDE
In the Name of Love

BY A. SCOTT

Though I've never considered myself patriotic or nationalistic, somewhere in my heart and probably in my mind (but I try to supress it) I'm proud to be American. I don't know how it happened, but I find myself happy to be in America, doing the average junior capitalist things: going to school, watching T.V., thinking about the future and how the hell I'm going to support myself and pay taxes. It seems as though there's a contradiction here. How could I truly be both a liberal arts student and a proud American? It all lies in the meaning of "pride." My first instinct when someone mentions the word pride is to cringe "What a nasty word," my mind says. It connotes superiority, a lack of humility, a nose in the air. I try to avoid the word whenever possible, but unfortunately (or fortunately in some crucial circumstances) my parents endowed me with some of the stuff.

I had an argument with a close friend yesterday, someone I've known for years, over the phrasing of words and what they imply (somewhat ironical). The arugment led nowhere and I wound up walking away mad. Most people would agree that I made a rather irrational, non-intelligent move, but in my eyes it seemed my only choice; I was a victim of pride, pride in myself and my ideas. I couldn't give up because it meant admitting failure, therefore casting doubt on me as a thinking person; my pride would be wounded. This isn't an isolated event. Everyday the choice is made between the perpetuation of pride or reconciliation and the words "I'm sorry." As a country we are famous for choosing the former, and in this sense I shrink from being labelled an "American." In excess, pride leads to chaos.

It doesn't have to be something to avoid, though. Have you ever thought about a person void of pride? I've never met one, but it's a scary thought. How would we function without it? We have to be proud of something in order to keep society going. We each are proud of ourselves (hopefully) in one respect or another, and we therefore want to share ourselves with others. Bob might be proud of his business-like prowess, so he pursues business options to exploit his abilities. Joanne finds herself proud of her ability to understand God and his actions, so she becomes a sister to further exploit her abilities. Pride is not necessarily bad. As long as pride and humility do not part ways, pride works to people's advantage; but once it's used to promote feelings of superiority, pride is being abused. I need not raise examples of its abuse by the American government in the last few decades, but I don't see this as a reason to lose faith. I'm still proud to be part of the American culture. I understand its limitations and I don't believe it to be 'the best' in the world, but our culture is just as good and just as bad as any other; it's the one I know and understand. We've produced a fantastic number of artistic and intellectual genuises, and our diversity, though still not completely fused, creates a richness of culture found in few other countries.

Innovative Advice

KARL A. OSSENTJUK

American society has experienced significant change in the last twenty years and innovation, entrepreneurship and participative management are the keys to an American corporate renaissance. Integrationist corporations are more successful at creating ahead of changing technologies and markets than segmentalist ones and more appropriately mirror the values of the American pluralistic society. Innovation, as Rosabeth Moss Kanter defines it, is the "generation, asseptance, and implementation of new ideas, processes, products or services." Innovation must take place at every level of the corporate structure. It must not be only in the traditional sense of new products and services, but in every ways that organizations operate, in their view themselves, and in the mechanisms that can develop and engage their resources to the maximum extent possible. Companies must be flexible and recognize defects in their own systems. American companies that begin to focus on long-term goals and abandon short-run, get-rich-quick outlook that is hindering competiveness. An innovative organization needs work force at all levels that can shift with the changing technology and re-focus rapidly rather than group that becomes stuck in the rhythm of routine that cannot easily adapt to a new and different timbeat.

To initiate and implement an innovation, people must draw upon an extra source of power in order to move the system off the course in which it was heading automatically. As long as people are only custodians of already determined routines and directions, they are able to operate "automatically" by remaining within their segment and/or working with the information handed down to them. Innovation, though, requires the force of a stronger calibre. Innovators must obtain sufficient power to mobilize people to get something other routine done. An executive team, or the steering committee it designates, must be attentive to the ways to foster innovation within a corporation. Encouragement of a culture of pride throughout the company and easy access to power tools for innovative problem solving are crucial for a company seeking to innovate. Lateral communication within the firm, the reduction of unnecessary layers of hierarchy, and increased (and earlier) information about company plans are also vitally important to innovation. Innovation in the United States depends on the development of an integrative system which promotes open communication between all levels, flexibility, a long-range outlook and a healthy entrepreneurial environment.

Technology in the world today is like the United States national debt: it expands so rapidly that it is difficult to keep track of. Corporations that are integrative are much more successful in the battle to keep pace with ever-changing technology than are segmentalist ones because there is continual communication between all levels of the corporation, the individual is given an opportunity to participate, and thus innovation flourishes. Conversely, a segmentalist firm is concerned with compartmentalizing actions, events and problems, and thus keeping each piece isolated from the others. Companies where segmentalist approaches dominate find it difficult to innovate, or even to handle change, because the system is designed to protect against change. Under a segmentalist structure, innovation is feared, whereas under an integrationist one, it is encouraged and fostered. American corporations must realize that the ideas of the individuals within the structure are the key to innovation if they are provided with the tools and opportunity to express them.

"Participative management involves the development and use of all the people in the corporation in the corporations' affairs. The more employee diverse a company is the more ideas will be generated throughout the corporate neighborhood. Employees should be treated as contributing individuals rather than an anonymous mass whose primary purpose is to fit the restrictive mold designed by the company. Where an integrationist organization provides an opportunity and incentive to voice an opinion, a segmentalist organization actually provides a clear disincentive against saying anything. A company must look within itself because that is where its greatest strength lies.

American corporations hope to remain competitive within the domestic and international markets, they must foster innovation and facilitate communication within the corporate structure.

As Summer Fast Approaches, Do You Find Yourself A Little Short On Cash? Here Are Some Ideas For The More Enterprising CC Student...
[Senior Classics Majors Should Particularly Take Note]
·Invest In The Stock Market
Ahhh, up 3-Quarters!
Coke
Deere
If I don't wash a Million cars by the end of the day, God will call me home.
·Have a Car Wash Inspired By God
·Go On a Fast—Give up SAGA Food
Maybe this won't be so hard after all ·Go Into The Shanty Construction Business
Where have all the flowers gone...
·Find All Of The "Bugs" And Other Such Devices In The New U.S. Embassy In Russia
Warning: this one requires quite a time commitment ·Hire Yourself Out As a Lobbyist Against The 8-Block Plan
Is this where I sign up
Get in line with every one else.
·Cancel Your Subscription To The Gazette
Who really reads it any way??
·Whatever You Do, Don't Ask Gary Hart For Help
Care to make a donation?
HAVE A HART
$6 MILLION IN DEBT

Apathy and You

BY ROBERT JURKIEWICZ

In a recent trip to the Bahamas, I stumbled across a very interesting phenomenon: I encountered the presence of APATHY!! Doesn't this word seem familiar to us, as citizens of the United States? Well it should at least ring a bell. However, I thought that a small group of Islands such as the Bahamas would not experience apathy due to their history of political involvement. Well, I was amazed to find out that the Bahamian people could also be non-action oriented.

Apathy has been a major focal point in the Bahamas due to the strength of the FNM (Free National Movement Party) which is vying for power over the current administration, the PLP (Peoples National Party). The present party in power seems to be corrupt, in that leaders have taken bribes from the mafia, and the general attitude of the current administration is to help themselves and not help their nation.

On the other hand, the FNM is a party that was established to counter the activities of the PLP. They want to help and better the lives of the Bahamian people; they do not want to be controlled by the mafia, or be corrupted in any fashion. The FNM wants to lead the people into an age where everyone is very politically active and goal orientated. They do not want a citizenry which is unwilling to question the government.

Evangelist Rex Major, a very prominent individual in the Bahamas, spoke at the FNM convention and pointed out the reasons for Bahamian apathy. When reading about this, I was amazed and I thought about how their situation relates to a vast number of Americans today.

The first reason Major stated for apathy in the Bahamian state was powerlessness. The people feel that they can do very little to effect their state.

The second reason that apathy occurs is that people are ignorant. Some individuals feel it is not their place to interfere or that the government knows what it is doing. Why should I worry about it?

A third reason that was mentioned is innocence. Major feels that the people are unwilling to challenge the governments' actions. The electorate feels it is best not to be critical of every government action.

The fourth and most critical reason that Evangelist Rex Major cited for Bahamian apathy was that of indifference. People don't care about what happens. They want to be neutral and uninvolved in the happenings of their state.

Although you may ask yourself how these ideas about apathy relate to us, ask yourself this question: during the recent Iranian arms scandal, if you disagreed with what you knew of the situation, did you voice your opinion to the government, or were you apathetic and used these reasons?

Did you feel that what you had to say wouldn't have any impact? Well that excuse is horse... What if your view coincided with another million people, do you think that view will have an impact? Probably so, but if you and that other million had not expressed your views, then you would have lost the opportunity for it to be heard.

Were you ignorant to the situation? Did you feel that the Iranian arms scandal was a very intricate military plan and that the government knew what it was doing and that you could and would do nothing but accept the situation as it was. Did you use the excuse, "oh, they knew what they were doing."

Were you unwilling to challenge the government's actions? Did you feel that this was a minor incident and it was best not to be critical of the government's minor faults?

Or was it that you simply did not care about the whole situation. Were you indifferent to it? Did you subscribe to neutrality, the state of non-involvement? Did you feel that the crisis didn't warrant your efforts to respond? But really, who cares?

Everyone should care about the actions of government, no matter how small or irrelevant. The public must keep the government of this country honest in order for it to become a government for all the people and not for the priviledged few.

Apathy is rampant in the Bahamas and in our own country, so I must present to you this question: Why are the people of the United States apathetic? Why do we feel that we are powerless? Why are we ignorant? Why is innocence a factor and why does the attitude of who cares play a role in our society? We must answer these questions. We must question ourselves for the reasons why we do not speak up against apartheid (not divestment, that doesn't do the trick), or why we allow our government to accumulate such a high defecit, or why there is such wasteful spending in our system. Why do we allow such atrocities to exist. Is it because we are apathetic?

Heck, will most Americans actually go to the polls to voice their opinions, or will most people sit back and use the excuses that have been described? The only way to control or influence governmental actions is through public action. The four reasons for apathy I have described are prominent in our country today, and unless every individual enters into a state where we question the government, we will be left in a state that helps the few and not the majority. But who's fault will it be? Certainly not the governments'. It will be our own fault, for we have failed ourselves.

None of My Business

BY JON-MARK C. PATTERSON

Apathy. Every Newsweek article about contemporary college students features this idea. We are all supposed to be drifting along—working on our classes and drinking beer on the weekends—eyes focused two feet in front of our blank faces. We are held to be incapable of original thought and interested only in ourselves and our future money-centered careers.

Well, it seems that many at CC have taken this opinion to heart. Many an administration memo decries the CC "couch potato" scene and gropes for solutions. Many concerned folk have burnt incense at the Worner Center altar and prayed that students might become more involved next year.

I have never felt comfortable with these feelings. I wasn't really sure why, but a minor incident jelled my understanding. I was in a meeting with various campus noteables, and one of them brought up that "A" word. (You know—apathy.) My ears pricked up. She went on to explain that almost no one showed up at the Business-Economics Department lectures.

Now wait a second. I am sure that these lectures are interesting in their own way and are topical for a segment of the CC community. However, more often than not, I could care less. I recognize the importance of economics in the world and dutifully scan the business section of the paper each day—gotta check on those exchange rates before the trip to Europe this summer. I even play "Millionaire" on a friend's Apple computer occasionally. But it comes down to a tongue-in-cheek rhetorical question: Do I consider matters of business-economics crucial to a personal understanding of what is most interesting and important?

No.

I am not apathetic in not going to the lectures; I know that they exist and I consciously choose not to go.

So why don't people show up for campus events? Why are event sponsors often disappointed with the turnout their well-planned, well-publicized, worthy events draw?

I think the answer lies in what we compare ourselves to. We remember the 1960's, when hundreds of students would band together under a single banner on any given campus. A few issues were paramount and occupied everyone's mind. Today, it isn't that students are less interested than they were in the past. It's that the issues are not as clear-cut and galvanizing.

Students today have many varied interests, and a few broad issues no longer dominate their thinking. Smaller groups of students cluster around narrower issues. From the perspective of each group, other students appear to be less interested and involved than before.

I care about what is going on. And I have enough faith in the average CC student to believe that s/he cares too. I'm not worried about student apathy—unless reading The Disparaging Eye has somehow not yet found its way to the top of your list of priorities.

And don't count on seeing me at any Business-Economics lectures. I'm managing to keep busy just the same.

Pope ponders

Pickle prose,

page 1

Don't do that!

The Eye will be back

continued from p. 3

Imagination, instead of being a barrier between knowledge and virtue as it is for Rousseau, is the bridge between the moral and the material for Kant. In Kant's reasoning, there is a gap between the moral and the material. For example, "a good moral condition of a people is to be expected only under a good constitution." However, in order to bring about the good moral condition, the people must act as though they had already achieved the desired end. Therefore an act of imagination is necessary to bring the idea into actual, physical fulfillment. Like the "little train that could," we must decide that we can achieve something, regardless of empirical evidence contrary to the fact, in order to achieve it.

Imagination started after the first free choice Man made. He then "discovered in himself a power of choosing for himself a way of life." Once Man realizes what it means to be free, it is his moral obligation to act as though he is free until he is. Man, according to Kant, cannot find spiritual tranquility without an earthly manifestation of that tranquility. Imagination goads Man onward to realizing his ideals, but also leaves him in a state of permanent dissatisfaction. Once Man gains an Idea of moral obligation (an ought), then he can bring it to material fulfillment through imagination, if he so chooses.

The spiritual enlightenment which was thought by Christians and by Socrates to be necessary to achieve true moral consciousness, is expressed by Kant in terms of the material. It is through the completion of an earthly task or project that Man achieves a morality and harmony. The imagination can be thought of as the "way of thought which can in time convert the coarse, natural disposition for moral discrimination into definite practical principles, and thereby change a society of men...into a moral whole."

G.W.F. Hegel points out in his lectures on Reason in History, that we must not be deluded into thinking that the modern enlightenment is true Enlightenment because we must avoid a false sense of accomplishment and security which would stop us from thinking and thereby spurring the action which will eventually achieve the true Enlightenment. Human wisdom is cumulative: "the present stage of Spirit contains all previous stages within itself." And since "Reason is the comprehension of the divine work," there is constant progression among human beings until they reach the stage of Reason when the divine work is fully comprehended. The Reason which achieves this comprehension is the Reason to be found in the many (and accumulating) examples of history, because history is the manifestation of Providence. The ultimate, full comprehension of Providence will necessarily lead to the realization of the divine plan, which will resolve all dichotomies. In the meantime Man is constantly resolving oppositions and thereby creating new ones. In the same way, Hegel resolves the conflicts between knowledge and virtue and between material and moral.

necessary...that...a class of rational beings each of whom dies while the species is immortal, should develop their capacities to perfection."

Kant addresses Rousseau's discussion of the conflict between knowledge and virtue by claiming that knowledge leads to virtue. The gaining of scientific knowledge is the first in a sequence of steps accomplished by Reason which ultimately lead to virtue. For Kant, enlightenment is freedom from tutelage which implies a revolution to eventually release Man from all external authority. This entails scientific revolution, religious revolution, and political revolution to achieve a moral revolution. The advancement of Reason through the gaining of scientific knowledge, and the freedom from the tutelage of the mysterious divine authorities has already started, according to Kant. Therefore, although we have not yet achieved an enlightened age, "we do live in an age of enlightenment." People are not yet able to correctly use "their own reason in religious matters with assurance and free from outside direction," but the idea of this possibility has been raised, which is the first step toward its accomplishment. The other kind of freedom which Kant says is necessary for achieving virtue in the end is the "freedom to make public use of one's reason at every point." If this freedom is granted, "enlightenment is almost sure to follow." Along with the freedom from religious authority and this particular political freedom, both of which are based upon reason, it is important that each man does not resist his gaining of knowledge or his becoming enlightened. The individual has a moral obligation to become enlightened. The individual has a moral obligation to become enlightened for the sake of future generations: "A man may postpone enlightenment in what he ought to know, but to renounce it for himself and even more to renounce it for posterity is to injure and trample on the rights of mankind." Selective knowledge is not allowed, resulting in the increased importance of the new growth in the arts and sciences. The individual's task is to increase his self-consciousness through the free use of reason in order to make better choices. Man's choice-making is important because the final step to the true enlightenment and moral revolution is a conscious step. Moral goodness, like all other achievements, has to be the work of Man's reason: "amusement...insight, ...intelligence, finally even goodness of heart...should be wholly [Man's] own work." For Kant, virtue cannot exist without freedom or enlightenment; therefore, knowledge can lead to virtue, but not the final choice of whether it does or not is Man's.

For Hegel, like Socrates, knowing is doing. The knowledge of virtue is virtue because Hegel knows through the examination of history that "an idea is never so impotent as to remain an idea." Therefore "ought" not only implies "can" but it implies "does." Hegel does not need the imagination mediating between knowledge and virtue, because one does not need to act as though an end has been achieved in order to realize it—the Idea is sufficient.

The realms of material and moral are bridged by Hegel through the realm of Spirit and through Man, the only creature displaying Spirit. Spirit is the realm that actually unifies both the moral and the material. Mind and nature. It is the activity and the product of the activity of the human being transforming Nature into culture—the manifestation of the moral ideals of his society. Both Mind and Nature are important to Hegel's philosophy, and they find their synthesis in Spirit.

This opposition is further resolved in Man: "Spirit and Nature unite in human nature," i.e., the desire to change Nature and Nature, the object to be changed. Man was created by God to reconcile the antithesis that God had created to Himself in Nature. Therefore, Man is not only the union of Spirit and Nature, but of earthly and divine, and of Nature and God. As Man's comprehension of Providence becomes fuller and Man continues to shape Nature into his moral ideal, eventually it will be through Man and his Spirit that Providence is carried out in Nature and the divine and earthly are reconciled. Man is the only creature who can see (in retrospect) the connection between all human earthly events and the divine purpose. "Moral enlightenment has to be derived from history;" this can only happen through Man finding Reason in history; therefore, Man also unifies the moral and material.

Modern enlightenment is not satisfactory for any of the three. Rousseau, Kant, and Hegel all see the modern enlightenment as a mid-way point and not a final enlightenment. Kant and Hegel see it as a step in a positive direction; Rousseau sees it as an evil which can be used against itself. Each philosopher's attitude is a response to previous philosophers. Not only do they each respond to the immediately preceding philosophy and the specific developments of the time period in which they live, but they all address certain common problems, such as the two discussed here: knowledge vs. virtue and the material vs. the moral. Both of these conflicts, which all three of the philosophers feel compelled to address, imply the struggle to enable modern science to be compatible with the moral virtue of the ancient philosophers. In all aspects of their arguments concerning this conflict, the modern philosophers use the ancients as their model, whether to agree to disagree, whether overtly or covertly. This demonstrates a conflict in modern political philosophy: despite the fact that moderns believe themselves to be very far removed from the ancients and to some extent look down upon past generations because of the idea of cumulative wisdom, they cannot refrain from referring constantly to them in one way or another. Therefore, a large degree of modern political philosophy can be seen as either a rebellion against, or a recapitulation to, the philosophy of the ancients.

REATIVE SPEAKING & DEBATE TOURNAMENT SLATED FOR NEXT BLOCK

e 1st Annual Creative Speech & Debate Tournament will occur during the week of 9th block on May 12th & 13th and is open to any interested CC nt who would like to participate. The competition will have 5 categories:

DEBATE: One member teams debating the resolution that: Persons in tive positions should be subject to mandatory drug testing. Format: 5 ute constructive speeches, 2 minute cross-examination periods and 4 minute tals.

ORATORY: A 5-8 minute prepared speech on any topic meant to ade and inform the listeners.

INTERPRETATION OF LITERATURE: A 5-8 minute reading of ry, Prose or Dramatic work (i.e. plays, etc.)

HUMOR: A 5-8 minute presentation of original humor.

EXTEMPORANEOUS SPEAKING: A 3-5 minute speech on current ts and issues. The topics will be released during the tournament and each stant will have 10 minutes to prepare her or his speech.

shirts will be given away in addition to generous awards—$100.00 for 1st e, $50.00 for 2nd place and trophies for 3rd place. Funding has graciously n provided by CCCA, the Leisure Program and the Leadership Program. e information about sign-ups will be available soon.

y questions? Contact Lisa Seeland at x293 or 2 Montgomery Hall.

A Look At Humor

Yesterday's Thursday-at-Eleven lecture featured a panel discussion about humor preceded by several example performances. Aaron Shure and Dee Baker opened with "Carbunkle," a skit satirizing collegiate values attitudes, and stereotypes. Baker then presented several different forms of stand-up comedy ranging from a pseudo-intellectual evaluation of humor by a deranged professor to memories of painful moments of his youth. Shure joined him in an absurdly funny rendition of a praying mantis singing Mozart and torturing a man with sunburned armpits. Shure completed the performance with his own stand up routine of various one-liners.

Prof. Geroge Butte and Chris Bell, the event's organizer, joined the two comics for a short panel discussion about the psychology of humor. Butte discussed two major theories—the first describing humor as a life affirming phenomena, although it presents both light and dark sides of life. The second idea, proposed by Freud looks at comedy as a means to confront anxiety. A short question and answer session completed the presentation.

Staff

Cowen • Moving • Storage

Reduced rates for
Colorado College students!

-Summer Storage Special-

...beats all available storage costs. Ask for information at Mathias, Slocum, Bemis, Loomis or call 475-2800

Save • Save • Save

YAKITORI

Serving Lunch and Dinner
(Monday - Saturday)

•

Sushi Bar
Cocktails

•

10% Discount Off Any Entree
(with your CC ID)
Take-Out and Delivery

16 E. Bijou • Downtown • 578-0915

DOMINO'S PIZZA

TWO 12" ONE TOPPING PIZZAS FOR $9.14

(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.

Continued By Popular Demand

Limited Delivery Area
Our drivers carry less than $20

AVOID THE NOID
CALL DOMINO'S PIZZA

One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!

For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same!), and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings.

Two 12" pizzas will only cost you:

Superb cheese	$7.95
1 topping	$9.14
2 toppings	$10.33
3 toppings	$11.52
4 toppings	$12.71
5 toppings	$13.90
6 toppings	$15.09

Twice the pizza for one low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minute or less, GUARANTEED!

Offer may expire anytime

DOMINO'S PIZZA DELIVERS® FREE.

All Pizzas Include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.

Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95

Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers,
Extra Cheese (1 item)
Double Cheese (2 items)
Thick Crust, Extra Sauce
Each Item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19

Ask about our Group Discount (on 5 or more pizza orders).

We accept checks.

Prices do not include tax. Our drivers carry less than $20.00.

Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.

30 minute guarantee

If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes, present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off your order.
One coupon per pizza.

Fast, Free Delivery
Good at listed locations.

635-1511

The Tutt Family

—Affecting Growth and Development in the Springs

Mr. & Mrs. Bill Tutt enjoy ice cream and conversation with Dean McLeod (right). photo by Anne Basting

"Although you might not be able to tell it by looking at the prosperous Broadmoor Hotel of today, there was a time you could have shot off a shotgun in the lobby and no one would have cared," said Colorado Springs community and business leader William B. Tutt, Wednesday night's speaker in the Leadership 2000 lecture series.

The Tutt family traces its Colorado Springs roots back 100 years to Tutt's grandfather, who built the Broadmoor Hotel with Spencer Penrose. The Broadmoor, along with the Antlers Hotel in downtown Colorado Springs, comprise the main visible parts of a business enterprise that Tutt described as "the largest private employer in the city. We employ over 2,000 people in the Springs, and our main goal is to create even more jobs."

The Tutt family's involvement in Colorado has grown to encompass much more than the hotel industry. Since its inception, the Tutt controlled El Pomar Foundation has demonstrated its committment to Colorado entities through donating over 80 million dollars. The Foundation is also largely responsible for Colorado Spring's economic growth. During the depression and the later war years of the 40's, even the Broadmoor found itself struggling financially. "We saw the need to diversify the city's income base and create growth," said Tutt. El Pomar reacted by attempting to attract several U.S. government Defense Department installations to the Colorado Springs area. The results were the construction of Fort Carson, which "does more for Colorado's economy than any other enterprise," according to Tutt; the construction of NORAD, which El Pomar enticed through the donation of Cheyenne Mountain; and the construction of the Air Force Academy, for which El Pomar and Colorado Springs outbid 201 other cities.

Another of the local entities the Foundation has benefitted is Colorado College, having contributed towards the construction of the Tutt library and the El Pomar sports center, among other projects. "We are committed to CC, which I feel is as fine a private school as any in the country," Tutt said. "It adds an enormous amount to the cultural fibre of the city and we want to see it stay that way."

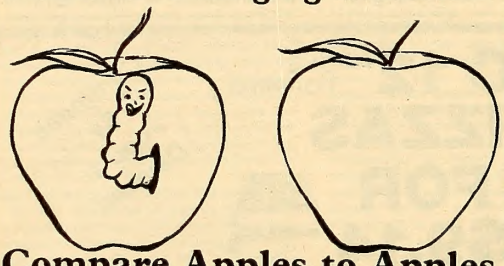
The El Pomar Foundation continued to seek growth in the Colorado Springs area, both by attempting to land the controversial 'Star Wars' related Consolidated Space Operations Center and by attempting to diversify the area's economic base. Largely as a result of the latter ambition, Colorado Springs has successfully attracted such high-tech companies as Hewlett Packard, Digital and Ford Aerospace.

Bill Tutt has also contributed to the Colorado Springs community through his involvement with the United States Olympic Center. "After the U.S. team didn't perform up to expectations at the '76 Olympics in Montreal, we and the Olympic Committee made the decision to move the Olympic Center to Colorado Springs from New York. No other city in the country even tried to attract the committee. We made a presentation with promises to the committee with almost no idea of how we would fulfill them. We was delighted and flabbergasted when they decided to accept," said Tutt. As a consequence of Tutt and El Pomar efforts to land the Olympic Center, Colorado Springs has become the amateur sports capital of the U.S. Over half of the country's sports governing bodies are headquartered here, and the Springs has also become knows as a center for sport science and medicine. Tutt and El Pomar recently capped efforts to place Colorado Springs at the forefront of the U.S. amateur sports movement by raising over 20 million private dollars to sucessfully bring the new Olympic Hall of Fame to Colorado Springs.

DON SILVER

GRIFFIS/BLESSING INC.

An Ever-Changing Selection



Compare Apples to Apples Before You Bite

What seems like a bargain now can turn your stomach later.

We offer a unique array of properties and services and can tailor a lease to meet your particular financial and service needs. It might actually save you money - as well as some unpleasant surprises.

Just a few of our FREE advantages:

1. Bi weekly maid service
2. Assistance in locating sub-tenants
3. Security Systems
4. Hot tub
5. Fire places
6. 24 hour plumbing & heating service
7. Washer/dryers, dishwashers
8. Prompt return and accurate accounting of damage deposits

When the pipe breaks at night and your organic chem final is the next day, make sure you know who to call...the same people you should call today.

GRIFFIS/BLESSING Inc.

520-1234

Hertz

You don't just rent a car. You rent a company.

Call for Weekend Rate and Eligibility

315 N. Weber

473-2444

8-6 Mon-Sat

Appointments possible at any other time

5% discount with Ad

the Stagecoach Inn

702 Manitou Avenue

On Fountain Creek in Manitou Springs

Don't Forget the Stagecoach Inn

Make Your Reservations

Lunch 11:30-2:00

Dinner 5:00-9:00

Sunday Brunch 10:30-2:00

Reservations 685-9335

Banquet & Catering Facilities For All Occasions

erts Endowed Lecture

etwork Problem-Solving with Math and Computer Science

e shortest distance between two is still a straight line, but the est distance between more than two is a problem of greater complexity. delivering the Roberts Endowed ure, Dr. Ron Graham, Director of research at AT&T emphasized "the symbiosis between the areas of mathematics and computer science for mutual benefit."

To illustrate his point, Dr. Graham used the example of networks and "the travelling salesperson problem." If a travelling salesperson must make only one visit to each capital city west of the Mississippi, what is his shortest route?

The extent of the network problem's significance is astounding. Dr. Graham works for AT&T where they use the shortest network to collect money from pay phones. The main importance of the shortest network is to the field of computer science. If mathematicians could determine the optimal pattern of connections for the thousands of transistors on a microchip, it would result in faster computers.

According to Professor Steven Janke, "Mathematicians are creating methods to solve the travelling salesperson type problem, but it would take computers more than three human lifetimes to solve them." Today's slower computers can do 1000 computations a second.

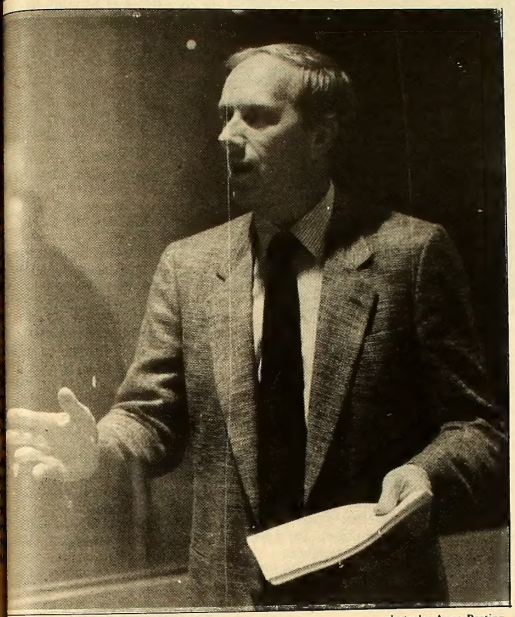
Computations for network problems are exponential. That is with each step you take toward solving the problem, you exponentially increase the number of computations that must be done to solve the problem. Professor Fred Tinsley agreed it is like digging yourself into a ditch.

Dr. Graham worked his way through school as a circus juggler and gymnast and served as the president of the Juggler's Association. He was able to add some of his showperson's humor to a relatively complex topic. "It was anything but a dry math speech," said senior psychology major Jamie Taylor.

The Roberts Endowed lecture is named in honor of Harold D. Roberts a 1908 Phi Beta Kappa of CC and former chairman of the board of trustees.

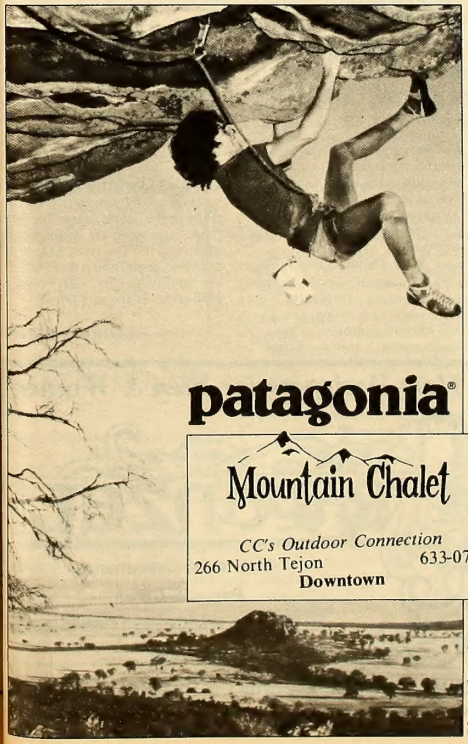
His son, Neil F. Roberts said his father had a lifelong interest in science particularly geology, botany, and chemistry. "Much of my fathers's legal work dealt with science," said Roberts. In fact the Blue River diversion tunnel which goes under the Continental Divide is named after him.

DAVID KLEIN



n Graham—searching for the "shortest network." photo by Anne Basting

How to pay for a liberal arts education.



Introducing

Otis Spunkmeyer Cookies

Chocolate Chip
Butter Sugar
Walnut Chocolate Chip

Double Chocolate Chip
Peanut Butter
Oatmeal Raisin

"All cookies are fresh-baked"

Free samples Friday April 24
From 11:00 am to 2:00 pm

Only at the HUB

The Wild Tigers of the Jungle

CC Students Go Crazy in Costa Rica

We have a reputation down here, though I'm not sure how good it is. There are nine of us, almost a third of the students. People say we party more than everyone else. But, hey with beers served for between 45 and 75 cents who can help it? And to top that off, with each beer comes a "Booa." Maybe a tort with beans, maybe a chicken wing. Anyway, it's like Happy Hour 24 hours a day and you don't even have to wait for Tuesdays! We also seem to be at the bottom of the Spanish classes...and we play a lot of Hack. But despite all that the director of the program, Don Alonzo Benavides, thought it was a great idea to write an article for the Catalyst. He hopes to recruit more of us!

Fueled by 45c beers, the ACM Tropical Field studies group cope with a somewhat different environment.

The ACM Tropical Field Studies Program is broken into three sections. The first month is spent in San Jose learning Spanish and preparing for an independent research project. The second and third months are spent in the field and the fourth is back in San Jose to analyze data and write-up the final project.

San Jose is an interesting introduction to Costa Rica. It's a Third World City aspiring for modernization (aren't they all?). A very efficient bus transportation system provides us with our first experience of getting lost in a country where they not only speak a different language but directions are hopeless; addresses read; "frente a Ferreteria San Geromino." Which means across the street from the hardware store in the Barrio San Geromino. The streets are clogged with diesel smoke and crossing the streets can be an adventure—cars don't stop, ever! But suddenly the first month is gone and you find yourself living on a finca in "el campo," staring at giant Guanacaste trees and climbing through the jungle. Now the important things are the sunrise, the tides, where to find the monkeys or helping your family milk the cows.

It's the third month now and we've begun to get a feel for what field study is all about.

Take Karen Johnson (Junior, Anthropology major) for example. She is excavating and dating a habitation site of Formative Period Indians. Her site is in a farmer's field and about a week ago the farmer decided to plow the field. Well, she salvaged what she could and is plowing ahead on her project, she hopes to finish before the spring planting.

Or Marcy Litvak (Junior, Biology) who is studying behavior of White Faced Monkeys in the jungle of Manuel Antonio National Park. While crashing through the jungle, machete in one hand and notebook in the other, she managed to develop some beautifully infected bug bites, everywhere. Some of the other Biology students are thinking about studying them.

"...the important things are the sunrise, the tides, where to find the monkeys or helping your family milk the cows."

Kristin Wolf (Sophomore, Biology), Doug Haller (Senior, Geology), Rolfe Speigel (Senior, Geology), Ann McLuckie (Senior, Biology), and Tanya Jerome (Junior, Biology) have all developed similar scams. Kristin is studying controls on faunal assemblages of rocky intertidal pools. Doug is doing structural mapping along the coast of Punta Judas. Rolfe is doing structural mapping of Isla del Cano (population counting Rolfe). Ann is working at Punta Morales with Hermit Crabs, looking at the coexistence of two different species. Tanya, also at Punta Morales, is studying the distribution and behavior of Mangrove Snails. The common denominator is the beach. So that's not so bad, planning a project so as to be able to work at the beach. But wait, there's more. They also have to do their field work at low tide. That's once a day. I can't figure out what they do with the rest of their time though?

"Most of the students are doing 'real' primary research and some students will be able to publish as a result of their work done here."

Shawn Benner (Senior, Geology) was doing fine with his geology project of mapping the volcano Rincon de la Vieja that is until he got arrested for "stealing rocks" from the National Park.

Heather Harding (Junior, Biology) is developing a data base for reforestation in Monte Verde. Rumor has it that she is known as "the gringo with the hat" who is the "best salsa dancer in Monte Verde."

But seriously, our independent projects are, for most of us, the biggest academic projects of our lives. Most of the students are doing "real" primary research and some students will be able to publish as a result of their work down here. The ACM program here is very well run, but I think the thing that makes it very special is the freedom. The CC administration could learn a few things down here. It's the first time that my school has treated me like a responsible thinking being and it is both a refreshing and challenging feeling. You are really on your own. The program lets students get study in the jungle, alone for weeks at a time. Sure there are problems, and for once there isn't anyone there to bail you out. We constantly amaze ourselves at our ability to not only cope but be productive at the same time.

GEORGIA DEJUNGLE

Photo Special! Every Monday!
coupon
FREE SECOND SET OF PRINTS
Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!
This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon. Limited time offer. Offer in effect Mondays only. 819
Kodak Colorwatch System
WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!
College Pharmacy
833 North Tejon • 634-4861

Hair Designers for Men & Women
RAPUNZEL
Style cuts, Cellophanes, Perms & Color.
Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.
Stop in or make your appointment:
827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

Tynan: Life in the Cultural Fast Lane Cont.

ntinued from p. 1

s one quickly discovers in Professor an's classes, defining a literary ement such as Catholic American ature is a difficult and, often, rary business. Something as organic literature does not easily yeild to ssification and definition. equently, Tynan requires that the er concerned must have at one time n baptized Catholic. Also, to add her unity to the work, Tynan chose ys that employ a similar critical proach, one that involves, to varying grees, a consideration of the writers kground. Even with the requirements, fessor Tynan found editing such a ly perceived literary movement a ficult and exhausing task.

Professor Tynan's Irish Catholic ntage has also spurned interests that lie side the academic realm. Through his e, Nancy Eckburg, he encountered ditional Irish ballads and sequently developed a hobby of ecting and playing them that he and wife share. For their recent neymoon, Tynan and his wife visited and where they traveled, spending a d deal of their time in the pubs, ording the ballads of the locals, king face, burping, booting and aging in other various forms of cularity. With this grassroots spiration, they returned to the States, ere they polished up their performing lls. Tynan and Eckburg displayed their ent a couple of months ago at the 19th reet Studio. Although there was very le publicity around the CC campus, e studio was filled to overflowing.

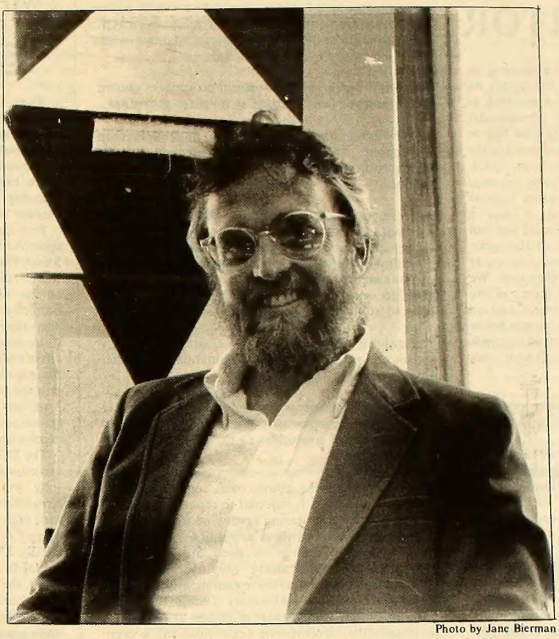

Photo by Jane Bierman

Dan Tynan: Teacher, editor and singer extraordinaire.

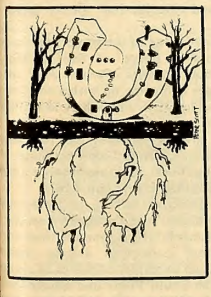
Displaying their instrumental talents, they accompanied their vocal harmonies with guitar, recorder and various percussion instruments. It was a quaint and entertaining evening for the audience who were treated to ballads of love, patriotism and a few good drinking songs. It was also interesting to hear the kid from the Bronx sing with an Irish accent.

"Between guitar slinging and book editing, Dan Tynan also does some damn good teaching."

Between the guitar slinging and book editing, Dan Tynan also does some damn good teaching. He took a strong interest in teaching during his high school years where he was motivated and influenced by one of his English teachers. Since then he has spent his time studying, learning and teaching. Tynan started teaching at The Colorado College in 1970 (that's over 112 years ago for a dog). Most of you probably know him as "the prof you had to use a lot of points on to get on the waiting list." But when you do get in you find that Tynan brings a certain spark to class that brings the text and the class to life. Combined with his dry but profuse wit, a good class party and an Irish accent every once in a while, one actually has fun while learning. And gosh, isn't that why we're here? Although one of his senior advisees was heard to say, "I just believe in Dan Tynan," let's just say he's a first-rate professor and a great singer. And we wish him luck and success on his new book.

DICKSON AND SCHAEFER

Ellipses and



Hyperbole

I don't dress very well, I never did. I ssess an awkward and accidental ardrobe that lags terribly behind the rrent fashion norm. Why, it was only is fall that I realized I shouldn't have lfs on my bellbottom pants.

Every time I enter a stylish clothes ore I panic. When the salesperson pproaches I turn and run. I am certain at there is some sort of permit that they ue to people that are allowed to be pper. (Incidentally, Webster says pper is synonymous with bufflehead.)

Leather jackets seem to be in vogue. hat fascinates me is that good looking, ell dressed people like to associate with e another. (They probably compare ufflehead permits.) So, when well dressed people walk past in all their fine leather, they smell like a herd.

The more expensive the jacket, the less water resistent the leather. When it rains, I like to watch all the "golden youth" stampeding for shelter for fear that their $300 coats become wallets.

There are many ways to track the clothing habits of students. The most obvious factor is year. The freshmen tend to overdress. The further they get in their college career, the more unkempt they become. If you see some slob chances are it's about to graduate. Senior males (and females for that matter) like to go unshaven. Some call this the Don Johnson effect, but we consummate slobs like to call it "letting the face go fallow."

Clothing cycles also correspond to washing cycles. Some people do their laundry when they run out of underwear, others when they have to wear socks that don't match; I do my laundry when I'm forced to wear shirts that have collars.

Slobs aren't a particularly pretentious crowd, but we do mind it when buffleheads pretend to be slobs. On Sunday mornings, the fashion victims seem to think it is time to wear sweatpants—sweatpants and make-up and perfectly brushed hair. A bufflehead wouldn't be caught dead actually sweating in sweatpants. Sweatpants are for Sunday breakfast and lycra is for sweating.

I know these things, because I have been in the weight room. In fact, I have learned how to do a CC workout. First, you lean against the wall near the scale and look at the cuties in lycra, then you lean against the leg lift thing, take one last look and then you leave.

This routine actually does help build ridiculously large muscles that serve no purpose except possibly to take the place of a personality. You see, the room smells so terrible that your entire body writhes in disgust, thereby creating good muscle tone.

What you wear is second in importance only to what you don't wear. I have discovered that when buffleheads take off their shirts in public, they begin to move in ways normal humans don't usually move. Suddenly extreme portions of their anatomies begin to itch so that only muscle defining scratches will be of any help.

And woe to the slob that doesn't have a tan. Despite the numerous warnings against excessive sun exposure, particularly at high altitudes, most students seem to feel it is better to have dark skin now than any skin later.

The point that is lost is that we are all the same. Underneath it all there is very little difference. If you just tear away the clothing, rip off the tan, scrape away all the muscles, we are all the same underneath—a disgusting fleshless bloody mass.

AARON SHURE

More Pizza for Less Dough
Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS
TWO PIZZAS ONE PRICE
FREE FLAVORED PIZZA • Garlic • Buttered • Sesame • Poppy • Rye
EXP. 5/7/87
Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS
More Pizza for Less Dough
Two 10" Small Pizzas
(Cheese Only)
only $5.24 #1D980
Additional 2 Pizza Toppings 83¢ Each
Not valid with any other coupons.
Delivery Extra.
EXP. 5/7/87
Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS
More Pizza for Less Dough
Two 14" Large Special Pizzas
(pepperoni, mushrooms, ham, green pepper, onions) No Substitutions
all for only $14.12 24 SLICES
With This Coupon • Delivery Extra
One Coupon Per Order #1D980
475-8241 (ate - two - four - one)
1625 W. Uintah
Uintah Station

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor:

There has recently been an increased awareness on campus of the divestment issue and its impact on Apartheid in South Africa, and without meaning to divert interest from that issue, the Shareholder Responsibility Committee (IRC) would also like to report on a related issue that has been proposed to the Board of Trustees, and which has also been tabled. Since most companies hold their shareholder meetings in April and May when the votes on issues such as South African involvement are cast, it was a disappointment that the following proposal was not accepted in time for its implementation this year. However, as the issue will no doubt appear again next year, we solicit your comments and thoughts. We would like to be representative of the mores of the informed members of the campus as a whole, and we hope that by reporting on the issues here, we can better reflect your desires. Please feel free to contact the chair (or any of the members listed at the end) with your comments.

Fair Employment Practices in Northern Ireland
Sent to the Board of Trustees, February 13, 1987

We propose that Colorado College vote its proxies for the MacBride fair employment guidelines for companies hiring in Northern Ireland. These guidelines are similar in purpose to the Sullivan principles in South Africa, which Colorado College has supported in recent years. In fact, we have also tried to stay with companies that are in high compliance. A similar stance is recommended for Northern Ireland, as implementation of the current Fair Employment Act has not contributed significantly towards equalizing employment opportunities for Catholics, who are twice as likely to be unemployed. Opponents to the MacBride fair employment guidelines argue that they will lead to reverse discrimination and that the Fair Employment Act of 1976 provides adequate protection of the workers. The proponents respond that the Fair Employment Act in fact maintains the status quo, which has a historical bias against the Catholics, that these principles are intended to bolster the spirit of the Fair Employment Act, and that affirmative action needs to be encouraged in order to equalize the opportunities. A summary of the principles outlined in 1984 by Nobel Peace Prize winner (1974) Sean MacBride are given below.

1. Increase the representation of individuals from underrepresented religious groups in the work force, including managerial, supervisory, administrative, clerical and technical jobs.

2. Provide adequate security for the protection of minority employees. (Total security cannot be guaranteed, of course, but reasonable, good faith efforts to protect the workers against intimidation and physical abuse should be made.)

3. Ban provocative religious or political emblems from the workplace.

4. All job openings should be publicly advertised and special recruitment efforts should be made to attract applicants from underrepresented religious groups. (This should not be construed to imply a diminuation of opportunity for other applications.)

5. Layoff, recall and termination procedures should not in practice favor particular religious groupings.

6. Abolish job reservations, apprenticeship restrictions, and differential employment criteria which discriminate on the basis of religion or ethnic origin.

7. Develop training programs that will prepare substantial numbers of current minority employees for skilled jobs, including the expansion of existing programs and the creation of new programs to train, upgrade and improve the skills of minority employees. (This does not imply that such programs should not be open to all members of the work force equally.)

8. Establish procedures to assess, identify and actively recruit minority employees with potential for further advancement.

9. Appoint a senior management staff member to oversee the companies affirmative action efforts and the setting up of timetables to carry out affirmative action principles.

In addition to the above, each signatory to the MacBride principles is required to report annually to an independent monitoring agency on its progress in the implementation of these principles.

As Colorado College is itself an Affirmative Action/Equal Opportunity employer, it seems reasonable that we should try to consistently apply this principle wherever we see inequity. Though the British government has viewed these principles as redundant (or illegal if they favor reverse discrimination), in every instance the principles call for a "reasonable, good faith, legal effort" for their implementation. We feel this is a step in the right direction for companies just setting foot into the situation in Northern Ireland, and that this action can be a force for positive change as the region developes. We therefore encourage support of the MacBride principles by voting all proxy issues dealing with them in their favor.

Sincerely,
NateBower (Olin 302)
Lelia Deykin (102 Mullett)
Margi Duncombe (Palmer 41)
Jennifer Frommelt (264 Mathias)
Ian Gilchrist (206 Haskell)
Seth King (338 Mathias)
Fred Owens (215 E. Monument)
Heidi Schmidt-Chair (324 Bemis)

Dear Editor:

I would just like to convey some interesting information that I was fortunate enough to come by during spring break. While working in the theatre helping build a set for an upcoming play a co-worker, slightly complaining, said that he was refused (by a four person committee) a job by the school for he is...heaven forbid...a MORMON.

Yes, he was refused the job of Special Events Coordinator because of his religion. Now we are talking about a job that requires a firm knowledge of the theatre as well as an ability to take on a fair amount of responsibility. The man who got the job, happened to be a CC graduate—self written major in video. This particular job is probably 30% oriented towards the theatre as far as production and knowledge are concerned. The person who was discriminated against has a Bachelor's Of Fine Arts degree in theatre from Brigham Young University.

In my frank opinion, the administration and faculty has failed to uphold their non-discriminating policies, and thus has shown that their "liberal arts" approach is a farce. Their decision has shown that they do not abide by their own words that they deem key to the liberal arts education; furthermore, they have also broken the law. According to the handbook, "The Colorado College does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, RELIGION, sex, national origin or physical handicap in its educational programs, activities or EMPLOYMENT POLICIES, in accordance with Federal, state and local laws." The problem here is definitely an internal one, shall we say "bureaucratic bullshit." I think that it is best that we question certain policies of the College for some definitely are in need of change.

Disappointed,
Bryan F. Bredehoeft

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI,
Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETER LOACH,
News Editor
DAVID EVANS,
Features Editor
MUNIR MEGHJEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL
& KATHY MAHONEY,
Sports Editors
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN,
Photo Editors
PETER SCOTT,
Layout & Graphics Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Castle Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 extension 675. The Catalyst is printed every Friday from September to May, except during holiday periods.

Castle Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its educational programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local laws.

Editorials appearing on the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

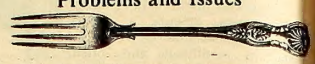
The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 600 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Box 56, Palmer, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

Two Forks Dam DEIS

Problems and Issues



The Draft Environmental Impact Statement (DEIS) for the Two Forks Dam proposal was released in January. The Denver Water Board (DWB) and Metropolitan Water Providers (MWP) want to build Two Forks to provide the water that Denver needs for a few more decades of cancerous growth and lawn watering (lawns consume about half of the water Denver uses).

Projected environmental impacts are appalling: the reservoir would inundate twenty-nine miles of the South Platte River with as much as six hundred feet of water, resulting in the loss of most of the only habitat of the Montane Skipper, a threatened species of butterfly. A herd of bighorn sheep would be displaced. The most productive stretch of trout stream in Colorado would be flooded. Two Forks would even affect endangered species of fish in the Colorado River drainage because of the huge amount of water diverted into the reservoir from across the continental divide. And, of course, Two Forks would help destroy grasslands around Denver by fueling the continued expansion of Suburbia.

The DEIS was released early as a result of political maneuvering. It seems that the MWP, worried by how long the DEIS was taking, asked Senator Bill Armstrong to lend a hand. He did, by getting in touch with and pressuring the Secretary of the Army (the Army Corps of engineers is in charge of the Two Forks DEIS). The Corps was subsequently ordered to finish the DEIS quickly, and DEIS funding was cut off. As a result, the Two Forks DEIS was never fully finished—the necessary issues were not addressed completely.

In addition to being incomplete, the DEIS is full of inadequacies, misinformation, and oversights which encourage construction of the dam. A few of the dozens of examples follow:

First, population projections used by the Corps to estimate Denver's water needs are out of date and inaccurate. The agency responsible for those projections has disowned them as unrealistic, and revised them downward. Denver simply will not grow as much as the DEIS says. The recent population projections suggest that there is probably no need for any new water supply projects.

Second, DEIS estimates of the size of Denver's existing supply of water are far too low. Losses due to "conveyence and distribution" (leaky pipes) are overestimated.

Third, estimated costs of the project are incorrect. The DEIS uses a figure of $461 million for construction, but a recent Denver Post editorial outlined expenses and came up with a total of more than $1 billion. The DEIS allows only $83 million for mitigation of environmental impacts, but environmental groups estimate the real costs at around $200 million. Overall, cost estimates in the DEIS make Two Forks look much more attractive and cost effective than it ever could be.

Fourth, the DEIS is lacking in its analysis of impacts to Threatened and Endangered species. The biological assessments which estimate these impacts are based upon incomplete and/or inaccurate information. As an example, estimates of changes in river flow (in the South Platte and affected western slope rivers) due to the Two Forks project are suspicious, but these estimates are used to determine how Threatened and Endangered species will be affected. And, the estimated $83 million cost for mitigation of environmental impacts doesn't even include threatened and endangered species—the DEIS doesn't consider mitigation for impacts to them at all.

Two Forks is this year's most important environmental battle in the Colorado Front Range. Regional groups have publicized public hearings on the DEIS and organized a letter writing campaign. The Corps of Engineers will use public comments (i.e. letters) to revise the DEIS—with enough critical comments, it will be much easier to stop Two Forks from being built.

ERIC JOHNSON

Victor Greto

Perhaps what made me feel the most angry was that I was actually surprised. Reading in the Catalyst the other day about that open-minded, profound thinking group called "Students against Unnatural Sex Acts," I decided to take their list of arguments and examine their validity; it was interesting, to say the least.

First of all, their claim that the "community at large does not support gay rights," is akin to the assumption of Falwell's old "Moral Majority," a belief that one's values are a clue and indicator of most people's values. This attitude comes natural to adolescents, and perhaps should be excused.

The first complaint of this group is that the "pilaging [sic]" of the langauge of Shakespeare by the abuse of such words as "gay," "queer," and "fag." I would first like to object to their use of the word "students" in the name of their organization as an insult and "abuse" of the dictionary meaning of the word—"a person who studies and investigates"—surely the onetrack purpose of their group belies such a meaning. As for the terms "fag" and "queer," have not their "abuse" come from the words' application upon homosexuals by groups such as their own? Are they then not the guilty ones?

As for homosexuals "destroying the normal interaction between males and females," I, who often make Woody Allen look like Casanova, wonder what exactly is the normal interaction? In-out, and then repeat? Can the "normal interaction" be that of men (I use the term loosely—those finding their phallic strength, and denying their impotence, in groups) harassing women who hang up signs urging sexual freedom? Where do I sign up, guys?

The third complaint is on a more profound level that "same gender" sex cannot "effect" the "continuation of the human race." There are days when I think we should urge this. Yet these profound thinkers insist, as do the Falwells and Swaggarts of the world, that sex has only one purpose, to make more fundamentalist, narrow minded assholes—well, to put it bluntly, I disagree. What bores these people must be in the sack!

"The flaunting of homosexuality" is "an offensive display"—so true, isn't it? And what of the flaunting of macho heterosexuality and the implied assumption of the brutal and unquestioned rightness of their "truth?" Their signs and verbal harassment of other students are more "inexcusable" and "grotesque" than any conceivable display of homosexuality. I often wonder why these little boys don't go home to their Heather Locklear posters and masturbate themselves into oblivion.

As for their fifth complaint: after reading their considered argument, I feel such anxiety at the fact that I wore blue jeans that strange and eventful Friday; my head hangs in shame at the thought of being part of a lost cause, unsupported by the greater number of sheep in our community too afraid to think for themselves. Can you, reader, imagine how hard life must be for these people? To have to be sustained by others' opinions, to derive most of your strength from what others think, how they act, in order to feel legitimate and "right?" Granted, we all need approval from people we respect and perhaps admire, but do we need to use others to prop up a superficial image of ourselves, a self we purport to be so "natural" and right, the unquestioned truth? The absorption of the particular individuals of this "anonymous" group into their organic, vague whole ends each of their alienation and the burden of freedom and individual thought—after the panic of the "differentness" of homosexuality has entered their rigid minds, their egos are soothed by the group they form for interdependent support. A sweet opiate.

As for their sixth reason (which provokes my assumption they are males): what does anyone know unless they've tried it?

The group's anonymity, I think, is not only a show of cowardice and fear and all that other stuff. It shows their true identity and characters for what they truly are—nonentities who hide behind the mass of their own sense of "group," who adhere to no sense of particular individuality. That's fine, if you think about it. In a sense, they are the "perfect" individuals, for they say nothing new, break no ground, preserve our long cherished prejudices—in their view of the world, these nonentities are able to have their cake and eat it too; let's hope they choke on it.

Dave Makarechian

Fun stuff.

Tracking the last twenty-two months of a lame-duck presidency. I can't think of a better time to be writing a political column that no one reads anyway. With the Democrats in firm control of Congress, and Reagan refusing to say die, it's easy and lots of fun to find topics to write about. Really. Washington is a very exciting place right now.

Actually, the most exciting topic of conversation in Washington is predicting how fast the larger part of the Reagan Revolution can end. Democrats in both houses are grinding their battle axes and rattling their swords.

But the Democrats' redoubled, hasty plans for burying the Reagan presidency reveal a serious weakness in their party structure, and raise questions about the Democrats' chances in 1988.

On the surface, with resounding defeats of the White House budget and the override of the President's highway bill veto, the Democrats appear to be a unified force. But when one takes a closer look, Democratic unity seems to be null and void. One small thread holds the Democratic party together: the desire to vindicate their party for the defeats suffered at the hands of the now vulnerable Ronald Reagan. In short, the Democrats still offer no new political direction or leadership, and still lack a clear philosophy on the nation's most important issues. In April of 1987 it's clear that the Democrats are a party without a purpose—and only a party of revenge.

Confused Liberals would likely scoff at such remarks. They might contend that the common thread holding the Democrats together is a desire to reach the little man, a desire to take from the rich to give to the poor, and a desire to once again allow individuals to look to the government for help.

But two major factors preclude this wishful thinking. First, Democrats are still in the process of fusing their new leadership on Capital Hill. After a decade of old fashioned, smoke-filled-room politics championed by speaker Tip O'Neil, House Democrats now face a new, aggressive agenda advanced by the new speaker, Jim Wright. In short, O'Neil has left Wright some very big shoes to fill: Wright must quickly establish firm control over the House's 256 Democrats in order to make solid advances on the Reagan Revolution in the lame duck years.

The second factor precluding strong Democrat unity is an ever growing faction of rather fiscally conservative Democrats led by Ways and Means Chairman Dan Rostenkowski, of tax bill fame. More and more "Rosty Democrats" balk at Speaker Wright's insistence on tax increases to finance his liberal, 1970s style big government programs. Rostenkowski sees the platform as a monkey-wrench thrown into the tax reform process and into the nation's economy.

So given that the legislative branch of government lacks established leadership, and is incurring more and more of an ideological split, what does the future hold for Capitol Hill?

It's anyone's guess as to what kind of legislation will come down from Capitol Hill. Many analysts expect Wright to defeat Democrats concerned about new spending initiatives, and those who spurn traditional protectionist legislation. But with members largely unconcerned about a central, unifying, party goal, legislation is likely to reflect individuals' concerns, and is likely to be counter-productive, haphazard, and slipshod.

H.R. 2, the Highway Bill vetoed by the President but overridden by a blood thirsty Congress, can serve as a test case. The bill is loaded with wasteful, pork barrel spending programs that benefit powerful Congressmen. For example, the bill spends over $1 million per mile to re-landscape part of a highway in Nevada. Los Angeles gets 14% of the penny-per-gallon fuel tax, or $198 million to extend four miles of its metro rail system.

perhaps a bigger question than the type of legislation the Democrats will produce is the type of leadership they will be able to produce. Especially because of competing ideologies in the party, and because of the ability for candidates to find ready support using only a vulnerable incumbent as a rallying point, Democrat hopefuls for 1988 are all over the board. Possible candidates range from the far left Jesse Jackson, Richard Gephard, Joe Biden category, to the more moderate, vague, wishy-washy Gary Hart, to the more conservative Sam Nunn and Albert Gore Southerners.

As the last twenty-two months of a rather uneventful presidency become even more uneventful, and in wondering about America's political future, we must be careful not to be mislead by the Democrats strong, outward appearance. Without strong leadership and ideological consistency, at least for now, the Democrats can be nothing other than a party without a purpose.

What's the Point

Does Nancy do Ron, Ron, Ron? Or is once enough? For Ron, that is. He seems well done at the moment. Question #2—Is Pam agGRESHive? So aggressive that we'll be selling arms to Pueblo? I hear the Pueblo paraplegic population is proportionately paramount to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania—quite perplexing (ugh—quit practicing your allitteration on me)...

That reminds me of an old addage...give a man a fish and he'll eat for a day. Give a man art and he'll spontaneously combust... Speaking of Christ, how did the Romans nail him? Caught him selling crack to an undercover disciple. What was he doing under the covers? Speaking of smoking crack, how is America's foremost woman of letters—Vanna White? Word has it she was busted selling bowels, at $250 a shot. Sounds messy. Wait till the may issue of Playboy.

Art Is.

Art is cleaning rugs in Oregon. Competing with the woman's soccer team? "Last time I saw a mouth like that it had a hook in it," Richard Bong.

Speaking of...CENSORED

Due to the sensitive nature of our audience the Meese Committee recommends that no one read any further.

Coming next month—Art Fish Memorial BBQ.

DIXON MUSSLEWHITE &
PAUL SCHAEFFER
EDITED BY BOB* WITH VERY LITTLE HELP FROM MIKE WEED

*Spelled backwards that's Bob.

Racism and Activism

Where are You, Hip Liberal?

It is seven o'clock. The current president of the BSU (Black Student Union) looks impatiently at her watch already knowing that she will be late for work at the writing center. Apparently, the ploy to coax members to the meeting by phone was unsuccessful. Once again, this little tete a tete will proceed without any real creedence (i.e., the power of the people), the minutes will be canned, and the gathering will decay into a wake for activism.

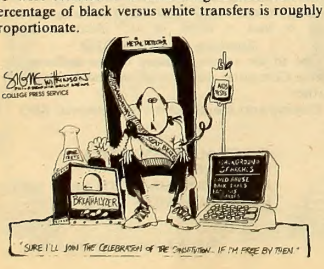
What happened to the flowering of idealism and pragmatism personified by popular heroes such as Malcolm X, King, and Carmicheal? What happened to the sentiments of political and economic reform that were engendered by the social climate of the 1960's? Is there something to the term "hip liberalism?"

If equal opportunity can be termed as hip, then it is alive and well at the Admissions Office. Similar to other institutions of the period, minority enrollment at CC showed a sharp increase during the 60's. "It was hip for minorities to go to school," acknowledged Lloyd Peterson, Assistant Director of Admissions. Ostensibly concomitant to minority enrollment percentage trends are presidential administrations. During the Kennedy and Johnson years integration made quantum leaps. However, even under Carter, that grand extoller of idealism, percentages inexorably declined. In 1980, the year that Peterson was appointed to the Admissions Board, the percentage of minorities on campus was 7.5%. It is now 9.5%. It would seem that CC has stemmed the tide of Reaganism. This bit (or byte) of information is qualified by the fact that CC has indeed come of age as far as elite collegiate institutions are concerned. This year twenty-eight hundred people applied to CC, while four hundred and eighty were accepted. That's about 6 to 1, and that's enough to beat Williams.

Why has it increased? "Quite simply, President Riley wants diversity," quoted Peterson. While admissions policies are somewhat biased toward minorities, they do not seem to be inordinately so. Minority applicants receive the same consideration as legacies and professorial progeny. For instance, when two equally qualified applicants are considered, to a certain extent the black will be taken over the white. Also, an abundance of financial aid and scholarship programs are available. Not only is this nothing new to minority students, it is also nothing new to CC students in general.

The fact remains that there are serious problems that CC integration policy has encountered. While Peterson has done a seemingly superlative job, it is obvious that integration at CC has only managed to inch forward. According to Peterson, one of the main stumbling blocks has been convincing minority parents that a liberal arts education is worth the pecuniary burden. There is also the fact that all CC students must be up to academic par. Compounding these difficulties is the loss of the TRIBES Program, an innovation of CC, to CU Boulder. Peterson asserts that the program was lost for "shoddy" reasons such as there being an office of institutional research at CU to keep track of graduates of the program. The programs size simply does not merit such an office. It was also felt, for some unfathomable reason, that there would be less opportunity for substance abuse at CU.

It would seem that these are somewhat precarious arguments for a move. Peterson even went so far as to state that he felt that the TRIBES Program would be back soon. However, a third primary reason cited for the move was that there were more Native Americans in Boulder. Peterson readily admits that the main reasons behind minority students transferring out of CC were cultural. It is interesting to note that the percentage of black versus white transfers is roughly proportionate.



Cultural reasons. Does this mean that these people transferred out because there is no real black social life? Perhaps, but it does go deeper than this. To be sure, CC, like any other school, has its drawbacks. Many members of the BSU and the student population in general are very quick to point this out. For better or worse, CC could quite easily stand for Country Club. It has also been advanced that there is a pervasive and ugly mentality behind these dubious initials.

While interviewing a member of the CCCA (CC Campus Association), it was learned that the Student Concerns Committee had conducted a survey of various social denominations to try to ascertain whether or not racism was extant at CC. The results of this survey were impossible to obtain. These findings were also supposed to be published in the Catalyst. They never were. The board member that was interviewed revealed that many committee members responsible for conducting the poll were remiss in their duties. Be that as it may, this person said that the incomplete results of the survey indicated that most people really felt that racism was not all that evident at CC, except in the form of jokes.

It has often been debated which is worse, subtle or overt racism. It is true that overt racism is not run across at CC, as opposed to a school say, like Dartmouth. Of the many people I talked to, this fact gave rise to the pretention that it did not exist. Many people also adopt this grandiloquent and doctrinaire position. The story goes that minorities have never been helped by "activism" and that less, not more of it is needed. It was also felt that a gargantuan fraction of mainly blacks and hispanics refused to transcend the morass of poverty and crime in which they lived. We've done all we can, now it is up to them. What was really needed were more minority role models of assimilation. One person even went so far as to state that when one thinks of blacks, one thinks of musicians and athletes, not scientists.

Well, this writer can think of one, but I suppose we all know the story of Dr. Charles Drew, hopefully, that is. Anyway, these are the intellectual moorings of a widely held viewpoint here at CC. Indeed, one might call CC a conservative arts school. The argument has obvious frailties, not the least of which is the fact that it ignores the historical duality of the problem, thereby citing assimilation as the key to resolution. Many members of the BSU vociferously maintain that integration coupled with assimilation is detrimental because it entails a loss of cultural identity. According to these same members, many blacks on this campus have swallowed these conservative polemics and view the BSU as some radical organization, which it is not. When interviewed, these "assimilated" blacks felt that it was a matter of personal choice, of dealing with the facts as they were.

The BSU experience can only be taken so far. One white definition of what blacks should do to alleviate the situation is not only to become more "American," but also to be exemplary citizens. One would assume that a definition of upstanding citizenship is individual intentions of changing society for the better. Activism is easily read into this.

What is the state of activism at CC? With the possible exception of the CCCAA (CC Community Against Apartheid), it is almost nonexistent. Organizations such as the BSU and MEChA (Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlan) are lucky to continue their existence from year to year due to sheer disinterest. These groups are kept going by diehards. Although there is some difference of opinion as to certain issues, political platforms of tangible integrity are never issued forth and acted upon. Many faculty advisors have thrown in the towel. They are very good at nebulous awareness drives, however, these groups also have the opportunity to review faculty appointments. Sometimes this prerrogative is not even taken.

The blatant disorganization of the CCCA has already been mentioned. Let us review the singular exception to the rule of activism at CC, the CCCAA. The CCCAA has been very visible on campus this year. It should be remembered that they have also been under constant fire by the Administration and the student body itself. T.S. Elliot once wrote that the worst crime in the world was to do the right thing for the wrong reason. It is frequently noted that a seemingly overwhelming majority of CCCAA members have almost no cognizance of what is going down in South Africa, except, of course, what their leaders have fed them. The leaders of the CCCAA do have a strong moral obligation to abolish Apartheid. Unfortunately, these leaders create for themselves an ambience of contemptible intellectual arrogance and ideological halitosis i.e. blind faith that a leaderless black South Africa will produce something better than anarchy or military junta and that divestment will make Apartheid more willing to bargain.

Hence we are left with the demoralizing picture of activism at CC. Some of the people that I interviewed at least had a viewpoint on the topic. Most people didn't know enough about it to really say anything. Others really could have cared less. Why does it take such a burning controversy as Apartheid to spur people into some sort of belated action? Racism here at home has been burning for three centuries, excuse me, since 1492. Many people, such as T.J. Bond (ex-president of the BSU) feel that the "me-oriented" attitude here may be partly to blame. "There are too few Indians, and too many chiefs." There are definite signs that things on this score are once again growing hotter. Prof. James Coleman feels that some sort of racial reckoning is inevitable in this country. Malcolm X counted on it. King tried to avoid it. Perhaps it will take more riots on the Southside, in Watts, in 5-points, or in Forsythe County to make students, the traditional wellspring of activism, more accutely aware that racism is one of the sins of the fathers that has been revisited upon the sons, and that it will not go away. Until then, one can only hope that increased awareness will do the trick, but the writer is probably hoping in vain. The more things change, the more they stay the same. This is Fletch Neeley signing off from the Campus Affairs Desk.

BY FLETCH NEELEY

ENACT Sponsors

B.K. Demonstration

ENACT, Rainforest Action Group, and Colorado Springs Earth First! are sponsoring a demonstration Saturday, April 25, at a local Burger King restaurant to protest Burger King's policy of using "rainforest beef" from Central America in its hamburgers. A major cause of rainforest destruction in Central America is the conversion of rainforests into cattle pastures, which produce beef for export (Burger King buys beef of this type from Costa Rica). Rainforests are the most diverse ecosystems on Earth. Because of their poor soil, the forests cannot be regenerated, and after several years cattle pastures turn to desert.

Participants are meeting in the Armstrong parking lot between 11:15 and 11:30 on Saturday morning, to bike/carpool together to the Burger King at Nevada and Fillmore for an hour of picketing beginning at noon.

Julian Cope Deals Well

"World shut your mouth. Shut your mouth. Put your head back in the clouds and shut your mouth.": The gospel according to Julian Cope or should I say Saint Julian- the title of his latest album. Like this statement (not to mention Cope himself), this album is straight-forward, a little surprising and at the same time highly entertaining.

Saint Julian opens with "World Shut Your Mouth." Not only do the lyrics make it a lot of fun, but the hard-driving beat produces a danceable song that grabs ahold of you and won't let go.

A couple of songs into the side, the style changes a bit with "Eve's Volcano." It has a slower psychedelic sixties sound which leaps into the refrain: "Doo doo doo doo doo I can't seem to win. My head starts beating and I'm covered with sin." Excuse me?

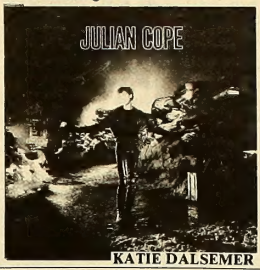
A funky tune called "Planet Ride" ends side one. Here, the instrumentation goes beyond the usual standard guitar licks and at times sounds like "Fashion" or some other older Bowie songs. I won't go into the rather kinky lyrics, but let's just say that "Planet Ride" doesn't refer to a space Shuttle mission.

Side two starts up with the title track. The sound is more mellow and pop-like and for some reason I found it immediately likable. It kind of reminds me of the group Modern English.

Things take on a different twist with the next couple of songs like one called "Spacehopper" which has a fast hard-core edge. I'm not sure if Cope's smooth vocals quite fit the song, but none-the-less this rocker is guaranteed to shake you up a bit or at least annoy your neighbors.

"A Crack in the Clouds" is a slow eerie ballad that closes the album. The lyrics seem quite ambiguous while the sparse instrumentation and the background sounds of a rain storm further complete the gloomy picture. It seems kind of a shame to end such an upbeat album with this downer, but hey, what do I know?

If you're looking for exceptional musicianship and lyrics that appeal to your social conscience, well, this album probably isn't for you. However, Saint Julian has so much to offer with its rocking and slightly warped songs that I advise checking it out.



KATIE DALSEMER

photo by Anne Basting

Lisa Holtby looks whimzically at Danny Reorda in The Canterbury Tales.

Music for Tanning

The Thrashing Doves are certainly nothing new to the 80's Music Scene. They have, through their singles and EP's earned a name for themselves, but Bedrock Vice is the first collection of their stuff on a major label, A&M.

The sound itself is not altogether "new" but it is undoubtedly fresh, alive, up and on, not to mention exhilirating and exciting. All of it is danceable recalling positive elements of REM, Simple Minds, The Smiths together with an occasional aspect of The The: well loved rock and roll of the past. Some of the best tracks on Bedrock Vice are "Beautiful Imbalance," the very impressive "Jesus on the Payroll," making a great selection of lively tunes and positive rhythms. The fresh flavor is reminiscent of spring and could make Bedrock Vice the album of the season. Quite a debut album and a band we expect to hear a lot from in the future.

Recommended for shorts, sunglasses, Bain de Soleil kegs, cases, bottles, cans, sun, sweat, skin, and generally blowing off work. Spring is time to enjoy life. Have fun.

E.J. BERNACKI

ALBUMS SUPPLIED BY BUDGET TAPES & RECORDS

"Angel Heart" Might Not Be An Angel

I have this thing about chickens too, Mr. Rourke, but I also have a thing about films that fall amidst all the other pretty-to-very bad films; I just don't like them! Granted, it was indeed a gripping movie, but not gripping enough to postpone the call of nature, or getting a second box of popcorn, or even from making a long distance phone call. "Angel Heart" is for an audience of mature 10-year-old virgins with strong stomachs — a few and far between audience.

Yes, this film may in fact be worth a dollar, or perhaps $2.50 with a first date, for this film can tell a lot about a person's inner credibility. I, for one, would no longer date a guy who is looking forward to a sequel!

Mickey Rourke plays one Harry Angel, a detective in the Big Apple. I'll skip the plot, which is pretty intricate and honorable, and just note that had Rourke taken one more shower and smoked one less filterless Camel cigarette, the movie would have been a slight bit more attractive. And, furthermore, striking an Ohio Blue-Tip match on a dead person's shoe is downright poor humor.

Robert DeNiro played his role as Dave Letterman might have. The cameramen, it would seem, need be crafty to avoid exposing Bob's tongue-in-cheek side! DeNiro, poor DeNiro, must have read the script for this roll while semi-unconscious, for, although the bun in his hair was severely beautiful and his long nails were impecible, he gave a mediocre performance at best.

Lisa Bonet, of prime time television fame, was equally cheesy. Her first movie appearance leaves her with a pretty big paycheck, blood-stained clothes, and a freak of a bullet wound. I feel bad that Bonet accepted this role, for I believe there are better roles for this potentially endearing, beautiful young actress.

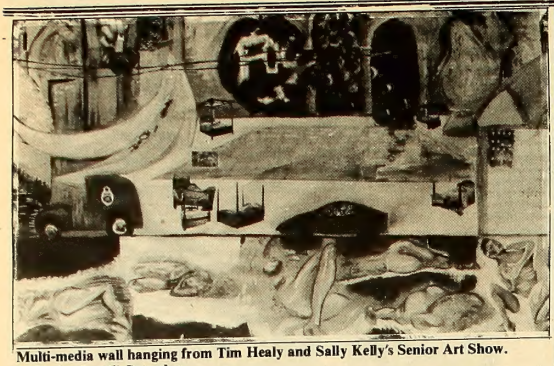
The violence was unneccessary, as was the racial and sexual overstatements that distract and simply disturb some, but enrage others. The most enjoyable piece of film fell in the middle of a bar scene in which the musical entertainment was too brief and too good for the film itself.

Symbolism prevailed, insultingly obvious at times, as Angel continues to make us aware of his "thing about chickens," but also unresolved at times, as a window fan churns in the background of all the relatively important scenes.

Set in Flannery O'Connor country, this film is a Northerner's eye view of the South, where not only is "A Good Man Hard to Find" but where a good film is hard to find, as well.

LISA JEANE BETTY

Senior Tim Miller's movie will be exposed Monday night. Asst. Director: Jillian Robinson. Starring: John Longo, Rob Madison, and Lara Travis.



Multi-media wall hanging from Tim Healy and Sally Kelly's Senior Art Show. In Packard until Saturday.

Into Oblivion Without a Lawyer

Sally Kelly and Tim Healy have created a Senior Art Show in tune with the times. They have transformed Packard Hall into four separate, but related, spaces. This innovative installation utilizes the themes of suburbia, the superficially glossy "middle class" world with an undercurrent of pain and spiritual waste.

Walking into Packard, one is confronted by a huge iron and railroad-stay cross. Bound to the cross is a female effigy wrapped in cellophane, wearing a gas mask—preempting a major idea in the show: the choking fumes of everyday American ignorance which asphyxiate spiritual values.

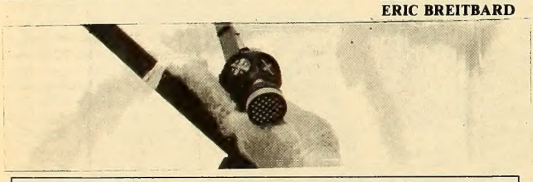
The second part of the show, on the other side of a yellow curtain is a small backyard/picnic area. With its screen door and white picket fence, it is a kind of Blue Velvet reference to the pseudo-happy suburban home: the perfect place for the perfect family to play. But is it? Next to this wholesome scene is a uniquely constructed medieval cathedral.

The room is macabre, the frescoes adumbrated on the black cloth are eery, vague images of crucifixions and crosses. The rusted pews and altar give it an ancient musty feeling — the church, like the happy family, has begun to disintegrate.

Parting the cloth, one enters the expected Packard gallery, housing an exhibit of neo-expressionistic paintings/murals. In the energetic quasi-figurative collages of American icons and crosses, the viewer makes a connection between the preceding, seemingly disparate, spaces. Suburban families, nice cars, and erotic women are juxtaposed with war, famine, and more crosses.

The world of Tim and Sally's art is one of swimming pools and churches, wars and sexy ads; a cheerful road map of an absurdly wasted land. The immense contradictions are apparent here, but by keeping the viewer in one space at a time, they show how easy it is to overlook them, achieving a study in humans' limited awareness. The show has a power and a purpose that prompts viewers to think about the limitations of their own perceptions.

DENA NOVAK AND ERIC BREITBARD



THE ANTLERS HOTEL
Colorado Springs, Colorado

Picture yourself at The Antlers Hotel for graduation.

Colorado Springs' finest...for only $60!

The Antlers...Colorado Springs' only Four-Star, Four-Diamond hotel, located just nine blocks south of The Colorado College, has a special offer for families and friends of graduating students.

- Single or double occupancy room rate of only $60
- A portrait of graduate and family, compliments of The Antlers
- Complimentary valet parking

Call Cynthia at The Antlers for reservations...we'll make this special event picture perfect!

4 S. Cascade Avenue
Chase Stone Center
Colorado Springs,
Colorado 80903

(303) 473-5600
(800) 232-2323

Operated by The Broadmoor Management Company

© 1987, The Antlers

Tulio: Save the Social

At the beginning of the month I wrote an article on Austin, Texas. For those that missed it, the main point is that live music is the lifeblood of a city's nightlife. It pumps through ever aspect of the city. It means you have a place to go and something to do at night. It encourages fashion alternatives. It gives people an entertaining and creative way of expressing themselves and their particular school of thought. I can't think of anything more essential to a social scene. Speaking of social scenes, doesn't it appear that CC has reached the point where something must be done?

For the freshmen reading this article, a little history. A year before you arrived at this school there were socials virtually every night of the week; often two at different houses. This was possible through the rather illegal system of selling beer cards which were then exchanged for tasty brews. Around the middle of the 85-86 term the administration realized it could easily be nailed with a multi-million dollar lawsuit if there was an alcohol-related death at one of these parties. The beer card system was shut down. The fraternities tried many different approaches to keep the traditions of socials alive. No dice. Now we are at the point where each house must provide all the beer free and can therefore only afford one or two socials a block. This sucks.

It sucks for a lot of reasons. The most obvious one being there are far to many nights where there is nowhere to go to relax, rage, chit-chat, scam...whatever. It is also undermining the identity of the different fraternities. Instead of people heading to the house where they feel most comfortable at, they flock to the free beer. Socials used to be the best way for an underclassman to meet older students; that's getting harder to do. In addition to all this the houses simply can't afford that much beer and the parties end sooner than most of us would like. That's the problem, what's the solution?

First of all I would like to clear the administration—(to a certain extent). I realize we are living in an increasingly paranoid society; especially concerning lawsuits. I personally feel when a young adult goes away to college they are responsible for their actions, not the school. Yet I realize many juries would not agree with me. So I don't really blame the school for shutting down the beer card system. What I blame them for is not trying harder to solve the social problem. If the administration feels that the health of the social scene is just our problem, the couldn't be more wrong.

Many gifted students subscribe to a "work hard/play hard" ethic. They expect the quality of their social life to be at least a good as the work they produce. Social life and academics are not mortal enemies. The true enemy of creative academics is a lifeless campus nightlife. If one knows there is a party that evening they have something to look forward to. If all one has to look forward to is another night of watching TV or wandering around the dorm, bored to tears; it's hard to produce fine work. Now we are finally at the solution point: Live Music.

If fraternities were allowed to host a band at parties and charge a minimal cover, the social scene would be smiling in no time. The recent Superdance was an event with alcohol and a cover charge and I'd say it went extremely well. Many fraternities are already in the charitable habit of requiring a donation of canned food at the door. Live music at socials would promote the music scene on campus which could have nothing but positive results.

Live music is also the best way to cut down on social pressure to drink. You can't dance with a beer cup in your hand, and if the band is good enough they might keep you on the floor all night. I really hope the administration takes this proposal seriously enough to take initiative. You can spend millions on Worner Center but that won't keep the transfer rate down. This could be a major step in improving the often strained communication between students and faculty. We all have a lot to lose, yet just as much to gain.

On Books: Laughter & Forgetting

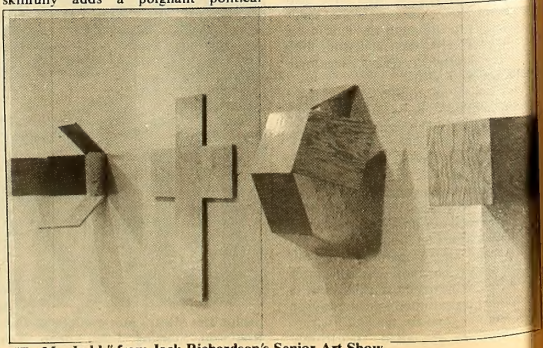
It is rare to find a book as emotionally and intellectually fulfilling as Milan Kundera's The Book Of Laughter And Forgetting. As the title suggests, Kundera deals with the aspects of everyday life. Yet, by examining these common issues so deeply, he takes mortal chaos and gives it an unique spirituality of its own. His openness and frankness about the issue of human sexuality is refreshing. Often his stories hit true to the heart, and make one laugh out and cry at the same time. Combined with Kundera's empathic feelings for humanity, he skillfully adds a poignant political commentary on the totalitarian governments of Eastern Europe. Above all, Milan Kundera writes with a magical grace that lifts its readers spirits towards the place where lyrical poetry is born.

Unfortunately, this brilliance cannot be shared by all. For one of the most eloquent writers of our time is forbidden to publish in his own country (Czechoslovakia). Therefore, it is even more of an honor for me to have the right to read and cherish Milan Kundera's words. I urge all to share his thoughts.

DENA NOVAK



"To Mr. Judd," from Jack Richardson's Senior Art Show. In Armstrong until Saturday.

CC Caves in Mines

Win evens season record at 4-4

Last Wednesday at CU in Boulder, the CC Lax Team faltered in the waning moments and lost to CU's Buffalos. The game was volatile as the momentum, and the lead, vacillated rapidly between the two teams.

The score was 2-2 at the end of the first, on goals by Blake Anderson and Eric Peterson. Good goal-tending by Devin Standard and the play of his stalward defense allowed only one more behind them at halftime. The score was 3-3 as the 3rd opened due to Mike Alkitis's last second blast.

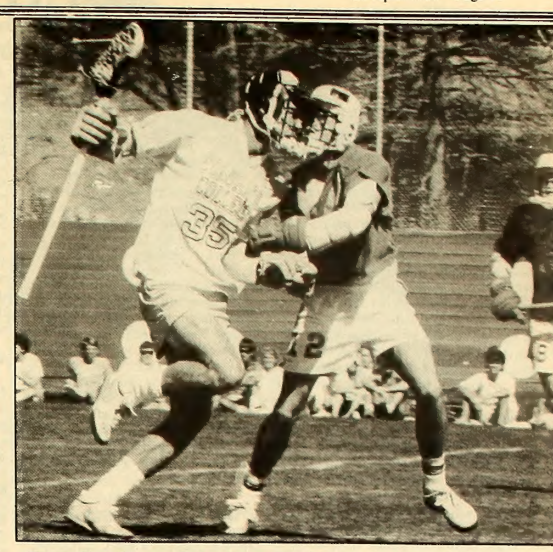
The officials had received a verbal assault from Tiger Coach Tom Kay concerning their ignorance and inablity to take control of the game. He was slapped with a penalty which only served to incite the Tigers to violence. The CU goal was peppered with 15 shots, 6 of which went in, during the 3rd. Peterson tallied 3 more while Guy Pope, Brian Brophy, and Robby Shwartz each blasted one home. The defense was sterling in the 3rd as they crunched, stuffed, and stopped CU's offensive threat including a penalty that left the Tigers two men down!

It seems as if the refs had determined the 4th period would be the Tigers downfall. CC was slapped with 9 penalties while CU received none. This proved to be the difference as CU scored the 8 goals they needed to win by two. Coach Kay was ejected from the game for his verbal abuse of the incompetent, bewildered, and vengeful officials. The defeat was a horrible one for all involved.

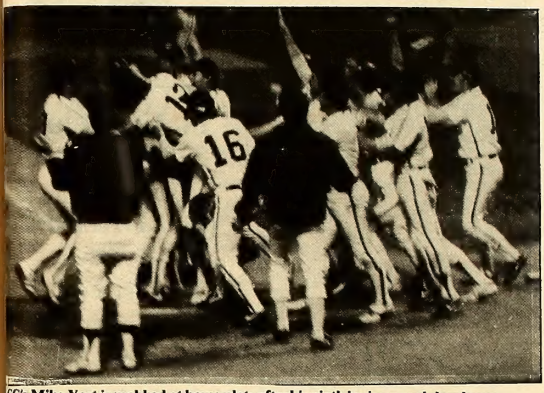
Saturday at the Colorado School of Mines, the Tigers bounced back! Blake Anderson and Guy Pope quickly tallied two for the Tigers. Visciously tough defense led by Jack Foster yielded a mere four goals at the half. So the Tigers sprang into the 3rd with a one goal margin due to a pair of blasts by Jim Quirk and a pretty behind the back goal by Eric Peterson.

The Miners quickly tied the game and then took the lead; but the Tigers were resilient. The netminding of Devin Standard, when combined with the aggressive defensive play of Jack Foster, J.B. Behrirs, and Jim Cramer, denied The School of Mines the momentum. Guy Pope's 2 key 3rd period goals kept the Tigers within striking distance.

Continued on p. 15



Prepared to utilize a well placed knee, CC's Brian Brophy instead decides to go around a CSU defender. CC thrashed the Rams 20-1 Wednesday to raise their season record to 5-4. photo by Jerry Wang



CC's Mike Yost is mobbed at home plate after his ninth inning grand slam home run beat AFA, 14-12. photo by Jerry Wang

Yost's Slam Downs AFA

The Colorado College baseball team won two of three games during the last week, beating the Air Force Academy, 4-12, on a ninth-inning grand slam by catcher Mike Yost (Colorado Springs, Colo.) at Memorial Park last Wednesday then taking a 2-0 victory in the opener of an Easter doubleheader in Golden against the Colordo School of Mines. The Orediggers won Sunday's nightcap by a score of 15-10.

The Tigers now are 5-13 for the season and 2-8 in the Colorado Intercollegiate Baseball Association.

Senior right-hander Dana Rademacher Englewood, Colo.) was the winning pitcher in both recent triumphs, earning the victory in relief over Air Force then spinning a three-hit gem to go the distance against Mines. He is 3-5 for the season.

Rademacher, who also saw action on the mound in the second game Sunday but was not the pitcher of decision, hit a triple for one five extra-base hits by CC in the loss. Yost slugged a pair of doubles.

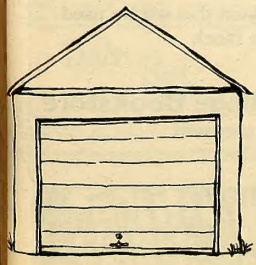
Sport Shorts

Women's tennis: The Tigers won four of six singles matches to defeat the University of Missouri, 5-4, at home on Friday. Pacing the singles charge were junior Sara Ryan (Tucson, Ariz.), freshman Stacey Wing (Colorado Springs, Colo.), senior Melissa Forbes (Marblehead, Mass.) and freshman Josey Axt (Edina, Minn.), who won their No. 1, No. 3, No. 4 and No. 6 matches, respectively. Junior Meredith Clark (Greely, Colo.) and junior Theresa Kuehne (Madison, Wis.) teamed up to win at No. 3 doubles, clinching the triumph for Colorado College, which had lost 5-4 to Air Force earlier in the week.

Men's tennis: Coach Ken Bartz saw his Tigers finish fourth in a field of 10 teams at their own invitational tournament, CC collecting 49 points compared to 65 for tourney champion Mesa. Regis and Colorado State finished in a tie for second place, each with 52 points. After CC came Denver with 41, Northern Colorado with 31, Metro State 21, Colorado-Colorado Springs with 19, Mines with 18 and Kearney State with 11. Colorado College highlight's included a first-place finish at No. 4 singles for freshman John Duncan(Bainbridge Island, Wash.) and a second-place finish at No. 1 singles for senior Kyle Fedler (Atlanta, Ga.).

Sophomore first-baseman Charlie Carrel (Birney, Mont.) was 4-for-5 in the victory over Air Force.

Track and Field: The CC men's and women's teams competed at the Sterling (Kan.) Invitational on Saturday, with freshman Sally Bush (Denver, Colo.) setting a school record in the discus. Bush finished fourth in the meet with a toss of 116 feet, 9½ inches, while teammate and fellow frosh Karen Roome (Denver, Colo.) took ninth with a personal-best of 97-1. Other women's highlights included performances by freshman Terri Grzbowski (Aurora, Colo.), who finished first in the 800 meters with a time of 2:26 and third in the 3,000 meters with an 11:39.4; senior Theresa Ellbogen (Casper, Wyo.), who threw the javelin a personal record 82 feet, 4 inches; and junior Mia Cadmus (Vail, Colo.), who was sixth in the 3,000 meters with a 12:46 and also ran a personal best 5:59 in the 1,500 meters. In the men's competition, Tiger sophomore Chuck Puga (Denver, Colo.) captured first place in the shot put with a throw of 50 feet, 1 inch, while junior Scott Kang (Fountain, Colo.) won the 1,500 meters with a time of 4:07. Junior Erik Browning (Austin, Texas) ran an impressive 15:18.8 and freshman paul Koch (Pueblo, Colo.) a 16:41 in the 5,000 meters. Freshman Ryan Shaffer (Arvada, Colo.) timed in at 2:01.6 in the 800 meters while the men's 400- and 1,600- meter relay, paced by freshman Mike Brown's (Arlington, Va.) 56.1 split in the 1,600, each finished fifth, helping Colorado College to an eighth-place standing overall in a field of 16 teams.



SUMMER STORAGE

The Choice Is Yours!

We Suggest:

Interstate Secure Storage

- Electronic Security System on Every Door
- Lighted & Fenced
- Your Lock—Your Key
- On Site Resident Manager

633-0222

SPORTS

Dean's Drivel

Led by this year's Most Valuable Player, Magic Johnson, the Los Angeles Lakers will win this year's NBA championship, ousting the Atlanta Hawks, upset winners over Boston's Celtics in the Eastern finals, in six games. The Lakers, owners of the league's best regular season record, will face their toughest challenge from a young and powerful Dallas Mavericks team in a fantastic seven-game Western conference final series. The Hawks, who will prevent an aging and slow Celtics team from earning the chance to repeat as NBA champions (the 68-69 Celtics team was the last to win consecutive titles), will split the first two games with Boston in the Garden and win in six games.

EASTERN CONFERENCE:

Boston Celtics vs. Chicago Bulls: The Celtics will win, probably in three games, but Michael will get his. Jordan, the league's most awesome scoring machine since Wilt Chamberlain, could threaten his record 63 point playoff effort set last year against the Celts. But Boston, led by the now routine excellence of Larry "Tweety" Bird and NBA field-goal percentage leader (.604) Kevin "Too Pale" McHale, will be far too much for the Bulls. Chicago has some good young talent in Charles "Thick As An" Oakley, Brad "Californai" Sellers, and Elston "No Deposit, No Re" Turner, but too many stiffs (Dave Corzine, Granville Waiters). Bill "Jerry's Not Dead" Walton's return to action for the Celtics will be key to the Celtics' success.

Milwaukee Bucks vs. Philadelphia 76ers: This is always a great matchup. Last year, Julius Erving's miss on an open fifteen-foot jumper with seconds to play was the difference in a gripping seven-game thriller that earned the Bucks the unenviable duty of getting swept by the Celtics. With the same reward looming for these two teams once again, look for the 76ers to rally behind the soon to retire (at the end of this season) Dr. J and the not soon to diet Charles Barkley to beat the Bucks. Milwaukee, aided by a resurrected John "No Coke, Pepsi" Lucas and the never afraid to shoot Terry "E.E." Cummings, have suffered from the ever worsening injury problems of team leader Sidney "No Relief" Moncrief. Randy "Pound Some" Breuer is too skinny to be a force inside, and Jack "Don't Make Me" Sikma hasn't produced in Milwaukee as he once did in Seattle. Roy "Boy Toy" Hinson and Tim "Can't Touch The Rim" McCormick will be too strong for the Bucks inside, and Maurice "Nice" Cheeks' defensive mastery will foil Lucas' speed. 76ers in five.

Detroit Pistons vs. Washington Bullets: Isiah and the Irish (former Notre Dame stars Adrian Dantley and Bill Laimbeer) will lead the Pistons to victory over the Bullets. Detroit's Thomas is still one of the most fun to watch players ever, and Dantley's scoring and Laimbeer's rebounding and outside shooting make them tougher than ever. Washington, carried by perpetual workhorse Moses "Molly" Malone and jumpshot specialist Jeff "And Mutt" Malone, just cannot be expected to win with NBA travesty Manute "Walking Stick" Bol in the lineup. Great athletes Joe "Used Cars" Dumars and Vinnie "Barbarino" Johnson round out the Piston backcourt, and Sidney "Makin' Lots Of" Green and Rick "Toot" Mahorn help out up front. Detroit will advance (in four games) to meet another athlete laden team, Atlanta, in what should be an exciting semi-final clash.

Atlanta Hawks vs. Indiana Pacers: Atlanta will be tested but not toasted by a young Pacer team that has oodles of potential. Willis, Wilkins, and Rollins are ably supported by Jon "Mr. Vertical" Koncak, and Doc "Joan" Rivers and Randy "@#$%!!*, Man" Wittman can rely on amazing waterbug Spud "Spider" Webb and self-designated shooter Mike "Come Get Some" McGee in the backcourt. But Indiana, with Chuck "Person to" Person, Herb "Fill 'em" Williams, and Steve "Self-inflicted Wound" Stipanovich backed by Wayman "No Sale" Tisdale, have one of the youngest and most talented teams in the league. Atlanta is just too tough, and will win in four games.

WESTERN CONFERENCE:

Los Angeles Lakers vs. Denver Nuggets: Nice series. The Nuggets will be lucky to get within twenty points of the Lakers in any game, and Los Angeles could very well set a record for average margin of victory in a playoff series. Magic, Kareem, and James "Trust" Worthy are all players who can score at any time, and Byron "Great" Scott can score in bunches if he's on. The Nuggets, probably the worst team in the playoffs (and not getting any better), have way too many stiffs to compete ("our stiffs are, well, just stiffs"—Doug Moe). Alex "Pink" English and Lafayette "Fat" Lever are good players, but any team who relies on Bill "Spot" Hanzlik as their defensive stopper is in terribly deep trouble. Blair "Schmid" Rasmussen and Danny "Ruptured Rhino II" Schayes are two more reasons that the Nuggets have absolutely no chance.

Utah Jazz vs. Golden State Warriors: This is a good series whose outcome makes little or no difference. Utah is a strong team with Karl "Mailman" Malone, Mark "King Stiff" Eaton, and Darrell "Funk and Dunk" Griffith leading the way under former all-world eater, Head Coach Frank "Get" Layden. Golden State relies on Joe Barry "A Christmas" Carroll, Eric "Sleepy" Floyd, and Chris "Rehab" Washburn for their success. If Carroll and Washburn can keep Eaton from dominating inside, look for the Warriors. But then again, who cares?

Portland Trail Blazers vs. Houston Rockets: Portland quietly compiled the Western conference's third best record, and Houston, after the early season losses of Lewis Lloyd and Mitchell Wiggins, got some flak from Dallas coach Dick Motta, who claimed Bill Fitch had the Rockets intentionally lose games so that they could avoid facing the Lakers until the conference finals. Clyde "The Glide" Drexler and Kiki "All The Way" Vandeweghe lead the Blazers while twin towers Akeem "The Spleen" Olajuwon and Ralph "And Delilah" Sampson anchor Houston's chances. Houston made it to the finals last year, but they are too weak at the guard spots to get past the Blazers. Portland in four.

Dallas Mavericks vs. Seattle Supersonics: Dallas will destroy Seattle. Mark "On Fire" Aguirre, Rolando "Back In" Blackman, Derek "Bazaar's" Harper, Sam "Gherkins" Perkins, and James "Mc" Donaldson comprise one of the NBA's best starting fives, and Detlef "Alles por Deutschland" Schrempft provides versatile backup assistance. Seattle has Tom "Burial" Chambers, Alton "Mister Twister" Lister, and Xavier "X-Man" McDaniel, but that won't be nearly enough. Dallas in a sweep.

N.Y. Mets
&
N.Y. Yankees
Shown At Greenstreets
Lounge
599-7727
★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★★

Heading out into the jungle this summer?
TAYLOR TRAVEL
will reserve your sedan chair!!!!!

"Your Campus Travel Agency"
818 N. Tejon 636-3871

Used Book Buy-Back
Tues. & Wed.
April 28-April 29
8:30-4:30
Any title in usable condition that will be used in a future block
The Colorado College Bookstore
McGregor Basement

acrosse

ntinued from p. 13

Finally the Tigers snapped out of their hargy. The defense forced the ball field to the offense which took mmand. Robby Schwarz finessed in 3 als which when combined with single sts from Stork, Ross dohrman, Guy pe, Bill Trousdale, and Eric Peterson de it 15 to 11, the final score. It could ve easily been 12 for the Miners if it had been for the spectacular 1 on 1 save de in the last minute by defenseman k Foster.

D. SCOTT STANDARD

Cycling

The Rocky Mountain Collegiate Cycling Conference continued last weekend with a hill climb hosted by the Colorado School of Mines.

Noel Lenski, who incorporated some Spage Gig carousing into his training program, was unhindered by the previous night's festivities as he took third place. Terry Ashby was close behind in fifth.

Racing action comes to the CC campus on May 3 at 8:30 Sunday morning as we host our first collegiate cycling event. Come and watch us rip Cascade Avenue to hell.

BY JEFFREY SHOMPER

Icers Down Alaska 3-1

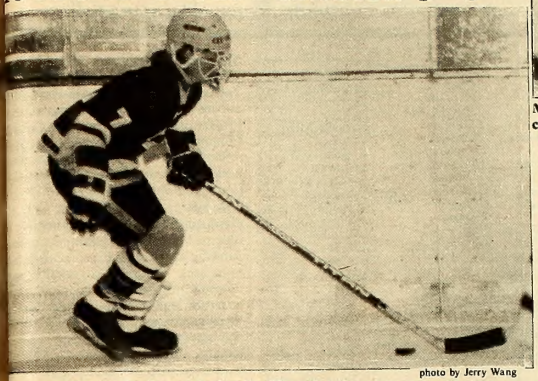

photo by Jerry Wang

lynner really goes for the net during the Tigers 3-1 victory over the Alaskan Northern Lights.

One of the longest seasons in Colorado College sports has finally ended. The women's club hockey team concluded its season Tuesday night with a 3-1 victory over the Northern Lights of Fairbanks, Alaska.

The Tigers took control, opening the scoring in the first minute of the game off a scramble at the side of the net. With the Alaskan goalie sprawled on the ice out of the net, senior Kathy Mahoney, also on the ice, sent the puck up the slot. Junior right winger Susan Deeds popped it into the open net.

About eight minutes later the Alaskan women matched that goal to even the score at 1-1. After that it was a defensive struggle and a scoreless second period.

Defensively, Martha Deeds led the crew with help from freshmen Quarters Keely and Doreen Smith, and sophomores Christina Chamberlain and Gretchen Smith. Between the pipes co-captain Dorothy Diggs anchored the defense kicking away 18 shots.

With the score still tied going into the third period, a CC powerplay created the opportunity for the gamewinner. Senior Sarah Flynn took a drop pass from Mahoney and let loose a wrist shot from the top of the left circle. Susan Deeds was at the right post to insure Flynn's goal.

CC held onto the lead then padded it with a breakaway goal by Mahoney. Rookie of the Year candidate Martha Deeds planted a clearing pass on Mahoney's stick at the redline. The senior left winger broke for the net beating the Alaskan goalie low on the glove side.

"Alot of hard work and strong defensive play, accompanied by a strong desire to win gave us this victory," said interim Head Coach Dave Roe. "We have some great scorers and they came through with the needed goals plus the senior leadership to inspire the team in their last game.

After a slow start to the season the Tigers rallied at the end to win four of their last six games.

Last Saturday the women posted their first home victory in a 7-0 rout over CSU. Kathy Mahoney led the team with four goals and two assists with linemates Sarah Flynn and Susan Deeds each adding a goal and assisting Mahoney's scores. Defenseman Nara got her first college career goal to finish off the scoring while netminder Dorothy Diggs recorded her second shutout of the year.

The Tigers also took home the fourth place trophy at the annual Colorado Women's Hockey Association's tournament April 11-13 in Denver.

QUINN TIKKANEN

Marathon

Marathon master Gary Geist (left) tells eager young journalist John Kinlin how chicks dig endurance.

photo by Jerry Wang

Continued from p. 2

2:32:54 was only 54 seconds off his mark and a personal best for the young marathoner.

To many, running is a lonely sport. When asked if he really enjoyed the sport, Banty replied, "I figured out that running is really kind of a pain in the ass. It's time consuming, it's boring, I run by myself and don't have a coach to push me. But basically the only reason I do it is just for the races. The races are cool. Just to be there, just to say I ran in the Boston Marathon—it gives me self confidence. The greatest feeling in the world is crossing that finish line and having someone there waiting for you."

BY JOHN KINLIN

To Marshall Carr

Son,

You've always kept our lives fun and exciting. Thank-you, and we send all our love on your 21st Birthday.

Love,

Mom & Dad

The Date Bar a Restaurant

Serving UNIQUE HOMEMADE RECIPES

10% off with CC ID

Serving Breakfast & Lunch

Mon.-Sat.

7 am - 4 pm

24 E. Kiowa 578-5693

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Found Near Loomis—Timex watch. Call and describe. Tony, 520-1626.

Tim Miller's Thesis Film "Indecent Exposure" is being shown Monday, April 27th in AH 300. Reception afterwards in Romance Language Lounge. Public welcome.

Typing Service—Accurate, fast typing service at reasonable rates. Located three blocks south of Armstrong Hall. Telephone 632-1226.

On Campus Jobs—Please see student Saga manager or Financial Aid office.

Dr. Harold L. Enarson

Commissioner, Colorado Commission on Higher Education
Chairman of the Board of Directors, Academy of Independent Scholars
Senior Adviser, Western Interstate Commission for Higher Education
Former President, The Ohio State University and Cleveland State University will speak on the topic

Quality Education, The Curriculum, and Assessment Issues

Wednesday, May 6th at 3:30 p.m.
Gates Common Room, Palmer Hall

WANTED

VOLUNTEER FOR CLASS AGENTS

A few hard-working enthusiastic Juniors who enjoy working with their classmates for fun and fund raising for Colorado College.

Apply in Annual Fund Office in Cutler Hall.

"YOUR SPEAKING VOICE IS YOUR FORTUNE." Discover NEW hidden power in your speaking voice.

Years of research, over 30,000 person-to-person voice contacts, uncovers NEW values in your speaking voice.

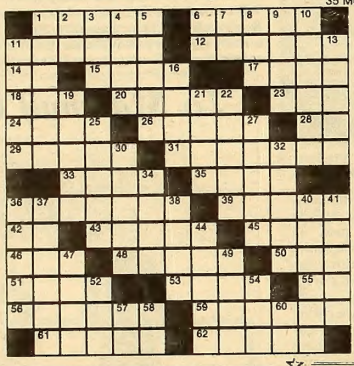
NEW knowledge increases your influence in your social, family, business, professional and sales life.

Order your audio cassette lecture "YOUR SPEAKING VOICE IS YOUR FORTUNE." Write WILSON, Box 42. Casper, Wyoming 82602. Please enclose check or money order for $39.95 to cover costs. Thirty-day delivery.

FILM — Olin I, April 27, 1987 at 8:00 P.M. "Dax's Case" - a 59 minute film followed by discussion presented by Science in Medicine course; Donald (Dax) Covart who, blinded and severely maimed in an explosion, was treated against his wishes. The film, through interviews with Dax and his family, his physicians and his lawyer, recount and reevaluate the religious, ethical, legal and personal dynamics that led to his being treated against his wishes.

Typewriter For Sale! Sears "Scholar" electric. Standard pica type; black/correction reel ribbon. Going abroad and must sell. Best offer. Call Dorothy at x215.

The Weekly Crossword Puzzle



ACROSS

1 Adhesive substance
6 Domain
11 Be unsteady
12 Tavern
14 Three-toed sloth
15 Distance measure
17 Grip in teeth
18 Doctrine
20 Customs
23 That woman
24 Despoil
26 Evaluates
28 Revised: abbr.
29 Breathe loudly in sleep
31 Annoys
33 Scorch
35 Midday
36 Gratified
39 Memoranda
42 Roman 51
43 Rips
45 Gull-like bird
46 Printer's measure: pl.
48 Freshet
50 Fish eggs
51 Footless
53 Partner
55 Prefix: down
56 Expand
59 Trade
61 Giver of gift
62 Fragment

DOWN

1 Venom
2 Near
3 Pigpen
4 Athletic group
5 Mistake
6 Rupees: abbr.
7 Babylonian deity
8 Priest's vestment
9 Girl's name
10 Parent
11 Caudal appendages
13 Warts
16 Colorless
19 Antlered animal
21 Short jacket
22 Surgical thread
25 Pay the check for another
27 Discharge a gun
30 Mollifies
32 Go in 34 Harvest
36 Beg
37 Pellucid
38 Apothecary's weight
40 Worn away
41 Scoff
44 Pierces
47 Piece for one
49 Greenland settlement
52 Mr. Rather
54 Sin
57 As far as
58 Teutonic deity
60 Symbol for tellurium

Southern Africa and Divestment. A lecture/discussion led by Linda Mizell Taylor, director of the American Friend Service Committee's Southern Africa Project and chairperson of the Colorado Coalition Against Apartheid. Ms. Taylor recently returned from a trip to Southern Africa. Tuesday, May 5, 4:00, Gates Common Room. Sponsored by the CCCAA.

Rewarding Summer for sophomore and older college men in Colorado mountains working with children. Backpacking, horseback riding, crafts, wildlife, many outdoor programs. Write now; include program interests and goals. Sanborn Western Camps, Florissant, CO 80816.

Car For Sale! 1979 AMC Concord, 6 cylinder, automatic, power steering. New tires, AM-FM cassett Marantz stereo. 56,000 miles. Well maintained, excellent condition, reliable. Going abroad and must sell. $1,900.00. Call Dorothy at x215.

Buy Nugget

Cutler Publications

is still accepting applications

for

Nugget Editor

(or Co-Editors)

Anyone interested please contact:

Lelia Deykin x297
(Acting Cutler Board President)

Heidi Dowd x282
(Nugget '87 Editor)

INTERN POSITIONS AVAILABLE IN ADMISSION OFFICE

4 intern positions open for Summer and School Year

* 1 Full-time Summer '87
* 3 Part-time School Year 1987-88

Applications and job descriptions available in Admission Office

Contact:
Lloyd Peterson, x348 for further information

LET'S SQUARE DANCE
THE OLD FASHIONED WAY!!
Sponsored by Inter Varsity Christian Fellowship
Saturday April 25th
7:30 – 10:30 pm Cossitt Gym
Featuring Professional Square Dance Caller Gib Gilbert
Square Dance Attire Welcome

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado — 8 May 1987 — Volume 21, No. 16

anel iscussion on outh Africa

pproximately 150 people gathered in s Common Room yesterday for a el discussion about CC's divestment icy. Trustee Gerald Phipps, essors Margi Duncombe and Chris liths, and students Ian Campbell and d Breyfogle composed the panel. dent Riley mediated the affair. This he first of several similar discussions be held for the next 12 to 15 months. Southern Africa Education mmittee, set up last March by the rd of Trustees and headed by Dean oks, organized the event.

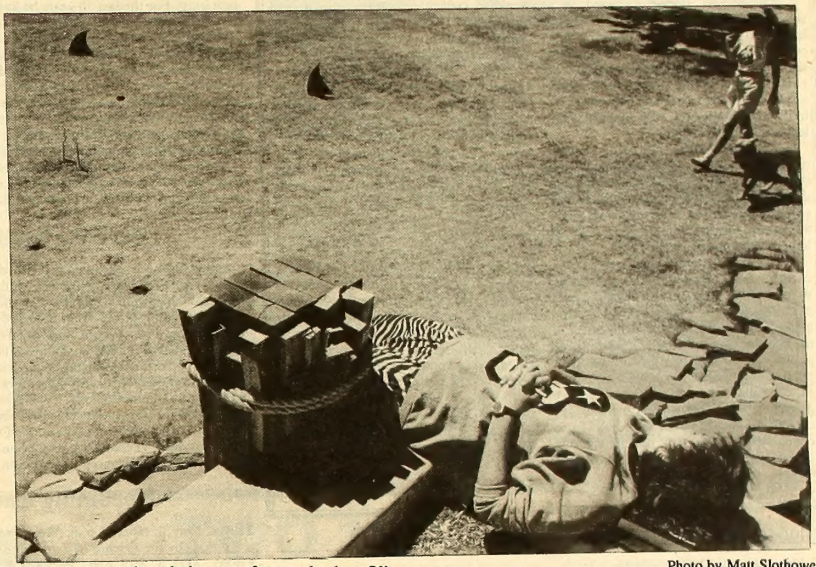
The five panelists each gave 10 to 15 ute speeches with Phipps, Chairman the Board's Investment Committee nning. He started by pointing out every Trustee abhors Apartheid. The rd chose not to divest for economic, ical and humanitarian reasons. By sting, the school could not maintain investment excellence it now enjoys. ondly they concluded divestment ld actually support the Apartheid ernment by promoting self-ficiency. Thirdly, the Board gnized that the companies in question couraged the Black cause through anti-artheid lobbying and social programs. e Trustees believe that abandoning uth Africa would promote a civil war h possible cataclysmic consequences.

Professor Duncombe chose to centrate on the ineffectiveness of the livan Principals—a set of guidelines ulating American corporate activity in uth Africa. She pointed out the manitarian programs prescribed by Sullivan Principals have actually efitted Whites more than Blacks and in e senses have supported Apartheid. pport for the current educational tems trains Blacks to participate in segregated world. The trade unions e been ineffective in securing Black hts and the newly created Black urgeoise divides the race. Finally, the nciples have done nothing to improve egation in the country's occupational structure. She maintains that divestment will weaken the Apartheid government and encourage racial equality.

Ian Campbell showed that Apartheid is based on economics, not racial hatred. He then showed, through historical examples, that foreign investment has sustained the system. He calls for divestment to undermine the economic base supporting racial inequality.

Todd Breyfogle, though not taking a stand for or against divestment, stated some observations about the American movement. He first pointed out that the information Americans receive is vague and somewhat untrustworthy. Furthermore, Americans cannot be sure what the consequences of any policy they enact will be. He also sought to destroy the fallacy of divestment being a moral statement. Different possible answers are

Continues on p.6



Just when you thought it was safe to go back to Olin . . . Photo by Matt Slothower

Color Dave "Adrenalin" Williams heads out. Photo by Peter Loach

Digital Tape-Newest Hi-Fi Technology

Have you ever noticed how many people's stereo systems seem to reflect their appreciation of technology rather than music? Well now there's a new toy: DAT—Digital Audio Tape.

Last block I went to the Sound Shop for a display of this tiny little tape thats causing such a big, big ruckus. First of all they're small; palm sized. They look more like a miniature VHS tape than anything else. They have a sliding cover to help save them from audio tape hell (car floorboards, Gerbers strained spinach etc.). Unlike normal audio tape which does a one-eighty around the tape heads, DAT covers only ninety degrees. Less tape around the heads means quicker random access. Most decks will be able to go from track one to twelve in about eight seconds. The main thing about DAT is that it sounds as good as CD's. Except now you can record. This has the recording industry in a cold sweat.

It's not hard to see why either. They just invested heavily in converting from records to compact discs. This is a wise move if CD's are what they appear to be: the recording medium of the future. But hey, whoa, whats all this I hear about DAT's? As good sound but you can record? The really scary thing about DAT is in its pirating capability. Digital recordings provide a much purer, uninterrupted stream of recorded material through a machine. DAT decks could make exact duplicates of CDs. Yet the industry has already thought of this and taken preventive measures.

This is where it gets confusing, but if you pick it you'll probably be able to impress somebody with your vast knowledge of stereo equipment you'll never afford. Compact Discs and cassette tapes turn at certain speeds, and these

Continued on p. 16

INSIDE

Peter Blasenheim: Student of the Charming, Pathetic and Dinky
Page 8

Lake Powell Overrun by Collegiate Parasites
Page 10

Art Reviews
Page 15

All Sports Thrown Into A Nebulous Void
Page 17

What's News

Analyzing the issues

Americans seem to love scandals and Gary Hart has offered himself as the latest subject for our national speculation. It is rather ironic that on the same weekend that Hart was quoted as saying,"Follow me around... I'm serious. If anybody wants to put a tail on me, go ahead. They'd be very bored" in a long article in the New York Times magazine he would come under fire for having supposedly spent the night with a Miami woman.

The Miami Herald engaged in a surveillance of Hart's Washington town house on Friday and Saturday. Two editors, two reporters and a photographer made up the investigative team. They parked legally on the street outside Hart's residence and kept an eye on both entrances to the town house until Hart confronted the team on Saturday night.

Hart has denied that he had sexual relations with Donna Rice, the woman who the Miami Herald has said was involved in the incident. He has insisted that Rice spent the night with a campaign associate and came and went from the town house at least twice on Saturday.

The details of the story are certainly critical. But perhaps more important are the ethical questions that the Miami Herald story have raised. For instance, is such a method of surveillance an infringement of the privacy of a political candidate or do public figures sacrifice privacy for their public commitments? And if such tailing of candidates is ethical, how can we guarantee that the investigations are complete and do not unearth false conclusions? Hart has undeniably dug himself into a deep hole. He'll have some trouble regaining momentum. Only recently had he begun to shift attention away from his financial straits to what he perceives as more important policy issues. Now the womanizing theme is dominating the news.

As press scrutiny of Hart's marriage and relations with women, especially Donna Rice has escalated throughout the week, the reading public has been caught in a dilemma. How significant has the Hart scandal been? Is Hart's behavior over the weekend (which if nothing else invited imaginative speculation) a sign of problems with his judgment and integrity as the Miami Herald has asserted?

What exactly are we looking for in a Presidential candidate? Should we focus on issues or on personal integrity? How realistic are we when we expect candidates to be paragons of our idealistic values? Can politicians function efficiently when they spend extensive time covering their tracks for alleged moral indiscretions? The architects of the Hart campaign admit that they are facing an uphill battle. The primary question is how longlasting the effects of the town house scandal will be. Hart tried on Wednesday and Thursday to openly dispel the questions about his conduct. He spoke with the press for an unconventionally long stretch in New Hampshire, answering questions for over an hour. Still, factual discrepancies exist between his account and that of the Miami Herald. Perhaps in the next few weeks we'll get answers to the perplexing questions. In the meantime, we'll watch for upcoming investigative reports from the Herald. Who knows, maybe Fawn is one of Gary's top aides.

News Editors

Students Share Farm School Experience

On May 5th, Betsy Wright-Clark, Andrea Avataggio and Kate Turnbull gave a slide presentation about their experience spending seventh block at the Malachite Small Farm School in Gardener, Colorado. Mike Nowak, professor of anthropology at CC served as their faculty sponsor. The Colorado College Venture Grant Committee funded the trip.

The Malachite Small Farm School is a non-profit organization that teaches about organic farming. Betsy Wright-Clark explained that the experience helped her realize how necessary it is to respect the earth and to remember that our food doesn't just come from King Soopers. The school stresses, that, by becoming aware of what is involved in producing food, people can become more responsible consumers.

Students became involved in all aspects of the farm. Morning chores were performed on a daily basis. Their education included the fundamentals of organic farming, proper caring for animals, cheese-making, beekeeping and working in the woodshop. Students also researched different aspects of organic farming and wrote papers for academic credit.

Interest has been expressed in making a block course at Malachite open to other students in future. However, the faculty has not been very receptive to the idea. Any students who might be interested in such a block should contact Betsy Wright-Clark, Andrea Avataggio or Kate Turnbull.

It is also possible to participate in the Malachite Farm School for shorter periods of time such as a weekend or a block break. For more information on the possibilities, write to Malchie Small Farm School, ASR 21, Gardener, Colorado 81040. The experience proved to be very rewarding and is highly recommended to any interested students.

MARGO LEVI

Hair Designers for Men & Women

RAPUNZEL

Style cuts, Cellophanes,

Perms & Color.

Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.

Stop in or make your appointment:

827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

News Briefs

Professors Thurow will Speak on Competitiveness in World Economy

Lester Thurow, newly named Dean of the Sloan School of Management at Massachusetts Institute of Technology and an authority on U.S. economic matters, will be this year's H. Chase Stone/Lewis Abbot Lecturer at Colorado College.

Thurow will present a lecture at 8 p.m. Thursday, May 14, in the Gates Common Room of Palmer Hall. The talk, which is free and open to the public, is on the topic, "Recapturing American Competitiveness in the World Economy."

An internationally known economist, Thurow is considered a leading authority on protectionism, U.S. competitiveness and revitalizing the U.S. economy. For the last 10 years he has been a controversial figure in the public policy debate about national competitiveness.

His most recent book, The Zero-Sum Solution, and many of his other writings question what he calls the "MBA mentality" of American managers. That mentality, he claims, is more interested in takeover battles than in enlarging the productive base of the United States.

Thurow's stand on this and other issues has earned him appointment as the new Dean of the Sloan School of Management at MIT. In this new position he has been charged with the responsibility of turning Sloan's emphasis toward the production of competitive goods for the world economy.

A Rhodes Scholar who earned his doctorate from Harvard University, Thurow in 1982 received the Loeb Award for economic writing. He is a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

"Save the South Platte" Rally

A rally has been scheduled for Saturday by opponents of the Two Forks Dam water project. The rally, called "Save the South Platte Day," will be located at the site of the proposed reservoir in the South Platte valley west of Denver. A primary purpose of the event is to show support for the canyon's recreational opportunities—participants will spend the afternoon hiking, picnicing, boating, fishing, and rock climbing. Environmentalists have charged that Two Forks would have disastrous impacts to regional wildlife and ecosystems. For instance, the dam would drown twenty-nine miles of the South Platte and its tributary, the North Fork, eliminating one of the West's finest trout streams. Opponents also claim that Two Forks is an expensive and inflexible method of providing water, and that the project would saddle Denver area water consumers with an enormous debt. The rally begins at noon along the South Platt, about eight miles east of Deckers. For more information, call Eric at 632-2181.

Upcoming Campus Events

Friday, May 8, Noon-5 p.m. West Terrace of Tutt Library. Book sale (17th annual) by the Friends of Tutt Library. Admission free, open to the public.

Friday, May 8, 8:15 p.m., Packard Hall. Concert by the Colorado College Trio—violinist Don Robinson, cellist Susan Smith, pianist Sue Langlas Grace. Free and open to the public.

Thursday, May 14, 11 a.m., Packard Hall. Chris Bell, Colorado College senior and performing comedian, presents a demonstration-discussion on "The Theory and Practice of Comedy." Free and open to the public.

Thursday, May 14, 8 p.m., Gates Common Room of Palmer Hall. Lester Thurow, author and dean of the Sloan School of management, MIT, will speak on "Recapturing American Competitiveness in the World Economy." Free and open to the public.

Thursday, May 14, 8 p.m., Packard Hall. Concert by the Colorado College Chamber Chorus, conducted by Don Jenkins. Free and open to the public.

Friday, May 15, 8:15 p.m., Packard Hall. Concert by Bricolage—the piano-percussion duo of Sue Langlas Grace and David Grimm—with guest artists Alice Rybak Slavich and George Brown. Free and open to the public.

the Stagecoach Inn

702 Manitou Avenue

On Fountain Creek in Manitou Springs

Don't Forget the Stagecoach Inn for all your Special Occasions

Lunch 11:30 - 2:00

Dinner 5:00 - 9:00

Sunday Champagne Brunch 10:30 - 2:00

Reservations 685-9335

Banquet & Catering Facilities For All Occasions

Hertz

You don't just rent a car. You rent a company.

Call for Weekend Rate and Eligibility

315 N. Weber

473-2444

8-6 Mon-Sat

Appointments possible at any other time

5% discount with Ad

udent Death
ocks Campus

orado College sophomore Bryan senberger died early Saturday g at Penrose Hospital, where he en taken after he suddenly became the fraternity house where he d.

19-year-old student from am, Mass., was admitted to al at 12:15 a.m. Hospital officials had apparently suffered some sort ure and that a second attack ed while he was being attended in spital. He was pronounced dead at m. Saturday.

enberger had told some of his Phi a Delta housemates at about 10:30 at he was feeling ill. Some of them alking with him to their upstairs oms when Rosenberger fell down. ntinued feeling ill, vomiting several over the next hour, and his mates stayed with him to monitor ndition and check his pulse. reportedly developed trouble ing and the Boettcher Health on campus was notified and an ance was called. Rosenberger conscious and lucid when edics took him from the residence to the ambulance, said housemates ccompanied him to the hospital. was admitted to Penrose at 12:15 nd was conscious in the emergency He suffered what was apparently a seizure, however, and was unced dead at 1:11 a.m.

The El Paso Coroner's office slated an autopsy for Saturday. Full results of that will not be known for several days, but at this time there is no indication of drug involvement, that office reported, adding that a bilateral acute pulmonary embolism — blood clots in the lungs — appears to be the likely cause of death.

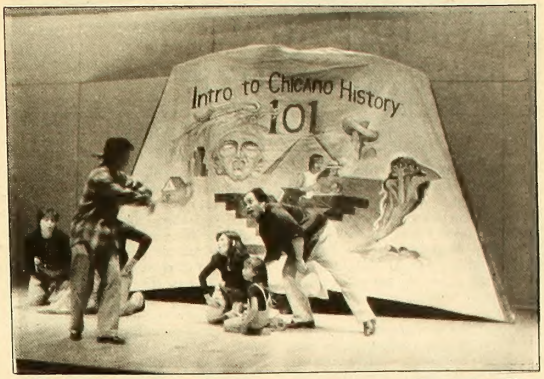
Rosenberger had had an operation on his knee at the end of the school's sixth-block break (which ended Feb. 25). The surgery was for a skiing injury he had sustained.

Rosenberger's parents were notified and his father flew in to Colorado Springs Saturday and has met with Maxwell Taylor, the College's Vice President for student life.

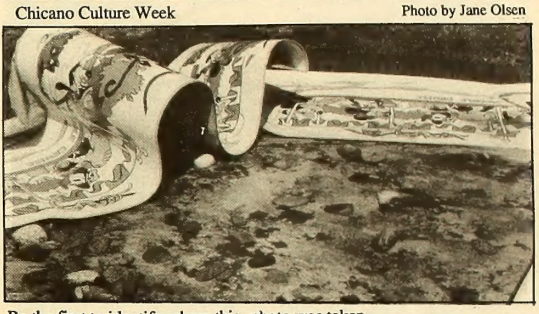
Mourning students gathered at the residence house Saturday morning, and Rev. Kenneth W.F. Burton spoke with them. An informal memorial service will be held this Sunday from 2 to 3 p.m. at Cutler Quad.

At the request of the Rosenberger family, a scholarship fund will be set up in Bryan's name for students who are financially unable to attend CC. The Fiji house has set up a committee which will work with the Rosenberger family to define the specific criteria for scholarship recipients, and to coordinate the raising and handling of funds with the Development Office.

Joe Barber



Chicano Culture Week Photo by Jane Olsen



Be the first to identify where this photo was taken. Win a Mocha Shake---Call x675. Photo by Jane Olsen

DOMINO'S PIZZA ®

TWO 12" PIZZAS FOR $9.14 ONE TOPPING

(TAX NOT INCLUDED)
Please see below for other selections.

FREE 6-PACK OF CLASSIC COKE® WITH PURCHASE OF A LARGE PIZZA!
DOMINO'S PIZZA DELIVERS® FREE.
Please mention coupon when ordering.
One 6-pack per pizza.
Offer expires May 31, 1987.

Limited Delivery Area
Our drivers carry less than $20

AVOID THE NOID
CALL DOMINO'S PIZZA

30 minute guarantee

If your pizza does not arrive within 30 minutes, present this coupon to the driver for $3.00 off your order.
One coupon per pizza.

Fast, Free Delivery
Good at listed locations.

DOMINO'S PIZZA

One of the greatest offers ever from Domino's Pizza—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large! Twice the pizza for one low price!

For a limited time, order any two 12" pizzas (they don't have to be the same!), and you'll get them for the price of one 16". The price will be determined by the pizza with the most toppings.

Two 12" pizzas will only cost you:

Superb cheese	$7.95
1 topping	$9.14
2 toppings	$10.33
3 toppings	$11.52
4 toppings	$12.71
5 toppings	$13.90
6 toppings	$15.09

Twice the pizza for one low price—two 12" pizzas for the price of a large!
And, hot to your door in 30 minute or less, GUARANTEED!

Offer may expire anytime

Free Six-Pack of Coke!

DOMINO'S PIZZA DELIVERS® FREE.

All Pizzas Include Our Special Blend of Sauce and 100% Real Cheese.

Our Superb Cheese Pizza
12" Cheese $5.65
16" Cheese $7.95

Additional Items
Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Onions, Green Peppers, Black Olives, Pineapple, Sausage, Ground Beef, Jalapeno Peppers,
Extra Cheese (1 item)
Double Cheese (2 items)
Thick Crust, Extra Sauce
Each Item
12" item $ .79
16" item $1.19

Ask about our Group Discount (on 5 or more pizza orders).

We accept checks.

Prices do not include tax. Our drivers carry less than $20.00.

Open for Lunch Every Day
11 am - 12 am Sun.-Thurs.
11 am - 1 am Fri.-Sat.

635-1511

Awards in Literature Given

Italy, Ireland, and an insane asylum sound like a Robin Leech Getaway with the Rich and Famous. These are, however, only a few of the places Colorado College Award in Literature winners will visit to pursue their projects.

The English department gave the awards in literature to five non senior students. Aaron Shure, Andrew Leman, and Sally Hegarty won the summer awards while Donna McDaniel and Katie Kerwin won the one block prizes.

Professor Neale Reinitz explained that "the level of scholarship of all the applicants was very high and hardly any of the proposals wouldn't have been suitable for the award." In fact there was so much parity among the proposals that the committee gave five awards instead of the traditional four.

Donna McDaniel and Katie Kerwin each received $1000 to defray costs incurred during their block of study. McDaniel plans to study problems that occur when an Indian writer becomes involved with a white editor.

She will travel to Antioch college to examine the drafts of Sarah Winnemucca's Life among the Paiutes, their wrongs and their claims and attempt to determine if Sarah's editors "Indianized the book." "The problem stretches beyond Sarah's book," explains McDaniel, "to any time an Indian writer interacts with a white editor."

Katie Kerwin will use her award to travel to Southern Italy to translate the modern Italian poet, Rocco Scotellaro. "I will travel to Trica Rico, a very small town where he was the mayor, learn the dialect, and meet some of the people who might have known him," says Kerwin.

As a summer winner, Aaron Shure will receive $1200 to replace lost income from a summer job. He'll be volunteering to work with psychotic patients in Denver. Shure emphasizes, "I don't want to write madhouse literature and I am not writing about the people I am working with. I want them to participate in the creative process because they are colorful, open, and fascinating."

Shure will write a compilation of short stories using techniques of humor with which he has experimented in his Catalyst humor column.

Another summer winner, Sally Hegarty will return to her native Ireland to study 8th and 9th century manuscripts and the works of some Irish poets. For her senior project, Sally is publishing a book of her own etchings and poetry.

"I am going to study the manuscripts for their bookmaking and illustration and the poetry to examine some of the influences on my own poetry." She explains that she read a lot when she was young and can see some of her early influences surfacing in her present work. "I have been particularly influenced by the rhythms of Yeats."

The final summer winner, Andrew Leman, plans to make a film based on a short story by H.P. Lovecraft.

DAVID KLEIN

Photo of the Week

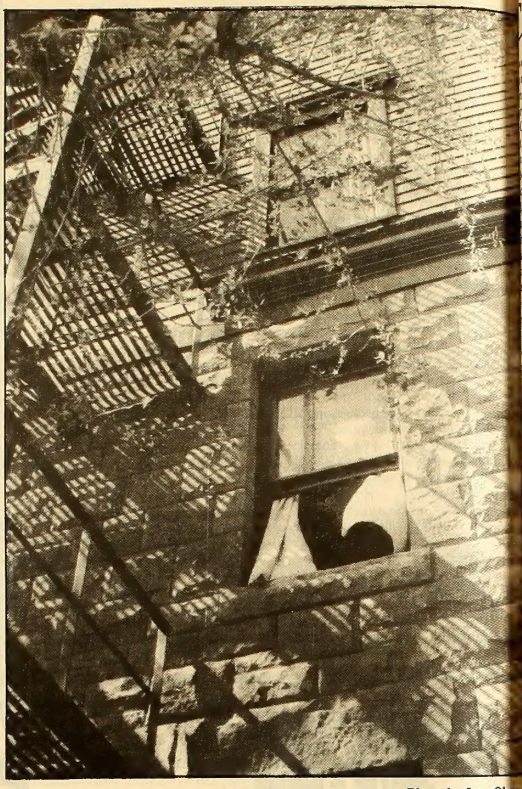


Photo by Jane Olsen

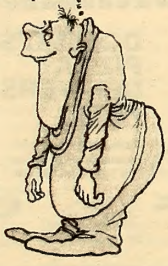
TRAVEL QUESTIONS??

Call Taylor Travel

Where's the Airport?



How can I fly my "kitty" home?

Where am I gonna get a bike box?

When does the Concorde leave for Paris?

"Your Campus Travel Agency"

818 N. Tejon 636-3871

Spend Your Summer with US Sprint!

TELEMARKETING OPEN HOUSE
Come talk to us about our temporary summer
opportunities.
Wednesday, May 13th
or
Thursday, May 14th
4:00 p.m. to 8:00 p.m.
1099 18th St., 14th Floor
Denver

Through US Sprint, GTE and United Telecom have combined a wealth of resources to develop the only fully digital fiber-optics telecommunications network in the industry. The result? Quality long distance products and unprecedented opportunities.

We're looking for top communicators with a high school diploma, excellent organizational skills and a professional telephone manner to work through the summer months. If you're an aggressive sales-oriented individual who enjoys the challenge of meeting quotas and have the aptitude to become a top telemarketing representative, we'd like to talk—even if you have a limited sales background.

We'll train you and provide the tools you need to increase your earnings (base salary plus a no-limit commission program)—as you market the innovative services of the country's emerging telecommunications leader.

Come discuss our summer employment opportunities on May 13th or 14th between 4:00 p.m. and 8:00 p.m. If you are unable to attend, please send your resume or application letter to US Sprint, Department LB-26, 1099 18th Street, 14th Floor, Denver, CO 80202. No agencies please. We're an equal opportunity employer.

Sound Good? That's US Sprint.

US Sprint

Women's Leadership Conference Planned

enty campus leaders will have the tunity to participate in a day-long en's Leadership Workshop on day, May 16. Students Lisa Holtby ina Bamberger have organized the as a follow up to their Venture participation in a Women's rship Symposium last fall in na.

ry McClatchey, Director of nistration at the Women's Political ing Institute in Denver will lead the hop. She will cover a variety of including such practical aspects of ship as how to run a meeting, and to inspire teamwork. She will also such areas as how to be pragmatic ow to avoid burnout.

ltby and Bamberger want to stress ractical nature of the workshop. One e reasons they have organized the hop for the campus is that they feel he focus on leadership has at times too theoretical. Both have ipated in some of the Leadership events on campus and while they hat the training that the program is effective, it has been limited to ic issues rather than focusing on the ic problems that women leaders face.

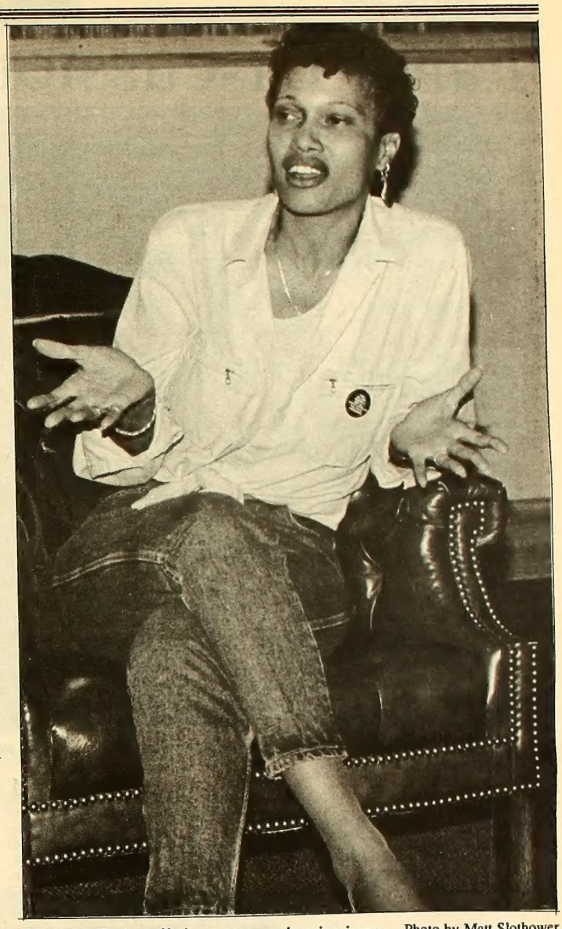
mmunication skills will be stressed g the workshop as well. Bamberger, or Philosophy major and Holtby, a r English major, both think that aren't many opportunities for n to get together as leaders. Holtby s that the Feminist Collective s a crucial role on campus as a forum political action and debate on Feminist issues. But she wants this workshop to be a more practical forum for learning specific skills and one which will draw women who may not consider themselves as politically involved feminists but who are still grappling with women's leadership issues.

"Our short term goal," says Holtby, "is to give practical skills to women leaders on campus. These are skills which would be transferable to women who are graduating as well." She hopes to draw a varied and representative group of participants, including members of sororities and various clubs and women of differing racial backgrounds. A simple application process will help the organizers to put together a unique group of participants.

Holtby and Bamberger hope "to encourage women to accept or pursue leadership positions, to confront the difficulties specific to those positions, and most importantly, to develop mutual support among campus women leaders." They hope that this workshop will be a catalyst for future women's leadership functions.

The workshop will take place from 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. on Saturday, May 16 in Gates Common Room. Full day participation is required. The event is open to both men and women. Applications, which are due on Tuesday, May 12 at 5:00 p.m., may be picked up and turned in at the Student Center. For more information, please contact Lisa Holtby or Gina Bamberger at 632-7468.

Katie Kerwin



Linda M. Taylor offering more on a burning issue. Photo by Matt Slothower

Taylor Discusses S. African Disvestment

da Mizell Taylor, Director of the rican Friend Service Committee's hern Africa Project, spoke in the 's Common room last Tuesday on thern Africa and Divestment." She just returned from a trip to South a. She is also Chairman of the rado Coalition Against Apartheid. n informal question/answer-lecture at, Taylor discussed her personal vations and opinions of the South a situation and explained her nization's views.

ylor explained that South Africa is pting to dominate the entire hern region of Africa—a point most ricans tend to ignore. Their brutal raids into neighboring countries to attack rebel camps have resulted in many civilian deths. The intensity of world outrage should curtail these international excursions, but South Africa just recently raided an ANC camp in Zambia.

She then concentrated on divestment, which she felt to be the best non-violent method for the U.S. to combat Apartheid. She believes that the Sullivan Principals have been ineffective because they have not helped the common Black man. Most projects instituted by American businesses, Taylor claimed, were "press-showy" and not really beneficial. The Blacks have little say in designing the social projects. They learn what the businesses and government want them to learn. The actual goal of divestment is to force South Africa to give the Blacks more political and speech freedom either through legal changes (a result of yielding to international economic pressure) or by forcing the government into reducing its internal police force (a very expensive agency to maintain). She ended her presentation by explaining that most people believe a Civil War is inevitable, but divestment would hasen the conflict's severity.

MIKE FRATERELLI

Date Bar a Restaurant
UNIQUE HOMEMADE RECIPES
10% off with CC ID
Serving Breakfast & Lunch
Mon.-Sat.
7 am - 4 pm
24 E. Kiowa
578-5693

Mother's Day is this Sunday.
The Lotus Eater Boutique is the place for you to be right now!
Hustle your buns on down and get cards and gifts for your mother and those who are and have motherly to you.
Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm
Sat. 11-5 pm
THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE
Downtown on Platte Between Tejon & Cascade
phone: 635-2118

Panel Discussion Cont.

Questions remain as panel discussion participants disperse. Photo by Peter Loach with help from Jerry (666) Wang just as moral as divestment. He finished his statement by encouraging a rational spirit of inquiry in moving toward a solution.

Continues from p.1

Labeling divestment "a moral cop-out," and "the easy way out" with no traceable consequences, Prof. Griffiths defended CC's investment policy. He pointed out that the consequences of divestment have not been thoroughly discussed. The inconsequential gesture of divestment could cripple the economic foundation of the school. The credibility of the school lies in research and teaching and it should not be undermined through an inconsequential, economically dangerous, divestment policy.

An emotional open discussion, lasting for about 45 minutes, completed the event.

MIKE FRATERELLI

PARTICIPATING TOYOTA DEALERS

COLORADO

Aurora
Mark Toyota
444 South Havana Street
(303) 340-2170

Boulder
Tom Lyons Toyota
47th & Pearl Parkway
(303) 443-3250

Colorado Springs
Gene Osborn Toyota
5597 N. Academy Boulevard
(303) 598-2222

Durango
Bob Sellers Toyota
20541 U.S. Highway 160 West
(303) 385-4822

Englewood
Burt Toyota
5460 South Broadway
(303) 761-3222

Fort Collins
Colorado Import Motors
Toyota/Volvo
1113 North College Avenue
(303) 534-2613

Glenwood Springs
Bighorn Toyota
152 West Sixth Street
(303) 945-6544

Golden
Stevinson Toyota
15000 West Colfax
(303) 277-0550

Grand Junction
Import Motors
2578 Highways 6 & 50
(303) 242-1221

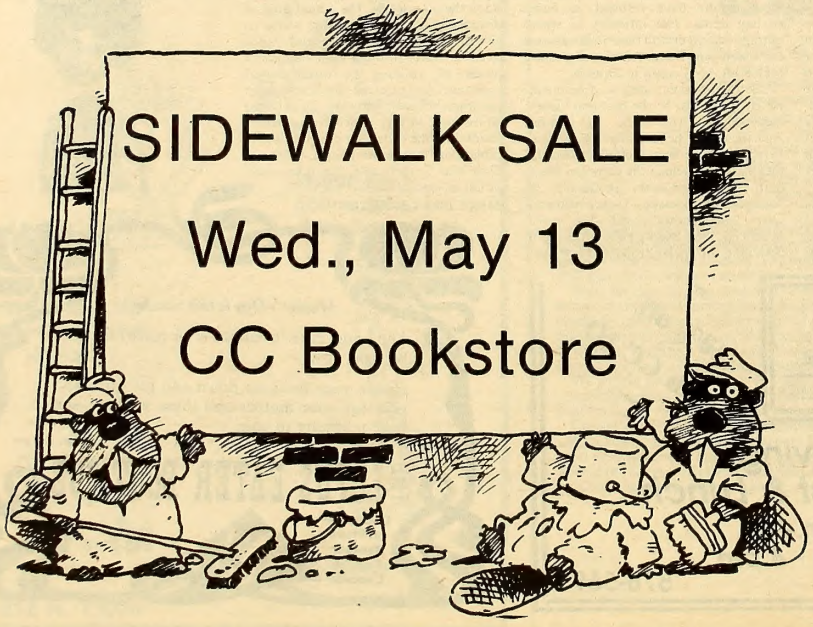
Longmont
Longmont Toyota
116 South Main
(303) 443-6325

Pueblo
Pueblo Toyota
2801 Highway 50 West
(303) 543-1719

Thornton
Douglas Toyota
1650 West 104th Avenue
(303) 466-1921

WYOMING

Laramie
Ken's Toyota Kars
2222 Grand Avenue
(307) 742-7423



TOYOTA CLASS OF '87

NOW IT'S POSSIBLE TO BUY OR LEASE A NEW TOYOTA WITH NO DOWN PAYMENT.

Graduates: If you've received a verifiable job offer, we want to get you and your new career off to a great start—with a brand-new Toyota.

BUY IT OR LEASE IT. Toyota Motor Credit Corporation and your participating Toyota dealer are now making it possible to get the credit you deserve with two Class of '87 "quick approval" financing programs.

If you qualify, you can buy or lease a new Toyota and generally no down payment or security deposit will be required.* What's more, we can even process your loan within 24 hours. See your participating Toyota dealer for program specifics.

To apply, you'll need a current driver's license and proof of employment or job offer. You may find it helpful to bring along any bank or credit card numbers. Once you're approved, you can take your choice of the most exciting line of new cars and trucks Toyota has ever offered, including the all-new Corolla FX16 GT-S Liftback.

So come on down to your participating Toyota dealer today. Fill out an application, and then buy or lease your new Toyota. Purchase or lease arrangements must be completed by June 30, 1987.

A new career and a new Toyota. Who Could Ask For Anything More!

LEASE EXAMPLE: 1987 Standard Bed Truck, model 8200, based on manufacturer's suggested retail price. 48 monthly payments of $131.77,† totaling $6324.96.† End-of-lease purchase option, $2813.16.† No further end-of-lease liabilities, except abnormal wear and tear and excess mileage.

*No down payment required on eligible models, provided the amount financed is not more than the Toyota manufacturer's suggested retail price, plus the cost of factory-installed optional equipment and required tax and license fees.
Loan approvals M–F, 8:30–5:00.
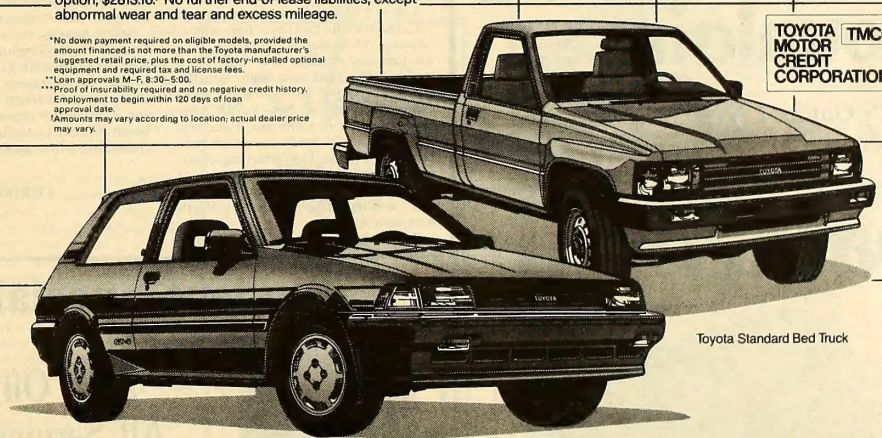
Proof of insurability required and no negative credit history. Employment to begin within 120 days of loan approval date.
†Amounts may vary according to location; actual dealer price may vary.

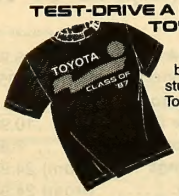
TOYOTA MOTOR CREDIT CORPORATION TMCC



Toyota Standard Bed Truck

Toyota Corolla FX16 GT-S Liftback

TEST-DRIVE A NEW TOYOTA AND RECEIVE A TOYOTA CLASS OF '87 T-SHIRT.



Come in and test-drive any new Toyota before June 30, 1987, and show us your student ID card.†† We'll mail you an official Toyota Class of '87 T-shirt.†††

†† All college students with valid student ID's are eligible.
††† Limit one per person while supplies last.

WHO COULD ASK TOYOTA FOR ANYTHING MORE!

Get More From Life... Buckle Up!

TOYOTA CLASS OF '87 TEST-DRIVE COUPON

Bring this coupon to your participating Toyota dealer for your free test drive. After your test drive, we'll mail you a Toyota Class of '87 T-shirt.

This coupon valid until June 30, 1987. Offer good while supplies last.

D-003

© 1987 Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc.

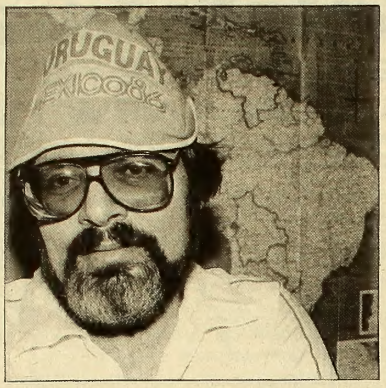
Falling Into Brazilian History

How on earth does one get interested in regionalism in nineteenth century Brazil? Peter Blasenheim, Colorado College's Latin American and African History professor quipped, "I just kind of fell into it, I certainly had no idea that I would eventually teach history when I was an undergraduate."

In 1966, as a sophomore at New York City College, Peter took a Portuguese class on a whim and then applied to a summer program in Lisbon "only as a means to get to Europe." As it turned out, he liked Portugal more than any other place in western Europe because it was so "charming, pathetic, and down right dinky." Peter's experience in Lisbon prompted him to return to Portugal for a full year in 1967-68 where he designed his own curriculum in Luso-Brazilian and Luso-African studies.

After his year in Portugal, Peter entered an M.A. program in Latin American Studies at Stanford. There he also worked on a Ph.D. in Brazilian History with a minor in African History. "I took a minor in Africa thanks to the open-mindedness of Stanford Brazilianist, John Wirth" (CC junior, Tim Wirth's dad). The fact that Peter knew Africa as well as Latin America was instrumental in his being appointed at CC.

Peter fell in love with Brazil on his first trip there as a graduate student in 1970. "As I got off the plane in Rio de Janeiro I thought, 'this is one big, overdeveloped, exotic, sex-crazed Lisbon'." I suppose landing in Rio on the same day that Pele led Brazil to a World Cup Soccer Championship had something to do with Peter's first impressions. "Spontaneous carnival in the streets is the most amazing thing that I had ever seen. The whole city just stopped and began to party!" Exotic parades and the Samba aside, Peter loved Brazil because "Brazilians are the kindest, warmest, gentlest people I had ever met." he returned to the U.S. convinced that he would deal with Brazil in one way or another for the rest of his life. According to Peter, "academic considerations were only a part of my strong feelings about Brazil."



Peter Blasenheim's bent on Brazil. Photo by Matt Slothower

In 1971 Peter returned to Brazil, intending to stay for a year. Nearly two years later he finally came back after researching his Ph.D. thesis in the state of Minas Gerais, Brazil's heartland. While living in a large interior city called Juiz da Fora, Peter heard about a position in the history department at the Colorado College. A week later he was in Colorado Springs, asking Bill Hochman for filtered drinking water in Loomis Hall, wondering why women weren't wearing heavy green eye shadow and orange lipstick, and freaked out that he couldn't smoke in "reasonable" places like elevators, movie theatres, and libraries. Peter had become thoroughly Brazilianized.

Life in Colorado Springs was strange for someone who had never been west of Newark, NJ or east of Truckee, CA. "I was born and raised in New York," Peter jested, "and it took me a while to realize that cross-country skiing did not mean skiing from L.A. to New York." After fourteen years in Colorado, Peter still hasn't become a hardy mountain-dude because he's too busy teaching about what's going on south of the border. "I love exposing students to Latin America and making them unlearn North American stereotypes."

Peter stresses that Latin America needs to be respected on its own terms. He a "Americans of all political stripes equally ignorant about Latin Amer Students and professors alike realize that "learning about La American history has little to do with adventures of of Bolivar." Alth more CC students are studying La America, it still bothers him that Americans have opinions about L America, but very few bother to about it." Yet Peter admits, "I'm alw shocked to find out how much I know about Latin America." commitment to learning more has ta Peter back to South America three ti since 1973. As a Fulbright Scholar year, he taught at the University Brasilia in a masters program in Brazil History, and also offered undergraduate course in Americ History.

Currently, Peter is the chairman of Foreign Studies Committee. He feels it is important for students to "get from under the shadow of Pike's P and learn first hand about the rest of planet." Peter also feels that the fore students on campus add an import dimension to student life by making little less provincial.

Peter has always had student frie since he has been at CC. "I never thi consciously about befriending studen it's just inevitable." Always asked ab how students have changed over years, he does admit that they are m conservative in the 80's than th counterparts in the 60's and 70's. Yet believes that their "fundamental nee and concerns are the same." However distresses him that they do communicate as well with each oth Peter is well aware that students too belong to an "alone generation."

Most important, in the classroo Peter conveys his enthusiasm to stude for these so-called "Third Wor countries. This student, for one, took classes as a freshman and sophomo and then found himself somewhere South America by his junior year. Pete enthusiasm is contagious.

CHRISTOPHER DU

Mountain Chalet
CC's Outdoor Connection
226 N. Tejon
633-0732
M-F 9:30-6
Sat. 9-5:30

patagonia®
Baggies™ Shorts

Check us out for the Pike Peak region's largest selection of Patagonia clothing.

© 1987 Patagonia, Inc.

Student Special

20% Off All Services (w/Ad or ID)

	REGULAR PRICE	YOUR PRICE
Just—A—Cut	5.95	4.75
Shampoo & Cut	6.95	5.55
Shampoo, Cut & Blow Dry	10.95	8.75
Shampoo & Set	7.95	6.35
Colorings	(from) 24.95	19.95
Perms	(from) 24.95	19.95

NO APPOINTMENT NECESSARY
GREAT EXPECTATIONS
PRECISION HAIRCUTTERS

6 Southgate Road
(Southgate Mall)
520-9957

New Spring & Summer Hours
Mon.-Fri. 8-8
Sat. 8-6
Sun. 11-5

Family Hair Care with the Personal Touch

McAllister House: A Piece of History

Unique, historical and right in the neighborhood

Okay, CC students, faculty & staff cluding all of you out-of towners): olorado Springs history check!

1. Where can you go to see a restored storian home, open year-round to the blic, within 5 blocks of campus?

2. What Colorado Springs house was lt in 1873 with the help of carpenter infield Scott Stratton (later of mining rtune and fame)?

3. What was one of the first brick uses to be built in Colorado Springs, one of Colorado College's first stees?

How did ya do? Unless you copied om the title of this article, you may not ve known the answer to all 3 questions the McAllister House Museum, at 423 Cascade Ave. (between Boulder and Vrain).

WHAT, you are now asking, exactly is McAllister House Museum? McAllister ouse is one of Colorado Springs' rliest homes, built in 1873 for Major enry McAllister and his family. stored to its original 1870's time riod, it is a modest 6 room house which today, a re-creation of Victorian ddle class life in early Colorado rings. It was saved from the fate of coming a parking lot for a near-by siness in 1960, when the Colonial mes of America in the State of olorado jumped in and saved the rimer McAllister abode. This effort was earheaded by Vesta Wood Tutt and the Pomar Foundation. Today the house on the historical register and is open to public as an historical house museum.

So WHOM, you are asking, exactly us this McAllister family? Henry cAllister was a civil war cronie of eneral William Palmer who came to olorado Springs at the urging of this end. McAllister moved here in 1987 ith his wife Elizabeth and their baby oy, Henry, Jr. They had a 2 story brick me built, (one of the first in the prings) and spent the next 50 years here. e family grew in the first 5 years to clude two more children, Mary and atilda. All three children grew up in the ouse.

Also of note about this new house: eorge Summers, an architect hired by lmer, designed the house itself. It iginally sat by itself on the northern & stern edge of town — what is now the 0 block of Cascade Avenue. The ollar-a-day carpenter hired to work on e house was Winfield Scott Stratton, ho some 20 years later became one of ripple Creek's first multi-millionaires. is signature carpentry can be seen roughout the house.

Henry McAllister had moved to olorado Springs to become the ecutive Director of the Colorado prings Company. Over the first decades his new life out West, he held many les. Major Henry McAllister: pioneer, ecutive Director, "Mayor" of Colorado Springs, President of the School Board, Colorado College trustee and assaying student, horticultural society founder, stockman, editor, women's suffrage supporter, and on and on. Because of his desire to further education for both children and adults in this new town, Henry McAllister worked long and hard. As a proponent of education, this included advocating a need for a college in town. He was one of the founding trustees of The Colorado College, and was succeeded years later by his son on the Board of Trustees.

The McAllister family holds a curious position in Colorado Springs history today. They are often lost and their contributions forgotten among the more prominent families and civic leaders of the past — the Palmers, Jacksons, Tutts and Penroses. The McAllisters were a modest but generous family; neither wealthy nor "prominent," but much respected in the community.

The McAllisters saw many changes come to Colorado Springs. They started out in a town of 3,000 which included settlers and Indians passing through, making camp at the creek to the West of their house. They watched their town grow as a "Little London" which became a bustling new town. later in life, Henry gave many speeches about his early remembrances of the town as a member of the Pioneer's Association, including a lengthy 1912 CC commencement address.

As the new owner/caretakers of this historical house, the Colonial Dames and the house's curators have worked to preserve and recreate the rich history of the McAllister home and how it represents life in early Colorado Springs. A quarter of the museum's collection is original McAllister, with other pieces from the 1874-84 period having been donated. McAllister house seeks to act as a window, giving a three-dimensional view of history by interpreting the life of an early Colorado Springs family, and the time period they lived in.

The house can be toured Wednesday thru Saturdays 10-4, and Sundays 12-4. An admission is charged to help with costs. It is $1 for students (with ID) or seniors; $2 for adults, and $.75 for children ages 6-16. There are also special group rates for groups of 10 or more. McAllister House grounds include the renovated carriage house which provides office and meeting space, and can be rented for use by groups.

The museum is now gearing up for its summer docent program and is in need of volunteers. A research program is also being planned which seeks qualified research help (students, particularly). If you have at least 4 hours a month to give (summer, or next fall) or are interested in the possibility of an internship, contact the curator, Ann Massmann, at 635-7925.

So if you're looking for a getaway as the end of the year closes — or something for your class, or visiting parents to do — come discover the McAllister House. It's something unique, historical, and right in the neighborhood. Come, catch a glimpse of Colorado Springs history!

ANN MASSMAN '86

kiku

FUTONS/CLOUDS/AND MORE

Futons
Frames
Accessories

2616 W. Colorado Ave.
(in historic Old Colorado City)
10:30-5:00 Tuesday-Saturday
520-9951

FOR LAUGHS, FOR LOVES, FOR ALL THE SPECIAL TIMES AND PEOPLE, NOTHING KEEPS THE MEMORIES LIKE

TINY DOUBLES

LASER-CUT PHOTOSCULPTURES

26 E. KIOWA
578-5220
MON.-FRI. 10-6
SAT. 10-5

SPRING SPECIAL NOW TO JUNE 21
BUY 3, GET A FOURTH ONE FREE

SUMMER STORAGE

The Choice Is Yours!

We Suggest:

Interstate Secure Storage

- Electronic Security System on Every Door
- Lighted & Fenced
- Your Lock—Your Key
- On Site Resident Manager

633-0222

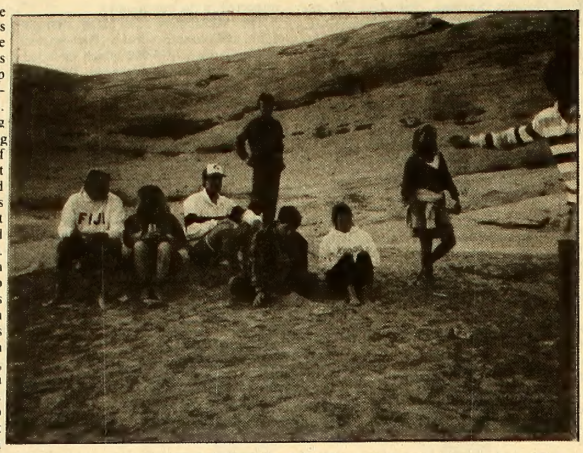
CC's Lake Powell Legacy

Fear and Loathing in Utah

Ah, the rights of Spring. As the weather gets warmer, the grass gets greener and the attention span of the student slowly wanes, hedonistic hordes of Colorado College funseekers jump into their Saabs and set out on the ten-hour pilgrimage to Lake Powell. According to the men at the boating docks, CC students have been terrorizing the lake for ages. This year's orgy of irresponsibility was no exception. Yet behind all the twelve packs of Old Milwaukee, the wankled boat propellers and the unbearable yet enjoyable heat there lies a much deeper and profound meaning behind CC's Lake Powell ritual.

One thing about Powell (that's Indian for "big lake o' water") is that it tends to make even English 101 discards extremely profound. It would have been interesting to count the number of times people unglued their mouths from a can of Hamm's long enough to utter, "wow, this place is so unbelievable." Such sentiments are, however, understandable. For where else on this earth can one hop in a speedboat and drive for miles at incredibly unlawful speeds and not pass a single boat the entire trip?

Beauty and profundity aside, a trip to Lake Powell is a brilliant case study of excess. There is something so innocent yet at the same time extremely amusing about wallowing around in stuporous depravity, completely secure in the knowledge that a few hours north in Provo they hang people for such behavior. It brings an illegal smile to the face of even the most hardened of malcontents.



CC students enjoy some block break liberal arts discussion. Photo by Dana Veeder

Endurance is another key aspect of any Lake Powell experience. Not constructive endurance, mind you, but the brand of endurance that allows one to survive a day begun at 7:00 a.m. with a few bong hits and a warm Stag ("Brewing Heritage since 1851"), one of the many unhealthy combinations that, along with excessive doses of sun, produces the acute and utter dehydration that can only be realized at Powell. Devoid of any even remotely rehydrating fluids for four days (bar the occasional mouthful of lake water inadvertantly consumed during a personally harsh but audience—enjoyed tubing wipeout) and fueled only by SAGA's lopsided allotment of starch and cholesterol (one hundred dozen bagels and a ton of 3% lean hamburger meat), the human body's capabilities for survival seem dangerously suspect. Yet it was discovered that somehow seven individuals and one extremely stupid dog can survive in a fifteen-foot deep pit of clay with the aid of little more than pure intestinal fortitude and a pack of Marlboro Lights. Fortunately, a dip into the lake's forty degree water daily proves that rejuvenation can occur in even the most deprived situation.

Philosophizing, excess and endurance. These are the qualities which make CC's Lake Powell ritual such a unique experience. And as the final day's sun sets over the huge, red cliffs, one can almost feel the dawn of responsibility and the inevitable return to normalcy.

DE CLAUDE GERBIL

OH BOY! NOW That MOMMA and POPPA and Grandma and Grandpa have gone to Stand in Line for bread, I can finally try on all of my new clothes and wolf down this entire Streudel! Where's the KARO syrup and my Diet CoLa?
KNOCK KNOCK
PETER SCOTT

The Party Takes a DIM VIEW OF YOUR Selfish capitalist vices, KATHI. We will show you the dangers of Western Excess by forcefeeding you the contents of this grocery bag and charging everything on the American Home Shopping Network To YOUR BANK ACCOUNT!!!
THE CUSTARD

FRESH
OLD CHICAGO
PROUDLY PRESENTS

THE WORLD BEER TOUR
114 BEERS
FROM AROUND THE WORLD
• 25 ON TAP • 89 BOTTLES •
Enjoy A Different Beer Every Time
Drink all the beers, get your name in the HALL OF FOAM!
18 N. Tejon St. Downtown 634-8812

SPRING GRADUATES:
GET THE CREDIT YOU DESERVE

Once again, we're proud to offer the GMAC College Graduate Finance Plan. GMAC wants to help us give you the credit you deserve, and the keys to a new Vidmar Motors Automobile.
For this special GMAC financing, all you need is your diploma, proof of a job, a low down payment, the ability to meet monthly payments and no derogatory credit references.
You'll get $400 off the purchase price, or a 90-day deferral on your payments* as a graduation present from GMAC.
After all, graduating from college is no small achievement. We're proud to offer you one of your first rewards. GMAC is an Equal Credit Opportunity Company.
Come in and see us today.
Pueblo
544-5844
VIDMAR
Oldsmobile-Honda-Jeep

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Letter to The Colorado College Community:

The Brothers of the Fraternity of Phi Gamma Delta uld like to thank the Colorado College Community the caring support provided to us during the ficult time following the death of Brother Bryan senberger. The list of individuals who gave endless urs of support and assistance is too numerous to idate here, but your kindness did not go noticed. Thank you—from all of us.

The Brothers of Phi Gamma Delta

A Respect for Difference

Letter to The Colorado College Community:

On March 21, 1987 at 10:00 a.m. three men, nding atop the Sigma Chi house, directed several sist and derogatory comments to a black man, ssistant Dean of Admissions Lloyd Peterson, as he assed by. On March 27 Dean Peterson wrote a letter the president of Sigma Chi explaining the incident d calling for a response. Rather than taking the atter to the Dean of Students, Dean Peterson chose confront the members of the fraternity, challenging to seek a solution to this problem. Unfortunately, is letter has only come to our attention as of this past uesday, May 5.

This Wednesday chapter President Eric Banta and t chapter President Sam Johnston met with Dean eterson and Dean Laurel McLeod to discuss the roblem of March 21.

— The leaders of Sigma Chi took full responsibility r the actions of the three individuals, recognizing at there is a problem with such behavior.

—The problem of intolerance to difference appears erywhere in society. It would be ignorant for the adership of Sigma Chi to deny that it could appear in y form in our fraternity.

— Derogatory remarks which reflect insensitivity to fferences in members of the college community, ether social, religious, ethnic, or differences in tual preference are neither acceptable nor consistent ith the aims and ideals of the Sigma Chi fraternity.

— There is no place in the Colorado College mmunity for such immature and ignorant action. As ated in the Pathfinder: "To preserve a work and udy atmosphere that is equitable, responsible, and umane, Colorado College reaffirms that its students, culty, and staff have a right to be free from scrimination. Discrimination under any rcumstances is reprehensible" (p.54 Pathfinder).

Also on that same page of the Pathfinder: "Academic institutions exist for the transmission of knowledge, the quest for truth, the development of the students, and the general well being of society. In pursuit of these ends the members of the college community have such basic rights as freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of peaceful assembly and association, freedom of personal beliefs, and freedom from personal force and violence, threats of violence, and personal abuse. The exercise of such rights by individuals is subject to the obligation of the college to maintain an atmosphere conducive to academic freedom, social responsibility, and civil order so that its educational mission will not be impeded and in order to protect the rights of all members of the college community." (Bylaw of the Board of Trustees Art. VI sec.1)

The Beta Gamma chapter of the Sigma Chi fraternity is dedicated to helping the college maintain an atmosphere conducive to such ends. The chapter will address the topic: "A Respect for Difference" on Monday night May 11, 8:00 p.m. at the Sigma Chi house. Everyone is invited and encouraged to attend. Leaders of various student organizations, faculty members, and administrators will be in attendance. It is our hope that Sigma Chi can confront the issue with help from campus leaders and the community at large so that we may come one step closer to making our community as comfortable as possible for all students, faculty, and administrators.

A formal apology on behalf of the fraternity has been delivered to Dean Peterson. We would like to take this opportunity to apologize to the Colorado College community for this unfortunate occurrence.

Sincerely,
Eric Banta, President
Samuel Johnston
Beta Gamma chapter of Sigma Chi

Shanties Reconsidered

To the Editor:

I am currently in Chicago attending the ACM Urban Studies Program. Nonetheless, I am still interested in the 'political' activities at Colorado College. Here are my thoughts on the ever-pervasive South Africa-Divestment issue:

Statement: The Colorado College presently has investments in companies who have investments, or transact business, in South Africa.

Presupposition: Apartheid is evil. It treats the majority of people in South Africa like a minority. Furthermore, it relegates this majority to an inferior standard of living, depriving them of basic human rights. In essence, apartheid contradicts our contemporary definition of justice and truth.

The Logic of Divestment: Certain students at CC claim the College is indirectly supporting apartheid by retaining investments in companies associated with South Africa. These students, whom we will loosely call the 'Divestment Group,' assume the best way to end apartheid is through the retention of money from any organization that even remotely supports the South African government. Likewise, the Divestment Group feels economic support for any institution associated with South Africa is a sign of support for apartheid. In short, this rationale assumes guilt by association (CC investments—South African companies—Apartheid). Thus, the Divestment Group demands that CC divest from South Africa in order to wash its hands of this dirty business called apartheid.

Extending the Divestment Logic: Since the Colorado College is an institution guilty of supporting apartheid, everything that supports CC is an accomplice to this criminal act. In other words, the students, by attending CC and paying tuition, are guilty of supporting apartheid. The students are to the Colorado College, as the Colorado College is to South African companies, and South African companies are to apartheid. Thus the students are soiled with the blood of apartheid by the very nature of their affiliation to an institution that supports South African business.

Solution: Every student who feels an urgent need to end apartheid, and who feels divestment is the best method to accomplish this task, should divest from the Colorado College. If these students are serious about their divestment efforts, they should reflect this commitment through serious action; that is, they should drop-out of CC and attend an institution that does not have investments in South Africa.

I can almost hear the reactions to my proposal half way across the country: "But we can do more good by staying, at CC and working for change." This argument is strikingly similar to the one businesses used to justify their continued activity in South Africa; and remember, the 'Divestment Group' rejected it! Thus, the Divestment Group cannot logically use this excuse to justify their continued enrollment at CC.

"O.K.," the Divestment Group retorts, "We are commited to divestment, but let's be realistic. We have other interests. We don't have to sacrifice everything to show our concern. We feel divestment is the best way to end apartheid, but we will weigh this interest against our other interests."

I can except this line of reasoning, it is logical and fair. But let us be fair to everyone. Just as the students are free to express the extent of their commitment to a cause based on personal interests, so the Board of Trustees should be free to express the extent of their commitment to a cause based onthe school's interest. I am quite certain the Board of Trustees find apartheid repulsive. However, after placing all of the College's motives into balance, the Board has found it in the best interest of the College to remain invested in South African companies for the time being. The liberty I grant the students, I must also grant the College. As each student must determine his or her best interest, only the College can determine its own best interest.

I think intellectual discussion is important. It is important to present all sides of an issue before making a decision; and this is especially true when discussing an important issue such as institutional policy toward South Africa. However, protests, shantytowns, and angry denunciations of the Board of Tustees have little relevance and no import to such discussions. This sort of behavior is immature, inane, and an embarrassment to the Colorado College community. I commend those students who actively encourage the College to reassess its position on each and every issue. I disclaim those students who rant and rave over the 'injustice and hypocrisy' of the College's divestment policy. If these students are truly commited to divestment, I suggest they withdraw from CC. Otherwise, who are they to protest?

—Daniel Engster

A Statement On Pres. Riley's Letter

To the Editor:

It's 12:30 a.m. Monday, April 20th, 1987. I read your letter in the Catalyst perhaps 2 minutes ago. The letter about the repression, vandalism, and provincialism that is occuring here in Colorado Springs, probably elsewhere. I don't know, I haven't been outside this country in 3 years. Let me state that I've seen human immune deficiency syndrome in my work and it is not caused by sexual behavior but the cross translation of blood from one species, (monkies) to humans. In fact the person I know who has AIDS is a construction worker married. He didn't get AIDS from a man but from a woman. So these people have really not thought seriously about AIDS. But now to my main point.

I walked into Olin Hall Friday night into a lab. A biology lab, and I thought to myself. This is how people should learn, free from worry and fear. Fear motivates groups. The mob. Not the individual. And if we are to be individuals in an age of urinalysis tests then there must be tolerance for, and understanding of human traits, differences. Thank you for your statement.

—Peter N. Knauf

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETER LOACH, News Editors
DAVID EVANS, Features Editor
MUNIR MEGHJEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETER SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Cutler Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado, 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 (extension 327). The Catalyst is printed bi-monthly from September to May, except during holiday periods.

Cutler Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in enrollment programs, provision of employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local law.

Editorials appearing in the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 300 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Russell Lerner, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80901. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

OPINIONS

Arguments for Divestment

To the Editor:

As participants in the teach-in and rally for divestment, we were particularly distressed to be present on March 14th when the CC Board of Trustees delivered its decision to adhere to its policy of continued investment in South Africa. Some of the assertions contained in the Board's statement are so fundamentally flawed that they cry out for an informed response. As Colorado College's decision not to divest has been noticed around the country and by South Africans, it is in the interest of the College community to assess the grounds for this stance.

While it astounds us that one must still debate the inefficiency of Sullivan Principle investment in promoting the end of apartheid, the CC board still seems in need of such prodding. Once again, those U.S. companies which endorse (not to mention the smaller number which actually apply) the Sullivan Principles employ only about one percent of the Black labor force in South Africa. To presume that a "trickle down" effect will benefit the whole of the Black labor force is to display either gross ignorance or willful neglect of the actual dynamics of apartheid. Meanwhile, such companies control significant proportions of key sectors of the economy such as the computer, automotive, and petroleum industries—thereby propping up the racial stratified economy. All of these companies agree to abide by South African law and many are obligated under the National Key Points Act to allow the government to take over their plants should emergency conditions so require. Naturally, many of these companies wish to maintain operations in South Africa because these subsidiaries have been quite profitable—as a direct result of the racially stratified labor force. We are forced to conclude that the CC Board of Trustees wishes to continue to join these companies in profiting from what is quite literally "blood money"—witness the recent murders of striking railway workers.

The Board's statement refers to "moderate black and white opponents of apartheid" who oppose divestment. Let us take the most prominent examples of each. Chief Gatsha Buthelezi was appointed Chief Minister of Kwazulu by the government. He has never stood for election by the Zulu people or any other constituency. (Nor is he the traditional Zulu king.) Buthelezi's "party," Inkatha, is government subsidized and frequently joins the police in attacks on anti-apartheid forces as evidenced by photographic and other reportorial evidence. He is a tool of the apartheid government, albeit a clever one. Ms. Helen Suzman, Member of Parliament of the Progressive Federal Party, has, in some respects, a formidable reputation, but she has never supported "one person. one vote" in a future, unitary South Africa. This, of course, is the true touchstone as to who qualifies as a sincere opponent of apartheid. Perhaps, the Board of Trustees has other examples in mind, but it is undeniable that the major church bodies, the major trade unions, the major anti-apartheid community groups, and at least 77% of the Black population of South Africa supports not only divestment but even sanctions (the last fact according to a poll taken by the South African Gallup affiliate at the request of the London Sunday Times—certainly no radical paper).

The matter of the Board's fiduciary responsibility deserves little attention. Apartheid-free portfolios have been proven to deliver comparable returns. Otherwise, numerous academic institutions, union pension funds, and state governments would not have opted to divest. Virtually all such institutions have found that a phased divestment over two years or less suffices to avoid any significant loss.

The Board's concern that divestment may precipitate "revolutionary upheaval and attendant, massive loss of live [sic]," displays an all too common racially-oriented perspective on events in South Africa. There already is massive loss of life in Southern Africa—as a result of police attacks on civilians, infant mortality and starvation of children in the "homelands" (at rates comparable to the poorest countries on the continent), and army attacks on neighboring countries and their civilian populations (terrorism by any other name). If the present situation is allowed to continue, "revolutionary upheaval" is the foregone conclusion. Rather than contributing to violence, sanctions and disinvestment are virtually the only non-violent alternative left to the world community. The Board's claim to reject divestment in the name of avoiding future violence is the most morally repulsive aspect of its report. It is premised on a concern for a hypothetical loss of White lives and a callous disregard of the ongoing, escalating loss of Black lives.

As if the decision itself were not sufficiently offensive, the Board proceeded to rub salt in the wound by alledging that the campus debate was not balanced. College funds will, therefore, be expended to bring anti-divestment speakers to the campus. Today, no speaker will claim to support apartheid. Apologists for the system of racial exploitation glibly denounce apartheid while they advocate continued investment and espouse the opinion that "one person, one vote" is either premature or impossible given the situation in South Africa. Members of the College community, as a whole, should beware of such characters and the Board's desperate grasping for a rhetorical fig leaf.

In conclusion, it should be noted that the Board itself tipped its hand when in stating that it chose "to reaffirm its long-standing policy" of investment. Such a "long-standing" policy implies that events in South Africa over recent years are deemed irrelevant by the Board. The majority of Board members clearly don't care that since the implementation of the Sullivan Principles, conditions in South Africa have deteriorated drastically at the cost of many lives—even the Rev. Leon Sullivan concedes this much. Obviously, the Board concluded that human life matters less than profit and chose to pursue the latter at the expense of the former.

To all those in the College community who refuse to have the name of their institution tarred by the brush wielded by the Board, we urge you to persist in your witness for justice in South Africa and integrity on the campus of Colorado College.

Most sincerely,
Ntathu Mbatha
Donald S. Will

An Interlude With The Constitution

I recently attended the 18th annual Center for the Study of the Presidency Student Symposium, in Washington, D.C. The experience I gained, I feel impelled to share with you.

You couldn't help but feel patriotic when you heard some of the speeches given about the framers of the Constitution of the United States, and their struggle to secure the blessings of freedom for the future. But, as I listened attentively, I began to think, this being the Bicentennial year of the Constitution of the United States, what would the framers of our Constitution think of our world of partisan politics, and the glitz and glamour portrayed by so many of the politicians of our day? The framers of the Constitution took on an immense endeavor. It entailed a challenge that asked them to be fair not only to their personal views, but to represent future generations as well. There is no doubt that they understood conflicts of interest in political viewpoints. But, what they also understand was that the document they were to form should represent, "We the people of the United States." They asked us not to see ourselves as individuals divided by party lines, but rather as representatives of a whole. the United States. The man or woman who can stop and understand that he or she is first and foremost a part of a whole community, and then a member of a distinct faction, would please the meaning the framers of the Constitution had in mind.

Our founding fathers left the Constitution as a skeleton to which future men and women must add body and character. The Constitution is only a cookbook, but without a cook, it is only that, a book and nothing more. They understood very well that some areas of the body politic had to be explicitly defined and followed, but as well, there had to exist parts that they couldn't and shouldn't have given answers for the changing generations that would follow. We should not always look to the Constitution as an answer book to the problems of the politic, but rather as a guide to see us through our journey.

The future lies not in a Disneyland representation of the Constitution, with parties and fanfare to celebrate the Bicentennial of the United States, but rather in an attempt to become better acquainted with the constitution and its purposes and meanings. We are tomorrow's leaders, and it is up to us to find tomorrow's answers with a look to the past, as well as hopes for the future. □

BY LENNY LEVINE

Michael S. Mehan
The Bottom Line

Looking at the Soviets

"So, when does the red flag get raised over your house?" a friend asked me as we were sitting in my yard enjoying the evening. It was not the first time someone asked me such a question since I returned from Middlebury College in Vermont, where I was studying Russian last summer.

When people hear that I am learning how to speak Russian, and that I want to study Soviet affairs, they always ask, "Are you a Commie, or something?" Why do you want to speak Russian?" or "When are you going to defect and join the KGB?"

At first I would lightly dismiss these questions, sometimes responding that I wanted to be a spy. But when such questions began to be more frequently asked, and when some people actually became apprehensive about what I was doing, I realized that there exists a real "Soviet phobia" among many Americans.

Americans seem to have a very stereotypical view about all things Russian; they believe that they are all members of the Communist party and anyone having anything to do with them is also Communist. As soon as the word "Russian" is spoken, people turn off their minds and begin to envision red banners and pictures of Lenin and Marx.

It is true, of course, that the Soviet Union does represent an ideological system vastly different than ours. But we have not bothered to check beyond the superficial rhetoric, and I have created a great boogie man out of the U.S.S.R.

As the late British Sovietologist, Edward Crankshaw said, "The Soviet Union has to be treated not as a monstrous, unfathonable apparition, to be contemplated hopelessly, but as one country among others, and part of the global mess." It is possible to learn about and understand the Soviet Union; it only takes a little time, which most Americans, unfortunately, are unwilling to give.

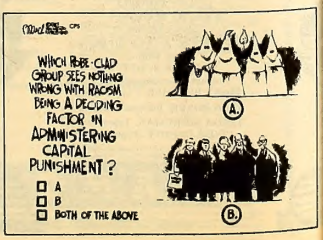
In the United States, only about 5,000 people are fluent in Russian, 150 times that number are fluent in French. And in no other language is there attached such a stigma, as to Russian. If a person studies French, is he, or she, a Socialist; if a person studies German, is he, or she, a Nazi? Probably not in most people's eyes. Yet, mention that you are studying Russian, and people start screaming "Commie" at the top of their voices.

The Soviet Union is a huge, nuclear power, with enough weapons to destroy the world several times over. It is, therefore, in the interest of the United States and the world to keep tensions at a minimum between the superpowers. However, no policy, no understanding and no agreemens can be reached if we do not want to learn to speak to each other.

It has been 70 years since the Russian revolution, and 42 years since World War II. We have no choice; the Soviet Union is here to stay. Therefore, we have to learn, maybe not to love the Russians, but at least to live with them.

The Soviet Union is a vast, complex and powerful empire; not only is its ideology confusing to us, but also its economy, politics and sociology. Yet, that is no excuse to just close our eyes and not bother to learn anything about it.

As we move towards the end of the century, there will be a growing need for more communication between our nations, and therefore, for people who speak the language and understand how the Soviets think. We will not have such people if we scare everyone away from learning about the U.S.S.R. by calling them all Communists. □



WHICH ROBE-CLAD GROUP SEES NOTHING WRONG WITH RACISM BEING A DECIDING FACTOR IN ADMINISTERING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT?
A
B
BOTH OF THE ABOVE
A
B

David Makarechian

Rock and Roll and the Right

"My, My, Hey, Hey...Rock and Roll is here to stay..."

Neil Young. Immortal words, and truly words to live by. Some things never change, and some things shouldn't change. Even before the jitterbug and jazz, Fats, Buddy Holly, and the King himself—even before the birth of big, bad, Rock and Roll—America's youth have sought counter-culture outlets of self-expression. Kids rebelling from their parents? That's as American as baseball, apple pie, and Chevrolet. And Neil Young.

If you agree with the above statement, you are going to burn in hell. No, really. Jimmy Swaggert said so. And the scary thing is, he isn't alone.

That's right. Rock and roll has—in earnest for the first time since the 1950s—come under attack by concerned parents. And these are some major-league type parents.

Led by Tipper Gore, wife of soon to be Presidential hopeful Sen. Albert Gore, (D-Tenn.) a group of Capitol Hill wives have united across party lines to try to pass a law regulating the kind of music children listen to. Swaggert's television ministry (which to most people, is just like any other television ministry) has launched an all out attack on the music from Hell. And President Reagan, in the true, "Republicam-Conservative" fashion, has pledged has lame duck support.

Specifically, Swaggert and the Capitol Hill bags are offended with music of the "Heavy Metal" variety. Their concern lies especially with lyrics about drugs, sex, suicide, and of course, Satan. The political bitties demand that record companies publish lyrics, and that government morality watchers rate albums—like movies—or publish written warnings advising the listener of possibly obscene material.

The attempt to establish state control of music may or may not be a measure of how much damage the Conservative eighties have done, and it may or may not be a movement to worry about. Hell, I wouldn't be surprised if the ladies got somewhere. After all, our kids shouldn't be able to go down to the store and buy sex and drugs in the form of a black wax disc. Somebody should pass a law, right?

Absolutely not. The pass-a-law-if-it's-bad mentality championed at various times by various politicians represents the ultimate ignorance. This line of thinking is the mark of an apathy that will be the death of any system that ostensibly depends on rational decision making.

In short, a system that depends on choice cannot function without its fundamental unit: choice. Legislative morality, in which one group predetermines the choice of the members of society, is a time-bomb counting down the final hours of the liberal-western tradition. Whither the First Amendment, and what is free speech? It's individuals making decisions for themselves, and other individuals producing for individuals who think for themselves—it's a kind of free market of ideas, where you and I decide what's in good taste and what's not. Choice, rationality, and free speech have nothing to do with Jimmy Swaggert and the christian Queens of Capitol Hill tea parties.

And choice extends beyond the scope of the governmental arrangement. Choice has guided the western tradition and can now be extended to questions of our very existence. But what about rock and roll music with nasty lyrics? How does morality fit into an existence that relies upon choice? In the classic Atlas Shrugged, Ayn Rand stated "...Man has to be man—by choice; he has to hold his life as a value—by choice; he has to discover the values it requires and practice his virtues—by choice. A code of values accepted by choice is a code of morality."

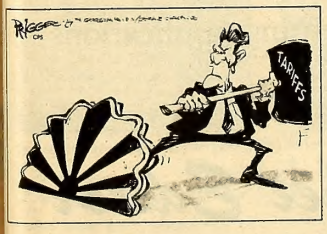
One need not understand concepts of choice to any additional degree to understand Rand's conception of morality. Advancing a reliance on the individual is nothing more than advancing that which is consistent with nature. In other words, everyone knows that Neil Young was right. Rock and Roll will never die, because youth don't want it to. Society and the government are not the answer. The individual is.

Tipper Gore and her pack of New Right censors are the true corruptors of the youth—not the Beasty Boys. Denying the youth education as individuals—allowing others to make the family's or the individual's personal decisions casts the darkest shadow on our future. □

Victor Greto

Taking Things Personally

One of the things (there are so many) which makes this life so horrible for the majority of the inhabitants of the planet earth, is that people (and here I should qualify—people in power, people who are comfortable) loathe and despise having to take things personally. In fact the Western world has cultivated a grand theory insisting that we must not take anything personally, that we "remove ourselves" from problems, from others, from relationships, in order to see them more clearly, "objectively." And if we think about it for a few splitseconds (between episodes of "LA Law" or "Gilligan's Island"), it does make some sense, doesn't it? Sure.



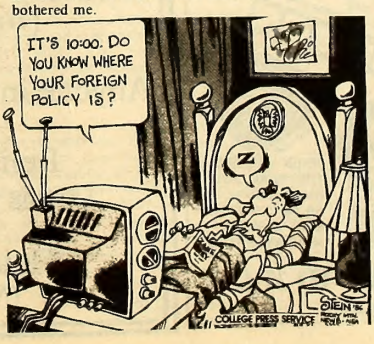
Yet the theory mentioned above is open to some strange and interesting interpretations. We, as middle-class comfortable men and women, not only take our Western ideal of "objectivity" and the ability to remove ourselves from personal involvement to task, we take it to its extreme; we live it to the point where our lives become padded and numb to what breathes outside. In other words, we live as though objectivity "goes without saying;" it is one of our assumptions which causes the greatest deal of pain for others, and, I think, ultimately for ourselves. We grant ourselves personal immunity from others' pain; we intellectually decide what degree our responsibility lies with respect to others, from our own lower classes to the dirtpoor of other countries. In many ways (and here is one of our wonderful excuses for such obscene behaviour) this assumed ability to objectify becomes our opiate for sanity, salves what guilt is leftover from the many American myths which seem to exist solely to exonerate guilt.

Come on, Vic, you say, should I really feel bad for a starving man in New York City? Ethiopians? Mozambiquans? Well...yes.

If we were only to believe our own rhetoric (and we don't), that when one man or woman's rights are infringed, so are everyone else's, we would begin to chip away at the numbness that surrounds our lives. It would almost, well, go without saying that we would feel at least a crimp in our day when another starves, when we see a hopeless man or woman homeless. A crimp, mind you. Not that we'd do anything about it, but we'd at least feel something. To go beyond this crimping feeling, we would have to take another's "act" of starvation or deprivation, economic as well as political, to heart, and then perhaps we'd get our asses out from in front of the television and do something. Yet the logical consequences of such a position are unbearable, aren't they? Where does it stop, and perhaps more importantly, why should we ask "where does it stop?" Where does our responsibility end and another's begin?

To answer such questions we'd need to take cases individually, establishing the causes in a particular society and so on, and begin to get a reasonable and compassionate perspective. That's such a hassle, though, isn't it? So, to generalize, what must we do? Or, in the words of another man, What must be done?

First off we must begin, when defending rights of free expression and so on (to take a relatively "small" case), to use ourselves as examples of others' transgressions. For instance, in the current turmoil on campus about the anti-homosexual signs, there was an understandable outrage in reaction to the narrowminded students who put up their signs that proclaimed their hatred for "unnatural sex act." And in a fine letter to the college community, President Riley eloquently denounced those who would do such a thing, going against everything a college like ours should stand for. Fine. But it was how he did it that bothered me.



If you read my last article (not a prerequisite), I guess that you saw how personal I took the attacks of those particular students against "unnatural sex acts." President Riley took the occasion to condemn Soviet communism in the form of quotations from Silone and Koestler to emphasize the point. Yet, for me, this mode of reaction is indicative of the supposed innocence of our own liberal selves; we do not find analogy, say, in our treatment of Central Americans, in the existence of a Ku Klux Klan, a Moral Majority—we go (always!) for the throat of the enemy the one out there, on the other side of the world—but not here. But it is here, as the students against unnatural sex acts have shown, it exists in our selves, it exists in our intellectual pretensions which tend to create analogies and contrast in some vacuum well away from us.

The essence of liberalism, for me, is no dogma, is not the counting off and listing of a certain bill of rights—it's the relentless and persistent questioning of our very selves. No, not a condemnation, not a rejection, but a sincere and openminded questioning. I mean, to take things personally in such a way that everything outside my self provokes a question within as to my motives, my desires, my wishes, my point of view.... I long to understand why I am, as well as how I am to survive. "The students against unnatural sex acts" are a part of me, obviously what I would label a very negative, prejudiced and horrible part, but me nonetheless, for all my intellectual machinations and philosophizing. I cringe when I look in the mirror (which, believe me, is as rarely as possible), and not just because I'm kind of sick-looking, but because what is me often tends to rise and show itself, in my eyes, around the expression of my mouth, in the furrowed lines of my forehead. I loathe those students who allow the bitter bile of prejudice to rise and show itself, to rear its ugly head, if you will, and who are proud of it. I loathe it not because of the singlemindedness of desperate men who revolted under the capitalist yoke and brutally used others in the process, but because that bitter bile is within me, and I'm desperately trying to destroy it.

The Colorado College Trio, playing tonight in Packard (See article).

CC Trio: Tonight

The Colorado College Trio will present a free concert, open to the public, in Packard Hall auditorium at 8:15 p.m. Friday, May 8.

The program's three selections are: W.A. Mozart's "Trio in G Major, KV564"; Frederic Chopin's "Trio in G minor, Op. 8"; and Ludwig van Beethoven's "Trio in B-Flat Major, Op. 97 (Archduke)."

The three Colorado College music instructors who comprise the group are violinist Don Robinson, cellist Susan Smith, and pianist Sue Langlas Grace. This will be the second concert for the newly-formed trio.

Piano and Percussion: Next Week

A pair of piano-percussion duos will be featured in a free concert, open to the public, at 8:15 p.m. Friday, May 15, in Packard Hall auditorium.

Pianinst Sue Langlas Grace and percussionist David Colson have combined skills as Bricolage (French for "puttering; doing odd jobs"). Bricolage's guest artists will be Alice Slavich on piano and George Brown on percussion. The full program is to be announced, but will include Bartok's "Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion."

Grace, principal pianist and director of student performances at Colorado College, has been on the school's faculty since 1976. She has performed solo and with orchestras in the United States and Europe, and has earned international recognition as a chamber music artist. Principal pianist for the Colorado Springs Symphony, she also is on the faculty for the Colorado College Conservatory for the Gifted Young Musician.

Colson has been a member of the music faculty at Coe College, Cornell College, and has taught at the University of Iowa and Rice University. He founded and conducted the Current and Modern Consort, a new music ensemble in Ann Arbor, Mich. Among his honors is a 1982 award at the Percussive Arts Society Composition Contest and a Sallie Shepherd Perkins prize in 1986 for highest achievement in music at Rice University.

Mondays Only

Photo Special! Every Monday!

coupon

FREE SECOND SET OF PRINTS

Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!

This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon. Limited time offer. Offer in effect Mondays only. 819

Kodak Colorwatch System

WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!

College Pharmacy

833 North Tejon • 634-4861

Yearbook— The CC version is soon to be extinct if no one applies to be editor!!

Cutler Publications

is still accepting applications

for

Nugget Editor

(or Co-Editors)

Anyone interested please contact:

Lelia Deykin x297
(Acting Cutler Board President)

Heidi Dowd x282
(Nugget '87 Editor)

From Kristin Mernitz's Senior Art Show

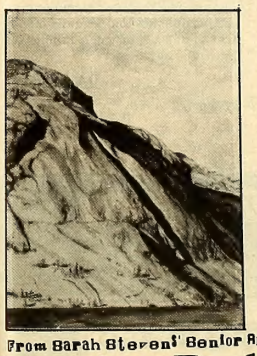
Dreamspace in Art

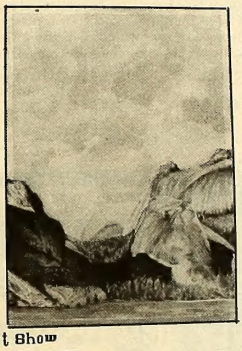
Kristin Mernitz's Senior Art Show, in Packard through May 9, is an exploration of the artist's role as a liberator of the unconscious. Kristin converts the often disturbing abstract images of the unconscious--as we see them in dreams--into aesthetically pleasing shapes and forms, colors and textures. While not all of her lithographs, paintings, and mixed-media wall hangings are strictly abstract (some represent "real" things), all contain elements of abstraction. These elements are primal, referring to the bare-essence images of space and what fills it. As in a dream, things are recognizable, but do not seem to be in their "proper" setting.

Sometimes surreally primitive, sometimes amusingly contemporary, Kristin's work reflects the very process of art. Especially in her self-portrait lithographs there is, metaphorically, a woman looking beyond her mask. While there are certain socially conventional aspects of that mask that she puts on every morning (when exiting the world of dreams), in her art she can forsake them, returning to the unconscious in the stature of a liaison between the two realms.

Kristin is highly successful in this position. Her works are enjoyable, and subtly provocative. The simple images catch your eye and hold it, and then you realize that they are not so simple after all.

E.B.





From Sarah Stevens' Senior Art Show

Static, Bold Energy

Twelve pieces make up the Senior Art Show by Sarah Stevens, on display in Armstrong May 4 through 8. The twelve works include five ink drawings, three dry points, two pencil drawings, one etching, and one mixed media.

A distinct technique in all of Sarah's work is a building-up of texture by placing lines in parallel. The lines do not blend together to create a smooth surface, but each is independent of the others, so that her abstracted forms of real objects and landscapes have a bold, static appearance.

This technique works well in two ink drawings depicting water and/or rain falling in a landscape of ledges, rocks, and mountains. The shapes retain their identity in their abstracted style. This bold, static nature of Sarah's technique emphasizes the sturdiness and rigidity of the landscape, and captures the energy in the turbulence that the falling rain or water suggests. The softness of the brush and the subtle combination and blending of different shades and colors contributes to a peaceful, almost mystical quality that can be associated with a rainstorm or a waterfall.

Sarah's style is very appealing. It takes forms and settings and gives them an abstracted, energetic quality. It is a nice change from a traditional realistic depiction of landscapes and objects in which every detail and color is represented exactly. Her style seems to emphasize the conceptual nature of the object as much as its realism.

CAMPBELL

From Laura Johnson's Senior Art Show

Pieces On Separation

At a glance the most striking aspect of Laura Johnson's art show is her use of color. The eight, fairly large, oil paintings around which the show seems to be centered are all compositions in bright, vibrant colors. Set against and within these pieces there is however an overriding theme of human alienation, loneliness and suspicion. In "Inbetween" and an untitled diptych Laura gets across two different kinds of human alienation which become central themes in the show.

In the oil "Inbetween" there is an intensly personal feeling of rejection. The woman is closing a door behind her, and in doing so she is shutting out two worlds from her past. The images that form these two worlds are not easily defined. To say that the faces of the business men are symbolic of a world of cold indifference is to ignore the other half of the world behind the door. In the other half of the painting there are female forms and faces, and the suggestion through color of at least some warmth—even in face around which the forms appear. Whatever the possible connotations of the two worlds might be, the movement of the painting is away from them and into a new space which at once unknown in its formlessness and hopefull in its bright color. This suggestion of humans uncertain of their place in the present and the future can be found in Laura's other works that concentrate onthe individual alone.

The place of the individual in society is considered in many of the pieces. In "Looking for Godard," "Because Biko," "Underground," and especially the untitled diptych, faces and forms, both realistic and abstract, show the separation of humans from each other. The diptych is decidedly modernist—at least the better part of it is. The city scene on the far right depicts in startling colors both the spirit of the individual and the stark environment of the city which separates these people from each other. The black woman, as bright and hopeful as she first appears, is isolated by the fact that when she looks at the man beside her, her vision of his face is a horrible white maks: a mask of meaningless race that prevents her from seeing anything more of who he might be. Leaning more toward the abstract are the men and women in the center of the piece. While the women do have some form and individuality, there is the suggestion, especially in the forms of the men, that there is in "city life" a resignation of spirit and an acceptance of conformity.

The painting's last attempt to find something other than modernist isolation is in the figures of the women which are decidedly Southwestern. In these faces there is form, strength, and what at first comes across as a unity of seperate spirits brought about by a spirit of place. There is however a difference in the faces which makes it clear that their visions are different. The faces on the left are clearly seeing things differently than the face of the indian. No matter how they each feel about their land, no matter how they may love it, their visions of it are not the same. In the end they are apart.

B. LEAF

Michael J. Yuppie in N.Y.C.

Michael J. Fox is back. His latest movie, "Secret of My Success," probably won't win much critical acclaim, but it's a great movie for all Yuppies, wanna-be-Yuppies, and those of us who just want to be entertained. The movie is funny, but it's not stupid. There is a lot of casual sex (some of it not so casual), but there's really nothing in the movie that a reasonably well-adjusted, open-minded, critical-thinking 20-year-old couldn't handle.

The story repeats a familiar "country boy seeking stimulating city life" theme. Brantley Foster (Fox) decides to leave Kansas and re-locate in New York City. he wants to put his years of college to the test, repay his parents for his college education, and have "a meaningful relationship with a beautiful woman." We know the story. The appeal of the movie is Fox's characterization of Brantley. He's so likeable—kind of like a warm, funny, human Alex P. Keaton. And, although his first experiences in the Big Apple consist of looking at buildings and women, Brantley soon gets down to the business of finding a job. The New York business community is hard to break into, but Brantley succeeds. Eventually, he makes his mark on the company he works for, entangling himself with the boss's wife on the way.

He also meets the Beautiful Woman, Christy Wills (Helen Slater), who is the lone female executive of the corporation. Following rumors of a hostile takeover by a corporate shark, a midnight chase through the country mansion, introductions to NYC's most powerful businessmen, and much confusion about names and identities, the truth comes out. Unemployment proves to be no obstacle to the ingenius hero, and the movie's ending is classic.

The photography of the film is well-done. New York City seems sparkling, clean—Newsweek suggests that this was intentional, portraying the city as it would seem to someone thoroughly intoxicated with being in a city. Character development is minimal but adequate. The characters are not so finely drawn that you get deeply involved with them, but they are three-dimensional enough to keep the story interesting. The plot moves briskly through the familiar story-line, with only a couple of implausible jumps.

The movie has a moral for all liberal arts students, especially you business-econ. majors: You, too, can work your way up from the mail room to a corporate office. Don't underestimate your ability, and don't forget a change of clothes.

CHRIS CARSTEN

continued from p.1 Tulio on DAT

speeds are labeled as 44.1-kHz and 48-kHz respectively. DAT decks playback at the same sampling rate as CDs—44.1-kHz. Yet they can only record at 48-kHz, same as normal tape. Many CD's now produced have a "glitch" manufactured into them. This means they cannot be recorded at the digital level. Of course those people out there who actually understand all this kHz-sampling rate stuff are pretty clever and can figure out ways of by-passing whatever the recording industry throws at 'em. The funny thing is that even most audiophiles can't hear the difference between the best analogue (normal) and digital recording (and they haven't even had their eardrums destroyed by 100 watt road trips, or Maiden shows.) And then there's the price.

That is one major reason this writer feels DAT isn't the industry crushing ogre the recording industry thinks it is. DAT decks will start at about fifteen hundred dollars. My disc player cost a hundred and sixty. And besides, remember how freaked out the movie industry was about VCR's? Technology is often compatable. DAT may eventually become to audio tape what CD's are to records, but it is extremely doubtful they'll ever take over the CD industry. Maybe you can't record on a CD, but then it'll never melt on your dashboard either. There's a lot more to be said about DAT but maybe now you have an idea why it scares the recording industry so much and why a lot of their fear is paranoia. And even when they do

TULIO BROWNING

Bowie Still Wanking

The funniest description of David Bowie I ever read was in a British magazine that called him "the wanker from another world." Well, I would agree with that if he were still the flamboyant Ziggy Stardust, but over the last few years Bowie has mellowed-out considerably. Now however, he's back with Never Let Me Down which captures some of his original spunk and also adds some new sounds.

The album kicks in with "Day In Day Out." It's a funky danceable tune that despite the somewhat monotenous repetition of the title refrain is quite likable.

A couple of songs down the line is the title track which is one of the more pop songs on the album. The beat is kind of on the disco side and Bowie's higher-pitched soul vocals further accentuate this sound.

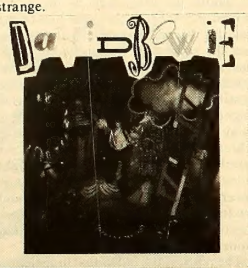
"Zeroes" ends side one and definitely sounds like a pleasing throw-back to his older style. It starts up with synthesized screams that at first seem to be those of a live audience. During the song Bowie's voice swells up to a strong almost plaintive quality previously found on older songs like "Changes." This is especially evident when he exclaims the refrain: "Tonight the zeroes were singing for you!" Another plus of this cut is some psychedelic guitar licks provided by Peter Frampton who played lead guitar on most of the album.

Side two begins with the most unusual song on the album. "Glass Tiger" fades in with space-aged dramatic instrumentation and Bowie narrating a bizarre fairytale. I almost expect to hear "You are now entering The Bowie Zone" every time I listen to it. Later into the song the tempo picks up quite a bit and the vocals take on a powerful operatic feel.

"Shining Star (Makin' My Love) follows on the side and is a complete turn-around from the previous song. The tune is fun and upbeat, while Bowie's flair for peculiar lyrics still shines through: "Eddie boy lit like paraffin spending two weeks in a crack house burns on his brain like Chernobyl." This offers a sharp contrast to the boppy almost silly feel of the song.

The next two songs show a strong rock and roll influence. "87 and Cry" is hardly Bowie meets Bon Jovi but it does have instrumentation that borders on heavy metal. Maybe I'm just not used to this new sound, but there's not much about this tune that really grabs my attention.

"Too Dizzy" switches back into a more pop style complete with lively saxaphone work that at times is reminiscent of "Young Americans." Like the title may suggest it's about a love affair gone strange.



Another righteous rocker called "Bang Bang" closes the album. It's fairly enjoyable, but the fast-paced whirlwind of guitars and vocals make it a little too mind-boggling.

Although some of the Ch Ch Ch Ch changes in the Bowie style on Never Let Me Down were rather disappointing, there was enough intrigue and vitality in alot of the songs to produce a likable album that I suggest trying on for size.

KATIE DALSEMER

Isaak: Call it Popsurfabilly

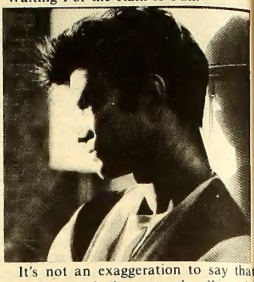
The first thing one notices about Chris Isaak is that he sounds a little like Elvis, and that he also looks a bit like Elvis. But let any and all comparisons end there. For in a time when the charts are dominated by pre-adolescent rap, Chris Isaak has quietly emerged as one of the most intelligent and original acts around. Yet he remains one of rock's best kept secrets. But even here one runs into difficulty, for his music cannot rightly be classified as rock. Rather it runs the gamut from pop, country, surf and rockabilly. Suffice to call it popsurfabilly.

I first saw Chris Isaak in 1985 when he was fresh out of college at a small LA dive called the AntiClub. It was the last night of a month-long engagement and it also happened to be Chris Isaak's birthday. The small place was packed to over-capacity. A casual glance around the room revealed numerous famous faces, among them Madonna and Sean Penn. Surprised at the incredible turnout, I asked Helen, the owner of the club, "Say, what kind of music does this guy play?" "He plays good music," she answered. It turns out she was right.

In the three years since then Chris Isaak has toured voraciously and built up quite a following on the West Coast club circuit from San Diego all the way to Berkeley. He has become a mainstay in the bay area rock scene which has produced such recent notables as Greg Kihn and the Dead Kennedys.

His just-released second album, Chris Isaak, has a very clean, very slick sound. Yet each song is so easy to listen to that it can fit most any mood. Though the tone is mostly melancholy, one might unconsciously find oneself dancing. What sets Chris Isaak apart from the Jackson Brownes of the day is the unsure, yet at the same time oddly reassuring quality of Isaak's croon and the unmistakeable, sharp, crystal-clear guitar of frontman James Calvin Wilsey, who used to tour with the Ventures. On the album Isaak also receives competent back-up from such notable bay area session men as former Tubes drummer Prairie Prince.

The album opens with the single "You Owe Me Some Kind of Love," a haunting tune, the video for which is currently on the MTV playlist (for whatever that's worth). The songs on side two are as original and pleasing as anything I've recently heard. The intricate guitar work on "Lover's Game" is especially nice. The album closes with the very beautiful "Waiting For the Rain to Fall."



It's not an exaggeration to say that there is not a bad song on the album. In fact, they're all pretty good. If Chris Isaak remains a rock'n'roll insiders cult artist, it's for the same reason that his music is so damn good: No vicious hooks which jump out and grab you in Toto-esque fashion and no loud, raucus guitar riffs. The fact is that in all its subtlety this is one of the most impressive albums of the year.

One question I've heard a lot lately is "what happened to good old rock'n'roll?" In a time when the James Taylors and the Steve Millers have all faded, it's refreshing to listen to Chris Isaak. Yes, the kid from the University of the Pacific has made good. If you're bored with the kind of stuff you've been listening to, put on the headphones and give the latest from Chris Isaak a good listen. I think you'll be presently surprised.

DAVID EVANS

Albums supplied by Budget Tapes and Records

PARTING IS A SWEETER SORROW
WHEN YOUR TINY DOUBLE CAN GO ALONG.
DON'T LEAVE COLORADO SPRINGS WITHOUT ONE!
EXCHANGE TINY DOUBLES WITH YOUR FRIENDS.
GIVE ONE TO MOM AND DAD AS A GRADUATION "THANKS!"
TINY DOUBLES LASER-CUT PHOTOSCULPTURES
26 E. KIOWA, DOWNTOWN COLORADO SPRINGS 578-5220
MONDAY-FRIDAY 10-6, SATURDAY 10-5, & by Appointment

Use the COUPONS !!!

More Pizza for Less Dough

Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS

TWO PIZZAS ONE PRICE

FREE FLAVORED PIZZA • Garlic • Buttered • Sesame • Poppy • Rye

EXP. 5/7/87 — Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS — More Pizza for Less Dough

Two 10" Small Pizzas (Cheese Only)

only $5.24 #1D980

Additional 2 Pizza Toppings 83¢ Each

Not valid with any other coupons. Delivery Extra.

EXP. 5/7/87 — Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS — More Pizza for Less Dough

Two 14" Large Special Pizzas

(pepperoni, mushrooms, ham, green pepper, onions) No Substitutions

all for only 24 SLICES $14.12

With This Coupon • Delivery Extra

One Coupon Per Order #1D980

475-8241 (ate - two - four - one)

1625 W. Uintah

Uintah Station

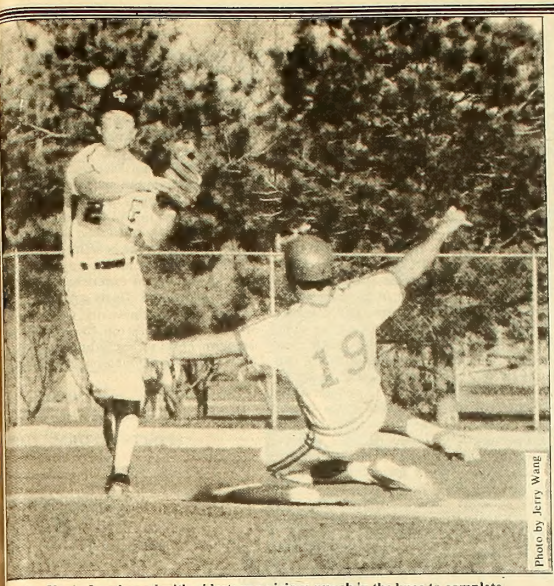

Photo by Jerry Wang

Senior Kevin Larabee adroitly sidesteps a vicious punch in the knee to complete a double play.

Baseball Team Looks Toward Next Year

The Colorado College baseball team ended the 1987 season with a pair of losses to the Colorado Intercollegiate Baseball Association (CIBA) Champion Metro State Roadrunners. Although the losses dropped the Tigers to 5-19 overall and placed them in last place in CIBA, the 1987 season was not without its highlights.

The Tigers accomplished something that few CC teams have been capable of when they beat Air Force two weeks ago. The victory was CC'S first in 11 years over the Falcons. The victory stands as only the 4th time in the 43 game series that the CC baseball team has beaten the team from Air Force.

Not coincidently, the hero of the Air Force game was also voted in as the team's MVP. Junior Mike Yost enjoyed another steller year. The Tiger catcher led the team with a .364 batting average. he also led the team with 4 home runs and 30 runs batted in.

The Tigers pulled off another major upset when they beat NAIA power Fort Hays State in the 10th annual Denver area tournament. Once again the heroes of this game were heroes throughout the season. Sophomore Charlie Ficco picked up the victory with both his pitching and his hitting. Ficco returned from a disappointing freshman year to become an invaluable member of the team. His pitching and hitting numbers reflected a MVP-like season.

Picking up the save in the Fort Hayes game was senior co-captain Dana Radmacher. Nothing speaks more for this senior's extraordinary contributions to CC baseball than the fact that he has had a hand in all of CC's big victories in the last 4 years. Besides the save against Fort Hayes, Radamacher, in his 4 years, has chalked up wins over Air Force, New Mexico State, Metro State, Southern Colorado, and Denver University.

Along with Radamacher, next year the Tigers will miss the services of senior designated hitter Alex Contreras and senior co-captain, second baseman Kevin Larabee. Contreras finished second on the team in hitting with .362 average, while Larabee led the team in runs scored.

Replacing the seniors, especially Radamacher, will be tough for the Tigers. They will also continue to face the task of continually playing teams with scholarship athletes but with new captains Charlie Ficco and Mike Yost leading the way, the Tigers should post more victories like the Air Force and Fort Hayes ones.

KEVIN LARABEE

Men's Tennis Closes Season With Winning Record

The men's tennis team concluded their season on April 25 with a strong performance at the conference tournament at Mines. The team finished 2nd overall. Bill Poll and John Duncan were finalists in singles (at 2nd and 3rd singles respectively), and George Wilmer won the tournament at number 5 singles. In doubles, Poll and Wilmer took first place at number 2 doubles, and John Osherwitz and John Duncan were finalists at number 3 doubles.

During the previous week, the Tigers had their last two regular season matches. On Wednesday, the Tigers downed Regis by a score of 5-4. The singles lineup carried the team , as the Tigers won 5 of the 6 singles matches. On Friday, CC was beaten by DU 6-3. The team finished the season with a winning record of 9-8, which was somewhat satisfying considering the toughness of this year's schedule and the pummeling that we received in Phoenix. Good luck to our graduating seniors, Kyle Fedler and John Osherwitz.

JOHN DUNCAN

Women's Tennis Wins Last Two

The Colorado College women's tennis team concluded its 1987 season with a 7-6 record. The Tigers defeated Big Eight Conference team, University of Missouri during the final week of competition.

Led by junior Sara Ryan at No. 1 singles, the girls continued to sweep four of the six singles matches. The doubles team of juniors Theresa Kuehne and Meredith Clark, defeated their opponents 6-7, 6-4, 7-5 for the deciding match in CC's 5-4 victory.

Later on that week the women traveled to Denver and easily conquered the Regis College team 7-2.

Unfortunately, the season was unusually short this year due to four inclement weather cancellations. This year the team did not receive an invitation to the NCAA Division III Women's Tennis Championships, once again in Kalamazoo, Michigan. Occidental and UC San Diego will be representing the West Region.

We would like to thank our coach Erol Agnos for her dedication, coaching expertise, and caring nature which made our four years at CC a very enjoyable and memorable time. Congratulations on a great season and GOOD LUCK next year.

Co-Captains
MELISSA FORBES &
KATHLEEN DELANEY

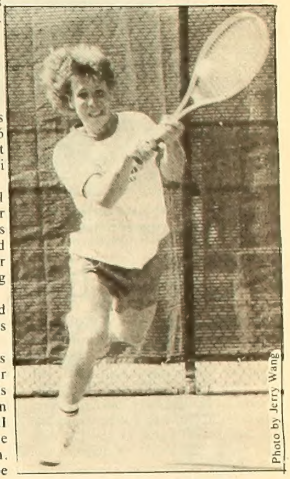

Photo by Jerry Wang

John "The Ripper" Duncan takes his aggressions out on a defenseless felt covered ball.

Seniors...

We need pictures for the Senior section in the 1986-87 Nugget. Leave labelled candids at the Student center in the Nugget box... C'mon, show us what makes you guys seniors!!

deadline May 18, 1987

Photo by Jerry Wang

Angered by a rude poke check from a Colorado State opponent, CC's Will Trousdale (left) prepares to take his ball and go home.

CC Stickers Sweep Ohio

The Colorado College lacrosse team swept three games during an Ohio road trip last weekend and now owns an impressive 9-5 record going into Saturday's season finale at home against the Stickers club team of Denver.

The Tigers defeated the College of Wooster, 9-4, on Friday; Kenyon College, 10-9, on Saturday; and Oberlin College, 10-4, on Sunday.

The most exciting victory of the three came on Saturday when freshman attacker Eric Petersen (Denver, Colo.) scored his fifth goal of the match with seven seconds left, snapping a 9-9 tie after CC had fought back to knot the score with 51 seconds to go. Senior goalkeeper Devin Standard (Chappaqua, N.Y.), who performed well all weekend, made 15 saves in the triumph over Kenyon while freshman Mike Alkaitis (New York, N.Y.) scored twice.

Petersen, who also added a pair of assists Saturday, and Alkaitis each tallied three times in Friday's victory over Wooster. Senior Rob Schwarz (Golden, Colo.) paced Sunday's victory, collecting four goals and an assist against Oberlin. Sophomore Blake Anderson (Montclair, N.J.) scored three goals.

"The trip to Ohio was a real eye-opener for a young team like us," said Tom Kay, Colorado College's head coach. "It taught us how to win the tough games and how to maintain a lead in the close game. Hopefully, the benefits of winning in Ohio will show up on our team next year. It was a good experience."

Kay added the Tigers are trying to include Denison University, which ranks among the nation's top 10 Division III teams, on next year's schedule in an effort "to see if we can compete on the next level up."

This Saturday's game against the Stickers is scheduled for 2 p.m. at Stewart Field.

SPORTS INFORMATION

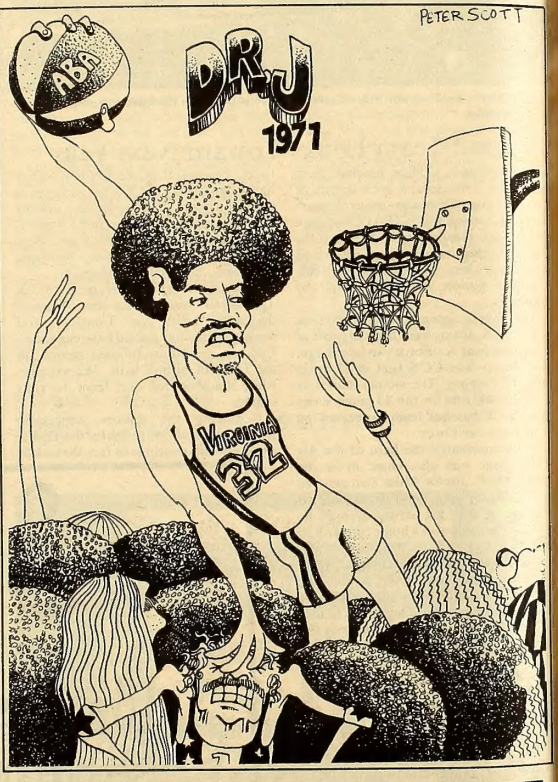
CC Cycling People

The Colorado College Cycling People completed their inaugural racing season with four races over the past two weekends. On the weekend of April 25th and 26th, criteriums were staged at Colorado University and Denver University. CC upstaged their strong 2nd and 3rd place finishes at the CU race when they mercilessly decimated the competition the following day on the DU campus. After his teammates obliterated most of the field with a blistering early pace, freshman sensation David Peters made a daring solo attack one third of the way into the race. With Peter s off the front, the opposition was forced to chase in vain while the CC teammates sucked wheel and rested for the sprint. Peters, the victor, crossed the line gallantly blowing kisses to the adoring crowds nearly a minute before CC riders Morgan Dewees, Terry Ashby, Garrett Ito, and Scott Ree destroyed the pack in the field sprint, netting CC a spectacular 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 5th, and 6th place finish (remember, they were well rested.) Alas, this would be CC's greatest moment, as the following Saturday at the Air Force Academy road race the Cycling People could fare no better than a second place finish by Ground Waster Terry Ashby with sixth and eighth place finishes by Chris Merriam and Dave Peters rounding out the team's top ten placings.

The bright hopes for success in Colorado College first hosted race were dampened by the horrendous stormy weather. Although Colorado College hosted the day's criterium, they did not preside over it, allowing CU to escape with the top five placings. "A performance as dismal as the weather and sparse attendance" commented faculty sponsor Sandy Kinnee.

In the final standings of the eight school conference, Colorado College finished a promising second in their first year of competition. The members of the CCCP will continue training and racing in USCF races through the summer in anticipation of success in the Collegiate track nationals to be held this coming fall.

JEAN DEGRIBALDY



THE ANTLERS HOTEL
Colorado Springs, Colorado

Picture yourself at The Antlers Hotel for graduation.

Colorado Springs' finest...for only $60!

The Antlers...Colorado Springs' only Four-Star, Four-Diamond hotel, located just nine blocks south of The Colorado College, has a special offer for families and friends of graduating students.

- Single or double occupancy room rate of only $60
- A portrait of graduate and family, compliments of The Antlers
- Complimentary valet parking

Call Cynthia at The Antlers for reservations...we'll make this special event picture perfect!

4 S. Cascade Avenue
Chase Stone Center
Colorado Springs,
Colorado 80903
(303) 473-5600
(800) 232-2323
Operated by The Broadmoor Management Company

©1987, The Antlers

YAKITORI

Serving Lunch and Dinner
(Monday - Saturday)

•

Sushi Bar
Cocktails

•

10% Discount Off Any Entree
(with your CC ID)
Take-Out and Delivery

16 E. Bijou • Downtown • 578-0915

Intramural Softball

Competitive (up until May 4)

ll teams have 1 game left to play onday, May 4.

DIV. A ll Ego (3-2)

lind & Body (2-3)	3
e Ya (3-2)	2
uzzy Navels (5-0)	1
oftballs (1-4)	4
otball Players (1-4)	5

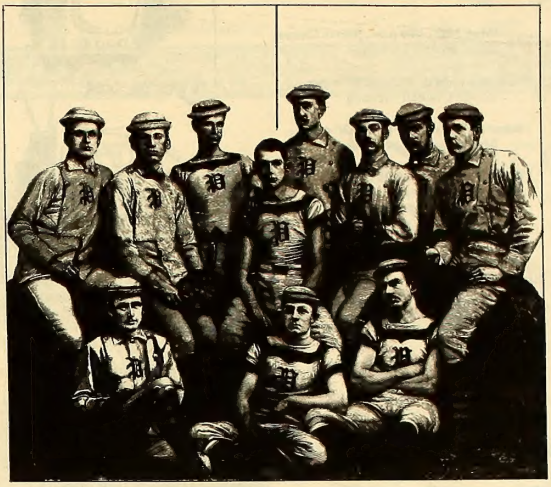
DIV. B

ishy Headed Mutants (0-5)	6
ighly Questionable (2-3)	4
exas Leuger (2-3)	3
piral Sphincters (2-3)	3
owers of Thunder (5-0)	1
ijis for Hire (4-1)	2

DIV. C

The Goooders (3-0)
Fiji Pledges (0-3)
enators (3-1)
Harvey Wall Bangers (0-3)
Wangers (1-2)

With 1 game left to play Thursday, May



Recreational league Standings

DIV. A

Soft Hocks (4-1)	1
Red Socks (1-3) (1-4)	6
The Bacon Mongers (2-2) (3-2)	2
Decadent Priests (1-3) (1-4)	5
Sand Rats (2-2) (3-2)	3
Stuckey's Haus Pecans (2-2) (2-3)	4

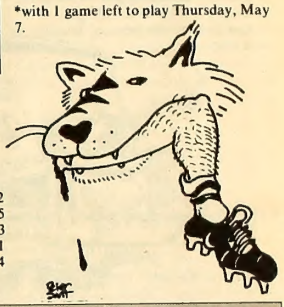
DIV. B

X Bud Club (0-1-4)	6
Boo-Boo's Disciples (3-2)	2
The Good 'Ol Boys (4-1)	1
Boog's Army & OPU (1-4)	5
Alpha flight (3-2)	3
Saganistas (2-1-2)	4

DIV. C

*Cheers (2-1)	2
*2-West Mathias (0-3)	5
The Stick (4-0)	1
*Dipshits (0-3)	4
*Beer-Nuts (1-2)	3

*with 1 game left to play Thursday, May 7.



Women's Softball Standings

DIV. A

Up to Bat (4-0)	1
HBI Squad (3-2)	2
Little Kings (3-2)	3
Buffetts (0-4)	5
Animals (0-5)	6
Absolut (3-2)	4

DIV. B

Henry Weinhards (2-2)	2
Two E-Z (0-4)	5
The Puckers (2-2)	3
Firm Handful (4-0)	1
Weber St. Lickers (2-2)	4

Cowen • Moving • Storage

Reduced rates for
Colorado College students!

-Summer Storage Special-

...beats all available storage costs. Ask for information at Mathias, Slocum, Bemis, Loomis or call 475-2800

Save • Save • Save

SKYWAY VIDEO
Rentals & Sales
577-9047
Hours:
Monday-Thursday 10:30-7
Friday & Saturday 10:30-8
Closed Sunday

- Foreign Films (Excellent Selection)
- Classic Films
- Operas
- Musicals

As well as an extensive selection of

- Current Releases

— No Club Or Membership Fees —
Tuesday Special - $1.49 Rentals
Sunday Rentals - Free

Skyway Plaza • S. 8th & Arcturus
(feel free to call for directions)

RAPAHOE BASIN'S having a Spring blow-out. We've packed every day 'til June 14 with 2 for 1 lift ticket bargains, and every weekend with fun menus, music and prizes. Ski the legend, Arapahoe Basin.

April 25-26 Zinka weekend. Coloradical Barbecue. Rock 'n Roll. Zinka-ball.
May 2-3 Cinco De Mayo. Fiesta Barbecue. Mariachi Band. Toroball.
May 9-10 Pink Flamingo Party. Seafood Barbecue. Reggae. Featherball.
May 16-17 Ragin' Cajun. Crawfish Boil. Cajun Tunes. Crawlball.
May 23-25 Luau. Hog-Wild Barbecue. Hawaiian Harmonies. Free Leis.
May 30-31 Beach Party. Too-Totally-Cool Barbecue. Volleyball.
June 6-7 Miami Vice. Surf and Turf. New Wave. Crocketball.
June 13-14 Surf Club. Beach Barbecue. Surfing Rhythms. Outrageous Volleyball.

Don't miss our $49 Spring Super Saver.
One Day of Free Skiing with One Night's Lodging — 534-7712.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Biology Seminar in Olin 419, Tuesday, May 12. Dr. Ronald Hartman, Department of Botany, University of Wyoming will discuss New and Important Additions to the Vascular Flora of the Rocky Mountains. This seminar will be held at 3:00 p.m. Brown bag lunch and refreshments served.

Don't be a WANKER, Support the ANCHOR! Anchor Splash is tomorrow at 1:00 at Schlessman Pool. Come cheer on your friends and get psyched for the party!

Blue Key Honor Society—Blue Key is an honor society that selects members based on outstanding academic achievements and leadership qualities. Blue Key welcomes innovative ideas from members for new projects, but also sponsors several annual functions which include the Welcomer-Welcomee program, a trivial bowl (in conjunction with Alpha Lambda Delta Honor Society), and Honors Convocation. The organization recently chose to become reaffiliated as a national honor fraternity in an effort to gain stronger focus in its activities and broaden its span of positive campus functions. Through its involvement on campus, Blue Key seeks to promote an atmosphere of academic excellence at Colorado College.

Applications available in the fall of next year.

At Shove Chapel—

Tuesday, May 12th, 8:00-8:30 a.m.
Meditation—Shove Chapel
Music, silence, mystical and/or other writings (enter by northeast door).

May 12th, 4:00 p.m., Shove Chapel
Bible study—Ephesians

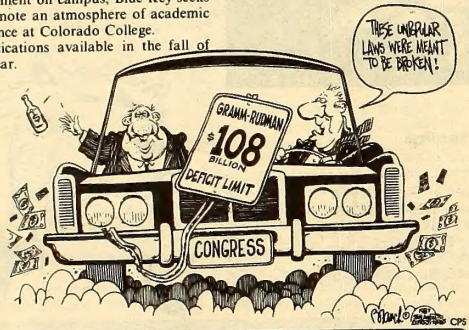
Wednesday, May 13th, 12:00 noon
Shove Council Meeting

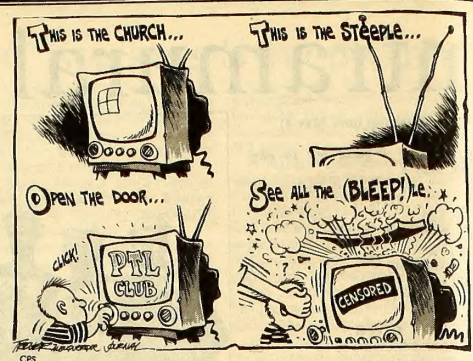
Thursday, May 14th, 8:00-8:30 a.m.
Meditation, Shove Chapel

Friday, May 15th, 12:05 (noon)
Worship Service
Speakers: Members of Shove Chapel

Car for Sale! 1979 AMC Concord. 6 cylinder, automatic, power steering. New tires, AM-FM cassetteMarantz stereo. 56,000 miles. Well maintained, excellent condition, reliable. Going abroad and must sell. $1,900.00. Call Dorothy at x215.

Sara T. - I'm sorry about last night D.K.W.





College Library's Annual Book Sale to the public set for Friday, May 8. The 17th annual book sale by the Friends of Colorado College Tutt Library will be held on campus at the library from noon to 5 p.m., and is open to the public.

Typing Service—Accurate, fast typing service at reasonable rates. Located three blocks south of Armstrong Hall. Telephone: 632-1226.

Several members of the Big Mountain Support Group have just returned from the annual Spring Gathering at Big Mountain. They will hold an informal discussion with the CC community to talk about Spring Gathering, new developments on the land, and the direction of support work for this summer and next fall. All are welcome regardless of previous knowledge. Wednesday, May 13, 7:30, Gates Common.

FOR SALE - An answer to Spring Fever !! White 1970 MGB Convertible. 1yr. old engine. Body in good condition. An investment for the future and lots of fun $3500. More info call ROSS at x340.

Attention Students! Don't throw that furniture or other useful items away just because it's spring and 9th block! If you don't want the hassle of hauling it to Goodwill, why not donate the item to the annual Senior Swap!

We will pick up your items on May 22nd for the sale on May 23rd. Call Richard at 578-1143 or Cutler Hall for more info or if you want to donate or help with the sale.

Seniors! Your contributions help us attain our monetary and participatory goals.

On Campus Jobs—Please see student Saga manager or Financial Aid office.

Typewriter for Sale! Sears "Scholar" electric. Standard pica type; black/correction reel ribbon. Going abroad and must sell. Best offer. Call Dorothy at x215.

Essay Contest—Topic: Do We Need An Equal Rights for Women Amendment to the U.S. Constitution? Eligibility: Students enrolled in senior high, college and continuing education. Award: Winners will be awarded scholarships starting at $1,000. Deadline: All entries must be received by September 30, 1987. Information: NOW Foundation Essay Contest, 1401 New York Ave., N.W. Suite 800, Washington, D.C. 20005 202/347-2279.

A celebration for 15,000 people will be among the events in the 1988 Grants Pass High School Centennial Celebration in Grants Pass, Oregon.

The high school is collating class rosters of the last one hundred years and current addresses of living alumni. The graduates will receive a bi-yearly newsletter from now until the celebration, and are eligible for the GPHS Hall of Fame, which will recognize the one hundred most noteworthy alumni. Applications will consist of a summary of the person's career or major accomplishments and contributions.

To contribute addresses or apply for Hall of Fame, write to Centennial, GPHS, 522 NE Olive Street, Grants Pass, Oregon, 97526. Include name, maiden name, address, and year of graduation.

Solution

ACROSS

1 A guess: colloq.
5 Siamese coin
8 Prohibits
12 Unit of Italian currency: pl.
13 Day: Sp.
14 Landed
15 Rooms in harem
16 That woman
17 Speed contest
18 Soothing
20 Semi-precious stone
22 Organ of hearing
23 Before
24 Come into view
27 Court game
31 Hurry
32 Native metal
33 Devotee
37 Edge
40 Owing
41 Solemn wonder
42 Contradicted
45 Rumor
49 Mixture
50 Comparative ending
52 Name for Athena
53 Ravelings
54 Southwestern Indian
55 Leak through
56 Chinese pagodas
57 Insane
58 Bushy clumps

DOWN

1 Plod through mire
2 Conceal
3 Algerian seaport
4 Bed canopy
5 Stick
6 Bind
7 Mark to shoot at 8 Unproductive
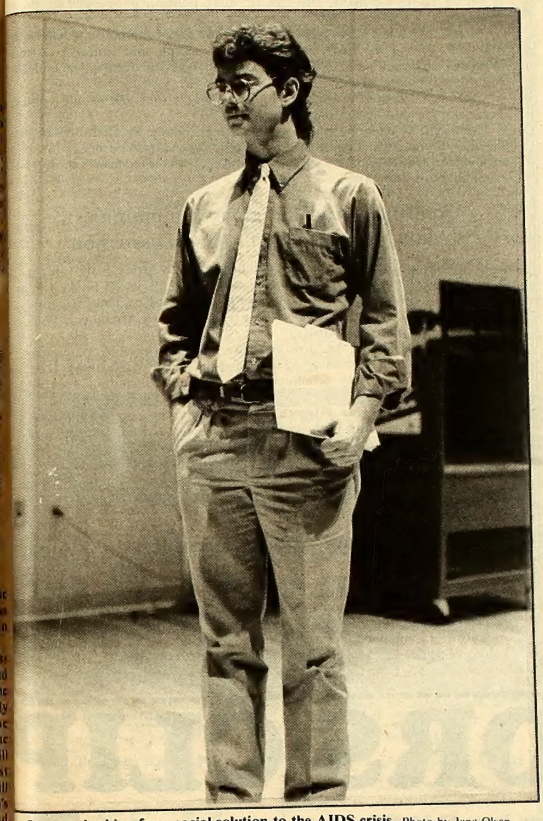
9 Wolfhound
10 Fastidious
11 Let it stand
19 Fall behind
21 Exist
24 Period of time
25 Mire
26 Finish
28 Bow
29 Anger
30 Weight of India
34 Imbeciles
35 Hint
36 Boredom
37 Prohibited
38 Be in debt
39 Meal
42 Blockhead
43 Lamb's pen name
44 One of Columbus's ships
46 Butter substitute: colloq.
47 Musical instrument
48 Hits lightly
51 Greek letter

	P	A	S	T	E		R	E	A	L	M
T	O	T	T	E	R		S	A	L	O	O	N
A	I		Y	A	R	D			B	I	T	E
I	S	M		M	O	R	E	S		S	H	E
L	O	O	T		R	A	T	E	S		E	D
S	N	O	R	E		B	O	T	H	E	R	S
		S	E	A	R		N	O	O	N
P	L	E	A	S	E	D		N	O	T	E	S
L	I		T	E	A	R	S		T	E	R	N
E	M	S		S	P	A	T	E		R	O	E
A	P	O	D			M	A	T	E		D	E
D	I	L	A	T	E			B	A	R	T	E	R
	D	O	N	O	R		S	H	R	E	D

© 1984 United Feature Syndicate
COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 15 May 1987 Volume 21, No. 17



Parker—looking for a social solution to the AIDS crisis. Photo by Jane Olsen

"U.S. Economy Dead"—Thurow

"The American economy has died and has been replaced by the world economy," said Lester Thurow in a speech about American economic competitiveness.

Thurow, the Dean of MIT's Sloane School of Management and world renowned economist, made the analogy of the American economy to a terminally ill cancer patient as he delivered the H. Chase Stone and Lewis Abbot Memorial lecture to an overcrowded Gates Common Room Thursday evening.

The first reaction is to deny death and seek a second opinion, then to claim it's unfair, and then go to Mexico for Layatril. "We are kidding ourselves if we think we can change to a service economy (Layatril) because there is no conceiveable way we can export enough services to make up the trade deficit."

America Has Not Been Competitive For 50 Years

After World War II, the U.S. was the world leader in every product they produced except bicycles. The U.S. had what Thurow calls "Effortless

Continued on p. 3

Dean's Cup: The Challenge Continues

Once more the challenge has been sounded. Horns summon the sleepy masses from campus dorms and quiet suburban streets. Laces drawn tight against running sneakers, hordes of enthusiastic CC'rs are expected to race in the Dean's Cup, held Sunday morning at 10:00 a.m. in Monument Valley Park.

The ten kilometer race originated eight years ago when Political Science Professor Glenn Brooks began his reign as Dean of the college. Brooks recalls, "I was amazed to learn what a group of broken down joggers worked in the Dean's office. That first fall we built a team and challenged the rest of the school to a race."

Held in the fall of 1979, the first race seemed a success. Hardy CC runners turned out to pound the red dirt paths that led through Monument Park. Race highlights were recorded on film by Romance Language Professor Marcelle Rabbin. Finishers retreated toward the cool sanctitude of tapped kegs and the thick turf of the football field.

However, as the newborn challenge conflicted with the fall Homecoming festivities it was switched to a May running date and henceforth has become an annual CC tradition.

The seasonal switch seems appropriate, for the spring climes encourage mass participation and provide a healthy opportunity of redemption from the winter decadence of books and booze.

The Dean's springtime challenge may be accepted at many levels. Not everyone takes the challenge lightly. A long

Continued on p. 8

AIDS: Parker Gives Cross-Cultural Perspective

Cultural anthropologist Richard rker conducted the second Thursday-Eleven lecture in May with a program led "AIDS in Cross-Cultural rspective: A View from Brazil." For his ddress on "one of the most serious alth epidemics of the latter half of the ntury," Parker relied on his research on x/gender systems and AIDS as a ulbright Scholar in 1983-84 and on his bsequent studies in the South merican country. The comparative talk ooked at the disease from a cultural rspective as it weighed sexual practices nd trends in AIDS cases in Brazil with ose in the US. Parker feels the study of IDS from the Brazilian viewpoint can lp better understand the dilema in the S and other high incident countries.

Parker theorized that "the kind of pproach (eventually) taken in Brazil ay be equally important in dealing with the spread of AIDS in the United States." He continued, "Brazil is in the middle of two extremes, Africa and the US." He explained that where in Africa and the US the spread of AIDS has been predominantly heterosexual and homosexual respectively, in Brazil it has been "polymorphous." He attributes this phenomenon to the country's high level of bisexuality (over 20%) and (the high risk practice of) anal intercourse (over 40%) which not only heightens the propagation of the disease but extends its infliction beyond any one group.

Like immunological and epidiological experts, Parker feels that controlling the disease demands a social solution rather than a technical one. "The cultural tradition in the US has been 'the magic bullet,' but modifications in sexual practice are necessary until that bullet is constructed," he said. Such a change, he feels, comes through public education which he feels has been slow and not as effective as it could be in both countries. "AIDS education must be focused on practices and specific behaviors, rather than being directed at groups," he said. Parker insisted that the language and ideology of the common folk be used for maximum awareness, referring to governmental tendencies to use distracting and vague euphemisms.

AIDS victims in the US are not acquiring the disease as before because of the drastic changes in sexual behavior as a result of AIDS education, noted Parker. Where the gay community was once the high risk group in this country, ethnic minorities, the poor and drug users are now assuming that role. The reason, Parker feels, is that crucial safe sex information has been muffled. He noted

Continued on p. 3

INSIDE

Alum Returns from USSR
Page 6

New Saga System
Page 7

Shanties Defended
Page 9

Aristocats Review
Page 13

Mahoney Named MVP
Page 15

What's News

Analyzing Current Issues

Let's wake up and smell the coffee—the congressional investigative hearings concerning the Iran/Contra affair have not unveiled many reasons for the American public to continue treating President Reagan as a larger-than-life savior. The flavor of the Iran/Contra affair is becoming bitter in the public's mind, and the dissolutionment about the Reagan years that this brings may create a new liberalism in the US. The conditional "may create" must be emphasized here, for looking at future American values is only speculation.

At the expense of an incredible national debt, the Reagan administration has "gotten government off our backs" through the cutting of social services and taxes, while creating a defense that bristles with the latest technological forms of overkill. In a nutshell, Reagan defines government as inherently meddling in personal affairs, and restricts techniques to better balance the socio-economic tables. The American public is showing more concern for public health care and elderly benefits, and the thousands of homeless, and this concern may place these issues high on the lists of 1988 election campaign agendas.

The public's dissolutionment with the Reagan doctrine of foreign policy has never been registered at the polls. While the 1984 election was a landslide victory, due to a temporary strengthening of the economy, public support of such projects as aid to the contras was never strong—only less prominent an election issue. Voting with one's wallet as we did in 1984 is nothing new to the US—a bastion of liberalism, individuality, and freedom. However the Iran/Contra affair has brought foreign policy concerns to the forefront, and may make the coming years less dominated by wallet issues and more in touch with international ethics its duties to military security. Looking at this interpretation, and then beyond this administration, one begins asking "why cannot government play an active role in society as a problem-solver?" "Do most governing actions have to be classified as meddling—on our backs?"

Speculate On '88

Some of the effects of the Reagan years have plagued the lower classes to be sure, as wealth tends to accumulate in only certain sectors of society and remain only there without some effort at redistribution. The post Reagan years may see a return, therefore, to a more distributive society that recognizes the many problems associated with adopting the "invisible hand" method of governing.

We will probably not see a return to "Great Society" values, but somewhere in between those values and Reagan values that seek more creative problem-solving and morals. Simple solutions to complex situations abroad may give way to more intellectual responses.

Ah, but isn't speculation fun?! However, let's not start dreaming, or having nightmares—depending on how one views such possible changes in post Reagan socio-political values. Of importance here and now is to recognize two facts: 1) The Reagan years are over—not only due to the approach of his final year and a half, but also to the current IranContra bog that is drowning the White House; 2) Now is the time to start asking questions about what values or whose values will dominate the next decade or more. The election in 1988 could bring big changes. Keep this in mind and stay informed!

News Editors

News Briefs

CC Students Win Coveted Fulbright Scholarships

Graduating seniors Inger Thomsen and Susan Van Camp have been awarded Fulbright Scholarships for a year's study in Germany, and classmate Scott Reznik has been named as an alternate.

Thomsen is a Colorado Springs resident who majored in liberal arts and sciences, focusing on political philosophy in literature. This fall she'll go to Freiburg University in Freidburg, Germany, to study on a DADD/Fulbright Scholarship in conjunction with the German Academic Exchange Service (DADD).

Van Camp, also of Colorado Springs, is a political science major. She will travel to Bonn, Germany, this fall to study political philosophy at Bonn University.

Reznik, a German major from Littleton, Colo., is an alternate and will study abroad if one of the final selections cannot accept, said Professor Armin Wishard, chairman of the College's German/Russian department and the Fulbright Program adviser.

Students interested in applying for a Fulbright for 1988 should contact Professor Wishard, ext. 520, soon for details.

The award is open to graduate students, including Ph.D. candidates. It includes tuition costs, a one-year maintenance stipend, plus covers air fare and incidental expenses for study abroad at a university of the recipient's choice. It is renewable for two years.

Apartheid And Religious Communities: Alum, Fitzgerald Will Lead Discussion

"Apartheid and the Religious Communities in South Africa" is the topic for a lecture-commentary slated for 4 p.m. Tuesday, May 19, in the Shove Chapel lecture room. The discussion will be introduced and led by Tim Fitzgerald, a 1985 Colorado College graduate who traveled to South Africa as a Watson Fellowship research grant winner.

Fitzgerald worked for the "Johannesburg Star," a white liberal newspaper published in English, and observed first hand the effects of apartheid. He also met or spoke with many prominent church leaders, including Archbishop Desmond Tutu.

In the May 19 discussion, Fitzgerald will talk about the judicial opposition to apartheid, as well as some of the rationale and theology cited by supporters of apartheid. Also to be discussed are the views and circumstances of the Jewish community in South Africa, in regard to the apartheid government.

An opportunity for questions and open discussion will follow the initial presentation.

Missionary To Speak About Experiences In Zimbawe

The Reverend Titus L. Presler wil discuss his past three years as a missionary in Zimbabwe, in south central Africa, at a 3:30 p.m. presentation Wednesday, May 20, in Gates Common Room. An Episcopal priest, Presler was a missionary in northwest Zimbabwe among the Shona tribe. Zimbabwe, formerly the British colony of Rhodesia, came into being as a state in 1980 and its population consists primarily of black Africans. Refreshments will be served.

SENIORS-CLIP n SAVE!

Colorado College has ALUMNI CLUBS in 20 cities and Canada, so when you're out in the COLD, CRUEL WORLD, give these folks a call...

Albuquerque
Barbara Koenig '75
(505) 344-5564 (h)
(505) 262-2672 (w)

Boston/New England
Martha Diehl-Momtaheni '82
(617) 322-9890 (h)
(617) 956-1730 (w)

Chicago
Elizabeth Gignilliat '82
(312) 327-9661 (h)
(312) 922-8940 (w)
Jennifer Peterson '81
(312) 281-2364 (h)
(312) 726-4800 (w)

Cincinnati
Dr. Paul M. Holland '69
(513) 829-4063 (h)
(513) 245-2502 (w)

Colorado Springs
William Caivert '44
(303) 576-0976
George Weege '50
(303) 634-3465 (h)
(303) 520-4631 (w)

Denver
Diana DeGette '79
(303) 388-6399 (h)
(303) 333-3735 (w)
Donia Ness '81
(303) 777-8525 (h)
(303) 321-6661 (w)

Grand Junction
James Casebolt '72
Joanne Tuthill Casebolt '72
(303) 245-4596 (h)
(303) 242-2645 (w)

John P. Gormley '79
(303) 242-8404 (h)
(303) 242-6262 (w)

Houston
Alice Balie McAlpine '77
(713) 524-4353 (h)

Marian Davenport Herman '75
(713) 975-9343 (h)
(713) 464-9451, x221 (w)

Kansas City
Julie Reddan '79
(816) 361-8202 (h)
(861) 274-5716 (w)

Los Angeles
Robert L. Davidson '71
(818) 799-7814 (h)
(818) 799-7000 (w)

Minneapolis/St. Paul
Nancy Corrigan Woodrow '68
(612) 935-7593 (h)
(612) 938-8874 (w)

New York City
Kathryn Cervon '80
(212) 879-1841 (h)
(203) 328-6578 (w)

Oklahoma City
Barbara Snow Gilbert '76
(405) 843-7027 (h)
(405) 235-7700 (w)

Omaha
Dr. Walter M. Bacon, Jr. '68
Lynne Lazier Bacon '68
(402) 333-0413 (h)
(402) 554-3614 (w)

Phoenix
Judy Weil Oksner '81
(602) 998-0881 (h)

Portland
M. James Mark '81
(503) 297-2816 (h)
(503) 223-4777 (w)

Pueblo
Joyce Baca Anderson '75
(303) 561-2544 (h)

St. Louis
Daniel J. Cooper '66
Beth Anneberg Cooper '66
(314) 821-8248 (h)
(314) 694-2156 (w)

Salt Lake City
Charles Streamer '76
(801) 546-1128 (h)
(801) 896-8214 (w)

San Francisco/Bay Area
Kathy Rogers '81
(415) 759-6132 (h)
(415) 986-1010 (w)

Seattle/Tacoma (Puget Sound)
William B. Stafford '63
(206) 284-6085 (h)
(206) 625-4565 (w)

Washington, D.C.
Jennifer Zimdahl '81
(202) 223-5288 (h)
(202) 485-6288 (w)

Canada
Monica Eckersley '82
(403) 244-8066 (h)
(403) 298-5800 (w)

Want to stay in touch? Give the Alumni Office your new address.

U.S. Moving Into World Economy Cont.

ntinued from p. 1

echnological Superiority." Fifteen years go, the U.S. held 90% of the miconductor market and today Japan ntrols 90%. The defense department ust now try to salvage a small part of e chip industry out of necessity.

"We must become competitive because e no longer have superiority." On a orldwide scale of technology, Thurow ys "Americans are average."

hange Is Necessary To Avoid Collapse

Thurow compared the $170 billion ade deficit to a black hole "the farther ou get in the harder it is to get out and e enormous pressures inside will hange the structure of world trade."

No country can forever run a trade eficit; and if you are a net debtor nation, ou must have a trade surplus to pay back editors. These are economic truths, but hat we don't know is when the world ill stop lending money to the U.S., the orld's largest net debtor nation. "If the foreign loans were to stop, our tandard of living would fall nsiderably." Thurow estimates it ould fall 8% on the average. The largest op in standard of living since WWII as been only 2%. "We are hooked on oreign loans and foreign companies are ooked on our American market." Japan produced 28 million video recorders last year and while the Japanese bought 7 million, the U.S. bought 14 million.

"To compete in the world economy," according to Thurow, "we must have world class components going into our products. We must measure up to the world."

Thirteen percent of American workers are functionally illiterate, as compared to less than 1% of Japanese workers. The high school drop out rate in the U.S. is 28% while in Japan it is 2%. Thurow believes changes in the education system are necessary to improve the quality of the American workforce to a world class level. "While the economics to become competitive are simple, the politics are fiendish."

The U.S. at 3.9% has the lowest rate of savings of any country. The country with the next lowest savings rate is Canada, and they save 14%. Because the other countries save, they can buy things like programmable industrial robots. "Thurow's axiom #1: A Japanese worker with a robot is better than an American worker without a robot."

While our competitors are spending from 2 to 2.2% of their GNP on research and development, the U.S. spends only 1.7%. "Thurow's Corollary: An American engineer without money is not as good as a foreign engineer with money."

We Must Teach The Lone Ranger To Play Soccer

Finally to measure up in the world economy, we have to improve our managers. Thurow explained how Japanese managers have on more than one occasion turned the most inefficient American factories into some of the most productive in the country. "American managers have a Lone Ranger mentality, they are not team players," said Thurow. He explained how the world game is soccer and how we're still playing football. "We have to learn how to play soccer, learn to play their game."

He suggests we learn to play their game when we produce goods for their needs. Currently, the Japanese have a good percentage of the snow blower market; however, they do not buy snowblowers. "We know we will have become competitive when we can export goods which no Americans use."

The speech kicks off the Economics Department's year of concentrating on the competitiveness of the American economy. Next fall, the department will host other programs to study the topic in more detail.

DAVID KLEIN

Use the COUPONS !!!

More Pizza for Less Dough

Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS

TWO PIZZAS ONE PRICE

FREE FLAVORED PIZZA ● Garlic ● Buttered ● Sesame ● Poppy ● Rye

EXP. 5/22/87 — Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS — More Pizza for Less Dough

Two 10" Small Pizzas

(Cheese Only)

only $5.24 #1D980

Additional 2 Pizza Toppings 83¢ Each

Not valid with any other coupons. Delivery Extra.

EXP. 5/22/87 — Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS — More Pizza for Less Dough

Two 14" Large Special Pizzas

(pepperoni, mushrooms, ham, green pepper, onions) No Substitutions

all for only $14.12 24 SLICES

With This Coupon • Delivery Extra

One Coupon Per Order #1D980

475-8241 (ate - two - four - one)

1625 W. Uintah

Uintah Station

Mondays Only

Photo Special! Every Monday!

coupon

FREE SECOND SET OF PRINTS

Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!

This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon. Limited time offer. Offer in effect Mondays only. 819

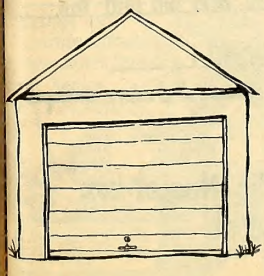
Kodak Colorwatch System

WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!

Kodak Ektachrome Film 200

College Pharmacy

833 North Tejon • 634-4861



SUMMER STORAGE

The Choice Is Yours!

We Suggest:

Interstate Secure Storage

- Call for a quote you'll be happily surprised
- 1st Months Rent ½ Price & Refferal Discount
- Electronic Security System on Every Door
- Lighted & Fenced
- On Site Resident Manager

633-0222

Heightening Cross-Cultural Awareness For AIDS

Continued from p.1

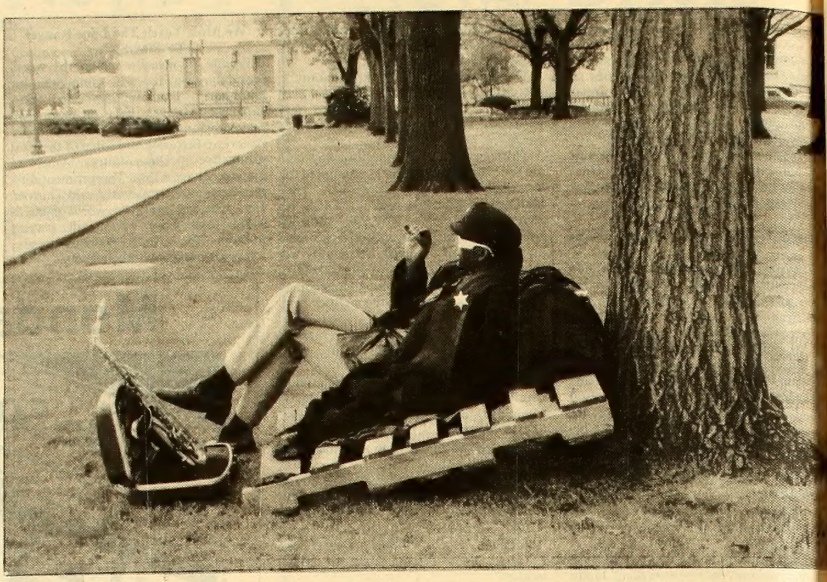
that the Brazilian lower class and intravenious drug user have become especially vulnerable for the same lack of information. Hence, he stresses the need for better educating methods.

"Outside Africa, Brazil is the third-highest country in the number of cases of AIDS, right after the United States and France," Parker noted. Yet, the first case wasn't reported until 1983, and by 1986 there were 790 reports and 406 deaths, he said. Parker continued that the victims were usually people of the "exterior" or those who had been abroad. As a result, he explained, Brazilians view the disease as one that foreigners import. Parker added that Brazil is more sensitive to foreign than domestic criticism. The country did not begin its public awareness program until it was criticized by the World Health Organization.

Professor Parker is a graduate from (and presently a doctoral candidate at) the University of California at Berkeley. Thirty years old, the visiting professor has also taught at his alma mater. Among his honors include those bestowed by the Tinker Foundation and Center for Latin American Studies, Wenner-Gren Foundation and Phi Beta Kappa.

AKLILU DUNLAP

Photo of the Week



"The Sheriff" keeps an eye on Capital Hill—D.C. Photo by Suzie Klein

1987 Nugget

ONLY

$17.50

don't let the memories slip by...

yearbook order form 1987

NAME _____

CAMPUS ADDRESS _____

SIGNATURE _____

Make checks payable to: Cutler Publications OR put it on your student account and we will bill your parents. Check one:

— paid by check {please put checks in envelopes}
— student account

Please return to the Nugget box at the Student Center

Loomis Last Lecture

Riley Gasps Last Words: Contemplation Versus Action

So what was this Gresham Riley in his last hour stuff? Did he die?...resign? The answer is none of the above. On Sunday, May 10th, President Riley spent an hour explaining to students what he would say if he only had one more hour to live. This was the final presentation of the Loomis Lecture Series for the academic year.

A sixty minute hour glass was overturned and President Riley commenced his talk. He explained that his discussion was going to be organized around some of his favorite quotations that he has used often in previous lectures and articles. The lecture centered around no single theme but rather on several important concepts that he said he hoped would hang together like "a string of pearls."

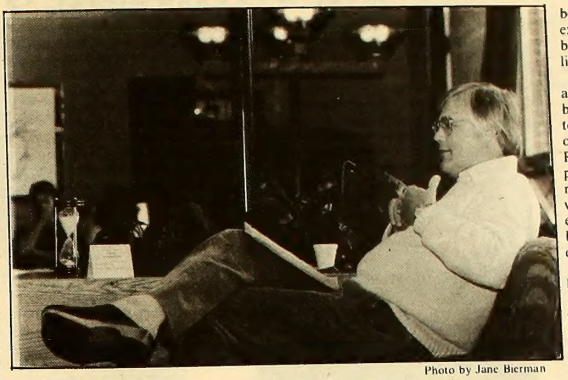


Photo by Jane Bierman

Riley began by stressing the value of institutions of higher education. He pointed out that a majority of the institutions that have survived the longest have been colleges and universities. Riley feels the reason for this trend of success and survival is that these institutions have remained true to their original purpose: the pursuit of knowledge. Riley warns that the greatest danger to a college or university is becoming excessively politicized. By saying this, he does not intend to advocate political neutrality, for he recognizes that as an impossibility. His purpose, rather, is to stress the importance of keeping the central focus of an institution in sight.

Riley quoted Karl Marx who as a young man, said, "The point is not to understand the world but to change the world." He then described how excessively simplistic and misleading such a statement is. Riley believes that we must ask, "to what end [should we] change the world." He thinks that Americans believe that actions have more value than ideas. Riley recognizes this "need" for action on the divestment issue. He explained that many people seem to feel that "something has to be done even if it is ineffectual."

Riley stressed the importance of using the creative resources we acquire at CC to do more than give gut reactions to world problems. He stressed coming up with new solutions. Riley quoted from the old testament, "Where there is no vision, the people perish."

Riley explained that the mastery of factual content is not the main goal of higher education. He said, "Facts are important, but they are merely means to more important ends." In order to give the facts value, we must use them to form ideas. Riley emphasized, "development of vision is an extraordinarily important goal of your education."

The President went on to warn against reductionism, that is the tendency to explain all situations by one principle. Einstien expressed this idea well, "Keep things as simple as possible, but no simpler." Riley recognized the limitations of dichotomous thinking, that is, viewing the world in terms of good and evil and right and wrong. He also stressed the importance of examining the context of any situation before making judgement. Learning to get beyond these limiting ways of thinking, Riley expressed, is a sign of reaching maturity.

Riley thinks that CC provides an environment very conducive to the development of the intellect. This is not necessarily true of the 'real world'. Justice Felix Frankfurter declares, "the entire American enterprise is a consipiracy against the mind." By taking advantage of our liberal arts education, we can become the leaders of the world. Riley explained, "There is a vital relationship between the development of leaders and a liberal arts education."

Riley emphasized that he is not advocating replacing action with ideas but rather developing and utilizing ideas to choose the right actions. Actions are often necessary to give ideas meaning. Riley illustrated this idea with a Chinese proverb, "I hear and I forget; I see and I remember; I do and I understand." Riley went on to say that students can be expected to do more than master existing bodies of knowledge; they can be expected to create new ones.

Riley believes that these concepts can be practically applied to the new Eight Block plan. He explained, "a primary thrust of that change will be to push student independent study and other creative efforts into the forefront." He went on to say, "Active involvement on the part of students is the meaningful part of education."

By this point, the last sand of the hour glass had fallen signifying the end of the talk. Riley had not covered nearly all of his ideas, but never fear, President Riley still has many hours to share his ideas with us.

MARGO LEVI

COMING IN JUNE

IN VIETNAM
THE WIND DOESN'T BLOW
IT SUCKS

Stanley Kubrick's
FULL METAL JACKET

WARNER BROS PRESENTS STANLEY KUBRICK'S FULL METAL JACKET
STARRING MATTHEW MODINE ADAM BALDWIN VINCENT D'ONOFRIO LEE ERMEY DORIAN HAREWOOD ARLISS HOWARD KEVYN MAJOR HOWARD ED O'ROSS
SCREENPLAY BY STANLEY KUBRICK MICHAEL HERR GUSTAV HASFORD BASED ON THE NOVEL THE SHORT-TIMERS BY GUSTAV HASFORD CO PRODUCER PHILIP HOBBS EXECUTIVE PRODUCER JAN HARLAN
PRODUCED AND DIRECTED BY STANLEY KUBRICK

Alum Describes Experiences in Soviet Union

Joanna Hambidge brought the world of the everyday Russian citizen a little closer to the world of the everyday CC student with a slide show last Wednesday night in the Gates Common Room. Hambidge's slides recorded her nine and one half week visit to the USSR last summer.

Hambidge, who graduated from CC last year, traced her desire to travel to the Soviet Union to her feelings as a freshman. In a written memoir of the trip, she recalls that during this time, "I became increasingly aware of and concerned about the nuclear issue. I wanted to know how the United States and the Soviet Union could despise each other so much — enough to threaten to destroy each other and the rest of the world with nuclear weapons." While at CC, Hambidge learned as much as she could of the history, politics, and languages of the Soviet Union, but found that this knowledge only whetted her desire to learn how the Russian people, and not the government, really felt about certain issues. "I wanted to hear their views on war and peace and their visions of the future. I wanted to discuss what we might be able to do to lessen the chances of nuclear war," says Hambidge.

During her visit to the USSR, Hambidge travelled to Moscow, Yaroslavl, Novorossiisk, Baku, Leningrad, and Krasnodar. Hambidge visited the famous landmarks in these cities, including the renowned churches. "I couldn't help but find it ironic that the government had put such effort into lessening the influence of religion in Russia, but then had spent so much money restoring the churches," said Hambidge. She also related that one of the women that she travelled with had smuggled Bibles into the country and had contacts with some underground churches. "I managed to go to one of their services, and found it much more lively and modern than the official churches," said Hambidge.

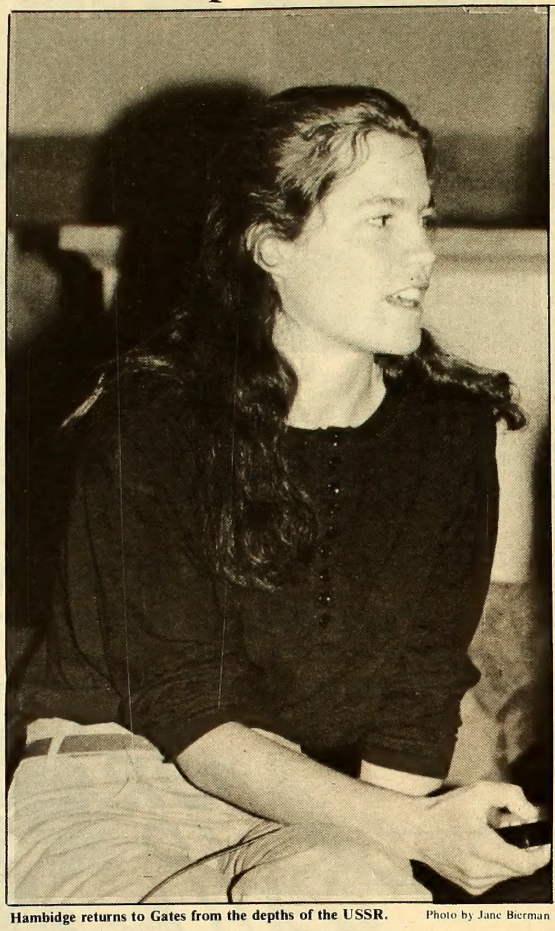
Although Hambidge enjoyed visiting the famous landmarks in Moscow, she found that the high point of her stay there was talking to schoolchildren in Red Square. "The teachers were trying to get the kids to come along," says Hambidge, "but they were excited to stay and talk with an American. For my part, I was glad to have a chance to try out my Russian!"

The bulk of Hambidge's stay in the Soviet Union was spent in the city of Krasnodar. Opened to westerners in 1976, Hambidge found that there she was finally able to freely talk to people without the constant presence of a government guide. She found that most of the citizens of Krasnodar were amazed to find an American that could speak Russian in their midst. Almost invariably, she found that her presence was welcomed in Krasnodar. "Mentioning to Soviet people that I lived in America evoked time and again positive reactions," said Hambidge. The goodwill displayed by the people of Krasnodar extended to inviting Hambidge as a guest into homes, parties, weddings, and other social activities.

On the whole, Hambidge found the Soviet people friendly and very, very curious about the United States. She also found a degree of puzzlement about President Reagan's foreign policies. "After meeting me and finding out that I was an American," Hambidge said, "the second thing that people would ask me was 'Do you want peace? Why doesn't Reagan want peace?'" In her memoirs, Hambidge recalls an intense encounter of this kind with an elderly Soviet woman:

The babushka held my hands tighter. I thought she might cry. She proceeded to tell me that when she had been my age, she had lost her husband and most of her family in the war. Shaking her head slowly back and forth, she said, "War makes no sense. All people should live together in peace."

DON SILVER



Hambidge returns to Gates from the depths of the USSR. Photo by Jane Bierman

Seniors Plan Parties

Hello, seniors! Hope you all have time in your busy schedules for the great, upcoming senior acticities.

We are planning a PARTY just for you!! This coming Wednesday, May 20th, we're all going to O'Furry's. The mixer, our last one, begins at 5:30 p.m. and lasts as long as you stay. Drafts will be 49 cents and everything else will cost you a mere 99 cents.

GOOD NEWS!!! You'll soon have the opportunity to witness "the creation," AFTER ALL, AREN'T YOU TIRED OF BEING ON THE OUTSIDE, LOOKING IN? We have arranged tours for seniors of the new Worner Center. Interested seniors should congregate at the construction site on Thursday, May 21st at 3:30 p.m. The tour, which will be conducted in small groups, should only last 30 to 45 minutes. I'm sure you won't want to miss it!

WE WANT YOUR JUNK!!! The Senior Swap is fast approaching, and it will be a great place to get rid of your "treasures." We will take everything from furniture to clothes. So, if you find that four years at Colorado College has created an "excess" that just won't fit in your car, give Richard Poling a call (578-1143). He is happy to get the stuff off your hands. If you can't reach Richard and you just can't wait to rid yourself of "the excess," feel free to drop it by the basement of the Tutt Alumni House on the corner of Uintah and Cascade. They will be more than happy to take it anytime between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. Just remember, we need your "treasures" before Friday, May 22nd.

Did you know that all seniors get a FREE yearbook? Yes, it's true. The yearbooks will be sent to you sometime in September.

Speaking of yearbooks, they need pictures of seniors. The Senior Section of the yearbook just wouldn't be complete without a few candid snapshots. Leave labelled pictures at the Student Center in the Nugget box. The deadline is fast approaching — Monday, May 18th.

Make sure and catch this column next week for a breakdown of all the GRADUATION ACTIVITIES.

ANITA WALLS

Hair Designers for Men & Women

RAPUNZEL

Style cuts, Cellophanes,
Perms & Color.
Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.

Stop in or make your appointment:

827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

Cowen • Moving • Storage

Reduced rates for
Colorado College students!

-Summer Storage Special-

...beats all available storage costs. Ask for information at Mathias, Slocum, Bemis, Loomis or call 475-2800

Save • Save • Save

"New" Saga Gears Up For 87-88

Food Service Returns with a Vengeance

The past is gone... it's time to look towards the future. The 1986-87 school year at CC will be aptly remembered as a year of great inconvenience to all of us. It will be remembered as the year without a student center, the year without an on-campus 3.2 intoxication pit and the year without an adequate bookstore. In short, it was a year which tested the tolerance of the liberal arts student. But perhaps most importantly, it will be remembered as the year that SAGA bit the dust. Without adequate dining facilities during the construction of the new Worner Center, the Colorado College student unfortunate enough to live on campus was subjected to a food service system which was inconvenient and inadequate. Yet just when you thought it was safe to switch to the Taco John's meal plan, SAGA rises out of the ashes and returns to CC life with a vengeance.

With the new student center and dining area comes a totally unique and exciting on-campus food service which will lay the old one to shame. Gone are the days of "Dangerous" Don Lippstien. Cupfulls of carbonated water disguised under the suspect title of Dr. Wells, and sticky sundae bar hands. The new main service area, which will be called "The Grand marketplace," will include a grill which will cook eggs to order for breakfast, stirfry, crepes, etc.) a delicatessen, an extensive salad bar, an entree section (with three choices every night) and a dessert area which will feature a soft-serve ice cream machine. Aside from offering a much wider variety of foods, the "new" Saga will boast a variety of other changes, including a much more efficient dining system which will allow the student to eat in peace away from the loud distractions of the serving area.

The new Rastall dining area will be totally separated from the service room and the kitchen. Students will be served in the serving area and will eat in the dining area, just as the god of college food services intended. Thus the sounds of breaking glasses and squabbles over the last Monte Cristo, not to mention the evil sight of over-indulgent salad bar patrons, shall no longer torment the student while eating. This set-up, designated the "scramble system," which its organic statist structure and separation of the serving are from the dining area is just one of the many plusses under the new system.In addition, the dining area will be equipped with 150 more seats than in the past. The former outside patio of Rastall will be transformed into an enclosed eating area complete with plants and a garden and will be equipped with skylights in the ceiling. This new and improved Rastall will be able to accomodate approximately 70% of the on-campus student population. Contrary to current speculation, the Bemis/ Taylor dining area will remain open for those traditionalists who shun the high-tech ambiance of the new Rastall.

"...the most exciting change is the addition of Benjamin's, a student spot for 'socializing and entertainment' where the student will be able to choose from four separate snack stands, each boasting a different speciality."

Perhaps the most exciting change is the addition of Benjamin's, a student spot for "socializing and entertainment" where the student will be able to choose from four separate snack stands, each boasting a different specialty. There will be The Hollywood Grill, which shall serve up the infamous Bengal Burger and other culinary delights; GreenStuffs, a salad bar; Wild Pizza, a wild pizza place; and Potpourri, which, aside from being a little bit of everything, will serve exotic foods and ethnic liberal arts specialties such as eggrolls and lasagna. Benjamin's will also be equipped with a total of 250 seats, a stage and a dancefloor. Quite a departure from the entertainment in the old Benny's (two checkers tables), huh? Despite the new 21 liquor law, it is speculated that Benjamin's will serve 3.2 beer and wine on a grandfather clause basis, so all you underclassmen can expell an alcoholic sigh of relief.

Another major change accompanying the transformed facility is the new meal plan system. The traditional 10, 15 and 20-meal plans will still be the mainstays fo the CC chow process. However, a new and exciting alternative called the "Flex" plan shall also be offered. With the Flex plan, a student gets 11 meals per week in addition to a $140 allowance for the semester which the student may use to purchase items on an a la carte basis from both the dining halls and the various on-campus eateries in the Benjamin's complex. While one would expect to pay more for this luxury, the Flex plan will be exactly the same price as the 20-meal plan ($1465 for the year). Saga is considering the implementation of a magnetic card system ("declining balance" buying) in which the meal/food price will automatically be subtracted from the card's balance. For all you pseudo-rebels without a cause, the issue will be open for student and administration discussion next year.

This complete overhaul of the food service system has been three years in the making, and following the completion of construction it will become as much a part of CC as bad athletic teams and late papers. Saga Food Service Director Larry Stahlberg promises that despite the increased efficiency of the new system, no student workers shall be laid off, and at least as many students will be employed in the future as have been in the past. Stahlberg feels that the new set-up, by presenting things in a more attractive manner, will create a nicer atmosphere, and thus a better perception of the service. Freshman-year remembrances of steam-heated trays piled high with green myster meat lead me to believe this statement holds a certain degree of validity. All in all, it seems that CC students have a lot to look forward to.

Next week: Inside Worner Center (perhaps never to return.)

DAVID EVANS

YAKITORI

Serving Lunch and Dinner
(Monday - Saturday)

•

Sushi Bar
Cocktails

•

10% Discount Off Any Entree
(with your CC ID)
Take-Out and Delivery

16 E. Bijou • Downtown • 578-0915

the Stagecoach Inn
702 Manitou Avenue
On Fountain Creek in Manitou Springs

Don't Forget the Stagecoach Inn for all your Special Occasions

Lunch
11:30 - 2:00

Dinner
5:00 - 9:00

Sunday Champagne Brunch
10:30 - 2:00

Reservations 685-9335
Banquet & Catering Facilities For All Occasions

Seniors...

We need pictures for the Senior section in the 1986-87 Nugget. Leave labelled candids at the student center in the Nugget box... C'mon, show us what makes you guys seniors!!

deadline May 18, 1987

Dean's Cup: "Fun is the Foolishness of it" Cont.

Continued from p. 1

standing feud between Brooks' "Dean's Machine" and the English Department's "Lord Byron's Foot Club," has promoted a classic rivalry between administration and faculty. A past Lord Byron's participant suspects that the Dean's Machine brings in help in the form of trained athletes.

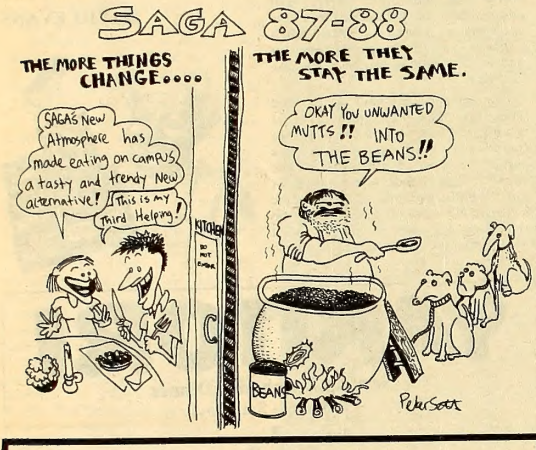
Dean Brooks ignores such low handed accusations and maintains that "we've got the parts of the machine assembled, but at this time we're uncertain of its composition."

Brooks admits that the faculty/administration rivalry may, however, become lost amidst the pack. The students' reliance on sheer youth to hammer out seemingly effortless performances can be depressing. He reflects, "my most distinct memory of past races stems from the cup race three years ago when, struggling on the 5th mile a giant centipede equipped with springs and antenae bounded past with great ease."

Contestants may register for the race as individuals, members of teams or costumed merry makers.

In the individual category, Scott Kang is undoubtably the favorite. The lithe "Conquerer" should breeze through the 10 K and to the football field's Olympic finish with considerable ease. However, McGregor denizen Ben Harrison and recent Boston Marathon participant Gary Geist will duel for the sacred second place silver.

Of course the basic challenge for most people is to drag their weary bones across that distant mirage, the finish line some 6.2 miles away. The 10 K run will start at the north end of Monument Valley Park (near the baseball diamond) where two loops will occur before heading back to CC where the race will conclude at the CC track.



SAGA 87-88
THE MORE THINGS CHANGE....
THE MORE THEY STAY THE SAME.
SAGA's New Atmosphere has made eating on campus a tasty and trendy New alternative!
This is my third Helping!
KITCHEN
OKAY You UNWANTED MUTTS!! INTO THE BEANS!!
BEANS
Peter Scott

TAYLOR TRAVEL
Understands your travel needs.
• Youth Hostel Cards
• Student I.D. Applications
• Eurail/Britrail Passes
Sprechen Sie Deutsch?
Habla Español?
Parlez vous Francais?
Quack?
Quack!
quack quack quack quack quack quack quack quack..
quack quack quack quack quack..
"Your Campus Travel Agency"
818 N. Tejon 636-3871

The Mean Dean Machine thrives on the pressure. Photo Courtesy of Nancy Kent

Photo Courtesy of Nancy Kent

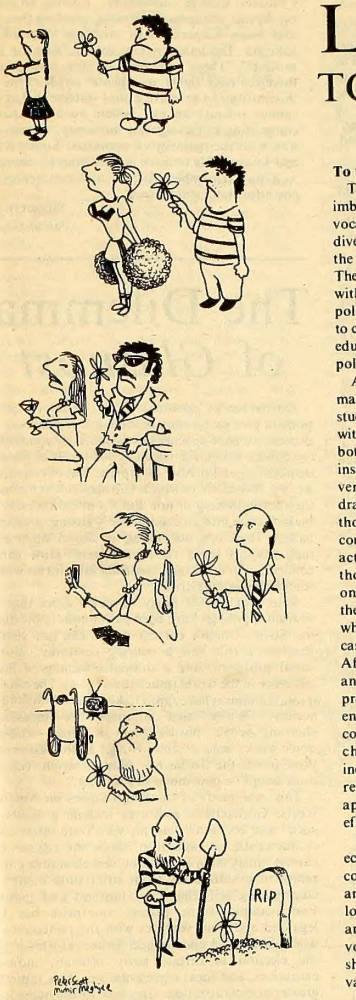
Prof. Jim Coleman impresses Dean "Mercury" Brooks with his enthusiasm before 1981 contest.

Dean Brooks welcomes students, friends and alumni to the event. Registration is available at the Student Center or the CC Athletic Department in El Pomar where forms are to be turned in. Please return registration forms by Friday, May 15th by 5:00 p.m. Awards and refreshments will be served after the race's conclusion.

A special thanks goes out to the Leisure Program, Athletic Department, Deans of the College and the many volunteers who made this race possible.

Alec Rekow
Allison O'Neal
Scott Allen

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR



Responses to Apartheid

To the Editor:

The campus debate on divestment has been badly imbalanced. The anti-divestment side has been less vocal, but occasionally heard, while the pro-divestment side has been quite loud indeed. However, the imbalance has nothing to do with those positions. The imbalance is due to an overwhelming concern with the establishment by The Colorado College of a political policy position. Very few have even stopped to consider whether it is an appropriate action for any educational institution to attempt to participate in politics by such actions as divestment.

As an academic community, The Colorado College may express its abhorrence for apartheid by means of study, analysis, and declaration. Confusing politics with academia will lead only to a pitiful corruption of both. The proper response of an educational institution to the rest of the world is academic, i.e., verbal and written inquiries into a variety of subjects, drawing conclusions about them in ways relevant to those subjects. In other words, we should be considering the meaning and effects of political activities (among other types) rather than engaging in those activities. And if we feel compelled to comment on a topic, we should do just that—communicate to the various communities that surround us, many of which are political, that The Colorado College, in this case for instance, condemns the government of South Africa for its policy of apartheid. Such action will have an indirect consequence on our audience(s), and will preserve the integrity of the Colorado College by endowing its activities with the intelligibility which comes by acting appropriately. Besides the silly character of divestment conveyed by its ineffectiveness, such an act is absurd because of its recognizable inappropriateness. In fact, the appropriateness serves as a guide to its potential effectiveness.

The College should handle its investments as economic and not forget that any economic connections the school may have will be somehow or another connected to something that we may all loathe. The practical world is always a messy place, and we attempt at a liberal arts college, as opposed to a vocational school, to detach ourselves from it for a short time at least, because we recognize the inherent value of knowledge.

However, as citizens, identified distinctly from The Colorado College, we may each act politically by such means as voting, writing letters to our representatives in government, petitioning people in the economic and political spheres, etc. Here, we will be acting appropriately and with the most direct impact. That impact may be acted upon by appropriate bodies, like the U.S. or other governments by a variety of actions from diplomacy, to economic support for South African blacks, to demanding that American corporations withdraw from South Africa, to indirect or direct military action. In this fashion, effective, appropriate actions can be taken by every party—individuals as citizens. The Colorado College and the members of its academic community, and government.

We ought to remember the obscurity of The Colorado College's so-called link to apartheid. The College holds a portion of its total investments in companies that do business in South Africa. Presumably they do business elsewhere, and they are not, I suspect, "South African companies" as they are often called. Divesting from these companies is only castrating ourselves financially in order to send a messenger that will have desperately insignificant or no effects and which will therefore be merely symbolic. If we are going to make a symbolic gesture we should make one that is appropriate to our kind of institution., the meaning of which will not be lost in the confusion and absurdity of an inappropriate action.

Sincerely,
Corey Abel

The Temptation of Immunity

To the Editor:

In last week's issue of The Catalyst Victor Greto spoke of the "personal immunity" which "we grant ourselves...from others' pain." The "we" in Victor's article can logically be extended not only to we, the students of The Colorado College, but also we, society, we, the political body of America, all of whom are very much seduced by this notion of "immunity"; everybody is trying to get it. Of course, it comes in different varieties: "immunity" from taxes, (tax-exemption), "immunity" from disease (especially AIDs), certainly, "immunity" from responsibility is the most popular.

This desire to become "immune" seems to have hit hardest in the political arena...Certainly everybody connected with the Iran-contra scandal is seeking some kind of "immunity" (whether it be "limited" or "passive" immunity - again, the options seem limitless, varying in degree of probable culpability and involvement in "the" crime. Tuesday's Denver Post reported that the President, for one, has not been too successful in securing his immunity: "President Reagan personally approved a plan to ransom the American hostages in Lebanon for $1 million apiece..." (This is according to former National Security Advisor Robert McFarlane)... It appears that Ronnie's desperate appeal for "immunity" won't bail him out of this one.

And then there's Gary Hart's quest for "immunity" which has only led to devastating consequences - a most turbulent and frenzied week of hairsplitting debate over his sex life, which has ended by indelibly scarring his political career. "Immunity" has not graced Gary's path... Again, nobody is really sure who is to blame for the "scandal" (which I prefer to call a "tragedy"): is it The Miami Herald who overstepped their bounds and also provided inaccurate information for a good "sensation" or is it Gary Hart's fault for "provoking" the press in the first place? Either way, both parties are implicated and both are denied the sought-after title of "immunity."

I only wonder what the public's reaction would be if a presidential nominee was gay, or heaven forbid, a woman... The public, press, etc. are so obsessed with meeting some kind of standard which simply does not exist. Will all the "upstanding, moral politicians" please stand up? They seem to be a bit scarce these days, or rather, the two are contradictory in nature. Now, of course, the media will turn to the more "pressing" question: who will succeed Hart's place in the race? Gary Hart no longer makes the front page...a week ago he ws the fore-runner of the Democratic party, and perhaps of the entire presidential race (we'll never know)...and now he's a mere foot-note, a mere "space-filler" in all the papers, even The New York Times!

On a related subject, Dean Glenn Brooks addressed a small audience in the lounge of the Romance Language department* on April 22, speaking about a condition which is pervasive in our society; he referred to this ailment as "cultural amnesia." He described this tendency in our society today, whereby one prefers to remain in the "void," a cultural and political void. He cited mainly cases of literary and historical amnesia, where one seems to have no consciousness of one's past: recent, historical or otherwise.

The hazardous effect of this "amnesia" is that we (again the collective, all-inclusive "we") tend to think too short-term, too narrow-mindedly, focusing on the immediate and the individual, negating the "whole" picture. We seek immediate gratification and success in what we do; we too easily retreat into that "padded and numb" environment which Victor described. We are also too passive, too content to "sit on the sidelines" and let things happen around us which may have a more profound effect upon us in the future.

We forget that the "self" can not be dissociated from the "whole," the two are integrally related, the health of one is contingent upon the health of the other. What we need to do is heed Victor's advice and "take more personally" those things which affect our whole being: our political, social, intellectual, and cosmic being. We need to resist the temptation of becoming "exempt" and "not responsible," of always granting ourselves "immunity," while actually falling prey to a self-destructive disease called "amnesia."

*Yes, this is a plug for the "Interdisciplinary Seminars" which are designed to encourage the exchange of ideas and perspectives among the various different disciplines at CC, (sponsored by the Romance Language Department).

Sincerely,
Mary Butcher

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETER LOACH, News Editor
DAVID EVANS, Features Editor
MUNIR MEGHJEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETER SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Tutor Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 (extension 5). The Catalyst is printed on recycled paper every Friday during the school year.

Tutor Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, national origin, or physical handicap in its education programs, activities, or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local law.

Editorials appearing on the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 400 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Rastall Center, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

Towards a Multilingual, Multicultural Society

To the Editor:

What role does politics play in art? Who is the Chicano/a? What part does he/she play in American society?

These were some of the questions brought up for consideration during the Chicano Culture Week, a presentation of Chicano art, theatre, cinema, music and history offered to the Colorado Springs community last week by MEChA (Movimiento Estudiantil Chicano de Aztlan).

The focus of the week was "Art As Politics In The Chicano Struggle." The use of art to spread a political message or as a forum to denounce oppression was examined through three films (The Ballad of Gregorio Cortez, Zoot Suit and Lemon Grove Incident), the poster art of Malaquias Montoya, an excellent theatre troupe down from Denver, Su Teatro, and a panel discussion Thursday night with speakers from CU Boulder, Stanford, the University of California at Santa Barbara and our own Damian Fernandez as moderator. All of the events that I attended came off very smoothly and professionally, the panel discussion especially was very interesting and provided a lot of food for thought, and the organizers deserve a hand for their efforts.

One thing which struck me as I was listening to the panel discussion Thursday night was the extent to which different events were presented in both Spanish and English, from the film Zoot Suit to the play presented by Su Teatro to the panel discussion itself. The Spanish was not translated and I think this was important, whether intended or not, in that it could provide the monolingual among us with a glimpse of what it would be like to come to the U.S. as a refugee from Central America or a migrant worker from Mexico. A woman at the panel discussion noted that she hadn't understood much of what was said and expressed her anxiety that "Anglos" (her word) and Chicanos would form two separate groups without any communication between them due to the possible lack of a common language and culture. Members of the panel and the audience attempted to sooth her anxiety by saying that Chicanos are not interested in cutting themselves off from the rest of society but do want to preserve their own culture and heritage as an important part of their identity.

In light of the recent efforts to make English the official language of Colorado and the bill passed in California making English the official language of that state (not to mention the Simpson-Rodino bill), it is important we keep in mind the real motives behind such actions, namely fear, ignorance and misunderstanding. A multilingual and multicultural society is a much more alive and vital society. Just look at the influence Mexicans and other hispanic groups have had on life in the American Southwest in terms of placenames and cuisine; the cowboy, a central figure in our collective image of the American West was taken from the Mexican vaquero; hispanic groups played an important part in the civil rights of the 1960's; and let us not forget that much of the hard work which built our railroads, dug the mines or harvests the food we eat was and is done by Mexican labor. Another example of an important contribution by a "minority" is the impact black musical forms (such as Blues and Jazz) have had on mainstream American music in the form of Rock and other pop music. As Americans we are part of one of the most ethnically and radically diverse countries in the world and that is part of what makes this country great, although it can result in tensions. Viva los Estados Unidos multilingue y multicultural!

Marc LaRhette with Devon Pena

In Respect for the Shanties

To the Editor:

Daniel Engster, a CC student attending the ACM Urban Studies Program in Chicago, wrote a very disturbing letter to last week's Catalyst titled "The Shanties Reconsidered." He starts off making his "Statement" and "Presupposition," in which he presents very nicely the facts with which we are all familiar about CC's investments and how "bad" apartheid is. But then he goes on to give us his biased, misinformed and misrepresented interpretations.

First of all, I find it very inaccurate if not offending to refer to CCCAA (The Colorado College Community Against Apartheid) as simply "the Divestment Group," because then one gets the impression that the aim is just divestment and not ending apartheid.

Then the letter states that this group "assumes the best way to end apartheid is through the retention of money from any organization that even remotely supports the South African government." This is totally incorrect. Advocates of divestment have said a million times that divestment is our only last peaceful resource. We have to give it a chance, but it is nonetheless not a guarantee to "ending" apartheid. But I'll tell you what the guarantee is: the oppressed majority of South Africans will appreciate divestment. They will because these companies will have stopped supporting the same evil system that oppresses and exploits them. They will appreciate it because America will have used its great "Constitutional" Principles of Democracy by doing what "We the People" of South Africa want. Now, you might feel the same way as one fellow student here just last week (in response to a South African student who was saying that her people want divestment) who stated publicly that "Black South Africans don't know better than us what is the best way to end apartheid." I was very shocked for this is the kind of statement, whether intentional or not, that I call racist without any apologies. Black South Africans might not know all the effects of divestment, they are not all economists (and neither are we). But there is one thing a lot more important they know better than you and me: They, have suffered inhumanity for centuries and are willing to take the effects of divestment, if any at all. They, have been patient for more than 300 years. How much longer should they wait? It is they who are affected by any kind of decision, and not us. These companies have been in South Africa for decades and if they have accomplished anything, it is the cheap labor and profits they get from the non-white population thanks to the evil system of apartheid (to whom they pay huge taxes). It took these companies at least three decades to be able to employ less than 1% out of a work force of 22 million Blacks (as of this year), and even from these only a tiny number in the managerial positions.

The letter establishes a logic, whose result is to suggest the "Solution" that "every student who feels an urgent need to end apartheid...should drop out of CC...," which seems very absurd to me. The letter's prediction is accurate that the response to such an argument is: "But we can do more good by staying at CC and working for change," a change for the better I would hope. Because CC is a "more" moral and more "democratic" institution than the South African regime, it is quite logical to want to stay to change it for the better. Stating that "this argument is strikingly similar to the one businesses use to justify their continued activity in South Africa," is comparing two institutions that obviously have opposite values and are on two opposite extremes of an issue. For CC would not want to state publicly that it believes that one race has a "God-given right and privilege to rule, exploit and oppress another race." The South African regime is not at all ready for any change whatsoever for the betterment of Blacks, and last week's all White elections prove this, since even the "Liberals" lost at least 5 of their few seats in the all White parliament.

Quite sincerely, I was very disappointed, disturbed and insulted by the letter's statement that what we do here: "protests," Shantytowns, ...all trying to bring the awareness of the South African situation right here on campus to confront it was labeled "an inane and immature behavior and an embarrassment to the Colorado College community." Finding an easy way out by just sitting back, relaxing, enjoying the comfort and being a spectator to this ugly situation is no solution. The letter ends by asking "who are they to protest?" "They," are part of this institution and therefore have rights, as much as anyone else, to ask this institution to make a oral statement that is: We cannot tolerate an evil system such as apartheid committing crimes against humanity, we are all the way with the majority of oppressed South Africans and we are ready to listen to their cries for humanity. And just remember: Silence and non-action are a powerful statement as well.

Sincerely yours,
Pascal Gasirabo

The Dilemma of Glasnost

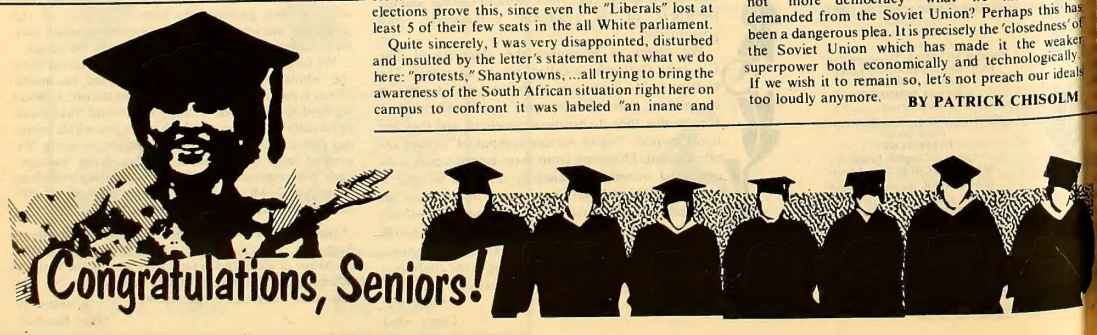
Gorbachev's 'openness' and 'democratization' policies give us commie-bashers a real dilemma. For decades we have appeared as moralists by condemning the Soviet Union for rejecting our ideals of freedom, democracy, and private enterprise. Out of consistency we are forced to welcome Gorbachev's reforms, be they revolutionary or not. But his intention here is to make Russia into an economically strong, prestigious nation. Therefore, our opting for Soviet 'openness' is tacit support for a stronger Russia! How can we condemn—or condone—these liberal reforms without sounding like hypocrites?

Most Communist Party members agree that past restrictive policies have been paramount in producing the Soviet Union's current woes. The last years of Brezhnev's rule saw a souring economy, growing social problems, and a dramatic waning of Soviet influence in the world (much to our glee). The old ways of totalitarianism have failed to keep pace with modern society. "We've tried administrative measures—shooting people, putting them in prison—and they don't work," says a senior Soviet editor. To counter these trends the Gorbachev administration realizes it must adopt "a new mode of thinking."

This new mode of thinking touches on American ideals. Gorbachev's measures include a variety of social and economic reforms which are interestingly characteristic of capitalism. Since the regime itself cannot satisfy mass aspirations, new economic policies represent a shift away from strict state control by emphasizing self-reliance of business and industry. For example, some private enterprise has been legalized and joint ventures with the noncommunist world have been encouraged. Other reforms include the election of certain party officials, industrial executives, and local representatives. This represents greater democratization. Glasnost, or openness in the media, is designed to subject incompetent and corrupt bureaucrats to unpleasant publicity. Hundreds of political prisoners have been released, and some political dissent has been tolerated. Further, Gorbachev's drive for arms control represents his desire for a relaxed international atmosphere which would enhance Soviet diplomacy as well as facilitate reform at home.

Gorbachev wants to, as he said in a speech, "bring out the potential of socialism through activating all the people's strength. To do so we need the full and free functioning of all public and state agencies...In brief, we want a broad democratization of all society...We want more socialism and hence more democracy." Is not "more democracy" what we have always demanded from the Soviet Union? Perhaps this has been a dangerous plea. It is precisely the 'closedness' of the Soviet Union which has made it the weaker superpower both economically and technologically. If we wish it to remain so, let's not preach our ideals too loudly anymore.

BY PATRICK CHISOLM



Victor Greto

By the Thread of a Panting Kite

Now that Gary Hart seems to have nosedived out of race for the Presidency, a great many other pos- ilities and uncertainties have unfolded. The publicans look stronger now; they still have their ry Hart in the guise of Jack Kemp, a protege of agan, as monomaniacal as his aging mentor—but ong, goodlooking, and without a pimple. Hart's dicament has revealed (once again) what the erican people in general seem to care about the st—image and style, or form. Like their slew of ss-produced products, their candidates must also ss the consumer self-righteous standardized buying st. Dark days seem to be descending. Yet there flickers the proverbial light barely inguishable in the distance—yet this is the wrong taphor. It is more a panting kite fluttering in the air. d what does the metaphor represent? My agination (and by relation, your's, you who are ding this). There exists hope as long as we have the aginations (implying courage) to transcend and urp the confines and limitations imposed upon us by twing constricting dogma. All the Secords, rths, Poindexters, administrators, frightened and dicalized middleclass men and women, and the arid ellectual elite, cannot suppress us. Those who twist rds to conserve what they have, who watch their evisions in placidlike sterility, who theorize of hts barren of their human counterparts, the social ditions which give these naked rights any kind of aning, will not overcome our striving for social tice. Those who write and sing paens to their ellectual forebears, who elevate the ancients to e absurd "higher" position, to that of supermen, o believe that all else in the present and the future is e repetition and variation on their pristine ideas, ll wither away due to their own inertia. Those who eve in democracy and self-determination, and then o support murdering bands of men who kill and im those who have chosen their own path, must be ercome themselves. Those who think the Poor and out-of-work sit in front of their televisions mplacently awaiting their welfare checks, who mfort themselves with their own rationalizations of way things are, their lies, their desperate and gant belief in the primacy of their truth, of their ception, and the pathetic disregard they have for ers who indirectly and directly support their own itions in society, must also be overcome.

We must never let go of that panting kite, our imaginations, even though it looks so alone and desperate, diving back and forth in winds that come in a million directions at once. We must never open our fist and release it, free it, and watch it nosedive to the earth. If we do, we will become what the tyrannous elite and intellectually arid want us to become, mere random elements in their vicious and well-ordered scheme of things. If our sweating fist opens, we will truly become the helpless and the hopeless, with broken spirits and broken minds, who will enjoy the taste of the bread and water which shall be so generously given us, the occasional pat on the shoulder for complacently supporting the upperclasses. We will be given jobs: we will fill their potholes, pour the concrete of the foundations of their hundred thousand dollar houses. And when they look at us, coming home in their freshly pressed suits, briefcases in hand, they will see the determined yet fatalistic expressions on our faces—and they will stop and "think" a moment and "know" the inevitability of all things. They will know that it is our place to pour the foundations for their houses, fill the potholes of their streets so their Buicks will not rattle as much.

And they'll be right.

We are lost in a morass of a million levels of existence, barely able to distinguish loyalties, priorities; our imaginations, our ability to transcend this morass, severely limited by the rote drills of our educations, by the assumptions which motivate our survival in this best of all possible worlds, must be strengthened. We must chip away at the morass, layer by layer, inch by inch, idea by idea. We must fight like mad whenever another's rights are transgressed, on any level, for I know without a doubt that you and I will be next.

We will never run out of minorities to defend, as the conservatives so pompously scoff, we will never run out of causes—we will try to transcend all the subtle disguises of their tyranny, their block on ideas, their pompous assumptions. And we will know, hand in hand with this battle, that it is not they who are the enemy, but the subtle and cozy ignorance of our own limited visions—it is ignorance we are after, it is ignorance we must transcend. They will call us hotheads and angry young men and women, and gently tell us of the virtues of moderation—without seeing or wishing to recognize that we are already on the verge of the extreme of spiritual and economic poverty. They will tell of the greatness of the Past, of the giants who forged our nation, and we will agree, but we will not stop there. We will go forward; they will not. Too afraid of what they will lose in the process, despite all their claims to democracy and self-determination and "rights," they will cringe when we wish to add to and reshape the present and future from the past. We will not assume as they do the "inevitability" of the present from the past; we will transcend their lock on the truth.

But we do not live in a movie where a benevolent God watches over us and makes sure all comes out in the end. We live in a world of conflicting values and truths, where none has any preeminence over another. And we live in a human world that demands there be one truth above all others. This is perhaps why I think we may lose. And this is why I think we must hold all that tighter to the panting kite.

There will always be us, in small pockets of society, holding desperately to our tenuous independent imaginations, try as others might to pry our fingers loose. Never let it go, never release your hand, never give up to their arid intellectualism; let it be our cry, as dogged as their insistence on their truth, that we will never give up our fight for social justice, for the freedom of all people.

LATEST ON THE IRAN-CONTRA SCANDAL!!
WHAT DID THE PRESIDENT KNOW AND WHEN DID HE KNOW IT?!
IMMUNITY FOR NORTH AND POINDEXTER? IS REAGAN ON THE WAY OUT??
FOREIGN POLICY PRIVATIZED! CONSTITUTION SUBVERTED!
IS REAGAN OUT OF TOUCH?? CAN HE SAVE HIS PRESIDENCY???
HERE, PAL—Y'GOT THE LAKERS' SCORE?
DRIVES 'EM CRAZY...

David Makarechian

1988: Year of the Protest Vote

ndorsing a presidential candidate. Truly a task to e a bad taste in your mouth. Like stale gin and ldly cigarettes.

nce again, the offerings of the two major parties fall desperately short, and once again, most voters be forced to compromise their principles and vote someone they really didn't care for anyway.

he candidates currently jockeying for position in or races suggest that 1988 will be another year of diocrity, and another year of political promises. In other words, 1988 will be the perfect for the protest vote.

en a cursory look at the structure of the two or political parties shows that meaningful internal nge is impossible under the current system, and it's time for a change from without. We are again roaching a juncture in American politics where nation must soon give way to the demands of a ple looking for something new—the demands of a ple looking to restore the fundamentals of the rful tradition that has guided American elopment.

oth the Republicans and the Democrats are ducing inadequate candidates because internal y politics—instead of ideology—are determining party's profile. In other words, the two big parties 't getting the job done, and voters steeped in and ted by the American creed cannot accept it. In the ition of Whigs, Progressives, and Bull Moosers it's to look beyond the scope of the established tical structure, and toward a third party to orm the third party function—to act as an external e, reshaping the political scene to once again fit the underpinnings of the liberal-western tradition. To see in exactly which direction to look requires a brief examination of current party weaknesses.

First, the Republicans. I honestly don't know where to start—the GOP has outwardly embraced a number of notions that are antithetical to individual reason and choice. Within the party, the birth of the New (aka Reagan) Right has sent party regulars pandering to America's pulpits, and have disenfranchised wings of the party that seek to uphold the principle of individual liberty and of a separated church and state. The Republican push for a military build-up is directly at odds with traditional concepts of frugality—frankly, no one knows what Reagan-induced deficits will bring. And as we move through the lame-duck years, more and more the Republicans are sacrificing principles of economic freedom, especially regarding free trade, because of vocal, reactionary Congress.

Political one-upmanship has been the downfall of the Democrats. In an effort to save losses from the Right's victories in the Eighties, Democrat politicians for the most part have legislated with an eye to their home districts, and with an eye to higher office. The result: Americans' economic freedom has fallen by the wayside, as more and more government programs tax our pocketbooks, and drag the economy. Social and individual choices have also been made outside the traditional scope, and have been made for bureaucrats arbitrary definition of "the good of society." Examples include slipshod programs for education c urricula and funding, a haphazard treatment of minor.ty affairs, and industrial retraining programs that are famous for not working.

Bush, Kemp, or Dole? No thanks. Dukakis, Biden (!), or Gephardt? Get serious.

Since both parties have forsaken ideology for party politics, the challenge to the American creed of amending the abysmal condition of current party politics cannot be met by either the Republicans or the Democrats.

The answer lies instead with the advancement of individuals. Since the early 1970s, the Libertarian Party has been gaining more and more support as the spokesman for those forgotten by the major political parties, and to the Libertarians we must turn in 1988.

Aren't the Libertarians those crazy anarchists who want to destroy the government and let mayhem reign in the streets?

Kind of. But the Libertarian philosophy extends far beyond that. Far from advocating anarchy, the Libertarians believe that government should exist for one purpose: to protect private property rights. Any other attempt the government has made at improving society has failed. The nation's poor are in deplorable conditions because the government's attempts to help have distorted their economic choices and has kept them down. The environment has been made a public good of the state, and is thus being destroyed. Foreign policy has turned into myriad violations of international law. Public education has made our children inferior. The federal reserve system and the tax code, and other controls of the economy, have been the reason for our economic ups and downs. By trying to define society's morality, the government has created victimless crimes, especially with drug enforcement. The list goes on and on, but cases upon cases reveal a pattern: if there's a problem, it's likely that government is to blame.

Endorsing the Libertarians in 1988 is not a blanket acceptance of all that they stand for. They are extreme, and they know it. But the Libertarian movement is supposed to be extreme, for the purpose of the party (as most see it) is not practical politics, but education. Advancing Libertarian planks aims at steering our government back on the right course, and educating society to create citizens capable of running the country as rational individuals for years to come. For this task, the Libertarians get my vote.

"Blurred Decision," from Susan Griak's Senior Art Show. Photo by Jane Bierman

Absolutely Live Tunes

"Absolute Music." Excuse Me? Just who are these bands that Livesounds is bringing for your listening pleasure?

Tonight two Denver-based rock bands, The Electric Third Rail and The Fluid will play at eight pm in Cutler Quad. Yes, Cutler Quad not the fraternity quad as was previously advertised.

The more prominent of these two groups is The Fluid which is considered by some critics to be the best underground band in Denver.

But Dudes, that's not all! Saturday will also see its share of entertainment. Kicking off the afternoon in Armstrong quad at twelve pm will be The Medicine Bow Quartet. Contrary to the name they aren't a tribal or ethnic group, but rather a Jazz band that hails from the Boulder area.

Okay, I know the description of the next band that's going to play will probably send some of you into a frenzy, but yes, they do play The Grateful Dead. In fact, that's most of the repetoire of local group Shakedown Street. I saw them a couple of weeks ago, psychedelic tapestries and all, and I can definitely say that they are fun!

The last band is another local one called Jamaican Eclipse. And hey, give yourself a pat on the back if you suspected that they're a reggae band.

Remember the music fest starts at eight pm in Cutler quad tonight and will resume tomorrow in Armstrong quad at noon. Well, what are you waiting for?

KATIE DALSEMER

Tarkovskij: Poetic Movies

Andrei Tarkovskij's first film, "The Childhood of Ivan" (Russia, 1962), will be shown in Armstrong 300 at 7:00, Mon. May 18 and Tues. May 19. Tarkovskij is perhaps the best known Russian director of the second half of the twentieth century. The son of the poet Arseniy Tarkovskij, the director made only five films in nearly twenty years, before leaving Russia in 1979 in response to unending difficulties with the Soviet film authorities. Tarkovskij died in Paris last December after completing his final film, "The Sacrifice," in Sweden. Tarkovskij's last Russian film, "Stalker" (1979), was shown in Armstrong two years ago. Tarkovskij's later films are difficult to describe, since he has a style which is at once as Russian in spirit as Dostoyevski (his greatest influence, with his father), and utterly unique and personal. His closest relation is perhaps the Swedish director Ingmar Bergman. Tarkovskij's films are, depending on one's reaction, either unbearable slow or intensely absorbing and poetic. They require an effort if one is used to an American (Miami-Vice/MTV) style of editing, pacing, sound, etc. Tarkovskij's last four films, "Mirror" (1974), "Stalker," "Nostalghia" (Italy, 1983), and "The Sacrifice" all share this same maturity of style which marks him as one of the few film-makers who has actually explored the poetic capacities of film. His earlier films, "Solaris" (1971) and the biographical "Andrei Rublyov" (1966) have only intimations of this unique lyricism, although other qualities make them excellent films. I won't say anything about "The Childhood of Ivan" since I haven't seen it. This is what Ingmar Bergman said about it:

"My discovery of Tarkovskij's first film was like a miracle."

Suddenly, I found myself standing at the door of a room the keys of which had until then, never been given to me. It was a room I had always wanted to enter and where he was moving freely and at ease.

I felt encouraged and stimulated someone was expressing what I had always wanted to say without knowing how.

Tarkovskij is for me the greatest, the one who invented a new language, true to the nature of film, as it captures life in reflection, life as a dream.

NICK NESBIT

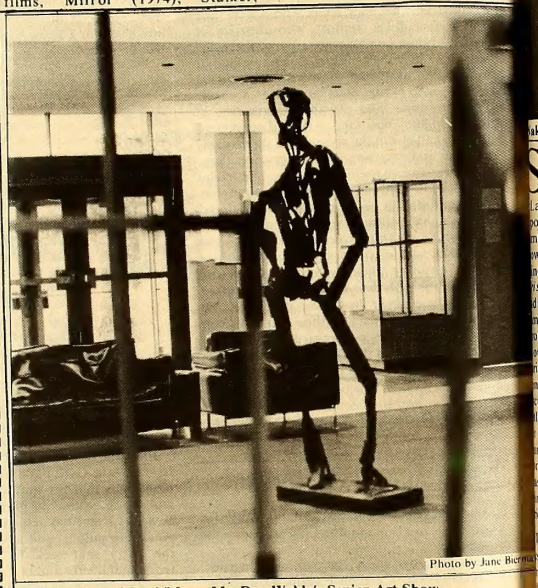


Photo by Jane Bierman

"Clark: Man of Steel," from MacRae Wylde's Senior Art Show.

~ Miller ~ BACCHUS

Present the Music of

THE LAST

Wednesday, May 20
3:30 PM
Cutler Quad
- Refreshments Served -

Funding Provided By:
High Country Sales, Saga & CCCA

Before you leave for the summer...

Take a nostalgic farewell vacation at the Lotus Eater Boutique.

A shopping trip for momentos for yourself and the loved ones at home.

Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm
Sat. 11-5 pm

THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE

Downtown
Across from Poor Richard's

phone:
635-2118

aked Emotion," from Ellen Stein's Senior Art Show. Photo by Jane Bierman

Scat to Aristocats

Last week, Billboard Magazine orted The Aristocats to be the mber 4 movie in America. This statistic ws that if you have not yet seen this ne flick, you are definitely not with it. istocats maintains the Disney dition of pitting animals against evil mans. As usual, the animals are able, ough intelligence, wit and ingenuity, outsmart the villain. The tale opens in ris, 1910, in the home of Madame, an ng, wealthy cat-lover. While Madame usses her will with her lawyer, her ler, Edgar, learns that he will inherit fortune only after the demise of her r kitty companions. What follows is a ry of kidnap and rescue spiced with se sequences reminiscent of such mated classics as the Road Runner es.

The Aristocats carries a fine social ssage. This is that members of the ious socio-economic classes can ed coexist peaceably, and can in fact n from their association. This is seen ough the willingness of the well-bred Duchess, to accept the friendship and p of the alley-cats, and in turn their ingness to come to her aid. Members both the aristocratic and working sses are shown to be virtuous and pathetic.

Unfortunately, the film flounders in its ual stereotyping. Duchess and her ghter, Marie are shown to be quite less, and both melt at the attentions the handsome, erstwhile Tom Malley. This may be a product of the s time period, 1910. If so, though, it is of the few points at which the theme eres to the era.

Disney takes many liberties with both e period and location. For example, Malley's friends, as beat/jazz sicians, have no place in turn of the tury Paris. In addition, the reason for ing the movie in France is somewhat biguous. None of the characters are ally French. The dogs who live in the ntryside, Lafayette and Napoleon, e American hillbilly accents and personae. Tom O'Malley portrays a typical swinging American bachelor. Only the aristocats themselves, Duchess and her children, Marie, Berlioz, and Toulouse, are at all French. The monnikers given to these animals reflect the good breeding of acculturated French aristocrats. Toulouse is an aspiring painter, Berliotz a pianist. The cleverness of naming the characters in accordance with their interests is also apparent in naming the starring mouse Roquefort.

The writers seem at times to be so consumed by their wit that they forget that their audience is comprised mainly of children. However, this can be a plus for older viewers, as The Aristocats contains the subtle humor that makes Bugs Bunny cartoons such a pleasure to adult audiences.

The characterization of Tom O'Malley, an alley cat who is domesticated by his romantic association with Duchess and his paternal feelings toward her children, is excellent. So is that of Scatcat, the leader of and singer in the jazz band which occupies O'Malley's city house in the tenements of Paris.

The anthropomorphism of the characters in The Aristocats is skillful. We see dogs who are well-meaning yet dim-witted, geese who are haughty and prim, and a mouse who is terrified yet determined to help his friends. The cats are, of course the heros. They are intelligent, creative, and embody the better elements of humanity, rescuing felinekind from the damaging stereotypes created by such other celebrity cats as Sylvester and Garfield.

Originally released in 1970, The Aristo-Cats has the lasting quality that typifies Walt Disney Productions. It is entertaining and a good way to spend a typically cloudy ninth block afternoon. For those who seek more adventure in their animated entertainments, we also recommend 101 Dalmations.

Now playing at: Citadel Mall: 1, 3, 5, 7, 9. Academy Station Six: 12:30, 2:25, 4:40, 7, 9.

VASSER BAILEY AND JULIA WILLIAMSON

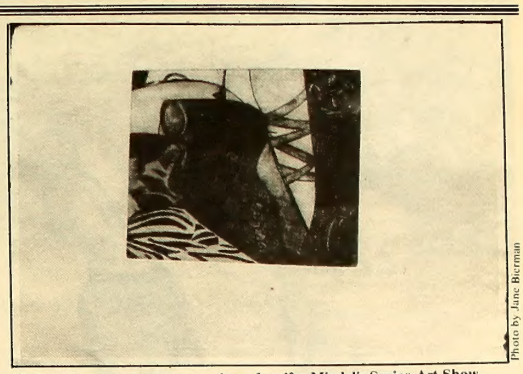

Photo by Jane Bierman

"Collage," on handmade paper, from Jennifer Mindel's Senior Art Show.

What's On Your Turntable?

Shannon Absher Senior Drama
Verdi's "Aida"

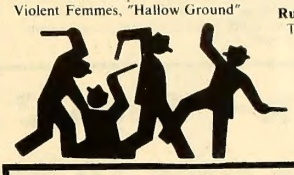
Jeanne Crowley Senior English
The Best of John Prine, "Prime Prine"

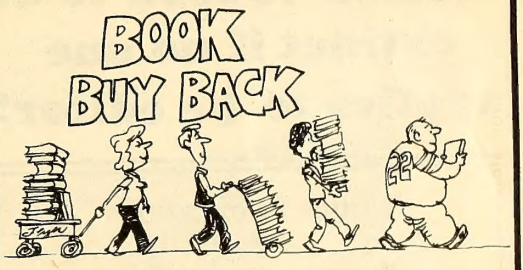
Tara Green Freshperson Undecided
Violent Femmes, "Hallow Ground"

Maxwell Taylor Vice Pres. for Student Life
Camille Saint-Saents, "Samson et Dalila"

Gilbert Johns Professor Psychology
John Adams, "The Chairman Dances"

Ruth Cline Secretary Art
The Cowboy Two Step





Year - End
Used Book
Buy - Back

at the

Colorado College Bookstore

May 21 & 22
8:30 - 4:00 p.m.

Bookstore & Nebraska Book Co.
will be buying used books.

May 25 - 29
8:30 - 4:00 p.m.
Bookstore Buy-Back Only

Freshman Karen Haffke shows a little leg as she baffles two befuddled opponents. Led by juniors Jeannie Alderson and Katie McNitt, and freshman sensation Suzannah Lawson, the extremely talented CC women's lacrosse team should show marked improvement in 1988.

Shortt, Murphree Named Academic All-Americans

A pair of Colorado College sophomores, defender Anna Shortt and forward Jennifer Murphree have been named to the Adidas Scholar-Athlete Soccer All-America first team. The team is selected by the Intercollegiate Soccer Association of America (ISAA).

Members of the team are selected on the basis of academic achievement as well as performance on the soccer field.

"This is the second year of the Scholar-Athlete Soccer All-America program," said Terry Weekes, National Soccer Promotions Manager of Adidas USA. "We are proud to be working with the ISAA in honoring outstanding college soccer players who also excel in the classroom."

Shortt, an English major with a cumulative grade-point average of 3. scored one goal and added two assists i season as the Division I Tigers finish No. 2 in the nation to NCAA champion North Carolina. Murphree, an educatio major with a 3.8 GPA, had six goals and one assist.

"They just represent the kind of student athletes we have here," Dang Pibulvech, head coach of the Colorado College women's soccer team, said of Shortt and Murphree. "I'd say that almost 90 percent of our players are scholar-athlete caliber. These awards speak for the others as well. We have kids who come in with high academic standards and are capable of maintaining it."

SPORTS INFORMATION

Two Tiger Baseballers Earn CIBA All-Star Honors

Senior right-handed pitcher Dana Rademacher and junior catcher Mike Yost were named recently to the Colorado Intercollegiate Baseball Association (CIBA) 1987 All-Star Team. Rademacher, the second leading vote-getter among league pitchers, will be one of five hurlers on the squad, while Yost joins the team as an honorable mention selection.

Rademacher, a main fixture on CC's team for each of his four seasons, again led the team in every major pitching category. In 78 innings of work, Rademacher gave up 102 hits and 48 earned runs for a 4.31 ERA and struck out 61 batters and surrendered 44 walks for a final record of 3-8. And with a 3.64 grade point average in chemistry, Dana was also nominated for Academic All-America honors.

For the second consecutive season, Yost was CC's leading hitter. He lashed out 24 hits in 66 at bats for a .364 average, and his 9 doubles, 4 home runs, 30 runs batted in, and 3 sacrifices were also team highs. His dramatic ninth-inning grand slam home run against Air Force earned the Tigers a 14-12 victory over the Falcons.

Other solid performances were turned in by Tiger talent. Charles Ficco led the team with 2 triples, and Kevin Larabee and Shawn Holt paced CC baserunners with 2 stolen bases each. Larabee also led the team by garnering 23 base on balls for the season.

DEAN CAMPBELL

Browning Just Misses

On Saturday, April 9 at the Arlington Track and Field Meet in Dallas, Texas, CC junior Erik Browning narrowly missed qualifying for Nationals in the 5 kilometer (3.1 mile) race. After running a PR 14:52 over Block Break, Browning blazed to a 14:43.1 that included one and two-mile splits of 4:38 and 9:26. Although the effort topped his previous best by an astounding nine seconds, Erik's run fell just .5 seconds short of the 14:42.6 needed to qualify.

SPORTS INFORMATION

Yearbook— The CC version is soon to be extinct if no one applies to be editor!!

Cutler Publications

is still accepting applications

for

Nugget Editor

(or Co-Editors)

Anyone interested please contact:

Lelia Deykin x297
(Acting Cutler Board President)

Heidi Dowd x282
(Nugget '87 Editor)

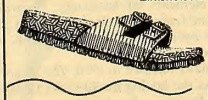
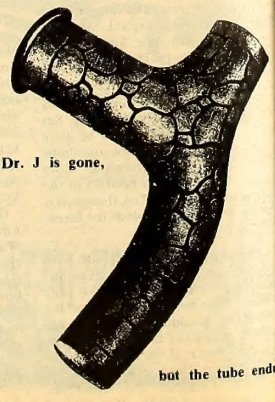
All Gain. No Pain.

Work out with every step you take. Birkenstock slip-on styles are true exercise sandals. Designed to let your toes grip the footbed with every step, they help keep the muscles in your feet and legs firm and well toned. Try the natural workout. Make every step count with Birkenstock.



Birkenstock
© Birkenstock 1987
COLLEGE SHOE SHOP
831 N. Tejon



Dr. J is gone, but the tube endur

...ired of loitering behind the DU net, CC's Robby Schwarz attempts to bounce ...a goal off the back of the goalie's head. Photo by Jerry Wang

Successful Season Finale

Freshman attackman Mike Alkaitis ew York, N.Y.) scored seven goals urday, leading the Tigers to a 14-11 tory over the Denver Stickers club im in their 1987 season finale at wart Field. Colorado College won its al five matches of the campaign and en of its last eight to wind up with a 10- ecord overall.

Another freshman attackman, Eric tersen, finished the 1987 season as 's leading scorer with a team-high 31 als and 16 assists for 47 points. Junior y Pope followed with 25 goals and a team-high 19 assists for 44 points, and senior Rob Schwarz pumped in 26 goals and dished out 11 assists for 37 points. Other Tiger scorers were: Mike Alkaitis (28-2-30), junior Will Trousdale (17-7-24), junior Jim Quirk (16-5-21), sophomore Blake Anderson (13-5-18), sophomore Dave Byron (9-1-10), sophomore Ross Dohrmann (7-2-9), sophomore Brian Brophy (4-5-9), senior Arnie Stifel (5-1-6), freshman Seth Miller (4-0-4), freshman Chris Allison (3-0-3) junior Jon Behrins (1-0-1), junior John Hite (0-1-1), and freshman Chris Burns (0-1-1).

All-American to Play for CC

Colorado College women's soccer ch Dang Pibulvech has received a al commitment from Laura Jones, of the nation's top high school ers last season, to attend CC and play the Tigers next fall.

Jones is a defender from Yorba Linda, f. She earned All-American honors Esperanza High School last season and was named to the All-America th Team. In addition, she has played the United States Soccer Federation's ional Youth Team and the West gion United States Olympic velopmental Team as well as icipating in the 1986 U.S. Olympic tival.

Laura is a strong defensive player who make an immediate impact on the m," said Pibulvech, who has guided Tigers to the NCAA Division I Final Four tournament the last two seasons. "She is a strong marker and ball winner with tremendous ability in the air. Laura loves to be challenged and will fit in well with the personality and attitude here at CC."

Jones will be the only scholarship player being added to the Colorado College roster in 1987. She is the most sought-after recruit in the West Region, according to Pibulvech. She also is CC's fifth player from the National Youth Team and one of 10 high school All-Americans to be part of the CC program.

The Tigers finished the 1986 campaign as the nation's No. 2 team after reaching the NCAA title game against North Carolina. Their final record, including a 2-1 mark in post-season play, was 17-4-1. They beat Massachusetts in the national semifinals before dropping a 2-0 decision to the champion Tar Heels.

Hockey Hotshot

Hockey: Senior Rob Doyle (Lindsay, Ont.) was named the Tigers' Most Valuable Player for the 1986-87 season at the team's annual awards banquet Friday, April 10. Doyle, who last season became the highest scoring defenseman in CC history, finished the '86-'87 campaign with 17 goals and 37 assists for 54 points. His career points total of 202 moved him up to fourth on the school's all-time list. He earned second-team All-America honors this year and was a first-team selection on the Western Collegiate Hockey Association's all-league team.

More Hockey Hotshots

At the Women's Hockey Award Banquet Wednesday night, senior linemates Kathy Mahoney and Sarah Flynn co-received The Most Valuable Player award. The annual Katie Clinton Enthusiasm Award went to rookie Kim Keeley. Julia Harrison, also a freshman, took home the Most Improved Player for the Tigers.

Next year's captains were also announced. Junior Sarah Meskin will lead the team for her third straight year along with freshman Martha Deeds as the other co-captain.

Tennis MVPs

Erol Agnos, head coach of the women's tennis team, announced that seniors Melissa Forbes and Kathleen Delaney have been selected as the squad's Most Valuable Players for the 1987 season. "They both were great leaders who kept the team together," Agnos said of the two. "That's something that we haven't always had here." Forbes finished the campaign with an 8-5 record in both singles and doubles while Delaney, who played doubles exclusively, boasted a 9-4 mark. As a team, the Tigers wound up 7-6.

Photo by Jerry Wang

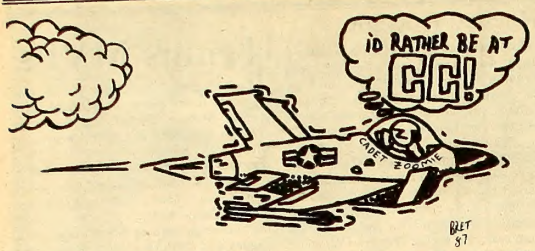
Pursued in vain by incompetent clods Kevin Lowe and Paul Coffey, Kathy Mahoney streaks in to complete her hat trick against helpless goalie Grant Fuhr.

Budget Tapes and Records $1.00 OFF!
ANY REG. PRICED ($7.99 OR HIGHER) RECORD, CASSETTE OR COMPACT DISC ($12.99 OR HIGHER)
M-F 10-8 SAT 10-6 SUN 12-5
327 N. TEJON 471-4419 GOOD THRU
(1 Per Person Only)

Mountain Chalet
CC's Outdoor Connection
266 North Tejon 633-0732
Downtown

3 Button Long John Shirts
Buy 1 for $15.95
Buy 2 for $13.95
Buy 3 for $11.95
(Expires May 31st)

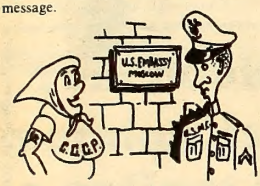
ANNOUNCEMENTS

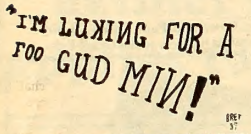


Student Help Needed: Freshmen, sophomores, juniors - if you plan to be here May 31 and June 1 you can join in the seniors' big weekend. Students are needed to help usher and serve at Baccalaureate and/or Commencement. sign up at the Legal Office, Room 204 Armstrong or call 703. You can sign up for one or both days. Thanks.

On Wednesday, May 20, at 3:30 P.M. in the Gates Common Room on the Colorado College Campus the Reverend Titus L. Presler will present a lecture on the past three years in Zimbabwe. Refreshments and discussion will follow.

FOR SALE: Beat-up '78 4-wheel drive Subaru. 4-door, all maintenance records. Dependable good little car. $500 negotiable. Call Cheryl at x786 leave message.





AN ALL CAMPUS BLOCK PARTY. Where: Beta/Jackson Parking Lot. What: to prove there is a lot of CC on the east side of Nevada. What: Two bands, barbeque for 300 (first come first serve), Beer and Fun!!!! When: this Saturday, May 16th from 11:00 am until 6:00 pm. Note: Please be careful crossing Nevada and bring your CC ID.

Who do YOU want running YOUR Writing Center? Come meet the next two candidates for the Director of the Writing Center.

Tuesday, May 19th: Molly Wingate from Bucknell University in Louisburg, Pennsylvania, 3-4:30 p.m. English Club Room.

Wednesday, My 20th: Kathy Brandt from University of Colorado at Colorado Springs, 3-4:30 p.m. English Club Room.

Please come!

Buy Your '87 Nugget

Awesome College Car for sale! 1971 Coup de Ville gold Cadillac. Holds everyone and everything. Must sell. $440.99 (will bargain). Call Marcia at x219.

Dear Claude,

When's the A.C. coming on in AH.

D.S.

Help Needed: Freshmen, sophomores, juniors—if you plan to be here May 31 and June 1, your help is needed to usher at Baccalaureate and/or Commencement. Join in the festivities. Volunteer now by calling the Legal Office, x703, or stop by Armstrong 204. You can sign up for one or both days. Thanks for your help.

Shove Chapel:

Tuesday, May 19

8:00-8:30 Meditation—Shove Chapel Music, silence, mystical and/or other writings (enter by northeast door).

4:00 p.m. Shove Lecture Room

"Apartheid and the Religious Communities in South Africa." Speaker: Tim Fitzgerald

Thursday, May 21

8:00-8:30 a.m. Meditation—Shove Chapel

Friday, May 22

12:05 (noon) Worship Service—Speaker: Kenneth Burton

The Puzzle

ACROSS

1 Abstain from
6 Steeple
11 Sever
13 Went by water
14 Negative prefix
15 One skilled in dissection
17 Chinese distance measure
18 Time gone by
20 Shatter
21 A month: abbr.
22 Back of neck
24 Pose for portrait
25 Female relative
26 Rockfish
28 Rue
30 Metal fastener
32 Clayey earth
33 Stretcher
35 Proceeds
37 Part of skeleton
38 Precious stone
40 Singing bird
42 Piece of cut timber
43 Buffalo
45 Diocese
46 During the period of 47 Kind of race horse
49 Hebrew letter
50 Hold back
52 Put away for safekeeping
54 Roman official
55 Sows

DOWN

1 Chinese or Japanese
2 Coarse
3 Running
4 Mountain on Crete
5 Lairs
6 Band worn around waist
7 Hole
8 Negative prefix
9 Soften in temper
10 Decree
12 Male sheep: pl.
13 Method
16 Den
19 Unlocking
21 Swordsmen
23 Growing out of 25 Dart
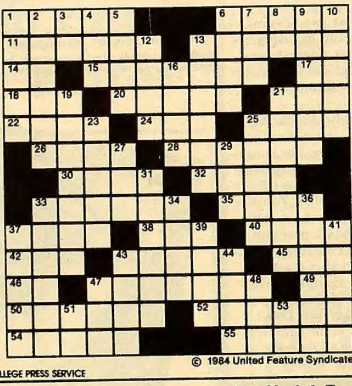
27 River island
29 Prevent from free speech
31 Vast throng
33 Pillaged
34 Remainder
36 Leaked through
37 Cutting edge
39 Witty remarks
41 Wants
43 Kind of cheese
44 Seines
47 Hindu cymbals
48 Fish eggs
51 Agave plant
53 Concerning



© 1984 United Feature Syndicate
COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

ON-CAMPUS JOBS. Now is the time for students with student employment awards to locate jobs for the 1987-88 academic year. Students with awards who will be working for the first time or who wish to change jobs for next year can make an appointment with Nancy Kent, Financial Aid Office (x651). She will refer them to any openings for which they want to apply. (A list of job openings is available in the office.) Students not receiving financial aid are invited to obtain and submit applications also. Applicants will be considered for openings by date of application.

Research Assistant—Summer, 1987, library and editing work, research assistance, June-August, 1987. Work with Professor Tom Cronin, Department of Political Science. Requisites: high academic achievement, writing and editing experience. Interested persons should submit letter of interest, resume and list of three references to Box 6, Armstrong Post Office, CC. Flexible hours, good pay.

Help Needed: Two people to help serve and clean-up at a private graduation party on May 31st. This is a paid position in addition to free, home-cooked food. If you are interested please contact Jay Ferguson ASAP at 630-0634 or, if you can't reach me, leave a note in O.C. Box 321 and I will get in touch with you.

Honors Concert by CC Students. Thursday, May 21st, 8:15 p.m., Packard Hall. Free & open to the public.

Biology Seminar: Tuesday, May 19, Olin 100. Guest Speaker: Dr. David Johnson, College of Sante Fe, Colorado College alumnus. Topic: Desert Islands. Biogeography of Isolated Buttes on the Colorado Plateau.

The Investments Club will hold interviews for those persons interested in taking over as next year's Chairpersons. The meeting will be held Wednesday, May 20 in Armstrong 234 at 6:30 p.m. All invited to pad their resume!

Yard Sale: Every thing a college student needs at low prices. Friday, May 15 & Sat., May 16 at 1309 N. Wahsatch.

Thursday, 21 May: 11 AM (Amphitheatre)
The Bacchae by Euripides (Ted Hubbard)

Sunday, 24 May: 8 PM (AH #32)
Song of the Lusitanian Bogey by Peter Weiss (Kyle Stokes)

Adaptation by Elaine May (Geoff Chadwick)

Endgame by Samuel Beckett (Jennifer Eyl)

Monday, 25 May: 3 PM (Amphitheatre)
Blood Wedding by Garcia Lorca (Joe Reorda)

Monday, 25 May: 7 PM (AH #32)
Sweet Thing by Anne Basting (etc. excerpts) (Lisa Holtby)

The Education of Skinny Spew by Howard Brenton (Katy McNitt)

Red Black and Ignorant by Edward Bond (E.J. Bernacki)

Tuesday, 26 May: 7 PM (AH #32)
Equus by Peter Shaffer (Brad Tisdel)

Bad, Bad Joe Joe by James Leo Herlihy (Courtney Janak)

Beyond Therapy by Christopher Durang (Jane Fox)

Attention Class of '88! Nominations are being taken for our SENIOR CLASS SPEAKER. The person must have some sort of relation to Colorado College. Please direct any suggestions to one of your Senior Class Officers by 5:00 this Sunday, the 17th: Debbie Roark, Vice President, x323; Karl Ossentjuk, Treasurer, x276; or Carrie Brown, Secretary, x213. We realize that it is early to start thinking about graduation, but a prospective list needs to be drawn up before next week.

VOLUNTEER ACTION NEEDS YOU!!! If no one takes over the Volunteer Action Program for the 1987-1988 school year the program will die. This big brother big sister program has ample funding, freedom and space to function. The program is already in its fourth year and needs to be transferred over to some one who has leadership abilities, budget abilities and the ability to work with Elementary School Administrations and parents.

Most of the 1986-1987 Volunteer Action Steering Committee is graduating or will be unable to commit to the program because of semester abroad studies. Please, if you are interested in managing this worthwhile program contact Cheryl Hintergardt at x786 or Debbie Malone at x319. We will walk through the program with you and transfer over all the accounts. Thank you.

ADOLFO CALERO
Contra Leader, Nicaragua

The Catalyst

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado

22 May 1987 Volume 24, No. 14

photo by Jane Olsen

Perkins Wins CC's First Mellon Fellowship

Senior English major, Priscilla Perkins, has won the coveted Mellon Fellowship in the Humanities which will fund her graduate study in English at Columbia University. Perkins is the first Colorado College student ever to receive the prestigious award.

The Mellon scholarship funds graduate school for students who want to teach in the humanities. The Mellon Foundation will pay tuition and a stipend for Perkins for her first two years of study. During her third and fourth years, she will need to obtain financial support from Columbia. The Mellon will then resume payment of a stipend during the fifth year of study if Perkins is reasonably close to finishing her doctorate degree.

Perkins wants to specialize in Renaissance Studies. "My first course at CC was Renaissance Culture," she says, "but I didn't really start to like the Renaissance until I began working on my thematic minor in Renaissance studies. By then I was really hooked." Perkins identifies history professor, Robert McJimsey and English professor, Mark Stavig as two of her most influential professors.

The application process was rigorous and long. First, Perkins got a professor to nominate her for the award. Next, she filled out a very lengthy application which included an essay stating her "intellectual interests" and three faculty recommendations. "I took some risks," says Perkins. "I named professors and scholars who have influenced me, gave my view of the Renaissance and emphasized my well rounded education at CC." The application also required Perkins to list the graduate schools to which she had applied and her reasons for selecting each program.

After Perkins sent in her application

continued on page 4

Cheney to Give Commencement Address

National Endowment for The Humanities Chair Returns to Alma Mater

Lynne V. Cheney, who chairs the National Endowment for the Humanities, will give the address for Colorado College's 106th commencement at 8:30 a.m. Monday, June 1, outdoors in the Central Quadrangle.

Her talk is entitled "Mortal Stakes." Since last May she has been chairman of NEH, a Washington, D.C.-based organization which distributes federal funds for scholarly studies and humanities projects. She graduated from CC in 1963 with Phi Beta Kappa honors and a degree in English, and earned a Master's at the University of Colorado and a Ph.D. at the University of Wisconsin.

Cheney has taught at the University of Wyoming and George Washington University, written the novels "Executive Privilege" and "Sisters," and from 1983-1986 was editor of Washingtonian Magazine. She and her husband, U.S. Rep. Richard Cheney (R-Wyo.), co-authored "Kings of the Hill," a history of the House of Representatives.

Douglas A. Fox will deliver the Baccalaureate address, "In Praise of Hypocrisy," at those 3 p.m. ceremonies, Sunday, May 31, in Shove Chapel.

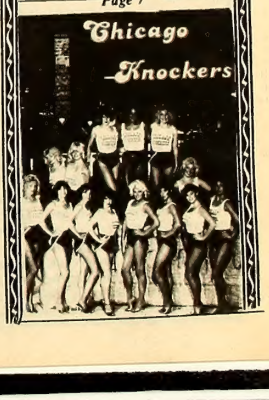
The College's 106th commencement is slated for Monday, June 1. The ceremonies will begin promptly at 8:30 a.m., outdoors in the quadrangle immediately north of Armstrong Hall. Colorado College President Gresham Riley will preside.

A procession by faculty and seniors in full academic regalia will open the ceremonies. Professor Douglas A. Fox will deliver the invocation, with the hymn, "America the Beautiful," to follow. Lynne V. Cheney will deliver the commencement address.

JOE BARBER

INSIDE

Page 7



What's News?

Screw current events! We're sick of questioning distant issues. Let's look at what really matters...the bureaucratic entanglements at CC.

Why not talk about SAGA, everyone's favorite scapegoat. Why, when we are leaving, is SAGA going to turn into a posh yuppie joint that will rival the Broadmoor. Omelettes made to order, give us a break! Aren't college students required to experience cold, runny scrambled eggs? Where will we learn tolerance? Where else will we direct our cynical energies?

And then of course there's the Worner Center—the latest clubhouse at the CCCC (Colorado College Country Club). Dress code required?

Moving on to that bastion of knowledge and resources—King Tutt Library. Why do they check ID's at night, but never during the day? That electronic detector is great; what took so long for them to realize browsing through our personal belongings every time we left was quite annoying? How 'bout them video monitor headphones? Free mocha shakes to anyone who can wear them through two straight movies. Funny how your headphones are blasting, (giving you that recurrent "bleeding-ear syndrome") while your friend thinks it's a silent movie. If the library won't let us study on weekend nights, (who get's anything done during the week? or weekend for that matter) they had better tell the leisure program to plan some parties; so far the result has been bone-numbing boredom.

Why does the registrar send us those perplexing messages notifying us that we have earned a spot in a class? They give you 48 hours to confirm even though you received it a week late in the first place.

What do administrator's do all day? Have you ever tried to get a hold of them? Has anyone ever met the real Gresham Riley? What does Dean Brooks know that David Finley doesn't? Does Laurel McLeod really hate all Greeks? Is she just? Tune in next fall for the continuation of the "we" (the students) vs. "them" (the administrators) soap opera.

Which brings us to the eight block plan. You've probably already guessed that we're not very enthusiastic about having decisions thrust upon us. Hey you in Armstrong, did you see our opinion poll of the students about the eight block plan? No one supports it.

Where else but at CC do you see sprinklers to water cement and gravel while it's snowing and raining? Isn't it illegal to drown grass? Anyone else notice the chaotic habits of our complex sprinkler system? Just when you've found a comfortable spot on some soft, dry grass to catch some rays, a hidden sprinkler rears its ugly head, dousing you with sewer water.

Why does the CCCA get so little money? And then siphon it from Cutler Board?

Why do the freshmen seem younger every year?

Will the new Olin extension have windows? Will Olinites remain forever entombed?

Why do seniors take a ninth block class? Does anyone know what Bacalaureate is? Do any seniors really profess to make more sense of the world now than they did four years ago? How many seniors visit the Career Center for the first time ninth block? Does anyone have a real job? Haircuts are easy. What are we supposed to wear under those black robes anyway? Why black robes? Is this a step closer to death? Why is graduation so early in the morning?

Why are the choices of graduation speakers limited to people associated with CC? We liberally educated people wouldn't want to broaden our perspectives, would we? Why don't seniors get to vote for their speaker? Whose graduation is it anyway? Who picked Liz Cheney's mom? Maybe the price was right. Whose mom, cousin or aunt will speak next year?

Now that everyone has figured out the wordperfect system, will there ever be a computer available? Why is it that the breakdown rate of the printers is directly proportional to how badly you need to print, i.e. how late the paper already is? Speaking of which, as our deadline approaches we...#$&@+*&$.

Damn Printer!!!
Peter and Katie

News Editors Lose Control

News Briefs

Bayley to Rock CC Again

Guitarist-singer John Bayley will bring his blend of rock, folk, calypso and reggae music to Colorado College on Sunday, May 24, for two evening concerts.

Performances will be at 7:30 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. The shows are open to the public and tickets may be purchased for $5 at the Student Center, 931 N. Nevada Ave., or at any of Independent Records' three stores in Colorado Springs.

A costume contest for the best "Island Wear" will be a part of the 7:30 p.m. show for the audience. Those at the 9:30 p.m. show can participate in a limbo contest.

Bayley, 39, is a native of Guyana who came to the United States in the mid-1960s and now resides with his wife and their two children in Manitou Springs, Co. He has performed with a variety of well-known musicians, including Richie Havens, Lou Reed, Jimmy Cliff, Taj Majal, the Pointer Sisters and Marshall Tucker.

His well-received solo instrumentation includes both six-and twelve-string guitars, mandolin, bazouki, foot-powered tambourines, and many Latin American and African percussion instruments.

Folk, calypso, reggae and rock are all in his repertoire and many of his songs are of a Caribbean Island nature. Bayley has been touring annually through the United States and Canada.

Senior Swap Scheduled for Saturday, May 23

A wide variety of used furniture, clothing and household goods will be up for sale at bargain prices Saturday, May 23, at the annual "Senior Swap" at CC.

The event—for which departing students traditionally donate items they no longer need or consider too cumbersome to pack—is slated to run from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m., outside, at the northeast corner of Armstrong Hall.

Proceeds go to the college's annual fund and to fund the seniors' gift to the school. The swap's organizer, senior Richard Poling, explained the latter: "Every year the senior class tries to raise enough money to leave something behind, such as money for a concert, a tree, or maybe chairs for one of the lounges."

The "Senior Swap" is open to the public. All unsold items will be donated to Goodwill, Poling said.

Orientation for India Studies Moves to CC in 1988

The ACM India Studies program is an opportunity to study a fascinating South Asian culture. Colorado College's ACM program adivisor, Jack Carter, and Jane Cauvel, professor of philosophy, have achieved their long-desired goal to bring the orientation segment of the 10-month program to Colorado College. Next year, during blocks 7, 8 and 9, 20 students representing ACM colleges will come to CC to receive the background education they will need during their 7—month stay in India. The orientation will include weekly guest speakers on a variety of topics relating to India and displays of Indian art and culture. Because these orientation programs are not limited to program participants, all CC students will benefit—we will get an unmatched opportunity to explore India without leaving campus.

According to Professor Carter, there are still a few positions open for the program. Interested students should contact Jack Carter, x402, for more applicationinformation as soon as possible. The deadline for application is early in September. The study program includes an independent project culminating in a thesis and course work covering topics from Maranthi (language) to history and music. There is opportunity for extracurricular study and travel as well.

CHRIS CARSTEN

Graduation Hangs Over Seniors

Hello, seniors. Well, this is it...the last Senior Column, and, boy, is it packed full of things that you need to know. So, get out your calenders and/or engage your memory because the following applies to you.

Have you been to a good garage sale lately? If not, we have a bargain for you!! On Saturday, May 23rd from 9:00 a.m. until 3 p.m. the Senior Swap will take place at Armstrong Hall. It will be a great opportunity for seniors and even non-seniors to pick up some great stuff at low, low prices.

WE NEED YOU to turn in your Senior Class pledge card. Earlier this year we sent you an envelope asking for suggestions for a Senior Class Gift and for a contribution from your General Obligation Deposit. If you've lost your pledge card, stop by Tutt Alumni for an extra copy. If you haven't filled the card out, take a few minutes and then drop the card into the Senior Class Box in Armstrong, Bemis Desk or Tutt Library. We need to get those turned in. Thanks.

Now for GRADUATION INFORMATION. You and your parents should have already received a master calender of all the upcoming Graduation Activities. If you didn't get a copy, contact the Registrar's Office. Read on for a condensed version and a few highlights.

Saturday, May 30

9:30 a.m. Graduation Practice. Meet at the south steps of Palmer Hall.

6:30 p.m. Senior/Parent Graduation. Reception—at the Broadmoor.

7:30 p.m. Senior/Parent Dinner Dance

Sunday, May 31

2:00 p.m. Senior Class Picture. Meet in Palmer Hall for robing.

3:00 p.m. Baccalaureate Service in Shove Chapel

Monday, June 1

8:30 a.m. Commencement Exercises. Seniors meet at 7:15 a.m. in Palmer Hall.

AND NOW FOR THE HIGHLIGHTS

It's almost time to pick up CAPS AND GOWNS. Caps and gowns will be available for pick up at the Book Store on May 27, May 28 and May 29th anytime between 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Avoid the rush—get there early! You'll need to wear your cap and gown for the Senior Class Picture, Baccalaureate and of course, Graduation. Unfortunately, caps and gowns are not ours to keep, so don't forget to return them to the Book Store after graduation. And when you do, the Senior Pictures will be there, available for purchase.

It's also almost time to pick up your SENIOR/PARENT DINNER DANCE TICKETS. The tickets will be available in the Tutt Alumni House from 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Thursday, May 28 and Friday, May 29th. You can also pick them up on Saturday, May 30th from 8:30 a.m. to 1 p.m.

And now for some parting words, courtesy of the Beatles:

There are places I remember all my life, though some have changed. Some forever, not for better. Some have gone and some remain. All these places have their moments with lovers and friends I still recall. Some are dead and some are living. In my life, I've loved them all.

And of all these friends and lovers, there is no one compares with you. And these memories lose their meaning when I think of love as something new. Though I know I'll never lose affection for people and things that went before. I know I'll often stop and think about them. But in my life, I've loved you more.

Congratulations to all of the members of the Class of 1987!!

ANITA WALLS

Zimbabwe: Religion caught in the Politics of Modernity

Episcopal missionary Titus L. Presler dressed the College community on dnesday in Gates Common Room. esler, who recently returned from a ee year mission to Zimbabwe, cussed the relationship between igion and politics in contemporary mbabwe.

The Shonas, the majority ethnic group Zimbabwe, practice a religion based on the reverence of their ancestors. e spirit medium, an individual, relays e desires of the ancestors to the people rough both possession and ritual. And ost importantly the spirit medium ooses the chiefs. According to tradition e chief shall be chosen by the ancestors, d since the spirit medium is the only rson in contact with the ancestors he ereby de facto chooses the chief.

The resting place of the ancestors is in e land. The ancestors are present in the ods of their people. The Shona refer to ese ancestral lands as their Musha, the nd of their fathers and mothers. herefore land claims were and continue play an important role in Zimbabwe. ue to this belief the Shona people lieve that they can only rest if buried in eir Musha and thereby come in contact ith the ancesters.

Due to the importance of land, olitical authority is related to the ntrol of land. The chief had authority er the Musha. Yet the spirit medium lains control due to his connection to e ancestors. Therefore the power of the irit medium is obvious.

With the advent of colonization the traditional system came under attack. The colonizers began to subvert the system by creating a cast of spirit mediums who abided by the desires of the colonizers. By doing this, the colonizers succeeded in implementing a system of indirect rule. That is, the traditional chiefs carried out the dictates of the colonizer due to the corruption of the spirit medium.

The practice of indirect rule prospered until the rise of the War of Liberation. Guerillas had been formed under the command of ZANU, a Shona liberation group. ZANU and their guerillas were committed to Marxism. Yet the outward posturing of this ideological dogmatism was untenable with traditional Shona society. ZANU realized that they needed the sanction of the spirit mediums in order to be legitimate in the eyes of the Shona masses. Some of the spirit mediums who were dissatisfied with indirect rule and abandoned the chiefs and gave the guerillas the sanction of the ancestors. This sanction accorded the guerillas the status of traditional Shona warriors.

With the success of the revolution in April of 1980 the leaders continued to invoke the power and blessings of the ancestors. Mbuya Nehanda, the ultimate ancestor of the Shona, according to the leaders, provided the source of power of the guerillas. The power of Mbuya Nehanda occupied the barrels of the guns of ZANU and led them to victory.

photo by Jane Bierman

Watson Fellowship Recipients: (from left to right) Tony Lopez, So Yong Park, Chris Dunn, Stuart Martz

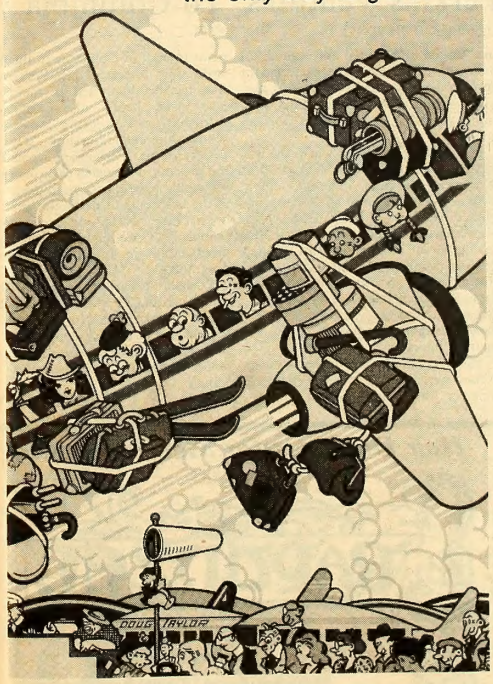
Today the worship of the Shona ancestors has become a form of state religion. Yet this incorporation into the state has not come without the reduction of religious freedoms. The spirit mediums have been formed into a state body, the National Traditional Healers Association. This incorporation of the mediums into the government reduces the scope of their power and once again co-opts them. Further the government has become distrustful of any activity that is not state sanctioned, thereby further increasing statism at the expense of local autonomy. The creation of this state religion denies the existence of other religious groups. In fact Presler believes that some of the violence between the Shona and the Ndebele, the next largest group, can be attributed to this spiritual hegemony.

The presentation concluded with Presler responding to questions and offering hope for the success of Zimbabwe.

IAN CAMPBELL

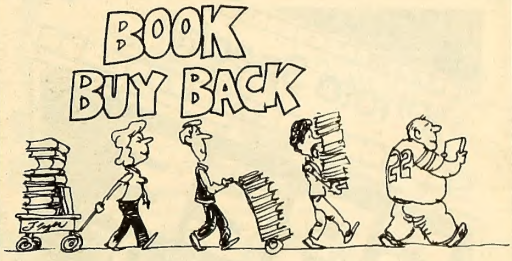
TAYLOR TRAVEL

the only way to go. . .



"Your Campus Travel Agency"

818 N. Tejon 636-3871



Year - End
Used Book
Buy - Back

at the

Colorado College Bookstore

May 22
8:30 - 4:00 p.m.

Bookstore & Nebraska Book Co.
will be buying used books.

May 25 - 29
8:30 - 4:00 p.m.
Bookstore Buy-Back Only

Germany Beckons Fulbright Winners

Two CC seniors have received prestigious Fulbright Fellowships which will enable them to study in Germany next year. Inger Thompsen will study at the University of Freiburg and Susan Van Camp will attend the Friedrich-Alexander University in Erlangen—Nurnberg. A third CC student, Scott Reznik has been named an alternate and will be notified in June whether he will be a recipient.

CC German professor, Armin Wishard, who is the campus adviser for the Fulbright Fellowship program, is thrilled wiht CC's success this year in the Fulbright competition. "We have not had a Fulbright winner in about four years," he says. About 673 Fulbright fellowhips were awarded this year for study in 130 countries throughout the world, including some eastern bloc countries, says Wishard. About sixty of the coveted awards went to applicants proposing to study in Germany. Wishard explains that Germany offers so many scholarships because in addition to those funded by the U.S., the German government also funds several Fulbright Fellowships through the German Academic Exchange Program.

Wishard stresses that Thompsen, Van Camp and Reznik competed not only against other B.A. candidates but also against M.A. and Ph.D. candidates. "The intense competition makes their awards especially significant," says Wishard.

Van Camp, who lived in Germany for eight years as a child, looks forward to immersing herself in the German culture and to returning to her home. She will study contemporary political philosophy, focusing on philosophers of the 1960s including Eric Voegelin, Leo Strauss and Max Weber. "I want to examine their responses to the fundamental questions confronting modernity," says Van Camp. She hopes to pursue a career in international law and is currently checking into a program at the University of Denver that would combine a Master's degree in International Relations with a law degree.

Thompsen plans to focus both on German literature and political philosophy. She will engage in a project on Hermann Broch's The Sleep Walkers and Thomas Mann's Magic Mountain. She wants to explore the theme of conversation and silence. She became interested in this topic while she was working on her Liberal Arts and Sciences major which combines comparative literature with political philosophy. She has studied the works of Thomas Mann, Albert Camus and Michael Oakeshott in the original languages. "Conversation and silence is a good theme because I also have an interest in linguistics," says Thompsen. She has studied German since the 7th grade, but has not previously spent any time living in Germany.

photo by Jane Bierman

Fulbright and Mellon Winners (from left to right) Inger Thompsen, Priscilla Perkins and Susan Van Camp.

The application, which is due in the early fall, requires a curriculum vitae which is a proposed plan of study and a biography. Good grades and extra-curricular activities are important. Applicants are interviewed on campus by a committee of about five faculty members which is chaired by Professor Wishard. Scholarly excellence is a critical qualification, notes Wishard. In addition, interested students should have a strong focus. "They can't be vague. Most important is a quality proposal which is feasible. It has to be realistic something that you cannot study in the U.S."

The Fulbright provides generous financial support to fellowship recipients including funding for tuition, room board, a book allowance and a stipend for travel. Van Camp will leave for Germany on August 1 and Thompsen will go September 1.

Professor Wishard encourages qualified students to obtain information on the fellowship from him. Applications will be due on October 10, but Wishard has information and applications available now. For further information contact Wishard at ext. 520.

KATIE KERWIN

Perkins Ventures To Columbia U.

continued from page 1

she "waited and waited and waited." "I thought for sure I hadn't been selected for an interview," she said. "They said they would notify us in January. Finally on January 25th, I got called for an interview."

Perkins flew to Dallas where she was grilled for thirty minutes by a panel of scholars from around the western region, including one specialist in Renaissance studies. Members of the panel had each come up with very specific questions after having about one month to research Perkins' proposal. "I thought that I had blown the interview when I began to talk about the wrong Queen Mary when they asked me about Mary, Queen of Scots," Perkins laughingly says, describing the rigorous interview.

About a month later in mid-March, Perkins was named a Mellon Fellowship recipient. She modestly beams about her plans to start at Columbia in the fall. "I really want to teach," says Perkins. She first became interested in the Mellon when she heard about it at an informational meeting on various scholarships and fellowships. "It sounded perfect for me." Perkins applied in the fall but says that if she had it to do over again, she would have started thinking about it at the beginning of her junior year. "CC doesn't teach you to look forward to grad school. That's not bad, but it put me at a disadvantage in applying for graduate programs.

Priscilla Perkins has received a variety of honors at CC. She recently won the Frank Krutzke Award for the best Senior Project in the English department. She won the Award in Literature during her junior year and is a member of Phi Beta Kappa.

KATIE KERWIN

Mondays Only

Photo Special! Every Monday!

coupon

FREE SECOND SET OF PRINTS

Receive a second set of prints absolutely FREE with your roll of 110, 126, disc or 35mm color print film left for developing and printing!
This coupon must accompany order. Limit one roll per coupon.
Limited time offer. Offer in effect Mondays only. 8/9

Kodak Colorwatch System

WHEN YOU SEE THIS SEAL, YOU KNOW YOU'LL BE GETTING THE BEST QUALITY AVAILABLE TODAY!

College Pharmacy

833 North Tejon • 634-4861

Hair Designers for Men & Women

RAPUNZEL

Style cuts, Cellophanes,
Perms & Color.

Nexus, Redken, and Tri products available for sale.

Stop in or make your appointment:

827 N. Tejon at Cache La Poudre 632-3532

President's Notes: Cutler Board

As the new Cutler Board President I ...h to announce next years editors. In ...fall Katie Kerwin will be The Catalyst ...tor. Pat Ledger and Pete Scott are co-...ing the Disparaging Eye. Jim Lasko ...Dan Engster will take over the ...iathan for the entire year. As of now ...are still looking for an editor or co-...tors for next year's yearbook, (Nugget ...'88). We are concerned that the lack ...applicants for this position signifies ...t the student body is no longer ...erested in having a yearbook. If no one ...lies there will be no yearbook next ...r. Should you be interested in either ...ling or co-editing next year's yearbook ...of the following would be happy to ...swer any questions that you might ...e. Heidi Dowd (this year's Nugget ...tor) x282, David Henrickson (faculty ...viser) 633-6807 or myself x298 or 632-...99.

I also wanted to personally ...ngratulate this year's publication staffs ...n the all did a marvelous job. Ted Craig ...d his staff have done an admirable job ...rou... the Leviathan producing five top-notch issues with a budget conceived for only four. Heidi Dowd and the yearbook staff are in the final stages of a well organized Nugget. I am looking forward to finally seeing what they have dedicated so much of their energy towards. Under Munir Meghjee's and later Brian Smith's direction we've seen our youngest publication, the Disparaging Eye, successfully bring to light differing perspectives of the student body on significant contemporary issues. Finally, first under the leadership of Blair Sanford and David Klein and then under Alec Rekow's and Mike Fratterelli's guidance, the Catalyst staffs have continued to produce a quality paper.

It is my opinion and I hope yours also that CC can feel very proud of its four publications. I've seen the students who work on them put forward an incredible effort while making frequent personal sacrifices. Because these publications are designed to be an outlet for the Colorado College Community's feelings, your opinions, your writing, and your artwork are all most welcome. They are what do, and should, make up our publications. We want you to participate in these publications in any way you can. I feel very strongly about this and therefore would welcome a call or a letter, this year or next, in which you would comment or criticize any part of or anyone of the publications. These are your publications!! This is not meant as an accusation, it is an invitation to join us.

Sincerely,
Jean Maurice Boyer
x298

Student Coalition Project Pursued

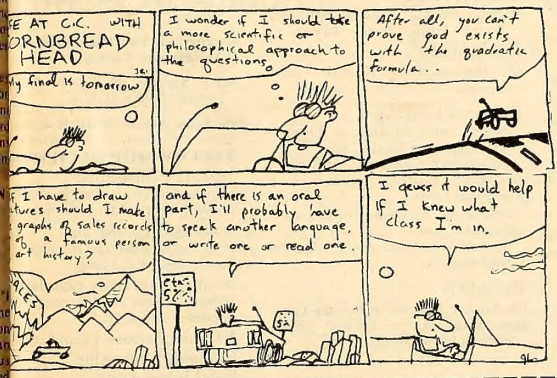
The occurence of a racial incident several weeks ago involving the Sigma Chi Fraternity resulted in the formation of a new organization this month, the Campus Awareness Coalition. Composed of delegates from each of the existing interest groups, CAC will act as a communication medium for these organizations and student concerns.

A discussion titled Respect for Difference was sponsored by the Sigma Chi Fraternity as a means of understanding intolerance for racial and ethnic difference. Fraternity member Greg Griffin said, refering to the meeting, "It was evident people wanted to interact, but there was a lack of communication." And so CAC was conceived and established two meetings later with the need for a regulatory communication body.

CAC has set five goals for itself in the coming year: 1) to improve communication between campus groups, 2) to promote campus awareness of these groups activities, 3) to encourage co-sponsorship of activities among groups, 4) to strengthen the student voice, and 5) to promote community spirit.

"We're not expecting to solve major problems like discrimination, but this is a first step toward improvement," said Griffin. Though only delegates from student organizations are presently members of the coalition, the group will eventually be open to all interested members.

AKLILU DUNLAP



...E AT C.C. WITH ...ORNBREAD HEAD
...y final is tomorrow
I wonder if I should take a more scientific or philosophical approach to the questions.
After all, you can't prove god exists with the quadratic formula..
...f I have to draw ...tures should I make ... graphs of sales records ... a famous person ...art history?
and if there is an oral part, I'll probably have to speak another language, or write one or read one.
I guess it would help if I knew what class I'm in.

Before you leave for the summer...

Take a nostalgic farewell vacation at the Lotus Eater Boutique.

A shopping trip for momentos for yourself and the loved ones at home.

Mon.-Fri. 10-6 pm Sat. 11-5 pm

THE LOTUS EATER BOUTIQUE

Downtown
Across from Poor Richard's

phone:
635-2118

SENIORS-CLIP n' SAVE!!

Colorado College has ALUMNI CLUBS in 20 cities and Canada, so when you're out in the COLD, CRUEL WORLD, give these folks a call...

Albuquerque
Barbara Koenig '75
(505) 344-5564 (h)
(505) 262-2672 (w)

Boston/New England
Martha Diehl-Momtaheni '82
(617) 322-9890 (h)
(617) 956-1730 (w)

Chicago
Elizabeth Gignilliat '82
(312) 327-9661 (h)
(312) 922-8940 (w)
Jennifer Peterson '81
(312) 281-2364 (h)
(312) 726-4800 (w)

Cincinnati
Dr. Paul M. Holland '69
(513) 829-4063 (h)
(513) 245-2502 (w)

Colorado Springs
William Calvert '44
(303) 576-0976
George Weege '50
(303) 634-3465 (h)
(303) 520-4631 (w)

Denver
Diana DeGette '79
(303) 388-6399 (h)
(303) 333-3735 (w)
Donia Ness '81
(303) 777-8525 (h)
(303) 321-6661 (w)

Grand Junction
James Casebolt '72
Joanne Tuthill Casebolt '72
(303) 245-4596 (h)
(303) 242-2645 (w)

John P. Gormley '79
(303) 242-8404 (h)
(303) 242-6262 (w)

Houston
Alice Balle McAlpine '77
(713) 524-4353 (h)

Marian Davenport Herman '75
(713) 975-9343 (h)
(713) 464-9451, x221 (w)

Kansas City
Julie Reddan '79
(816) 361-8202 (h)
(861) 274-5716 (w)

Los Angeles
Robert L. Davidson '71
(818) 799-7814 (h)
(818) 799-7000 (w)

Minneapolis/St. Paul
Nancy Corrigan Woodrow '68
(612) 935-7593 (h)
(612) 938-8874 (w)

New York City
Kathryn Cervon '80
(212) 879-1841 (h)
(203) 328-6578 (w)

Oklahoma City
Barbara Snow Gilbert '76
(405) 843-7027 (h)
(405) 235-7700 (w)

Omaha
Dr. Walter M. Bacon, Jr. '68
Lynne Lazier Bacon '68
(402) 333-0413 (h)
(402) 554-3614 (w)

Phoenix
Judy Weil Oksner '81
(602) 998-0881 (h)

Portland
M. James Mark '81
(503) 297-2816 (h)
(503) 223-4777 (w)

Pueblo
Joyce Baca Anderson '75
(303) 561-2544 (h)

St. Louis
Daniel J. Cooper '66
Beth Anneberg Cooper '66
(314) 821-8248 (h)
(314) 694-2156 (w)

Salt Lake City
Charles Streamer '76
(801) 546-1128 (h)
(801) 896-8214 (w)

San Francisco/Bay Area
Kathy Rogers '81
(415) 759-6132 (h)
(415) 986-1010 (w)

Seattle/Tacoma (Puget Sound)
William B. Stafford '63
(206) 284-6085 (h)
(206) 625-4565 (w)

Washington, D.C.
Jennifer Zimdahl '81
(202) 223-5288 (h)
(202) 485-6288 (w)

Canada
Monica Eckersley '82
(403) 244-8066 (h)
(403) 298-5800 (w)

Want to stay in touch?
Give the Alumni Office your new address.

Honors Awarded at Convocation

ART

Honors in Art History—Lisa Marie Gibbons

Honors in Art Studio—
Susanne Bratt
Liz Crawford
Kristina Loof Deutsch
Lise Phillips Grace
Laura Johnson
Kristin Lee Mernitz
John MacRae Wylde

Mary Chenoweth Award—John Douglas Richardson

BIOLOGY

Mary Alice Hamilton Award in Biology—Gianfranco Dominick Basili, Randall E Kochevar

Robert M. Stabler Summer Scholarship Award—Pamela Marie Kittelson

CHEMISTRY

Otis A. and Margaret Barnes Departmental Service Award—Scott Edward Van Bramer, Brian R. Wenzel

Freshman Chemistry Award—Dale L. Orth, Kristina Mary Hatelid, Erin Kate Steele

Merck Index Award—Daniel Weston Pierce, Hasan Faraz Naqvi

CLASSICS

John Bryant and Miriam Gile Hartwell Prize—Noel Emmanuel Lenski

DRAMA AND DANCE

Broadway Theatre League Award—Thomas Rogers Mays, Sharon deLong Kent

ECONOMICS AND BUSINESS ECONOMICS

Robert W. Kaye Memorial Prize in Business Economics—Allison Graves

Kenneth J. and Elizabeth H. Curran Prize in Economics—Kenneth Reid Morgan

Kenneth J. Curran Prize for Significant Achievement in the Divisions of Humanities and Natural Sciences—Allison Graves

EDUCATION

Award for Excellence in Elementary Teacher Education—Sara Lue Bratton

Award for Excellence in Secondary Teacher Education—Jennifer Lynn Moran

ENGLISH

Evelyn May Bridges Poetry Awards—Laura Margaret Finley, Brenda Kay Frihauf, Sarah Anne Hegarty

Adelaide Bender Reville Fiction Awards—David Brendel, Laura Margaret Finley, Victor Albert Greto

Colorado College Award in Literature—Sarah Anne Hegarty, Donna W. McDaniel, Katherine Mary Kerwin, Aaron Michael Shure, Andrew Hale Leman

Frank Krutzke Senior Project Award—Priscilla Ashley Perkins

FORENSICS

Apollonian Award—Lisa Alane Seeland

GEOLOGY

Association for Women Geoscientists Award—Lisa Ann Seaman

Rocky Mountain Association of Geologists Award—Eric Seth Johnson

Estwing Outstanding Senior Geologist Award—Kelly Ann West

GERMAN

Max Kade Award for Excellence in German—Scott Miles Reznik

HISTORY

Clyde Augustus Duniway Prize—David Scott Casson, Christopher John Dunn, Evan Morgan Williams

LINGUISTICS

Award for Excellence in Linguistics—Catherine Marie Coppolillo

MATHEMATICS

Thomas Post Rawles Prize—John Andrew Tompkins

Florian Cajori Award—John William Buchholz

MUSIC

David and Karen Smith Cowperthwaite Prize—Susan Lynn Robinson

PHILOSOPHY

Robert Lewis Award—Anneliese Meadows

J. Glenn Gray Award—Gregory Dow Gale

POLITICAL SCIENCE

Edith Bramhall Award—Corey Steven Abel, Lisa Alane Seeland, Theodore John Craig

Fred Sondermann Award—DOminick Donald Sekich

PREMEDICAL

Frank Henry John Figge Award—David Andrew Thorsett

PSYCHOLOGY

William Arthur Blakely Memorial Award—Edwin James Taylor, IV

RELIGION

The Hastings Prize—Michelle Louise Wemple

Romance Languages

Award for Excellence in French - Frank Thompson Nesbitt, III

Award for Excellence in Italian - Matthew Walter Sanidas, Noel Emmanuel Lenski

Award for Excellence in Spanish - Lora Lea Looney

Romance Languages Award - Jennifer Lynn Moran

RUSSIAN

Outstanding Progress in Russian Language Study—Aaron Michael Shure, Michael Stuart Mehan

SOCIOLOGY

Abbott Prize—Sheila Jane Farr, Stacey Leigh Ross Goh

ALL-COLLEGE AWARDS

Alpha Lambda Delta Book Award—Inger Sigrun Bredkaer Thomsen

Ann Rice Memorial Award—Kimberly Tara Sportsman

Blue Key Award—Douglas A. Fox

CCCA Award—Richard C. Bradley, Garth Allen Fitzgerald, William Anthony Martinez

Cutler Publications Awards—Heidi Jo Dowd

Peter Lehmann Award—Inger Sigrun Breadkaer Thomsen, Ian Christopher Cambpell

Leisure Program Award—Stephen Alan Hauser, SoYoung Park

PRESIDENT'S OFFICE

Association des Amis de CC—Kenneth Mark Burton

Burlington Northern Faculty Achievement Award—Jane Cauvel

E.K. Gaylord Award—Theodore John Craig, Michael Stuart Mehan

Jeanne Gibbs Memorial Award—Mary Monica Butcher

J. Juan Reid Award—Blair Edward Sanford

Josephine Van Fleet McLaughlin Award—Ann Margaret Lindsey

Mary Stearns Barkalow Award—Deborah Susan Malone

Van Diest Award—Tijani R. Cole

FELLOWSHIP RECIPIENTS

Watson Fellowships
Christopher John Dunn, Anthony Guy Lopez, Stuart J. Martz, So Yong Park

Fullbright Fellowships
Inger Sigrun Bredkaer Thomsen, Susan Elaine Van Camp

German University Scholarships
William James Campbell, Richard Randall Frohock III

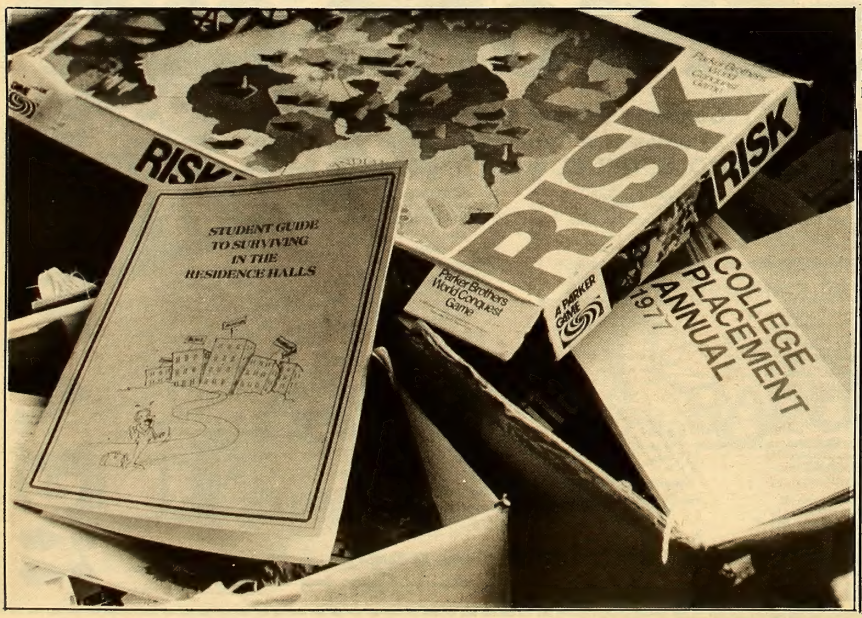
National Science Foundation Graduate Fellowship
Daniel Weston Pierce

Mellon Fellowship in the Humanities
Priscilla Ashley Perkins

Leadership America Summer Internship
Daniel Albert Engster

Photo of the Week

photo by Jane Olsen



the Stagecoach Inn
702 Manitou Avenue
On Fountain Creek in Manitou Springs
Don't Forget the Stagecoach Inn for all your Special Occasions
Lunch
11:30 - 2:00
Dinner
5:00 - 9:00
Sunday Champagne Brunch
10:30 - 2:00
Reservations 685-9335
Banquet & Catering Facilities For All Occasions

Rudner: One Step Away from Letterman

On the ninth of June, after over a year of political canvassing, fund-raising, and baby kissing, senior Wayne D. Rudner hops an eastbound plane for New York City and—with any luck at all—the David Letterman show. Rudner and his faithful compatriot Andy Cozine will spend two weeks in the Big Apple. They hope to stir up enough publicity during that time to convince Letterman that his show needs a "capitalistic comic genius" of Wayne's caliber. Judging by Rudner's past feats, this almost sounds like a practical endeavor.

"We are extremely optimistic," says Rudner. "Sooner or later Dave will have to admit that I am the true Voice of the Future." This is a college student with a liberal arts education? Rudner continues: "My only regret is that I won't have accomplished Late Night before graduation." C'est la vie, Wayne, c'est la vie.

Despite the local stir Rudner has created, a few students may yet be unaware of Wayne's life goal. He wants a guest spot on the Late Night show. No more, no less, or at least that is all Wayne's telling. Since last April, Rudner has help petition drives at CC and at the Chapel Hills Mall. His story has been featured in the Gazette-Telegraph, the Rocky Mountain News, and in dozens of other publications nationwide. Several days ago, in fact, someone reported a sighting in a Cosmopolitan interview with Letterman. That's not all. Letters plugging Wayne have reached Letterman's office from a congressman, a senator, a mayor, former Miss America and actress Lee Meriwether, and the president of the Colorado Springs Chamber of Commerce. Wayne's speeches to business clubs and elementary schools have garnered even more fan mail. According to Wayne, President Reagan politely declined to submit a letter. "Oh well," shrugs the unphased Rudner. "Win some, lose one."

Rudner's current goal is to attack New York City in person, with Andy in town. "Nothing is news to the east coast," Rudner explains, "unless it's happening in New York." Wayne and Andy have set up interviews with the ABC National Radio News Network, as well as several other radio and television talk shows in New York. They also plan to petition in front of Rockefeller Plaza and bombard Dave's office with campaign paraphernalia.

The question remains: Why is Wayne doing all this? "This is a celebration of the capitalist system," Rudner says. "We want to prove you can accomplish anything you set your mind to."

"Overall, this is a tribute to America," Cozine adds. "The campaign has been fun, its been an education. Above all, we've learned that this could only happen here, in the United States. Fame is only one route towards expressing that message. We chose fame because right now it is a hot commodity."

Campaign Vice President Cozine, who also bills himself as press secretary, legal consultant, and "creative genius," claims the Letterman guest almost ended in failure. According to Cozine, the entrepreneurial team was on the verge of admitting defeat only three weeks ago. Business cards were printed. The "VOF" promotional packet was almost complete. Rudner's stage act was polished. "Still, we were faced with financial liability for an amazing sum in campaign losses," Cozine explains. "We sat on Wayne's front lawn and, after two hours of deliberation, admitted that it would have to end. We barely managed to cover our losses, and then we pulled out."

The following week, Cozine was writing supporters across the nation in a final plea for assistance when Rudner suggested canvassing for local sponsorship. Rallying the support of their on-campus staff, which boasts over thirty volunteers, the team hit the streets of Colorado Springs in a final last ditch effort to collect funds for a NYC trip. In ten days, Rudner and Cozine had amassed over $1000 and two free round-trip plane tickets to New York.

So what happens after Letterman, should the quest succeed? Rudner claims that People Magazine, USA Today, CNN, and Entertainment Tonight have promised coverage if they can get onto the Late Night stage. After Rudner and Cozine become the most famous men in America, they plan to write a "how-to" book entitled Campaigning for Fame. According to Rudner, several faculty members believe the excitement will generate "two to three best sellers."

Andrew W. Cozine

Knockers Enamour America

U.S. tour comes to Springs

The Chicago Knockers

Two thousand years ago frenzied Coliseum crowds roared as blood spattered gladiators clashed in mortal battle. Wednesday night, May 20, 1987, a near capacity City Auditorium throng erupted in orgiastic delirium as the mud-caked Raging Apache (36-25-35) punished the writhing California Kid (37-27-36 and a former stunt woman) in a knee deep sludge pit. There were no cheap sexual theatrics this night; these women came to wrestle. Raging Apache later teamed with the Invincible Rocky (38-26-36) to take on the dreaded and very masculine Masked Mud Marauders, a male tag team with combined dimensions of 12 feet 4 inches and 405 pounds. A glorious combat ensued that exalted both genders as well as their noble sport. The women quickly paralyzed the men with a series of body slams and pile drivers, and the surprised Marauders found their masked faces buried in the slimy swamp. The tuxedo clad and charming master of ceremonies attempted to maintain an aura of order and fair play (in addition to keeping the crowd updated on the competitor's measurements), but as is common in this topsy turvy sport, trickery prevailed. Without receiving the proper tag, Rich pain entered the pit and joined John Stucco in pinning the not so invincible Rocky at the end of Quiet Riot's "Cum on Feel the Noize" which marked the conclusion of the third period. Vegas oddsmakers cursed the underhanded fraud, but the results remained etched in stone (at least until Friday night in Topeka).

Earlier this day the Chicago Knockers wrestling troupe greeted their fans and signed autographs at the Independent Records store on Platte Avenue. The pleasantly attired combatants actually had to coax their shy male worshippers to come closer for a better look. The same beer-drenched men needed far less persuasion that night as they hooted obscenities and caught the athletes whenever they slid from the slippery muck mat. Whether on their knees in foot deep mud or striking sublime conversation in trendy Colorado Springs hangouts, the Knockers proved that they have not become mired in the trappings of stardom nor by the stereotypes of the small-minded.

Peter Scott and Mike Fraterelli

87

SENIOR DIRECTORIES

They're here and they're free!

Get yours at Tutt Alumni House
(N.E. corner of Cascade and Unitah)
Thursday, May 28 and Friday, May 29
8:30 - 5:00 p.m.
Saturday, May 30
8:30 - 1:00 p.m.
Don't leave CC without it!

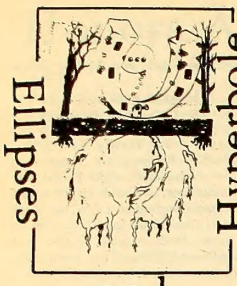
Celebrate the end of the school year with us!

OLD CHICAGO
FRESH PASTA AND SAUCE BAR
DEEP DISH PIZZA
Chalkboard specials, salads, sandwiches and giant, fresh baked chocolate chip cookies! Something for everyone! Take-out available. Full service tavern with satellite TV for sports viewing. Cubs HDQ's!
PATIO · LUNCH · DINNER
118 N. Tejon · Downtown · 634-8812

JOSE' MOLDAVE'S
MEXICAN STYLE AND AMERICAN DISHES IN A CASUAL ATMOSPHERE
Santa Fe style blue corn tortilla specialties: beef, chicken and shrimp fajitas. Salad bar with dinners. Live entertainment Wed.-Sat. after 9:30 p.m. in the lounge.
PATIO · MARGARITAS & SANGRIA
LUNCH · DINNER · SUNDAY BRUNCH
222 N. Tejon · Downtown · 636-2311

Finn's
THE MOST EXTENSIVE LIST OF FRESH DOMESTIC AND EXOTIC SEAFOODS IN SOUTHERN COLORADO
Specials change daily with availability of fresh fish. Beef, poultry and lamb round out dinner; salads and sandwiches at lunch. Light Oyster Bar menu.
RESERVATIONS · PATIO
LUNCH · DINNER · SUNDAY BRUNCH
128 S. Tejon · Downtown · 635-3535

NORTHPORT Restaurant
BBQ RIBS AND CHICKEN
FRESH SEAFOOD, PRIME RIB
Char-broiling brings out the flavors of dry-aged USDA choice beef, Danish Baby Back Pork Ribs, Fresh Seafood and Teriyaki. Upstairs, the Blue Parrot Grill features appetizers, sandwiches, burgers, exotic nectar drinks and beautiful sunsets.
7115 Commerce Center Drive · 593-7678
(Just N.W of I-25 & Woodmen Rd. next to Hampton Inn)



and

I never planned on it, but it happened anyway. I'm bound for the far side of the Black Sea far behind the Iron Curtain. It all started when someone put the idea into my head that every educated person should know at least one foreign language.

I didn't want to learn French. Although I knew no French people, I knew people that knew French. And I knew I didn't like most of them. French, like playing the guitar, is something that is supposed to multiply your sex appeal.

Speaking French, like playing the guitar, is something everyone's brother can do poorly, but hardly anyone can do well. There are hundreds of people out there that can strum a few chords of French, suck cigarette smoke through their noses, and look altogether aloof, haughty and important.

Sometimes, these people actually go to France, where they buy some clothes, walk around, piss-off a whole bunch of Frenchmen, and then come home. But they come back seasoned world travelers, equipped with the mystique of foreign lands, exhaling the vapors of their Wanderlust. Well educated people are supposed to go abroad.

The Romantic notion that travel is naturally educational seems skewed. Stupidity fits nicely into any size suitcase and is less likely to be left behind than a toothbrush. If I am a lughead in America why won't I be one in Europe? I may or may not be exposed to another culure, but what's to stop me from being a lughead? Clearly, the most exotic places in the world are in our own heads.

So, why am I going to spend a semester in the Soviet Union: not to learn French and not to stop being a lughead. Maybe I am going there to promote world peace. Well, I'm not sure I believe in world peace, and I am not quite arrogant enough to think I could succeed where Christ and Ghandi failed.

You might suspect that I am going to the Union in hopes of testing my self-control against the lures of voluptuous KGB agents. I don't think, however, that they will waste their most enticing agents in order to coax from me the locations of strategic Seven Elevens.

I am going to the Soviet Union to learn the language. Words are my life. I love language. I love metaphors. Life without language would be inexplicable, and life without metaphors would be like something you can't compare anything to.

I chose Russian for no good reason. It seemed exotic. It turned out to be the hardest language this side of Chinese. A good student in Spanish might win the departmental award for "excellence in Spanish." A Russian student can only win an award for "Progress."

My image of the Union is mixed. My grandparents fled the country for very good reasons, but they left a very different nation than the one I will to go. I don't believe in the Evil Empire. I look on the Soviet Union as though it were SAGA on a national scale; in both SAGA and the Union there are long lines of depressed people waiting for products of questionable worth.

I will continue to write "Ellipsis and Hyperbole" and try to sneak it past the censors. So, if you are interested in what life without toilet paper means to a CC student, stayed tuned...

AARON SHURE

They Keep CC Clean

To Hell and back with the grounds crew

7:00 a.m. comes early for students working for the Colorado College grounds crew. The sky is clear and the sun shines bright before the invariable afternoon clouds roll in. Earthworms slither happily through the still-fresh dew glistening on the campus grounds. In this cheerful scenario, these dedicated students-turned-maintenance mercenaries begin a full day in the dirt.

The first task is not a pleasant one: "Park Patrol." The lonely trash collector is given what is commonly known as a "trash picker-upper" and told to pick up the ugly waste residue left by careless, spring fever-obsessed, late night-carousing students. Beer cans and cigarette buts litter our lovely mountain paradise before the crisp dawn breaks. What, you say? You've never seen this shameless perversion of filth? Well, that's due to our noble park patrollers' undying self-sacrifice and willingness to restore our campus to its pristine state before we awake.

By the time the wet dew has been burned off the grass by the blazing Colorado sun, our student groundskeeper is just getting warmed up. The next chore on the menu is the physically-taxing trimming around the trees with the "lawn boy" and "weed whipper" in order for the riding mower to have a little easier go of it. If you think this sounds easy, consider that the CC campus spans 10,000 acres from Cache La Poudre to the Black Forest, and contains over 25,000 trees, bushes and shrubs. That adds up to quite a bit of bush.

As if this weren't enough for one morning, there are the various gardening duties which include weeding, leaf-removal and hoe activities...definitely not chores for the weak of heart.

At noon our shrubbery swashbucklers get a well-deserved half-hour break to fortify themselves for the taxing afternoon which lies ahead. Dry toast and a glass of cranapple juice is all that's required to sustain the Spartan groundskeeper.

With the afternoon come the worst jobs of the day. Can you imagine being assigned to the job of "exploring the contents of the Bemis Hall sewer system to see just what the hell is clogging the darn thing up." Not a pretty assignment but nonetheless one the student groundskeeper attacks with an open mind (and a plugged nose).

The day ends with nothing more than a brief and tearless farewell from co-workers and the inordinate satisfaction of a job well done. Not enough can be said about our fearless and selfless student grounds crew and not enough is said. So next time you see a student clad in dirty, smelly clothes sweeping the dried crusty puddle of puke that could have come from your stomach the night before, just give them a little sign of appreciation, and make a friend.

SAM SPADE

Hungry Howies
PIZZA & SUBS

FREE FLAVORED PIZZA CRUSTS
• Rye • Buttered • Garlic • Poppy Seed
Original • Sesame Seed
So Delicious You'll Be Tempted To Start Where You Used To Leave Off!

1625 B. W. Uintah
(Uintah Station)
475-8241

Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS
More Pizza for Less Dough!
Two 12" Medium Pizzas
(Cheese Only)
only $7.23
20 SLICES
Additional 2 Pizza Toppings 93¢ Each.
Not Valid with Any Other Coupons. Delivery Extra.

Hungry Howies PIZZA & SUBS
More Pizza for Less Dough!
Two 14" Large Special Pizzas
(Pepperoni, Mushrooms, Ham, Green Pepper, Onions)
24 SLICES
all for only $14.12
No Substitutions With this Coupon • Delivery Extra
One Coupon Per Order.

Cowen • Moving • Storage
Reduced rates for Colorado College students!
-Summer Storage Special-
...beats all available storage costs. Ask for information at Mathias, Slocum, Bemis, Loomis or call 475-2800
Save • Save • Save

YAKITORI
Serving Lunch and Dinner
(Monday - Saturday)
•
Sushi Bar
Cocktails
•
10% Discount Off Any Entree
(with your CC ID)
Take-Out and Delivery
16 E. Bijou • Downtown • 578-0915

THE DISPARAGING EYE

A Journal of General Interest

VOLUME 3 NUMBER 5 May 22, 1987

Pilgrim's Progress?

BY SAM LIESCHING

In order to have any success, the Pilgrims found that they would have to rely primarily on the merchants. Because King James I had different religious ideas he would not directly grant the Pilgrims a patent to establish a colony in North America. Thus, they had to negotiate with various merchants and merchant groups in order to obtain a patent. Finding no success with the Virginia Company, the Pilgrims accepted an offer from Thomas Weston, a private adventurer. Weston received a patent from James I to settle New England. The Pilgrims had no say in the decision to go to New England. Instead, Weston had chosen New England because he hoped to find profit from the fishing in the area.

After the patent was granted, the merchants gave the Pilgrims unacceptable terms for the future operations of the settlement. Weston and Robert Cushman, a pilgrim sent to England, from Leyden, to negotiate with Weston and the other merchants designed the businesslike document. The Conditions, in the form of a list containing ten points, explained that the pilgrims and the merchants would form a seven year joint stock company and how that company would run. The Pilgrims found the Conditions demanding, especially in two areas. First, the merchants wanted the pilgrims to work seven days a week towards satisfying the contract. Instead, the Pilgrims wanted two days a week so they could have time to spend with their families and engage in their own employment. Without the two days off and proper division of property, the second complaint, the Pilgrims refused to sign the Conditions.

The Pilgrims continued to stand firm on the two issues even though their success relied heavily on Weston and the other merchants. So without a contract, the first would be settlers sailed to Southhampton, England from Leyden to first settle Weston and then go on to New England. The Pilgrims had been dissatisfied with Cushman's negotiations believing he had been too sympathetic with the merchants. When they arrived, they met with Weston and Cushman, but, nothing was resolved. Regardless, Weston let the Pilgrims continue to New England. He had little to fear knowing that they would not survive without the further provisions he would send over later. At this point, Cushman continued as chief negotiator with Weston. The Pilgrims were confident that Cushman would be able to resolve the two points in question with Weston. Although the Pilgrims left England without giving in, they knew they had to deal carefully with the merchants if they hoped to survive.

Upon their arrival at New Plymouth, New England, the Pilgrims had to immediately acquire commodities in order to have a means of trade. They began to plant corn so it would harvest when Weston's ship arrived. At this time, they also set out to establish relations with the Indians, and were able to successfully set up a system of trade. While this was happening, other settlers had become busy catching cod and bass. Within the first year, the settlers had managed to grow a substantial harvest, catch plenty of fish and acquire beaver skins through trade with the Massasoit Indians. Thus, the Pilgrims labored mostly for the benefit of the merchants, who were soon to arrive.

On November 9, 1621, Weston's first ship, The Fortune, arrived, and long term trade between Plymouth and England began. Robert Cushman came with the ship carrying a new contract which the Pilgrims were more willing to sign. The ship also had thirty-five new settlers as well as important provisions. The ship was soon stocked with beaver skins, wood and other items and returned to England. This event bonded the settlers to a seven year contract and assured them that most of their time would be devoted to acquiring enough goods to fill other ships and pay off their debt to Weston.

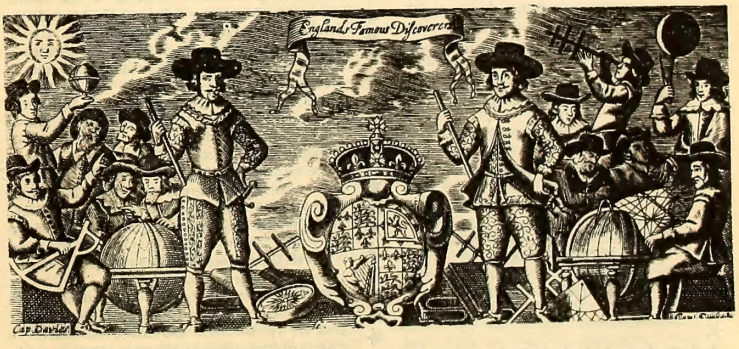
Weston's next ship, the Sparrow, brought considerable change to the settler's means of trade. The ship brought news that Weston had sold his share to John Pierce and was planning to start his own plantations nearby. Weston's plantation not only threatened the pilgrims with trade competition but it also threatened them with different religious and social ideas. Furthermore, Weston's desertion forced the pilgrims to find their own means of trade with other merchants, until they heard from Pierce.

The lack of a definite trading partner, forced the settlers into becoming ordinary businessmen. While the settlers waited for word from Pierce, they managed to find alternative ways of trade. The surprise arrival of a ship from Virginia helped . The Pilgrims traded beaver skins and corn for knives and beads, which were good items for trade with the Indians. At the same time, an unknown disease was spreading among the Indians. This disease was killing some and making others too weak to farm. The Pilgrims used this to their advantage by trading corn for a substantial profit. The trade with the Virginians established a good name for Plymouth among those trading in Virginia but it also opened them up to a different group of people and their ideas. The profit gained from the Indians demonstrates how the Pilgrims had gotten caught in the world of trade and profit.

As Plymouth found itself in vigorous competition over trade in New England, it also became threatened by internal struggles and outside influences. In 1624, the settling of the Dorchester colony on Cape Ann affected Plymouth financially and politically. By then, the Pilgrims had heard from Pierce and the other merchants and a few Pilgrims had become friendly with them, especially John Lyford and John Oldham. Lyford and Oldham were also among a small group of Pilgrims that had become angry with the church in Plymouth. As a result, they conspired with and persuaded the merchants to join them on Cape Ann. About two-thirds of the merchants chose to go with Lyford and Oldham. The new colony also took over some of Plymouth's plentiful fishing spots. The actions of Lyford and Odham not only effected Plymouth's trade and prosperity but it also showed that there was considerable discontent among the Pilgrims. Perhaps the temptations from outside influences were becoming too strong.

After the loss of the merchants who went to Dorchester, Plymouth sent Captain Miles Standish to interest some new merchants in Plymouth. Standish sailed aboard one of two ships filled with an

See Liesching, page 7



Person of the Month

Donna Rice

BY DAVE MAKARECHIAN

Editor's note: This will be the last issue for the Eye's person of the month column. Each month, the Eye's person of the month featured a prominent political newsmaker in an effort to prevent the paper from wandering too far away from current issues. Thanks to the College community for ignoring our pleas for input on the person of the month, and for help in other areas. Enjoy your apathy.

Donna Rice. Certainly an influential newsmaker for the month of May. And what a bod. Donna Rice earns person of the month honors for being one who may have significantly altered the course of history.

But Rice is a rather strange choice for person of the month — because she really didn't do anything. Donna Rice is important only as a name. At bottom, Gary Hart's scandal with Rice illustrates the weakness of current Democratic Party organization, and raises important questions about the Party's future.

Some have pointed to Rice as a truly influential figure in the course of political history. She single-handedly derailed an innovative — and likely successful — presidential bid. That's absurd. What happened between Donna Rice and Gary Hart (or what we think happened) was bound to happen between someone and Gary Hart, sooner or later. A number of sources have indicated that Hart has always had the reputation of womanizer. He's slick. So Rice is important only in underscoring aspects of Gary Hart that most of the voters probably knew, but were just unwilling to admit to themselves.

Just how ridiculous a candidate was Gary Hart? I thought most people realized that when the scandal broke about his name change. But it took yet another situation where Hart left himself wide open for public ridicule. This was clearly not the man to be making command decisions in the White House everyday.

Thus even more shocking than what was revealed about Hart was what was revealed about the Democratic party. Calling them poor judges of character is an understatement. Hart was the Democrats great white hope. He had matured as a candidate and had paid his dues by demuring to the Mondale fiasco in 1986. But the Democrats had

photo courtesy of U.S. News and World Report

overcommitted themselves. All of their eggs were in the basket of a Washington smoothy. And when a strong, top candidate has an elicit weekend for a swim-suit model, the rest of the party could suffer irrepairably.

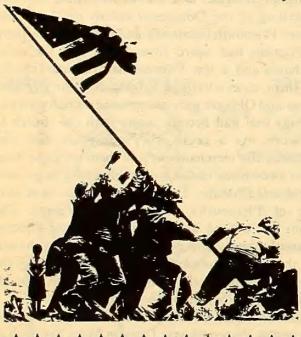
Just how bad will they suffer? Well, a strong indication is the newest entrant into the Democratic ring: Sen. Simon, of Illinois. The man wears bow ties. The entrance of such an obscure candidate illustrates that now, it's anybody's race. Without a candidate providing strong leadership through the primary season, the Democrats will lose an element of consistency and a jumping off point for the rest of the candidates.

Moreover, Hart's abrupt departure promises to disrupt the entire party structure. On the surface Hart was still playing the role of the outsider — a virgin politician in the face of traditional, Democrat power politics. But being the front runner for three years brings with it a rather large dose of the party politics thing. Hart had been busy forging coalitions and building bridges since he left the platform with Mondale in 1984. His quick departure has sent the entire card house tumbling. Just how fast the remaining Democrat hopefuls can rebuild and reclaim aspects of the Hart machine will be the true test of this year.

And where will the Democrats go from here? Likely not the White House. Baring a (more) major Republican disaster in the upcoming months, the Democrats just don't seem to offer anyone reasonable. Biden, Gephardt, Dukakis, Babbitt? Don't be silly. Is this the year of Jesse Jackson? No thought seems more scary to mainstream America.

So, Donna Rice, we — like Gary Hart — have used you. Not a figure (no pun intended) of changing the course of history, but a name — illustrating the weakness of a party that had banked on the innovative young Westerner with new ideas.

But we may not have heard the end of Gary Hart. The man admitted that all his service — to his adopted state of Colorado and to other constituents — has been with an eye to the presidency himself. I don't think he's going to give up this easily. Senator Hartpence has always been prone to change.



The Ed's Box

This is it, the last of a series of Disparaging Eyes to be put out by the current editors. The past semester has been exhilarating, frustrating, and above all, rewarding. With this volume of the Eye, new ground was broken. We dared to go against the entrenched ideas of the paper and include topics that dealt with sports and human interest.

In the beginning we were villified and castigated by the CC publishing elite, but we endured and put out a product that we believe to be the finest possible for its circumstance. Change and improvement, we learned, are indeed feared within these ivy covered walls, but persistence is not.

So what did we hope to accomplish this semester? To make the Eye a vital and readable publication.

Did we succeed? Well, we think so. You see, it's hard to gauge your success or failure at an endeavor with no more than word of mouth response. While we realise that it is a bit of a bother to put pen to paper and respond to something you've read, it is nonetheless a needed thing. Remember, bitching to your roomie about Dave Mak's gay rights article doesn't do the community at large any good. Bitching to us, at least, gets your ideas into the discussion process and that is part of the reason you spend that ungodly sum of money to come here.

Still, the attempt was made to make The Eye a better publication. We set out to increase readership, and we did; we set out to diversify The Eye, and we did. Perhaps we did not accomplish these rather lofty goals to the extreme which we had hoped. The experience and overall memories reign as bittersweet. But the regrets are few. Both of us, if given the chance to take on this project again, would probably do some things differently. Nevertheless, the overall focus of change which we felt was needed would remain full intact.

And now some personal thoughts...

Peter Scott and Pat Ledger will be taking over as Editors-in-Chief for The Eye next fall. Both of these guys are are intelligent and driven individuals. To these two future editors we offer both a challenge and a plea. The challenge is this: uphold the standards for professional journalism to the fullest; don't compromise quality. More importantly, we ask these two scholars to keep the publication where it exists in terms of readership. The current editors have worked long and hard to open The Eye up to the entire CC community. To some extent we've succeeded. We only ask you, the next editors, to expand on what we have accomplished. Please don't turn The Eye into the parochial, stuffy, aloof publication which it once was. Keep The Eye diverse, and open to all.

The time ahead will present a difficult and dramatic transition period for The Eye. Hopefully the waters will not be too tempestuous (regardless of the tightfisted antics of the CCCA).

We close by saying "Thank You." First, we would like to express gratitude to our staff...To Dave Makarechian, a man who adds new meaning to the word "organized." To Steve Geraghty, a hard worker, excellent writer and Class AAA human being. To Bill Porter, a guy with a great sense of humor, dedication, and many talents. To Karl Ossentjuk, a reliable, personable individual. To Juan Calderon, a person with hidden artistic talents which caught the editors by complete (delighted) surprise. To Linda Shireman, and Linda Imhoff...we could not have done it without you. To Dave Fitzgerald for helping us get off the ground; and last but not least, to Karen Willoughby, for contributing her talents as Copy Editor. Finally, we express thanks to our writers — Matt Sanidas and Greg Archer, Suzie Klein, Robert Jurkiewicz and all the rest. A newspaper obviously cannot function without good writers. To these people we crack an icy cold one, and wish them all the best.

Most importantly, we would like to thank you, the students and faculty of Colorado College. You are the reason for The Eye's existence. Thanks for giving this publication the second chance which it deserved. On a larger note, one of (Brian Smith) will be leaving this fine institution for the so-called 'real' (i.e. business) world. To this Brian says: "Thanks for the terrific memories, CC!"

STAFF

Brian Smith & Norm Leahy...Editors-in-Chief

Juan Calderon & Bill Porter...Art Editors

Karl Ossentjuk, Steve Geraghty & Dave Makarechian...Associate Editors

Karen Willoughby...Copy Editor

Dave Fitzgerald...Layout Editor

Contributors:
R. Samuel B. Liesching, Matt Sanidas, Greg Archer, Robert Jurkiewicz, Suzi Klein, Tom Ori

Linda Imhoff...Typesetter

THUROW REVISITED

Point...

BY NORMAN LEAHY

What does this country need to compete in the global economy of tomorrow? According to some people, among them Dr. Lester Thurow and Brian M. Smith, we need to change our way of thinking about economic systems.

Okay. But does that mean that we must adopt the policies of the rest of the world to achieve competitivness?

No.

What do we need? Less interference by the government and more incentives for the private sector.

But first the situation. We run chronic budget and trade deficits. Our saving tax rates are among the lowest in the western world. We also have low inflation and interest rates. Throw into this an aging industrial infrastructure and you have a picture of the United States as an economic entity.

So where do we go? If you are among those who follow the pied pipers of command economics, then you undoubtedly think that what we need to do is to castrate the American economy so as to bring it in line with the rest of the socialist economies of the world. If you believe the dictates of Dr. Thurow, then you want our kids to go to school longer, our taxes to increase, specialists to become CEO's and M.B.A.'s to take a powder. While this makes for good fiction in the ivory towers of academia, it makes for hellish fact in the real world.

What the good Doctor says we need is to tighten our belts and become a lean economic machine like our competitors. Lower consumption and greater rates of saving will enable us to cut our deficits. But the only way to really reduce consumption is to raise taxes to levels that are prohibitively high. Lower consumption leads to lower standards of living and that leads to lower tax receipts. In the end, the goal of lower consumption to lower the trade imbalance is realized, but has cost the public its fundamental right of choice.

Choice on the part of consumers is what drives the economy. We decide what will be produced and what won't. Government regulation and taxation have been notorious for keeping the consumer from regulating the market, thus allowing the economy to languish under the parochial whims of the bureaucracy. Increased controls through taxes do nothing but to take away what little is left of that consumer power, not to mention the fact that increased taxes tend to strangle private sector growth.

And what of the charge that our children should be in school longer so that they may be brought up to the standards of our competitors?

It is hollow, shallow and too pat to be a real alternative. While the test scores say that our kids are behind the rest of the world in almost every facet of education, more schooling is not the way to bring about a change. Better schooling is.

That our populace is riddled with illiteracy speaks to the question of a need for the complete overhaul of the educational system. Here too the emphasis should be on local reform and personal choice and not on a federally mandated program that turns out automatons instead of thinking individuals. Only in this way can we be assured that not only will our workforce be educated but also that it will be varied. Variety and nonspecialization will insure our ability to compete.

Which brings the next point to bear: specialists as CEOs and MBAs as bit players. Though specialists serve a valuable purpose in the creative process, they are usually too specialized to carry products from the drawing board to the store shelves. And while MBAs can market, the cannot create. Thus instead of relying on one or the other to lead American industry, we should be moving toward an integration of the two so as to use the best of both worlds.

Clearly the American economy needs more to bring it around than the quick fix statism of the new ideas movement. We need a truly revolutionary swing away from the interventionalist Keynesian policies of the past half century into the free market policies that have been generally ignored as too reactionary or unfeasible until recently. An increase in social and economic regulation will succeed only in burying our economy. The free market gives us the opportunity to surge ahead.

The choice, for now, is yours.

...Counter-Point

BY BRIAN SMITH

Last week, I had the privilege of witnessing a speech by one of the brilliant economists of our time: Dr. Lester Thurow of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Among those accompanying me on the excursion to Gates Common Room were fellow colleagues/staff members Dave Makarechian and Norm Leahy. Norm and Dave found some of Mr. Thurow's ideas somewhat amusing at best. But this writer was clearly impressed with what Mr. Thurow had to say. My only regret: that the man does not seriously consider running for office.

Norm, in his criticism of Thurow, misses one of the key points which Mr. Thurow is trying to make. No, Lester Thurow is not advocating socialism. He instead wants America to reach its competitive potential by fostering a coalition between government and the private sector; attempt to get these two entities to act responsibly, and you have a more efficient economic structure. Now, let us move away from the vagaries and into specifics...

My deep respect for Mr. Thurow stems from one simple realization: the man is a pragmatist. Being a pragmatist myself, I can easily relate to what he has to say. We live in a complex world, confronted by tough choices. "Less interference by the government and more incentives for the private sector" sounds nice. Presumably that means less taxes and lower spending. Throw in "less regulation over business activity" for good measure. But where does one draw the line? Does this mean that we cut spending on education? Does it mean that we eliminate government programs and institutions which have worked and made America more competitive? Like Mr. Leahy, I consider myself both a fiscal conservative and suspicious of public bureaucracies. But let us be realistic, Norm. A lot of government programs are not only necessary but effective. Furthermore, our trade partners have greater amounts of regulation and taxation than we do. Yet they out-compete America on the world market. Frankly, the "less interference" argument is vague, unrealistic and (to use a term popular in my native Midwest) "doesn't hold water."

A general agreement exists that we must cut our monstrous budget deficits. But how do we go about doing this? Sure, we make Draconian spending cuts until we balance the budget. Or we can raise taxes. Or we can cut spending and raise taxes, which given the politics of this country is the pragmatic thing to do.

—RONNIE, THIS BUD'S FOR YOU—
...AND THAT'S HOW THE ARABIANS DEPOSITED THE MONEY... DID I EVER TELL YOU ABOUT THE CONTRA-AID MEMO... THEN THERE WAS THE... BLAH BLAH BLAH BLAH
MCFARLANE

No, compromising does not lead to a command economy! Compromising instead presents a viable way of bringing revenues — and depended-upon government expenditures — into line. Norm, fiscal realism does not necessarily lead to socialism. To say that it does is absurd.

But as Dr. Thurow pointed out, reducing the budget deficit only presents a first step to making America more competitive. We must become a more educated, more dynamic citizenry. We need to change our way of thinking. As Dr. Thurow pointed out, in the new, competitive international economy, free lunches do not exist. Yes, Norm better schooling is the key; but so is more schooling. Why not improve and lengthen the school year?

Yes, Norm, America does need to become a "lean economic machine like our competitors," in order to maintain our standard of living. But taxation, expenditures, consumption and production more in line with one another will not take away the public's choice over what they consume. Instead, it will bring about a more prosperous citizenry, increasing their freedom of choice.

We've already talked of the need for improving our educational system. Like Mr. Leahy, I agree it must be overhauled. But the Federal Government has to play a role. Granted, personal choice and local autonomy bear importance. But where will the money come from for states and localities on the lower end of the income scale? If we are going to seriously overhaul our educational system, it will cost more money. The Federal Government will have to play a role, to ensure that low-income areas can pay for improving their school systems as well.

Now a look at private sector improvement...

Granted, MBA's and specialists both have roles to play in American business. Mr. Thurow agrees with this assessment. But his point is this: all company people must know their products inside out and must have an international marketing focus. This means that MBA's should not separate themselves from the technology end of the business. It also means that engineers have a keen awareness of the consumer's needs and wants. This last point is especially important, applied on a global scale. As Mr. Thurow stated, you know we can compete when we can market products internationally which we ourselves would not want.

Fiscal pragmatism does not mean socialism and statism. Free market economics does not necessarily contradict the Federal Government playing a role to ensure America's competitiveness in the world economy. A cooperative relationship between the public and private sectors is a necessity. Both sectors must play a role in improving America's competitiveness.

The Galloping Gourmets

BY MATT SANIDAS AND GREG ARCHER

Is it possible to mix cuisine with diplomacy? How would you the reader like to discuss politics with Francois Mitterand over a cup of vichy soise soup at the Charles V hotel on the Champs-Elysees in the middle of Paris? If you asked us, we would gladly accept the offer. In any case, the subject of French cuisine brings back many fond memories of our experience in the various dining "endroits" of France. This is to say that each region of France is famous for one type of dish or another, and it was one of our goals to sampel each specialty with inquisitive delight.

Beginning our "European Vacation" in the culturally rich "ville" of Perpignan, we were pleasantly plumped with the region's delicacies. Bordering the Mediterranean, Southern France is blessed with perhaps the world's best seafood. Every afternoon, the fishing boats dock with the sweetest swordfish and mouth-watering mollusks, without even mentioning the cute little clams and the succulent shrimp. Townspeople scurry to the seaside to scout out the best in seasonal seafood. French chefs furiously prepare a fabulous feast to feed the famished masses who frivolously forgot to fend for themselves. Meanwhile, happy housewives hoist hot handles hastening a dinner of halibut for the hungry husband. In any case, seafood is frequently found in the diets of the French.

Now we arrive at a most interesting part of French cuisine and culture. This is the choice of wine to complement the flavor of the feast. Usually, we choose the region's generic wine or more simply "vin de table." Some people prefer to be more exclusive by choosing an aged wine from another region. However, for our palettes, the table wine more than complemented the cuisine. Rumor even has it that when the more prestigious Bordeaux region has a bad year, it comes to southern France to buy the consistently good grapes that the Perpignan region has to offer. In addition to this, we found that the vineyards of southern France and their owners proved to be most hospitable places to visit and tour. It wasn't long before we became aquainted with the various workers of the "co-operatives" and we were treated to hearty glasses of their best wine. Although we left these wineries many times tipsy, we learned a great amount about the production and distillation of wine. It did not help any that our French father was an avid consumer of wine and spirits. Needless to say, we had a very enjoyable time during our tours and at our dinners, these wines were often consumed.

An average dinner at our French residence was fit for three kings. Dinner usually began with "aperatifs" which consisted of both little crunchy munchies, olives and Pastis (a licorice liquor similar to Uzo). This alone was enough to quell our hunger for the night, but the best was yet to come. Before the soup was even served, we were able to munch on sauscison, bread and pate. Then the soup was the official entry into the meal. This usually commenced at about eight thirty. After an ungodly amount of predinner servings of food, the main plate was served. Frequently our French mother expressed concern over our eating habits because according to her we "ate like birds." So to keep our honor as healthy growing youths, we ate too much for our stomach capacity. I (Greg) gained twenty unwanted pounds and I (Matt) gained thirty pounds. We attributed the weight gain to the fact that we never had any idea what was to follow. It is not uncommon to have seconds or thirds on every course including the pre-dinner warm-up. As stated above the main course usually contained seafood prepared in a succulent manner that made our minds defy the capacity of our stomachs. It was not uncommon to find rabbit, fowl, poultry, pork and occasionally beef in our main course. But this was not the end. Dinner then took on a lighter side and we ate salad to aid our digestion. At this point on special occasions when many other hungry Catalan guests arrived at our home, we were treated to a special liquor that helped expand our stomachs even more than humanly possible. This was performed so that we could start the second half of our battle with our excessive "gourmandise."

The plates were cleared and a new setting was brought swiftly followed by vegetables or a cassarole. Assuming that the end was near, we devoured the properly prepared side-dish. Once again, the plates were cleared and the fruits and cheeses were brought. One must realize that it is impossible to refuse the cheese. As our French father always said, "un jour sans fromage est comme un jour sans soliel!" (a day without cheese is like a day without sun). So we would force a piece of cheese down to please the family. By this point we had already loosened our belts and could not wait to escape this paradise of self full-fillment. To our chagrin, the plates were once again cleared and dessert was served. Now, it is important to note that French people are biologically different from Americans in that they have two stomachs. The second one is exclusively saved for the desserts. So when asked "who wants dessert?", each French person threw two hands into the air signifying their obsession with the sweets. Finally, the meal was finished at about midnight. This marked the time for us to go to our rooms and do our homework which for some reason was always done the next morning.

In conclusion, one must ask himself or herself if it is possible to eat like three kings? The answer is yes because we have done it and it only takes a little bit of practice. In any case, being pseudo-diplomats of the United States, it is hard for us to imagine that problems can arise between the diplomatic corps of different nations when they are stationed in France. We say this because everyone that comes to France is obliged to eat its food and become entrepeneurs of this fabulous asset of France. Eating and enjoying oneself can jump any cultural and political barriers that exist between nations of the world.

The Wrong Solution

BY ROBERT JURKIEWICZ

This article pertains to all of those shanty builders and other believers of divestment. Give it up! Find a new cause to fight for, because divestment doesn't work. Put an end to your needless fight for divestment.

First, let me go through a brief history of what has happened to those firms which have divested from South Africa. Firms such as IBM, Coca-Cola, and Procter & Gamble have divested; since they couldn't take the factories home with them, they had to sell them. For the managers of these corporate giants, it was an easy, leveraged buyout. Often, the factories sold for but a fraction of the market value, because everyone knew the companies had to get rid of them. From this point of view, divestment has allowed for a cheap form of corporate restructuring — a possible boost for the South African economy. Thus, divestment has not helped the plight of the black majority. Instead, if anything, it has boosted the incomes of apartheid proponents. The U.S. has relinquished its influence in an area where its influence is desperately needed.

In response to the restructuring program and sanctions which have coincided with divestment, South Africa is now substituting exports for import substitutes. Because South Africa is one of the few countries that can run an autarkic (self sufficient) society, divestment in this sense has failed. And if the economy is unable to become autarkic, the Soviet Bloc nations sure aren't going to take part in this senseless movement. They will provide the South African economy with anything the Western world is unable to provide — and before you know it, another puppet government will be installed. And the world will say, where was the U.S.? In response, everyone will say, "they were taking part in that senseless movement — divestment." Once U.S. firms leave South Africa, America will be unable to enter the country to protect our vital interests. And once this occurs, the only way the U.S. will be able to influence the South African government again is by sending in the Armed Forces. So why not allow our businesses to operate in South Africa and find a new ingenious plan that will work better than divestment. I am not against the movement of abolishing apartheid, but the methods have not made any progress against this atrocious system.

As for the sanctions imposed by the West in accordance with divestment, they too have made little impact on the South African state. There will always be someone willing to supply South Africa, for the right price, with the necessary goods to keep their economy flourishing. Even without outside help South Africa is one of the few countries that could establish an autarkic system. Sanctions can only work if South Africa can be isolated by all the countries and individuals of this world. But human nature provides us with the loophole. "Sanction-busting" has already been developed to a high art form; not all countries have levied sanctions or will do so in the future. Further, as I said before, there will always be someone willing to help apartheid for the right price. Also, South Africa cannot be isolated — it is the major contributor to the sub-Saharan gross national product (about one third of the total GNP). The nations south of the Sahara depend upon South Africa for many goods, there is an interdependent system at work there, one that cannot be isolated. In failing to isolate South Africa, the Western world in turn is unable to manipulate the system of apartheid. In failing to do so, the movement has distinguished itself.

So please stop your useless pressuring of businessmen abroad. Find another solution to the problem. Apartheid must be stopped, but divestment is not the answer.

Green Politics

BY BILL PORTER

The television advertisement opens with a camper in a forest taking photographs of the trees; they are bare except for a few brown leaves. He unloads his film and dips it into the nearby river to develop the pictures, which he then admires. Just as smiles spread across the viewers' faces, Professor Hoimer von Ditfurth—a widely respected German ecologist—enters and explains that the forest is brown not from autumn chill but from acid rain, while the river is just one of many German rivers filled with so much chemical waste that it is almost processing fluid now. Animated green tendrils next appear, growing out of tree stumps and spelling out "DIE GRUNEN"—"The Greens."

The Greens represent West Germany's newest political party, and, arguably, the greatest threat to its political system as well. Officially born at a constitutional convention in Karlsruhe in January 1980, the Greens see themselves as the voice of various radical, democratic, ecological, antinuclear, citizen-initiative movements that have been active in the Federal Republic since early 1970. Specifically, according to the Greens' Federal Program, their policies "are guided by long-term visions for the future and are founded on four basic principles: ecology, social responsibility, grassroots democracy, and nonviolence." Strong support for these issues has led many political analysts to conclude that the Greens have now stabilized as Germany's third most important party—displacing the position traditionally held by the Free Democratic Party (FDP). Green members and supporters are primarily young, well-educated, and urban; their greatest electoral support is found in university towns and northern cities. Not surprisingly, their support of these issues has strong appeal among what US News and World Report calls "antiestablishment young voters." The movement, in fact, owes it birth to a "widespread feeling that, whether in open coalition or not, the main parties had in practice become an all-party alliance with no room for outsiders," reports The Economist. Thus, the Greens are a party with a difference—they truly represent real opposition in the West German political system. It is this commitment to opposition that, many observers fear, threatens the political stability of the German Republic.

The dominant ideal among the Greens is that of a full and direct democracy—an ideal that clashes with the actual politics of modern Germany. In attempting to create a true "grassroots democracy," the party has often paralyzed the system itself. Their insistence on the "imperative mandate" (delegates strictly bound by party instructions), biannual rotation of delegates (for greater participation of all party members), and refusal to compromise has proved disastrous for the existing form of democracy. Indeed, Mayor Manfred Rommel of Stuttgart calls the Greens a "destabilizing force." In the state parliaments where Greens now sit, the party's characteristic stalling and blocking of legislation has brought things to a standstill wherever no single party or coalition wields clear control. The possibly of a similar paralysis of the Bundestag—the German national parliament—is obviously troublesome; more important than the difficulty of conducting legislative meetings with the Greens is, however, the issue of coalition governments. Professor Jurg Steiner, in his book European Democracies, asserts, "The development of a set of widely accepted, informal rules for the process of cabinet formation is important for the stability of West German democracy" since no party has yet controlled a majority in parliament. Following the 1966-69 grand coalition between the Republic's two largest parties—the Christian Democrats (CDU/CSU) and the Social Democrats (SPD), there has been "great reluctance to form another coalition" between these two parties, and "there is a more or less informal rule against such a coalition." The formation of a German cabinet, according to Steiner, thus depends on the cooperation of one of the large parties and, traditionally, the smaller FDP. Yet, as he also points out, "the Green party considers the entire parliamentary game played by the three established parties illegitimate and corrupt and refuses to participate in any deals." With the new possibility of the FDP failing to receive the five-percent threshold of votes in national elections (beginning with the next one on January 25) needed to obtain any representation in the Bundestag, this attitude has, as Steiner phrases it, "disruptive potential."

Much of this speculation has, however, actually been overstated. Indeed, the Green party is essentially incapable of causing serious trouble for West Germany's political systems for three reasons. First, the Greens face an unstable and uncertain future. Despite what The New Left Review has called "a significant electoral following in the society at large," The New York Times recently reported the party is "now at the very bottom of the roller-coaster run, fearful of going altogether off the rails." Second, a faction of the party—known as the "Real-politiker" wing or "Realos"—advocates cooperation with other German parties. Further, this wing has been largely successful, despite its minority status, in asserting a policy of conciliation. Finally, a Green refusal to participate within the boundaries of political tradition will not ultimately hamper the German government in any significant way; if anything, it will lead to the dissolution of the Green party itself.

***

For the present, however, the Christian Democrats will retain their Bundestag majority in coming years, perhaps even gaining enough votes to break their coalition with the FDP and govern absolutely. Yet, the German news magazine STERN sees public dissatisfaction with the Kohl government in terms of policies on "arms control, national pece, the environment, and exploited Third World countries," as well as unhappiness with "mass unemployment, cutbacks in social welfare, and decreases in common educational opportunities." Thus, "If the electorate were to give this alternative [a possible SPD-Green government] their votes, and the Social Democrats and Greens were to take on the assignment [of correcting these problems], then who knows—perhaps 1991 will be the time of Oskar Lafontaine [a leading Social Democrat and nephew of ex-Chancellor Willy Brandt] and Otto Schilly [the prominent Green realo]."

In the meantime, the Greens themselves must struggle to survive the political forces threatening to destroy them. Although Der Spiegal claims the party is "past questions of its existence," the German periodical still recognizes that "several internal problems" jeopardize its longevity as a party. Foremost among these is the Green inability to develop an effective legislative program and the corresponding party splits that have caused this. Struggling to survive among a declining electorate, the Greens must also decide whether to become more cooperative within the system, as the voters demand, or stick to the fundamental, "grassroots" ideals the party was built on. Finally, the Greens must establish their own niche in German politics, even as the larger parties threaten to destroy or integrate them. Certainly the Greens and the issues they champion have something to offer the German political system; yet, it appears the movement may be swallowed by the very system that it has tried to change. Perhaps, however, the Greens will be able to continue fighting off these pressures as they have for the past seven years. As Helmut Lippelt, a Green representative to the Lower Saxony parliament, points out, "The Greens always need crises, so they can confront reality, like a child."

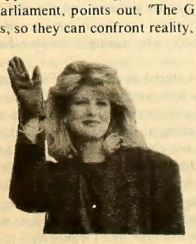

photo courtesy of Time

A Sugar High

BY SUZIE KLEIN

I remember when hard times hit the family budget and my mother would have these grandiose ideas of earning money by holding a garage sale. She allowed us to have our own table, provided we helped out with the rest of the sale. So, out came the hoola hoops, gum holders, nerf balls, Bob Hope records, and musty books. No matter how rough things got, we never dreamed of sacrificing our plastic hobby horses or our high speed train set. Campaign buttons and antique coins had to suffice. The big day usually fell on a Saturday, so Friday night we arranged the tables and tacked up signs on the telephone poles throughout the neighborhood.

When Saturday morning came, my sister and I would race outside to the back yard and start manning our table. Everyone in the neighborhood came to shuffle through our prized collection of junk and to see what they could add to their own messy basement. My sister and I took turns managing our "$.25 FOR THREE" stand. One of us did sales while the other worked on publicity. Usually we earned around two dollars which we split between ourselves. Naturally, after a long hot day of work we felt satisfied with every penny we earned. After we cleaned up the front yard my Mom would drive us to Baskin Robbins so we could celebrate. We always ordered bubble gum ice cream. You could cram the ice cream down into the sugar cone, bite the end off the cone, and then suck the ice cream out of the bottom. Then after you sucked or drank the ice cream out, depending on how long it took you to jam the ice cream in the cone, you would have a gold mine of bubble gum. On the way home as the breeze, from the rolled down window made your hair stick to the ice cream on your face, you chewed on your gum and thought how great the ice cream tasted because you earned it with your own money.

Well, economically the United States is seeing some hard times and President Reagan wants to have a garage sale. He and his cohorts suggested asset sales to remedy budget problems. This means selling government assets such as Amtrack or National Petroleum. Unfortunately, selling assets does not remedy or solve anything. Just like the family garage sale, it produces only temporary income. As kids and as adults we must realize that we actually are not gaining any money from these sales. That ice cream tasted good because we thought we earned it with our own blood, sweat, and tears, when really we never forked out a cent to purchase the objects we sold. Just like when your parents gave you an allowance and you felt as though you were earning money, America pretends it can earn money by selling its assets. We have to work on balancing the budget instead of getting a temporary sugar rush.

It's Time for a Change

BY STEVE GERAGHTY

What's happening to the education that our children are receiving? (Not that I have any children, but you get the point.) I recently had a little chat with a first grade teacher in Denver, and she graciously gave me her views. The problem, it seems, lies in the teachers that are earning their livings in elementary schools. First of all, they will no longer challenge the children they teach. The second problem is the lowered expectations of the teachers concerning the childrens' performances in school. Combined, these two are forming a society of pretty mediocre students. Why are the children not being challenged? Why do teachers expect less from today's students?

Both of these questions are answered with the philosophy that the children must not feel pressured, nor should they struggle with any schoolwork. Struggling will only lead to lowered self-esteem, and we certainly can't have the children feeling like losers. But they don't have to feel like losers just because they have to struggle to understand a concept. If struggling weren't a part of life, then we would still be walking in the nude and running around looking for berries to eat. Progress has been made in societies because people tried to make things easier for themselves. Struggling children will eventually learn. But without a little hardship, they won't be able to play ball with the big boys when they get older.

In turn, children should be pushed in school. Not forced to learn under the penalty of death, but pushed somewhat harder than the love taps they now receive. "First graders should not know how to read." What a bunch of hogwash! If the children entering first grade don't know how to read, why are we spending any money on kindergarten teachers? To be babysitters? Teachers in the elementary schools today need to start challenging their students—and expect them to respond to the challenge.

These teachers just might start this task by looking at themselves. Many of them are too lazy to teach. They lack creativity in their teaching methods; too many dittos are being distributed to the kids (if dittos have worked before, they should work again). The teacher needs to stimulate some inkling of desire to learn in a child. Yet while it is idealistic for a teacher to think that he can inspire every student every year, it is not idealistic to at least make some effort. And if the desire isn't ever aroused, the teacher still has the responsibility to bring the students through a grade level. Students coming out of a school year not on grade level is probably the biggest problem in education right now.

If a student begins in the lower classes, he is there to stay. Many arguments are raised that some kids are late bloomers, and that when their time comes, everyone will recognize this and move the child up to the level on which he belongs. All fine and dandy—except for one little bit of reality: in order for students to be moved up, some students need to be moved down. Otherwise, every class will become too large. But no student will ever be moved down. (And if you don't believe this, go to an elementary school and see for yourself!) Two main roadblocks are in the way of moving students down when they really belong there: the parents, who believe that their child is still peforming just as well as before, and the administrators, who see moving students down (or even more importantly, holding them back a year) as indicating failure to educate on their part. Both late bloomers and early bloomers are trapped in an inflexible system.

It is time for the teachers to raise themselves from their unimaginative niches. It is time that teachers stop pampering students for fear of harming their psyches. And above all, it is time for everyone to start being honest with themselves and admit to—and attempt to change—the unpleasant realities that now exist in our educational system.

On Education: Late-Night Ramblings

BY J. S. GERMAN

Why be alarmed?

Statistics have shown that since the conception and subsequent implementation of the block plan, fewer CC graduates have headed off to graduate schools. Supposedly they have decided that their years of learning are over once the Bachelor of Arts degree is firmly grasped in their hands. But is this really the case? Much easier to answer than that is the question whether that hypothesis is even the most likely of cases.

I don't think that CC graduates have decided that their education is over. My guess is that they are merely ending their ties with traditional methods of gaining an education and opting for different approaches to learning. The best way I can think of to explain this phenomenon is the analogy of teachers as guides. Since kindergarten, teachers have been our guides; someone early on decided that guides were a necessary part of the learning process. How can someone achieve knowledge without knowing in what direction they are supposed to be heading? My response: easily.

Every bit of information that we have running through society had to come from some initial source. Granted, this source is not the same for everything. Physicists have given us gravity, biologists population genetics, historians a sense of the interconnectedness of generations. But each of these topics started as an unexplored area of the world. Yet for them to be around today, somebody had to take the initiative to explore those fields. Whoever was the first certainly didn't have a guide. Nevertheless, these explorers still discovered some valid information during their travels.

Which brings me to my point about CC graduates—they are realizing that getting an education doesn't necessarily require the leadership of a guide. A little trial-and-error never hurt anybody.

The fact that once college is over, more pressing problems, such as earning a living, force many would-be scholars to take off their thinking caps and do something practical in life. Reading Shakespeare is hardly a way to pay the phone bill. Then again, going through school waiting to learn that one important economic principle is hardly a way to gain an education.

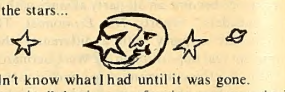
As J. Glenn Gray claimed, in Rethinking American Education, education should not be something that happens for us but rather something that happens to us. No one can deny that an education won't do something for us; we can get more prestigious jobs, earn more money, and afford Christmas vacations with the upwardly mobile possibilities in our future. But that should never be the only goal for obtaining an education. We should find ourselves involved in the pursuit of knowledge; we should be acting at all times to gain a better understanding of the material laid before our eyes. And we should never sit and wait for everything to be brought right before our eyes. We must put forth effort in order to reap the full rewards of education. Once this goal of education is realized, we can hardly blame anyone who chooses to explore the world on his own. I believe that education's best guides are those who have charted a course through unmarked fields—and the best scholars are those who do the same.

I hate mornings.

I shouldn't hate the mornings as much as I do, but I think I inherited the genes for sleeping in from my mother. Or it might be the fact that I sneeze uncontrollably for ten minutes every day after I get up. Whatever the reason, I would probably sleep until noon every day if I could. But this kind of a practice on a daily basis would be bad for a number of reasons. First of all, not everybody feels the way that I do. Many people enjoy watching the sun rise each day. (I find this event fascinating; I also find dreams fascinating.) Second, these same people accomplish more things in a single day than I do. They should; after all, they don't waste half of their day. But I don't think of sleeping away the morning hours as wasted time because I enjoy sleeping and the dreams that it brings. Time I enjoy wasting is not wasted time.

That's probably why staring at the stars isn't wasted time.

Last night I stared at the stars. For a long time. I couldn't help but wonder whether I was the only person looking at the stars at those instants that I did. Or if I was staring at someone on some distant star, and he at me, and neither of us knowing it. Stars make me feel so small. But they don't make me feel insignificant. My place is here on earth. Others may have their place on another planet. Yet neither of us affects the other. Lewis Thomas says that we are just children of the universe, and I would have to agree with him. We are very young and have the potential for an unlimited number of developments. However, we might already be heading in the wrong direction. If only we could find a father planet somewhere out among the stars...



I didn't know what I had until it was gone.

We hear it all the time, so often in some cases that it has become trivial. Which is a shame, considering the vast amount of truth to the statement. The saying even holds true in a course on the philosophy of education.

This saying first came to mind as I read an essay by Lewis Thomas titled "Clever Animals." Each example of humans being tricked by animals followed the same pattern: the researchers involved in the project jumped so quickly to conclusions that as time wore on, they could not dream up alternate—and more correct—hypotheses as to what was actually going on. But once they removed themselves from the experiment in order to get a better view, they noticed their mistakes. When their passion was calmed and the facts were in, they were able to see exactly what they possessed all along—incorrect assumptions. But they had to detach themselves from their work to see the truth.

In the present day, we sometimes find ourselves so completely wrapped up in the technical aspects of educational fields that what we believe to be concrete specifics have become in reality—and ironically—abstractions. The whole picture is more concrete and has more meaning than all the bits and pieces; the whole is greater than the sum of its parts. Education is surrounded on both sides by none-too-attractive pitfalls. First is the valley of specificty: we get so involved in a technical aspect of a field that its dividends are of no benefit to anyone. The second valley is that of generalization: stepping too far back leaves us with many horizons, but no transportation with which to move in any direction.

Ideally, we should educate ourselves somewhere in between. Knowing when to dive and knowing when to come back up for air are both parts of education. The process of balancing the two is largely based on trial and error. Since each method requires a drawn-out approach, sometimes time stands in the way of ever successfully juggling the two. If done incorrectly, four years of life—be it the result of a liberal arts education or graduate school—is a stiff price to pay for a highly probable error.

Reflections on Walzer

BY TOM ORI

The moral problems raised by the conduct of war pose a dilemma worthy of investigation. The dilemma is born out of the relationship between Walzer's Jus ad Bellum and Jus in Bello. In analyzing each aspect of warfare, that is, justice of war, and justice in war, one must ask what actions are legitimate. More specifically, an analysis of Walzer will help us see one individual's attempt to resolve the two conflicting moral positions: utilitarianism and absolutism.

In order to define Walzer's position, it is imperative to understand these two polarized and tension-generating schools of reason. Nagel gives a solid and succinct definition, "Utilitarianism gives primacy to a concern with what will HAPPEN. Absolutism gives primacy to a concern with what one is DOING." (Nagel, pg.54)

A pupil of the utilitarian school continually endeavors to maximize good while minimizing evil. Though the philosophy implements some restrictions on Jus ad Bellum and Jus in Bello, moral prohibitions simply are not emphasized in the logic of the utilitarian argument. If the stakes are high enough, a utilitarian is most likely to abrogate the perfuctory limitations placed on the cause and the conduct of warfare.

An absolutist, in a different light, places highest priority on the immediate means and actions at one's disposal. The absolutist theory indoctrinates specific Do's and Don'ts as an integral part of its function to guide the would-be prince.

For the absolutist there exists a definitive threshold. Specific actions which fall into the permissive category are morally justified and therefore reside on one side of the threshold. Any other actions, conceivable or inconceivable, no matter what the circumstances, fall into a prohibitive category and thus lay on the other side of the threshold. Simply, there is an absolute right and an absolute wrong. Leaders cannot breach the threshold even if the proverbial heavens are falling. Utilitarian philosophy embraces a continuum; everything, more or less, rolls along in a continual dialectical process of confrontation and justification based on consequences.

Walzer's concepts of Jus ad Bellum and Jus in Bello are inextricably related; an analysis of one element is not complete without some consideration given to the other. It should come as no surprise that in his discussion and assessment of ad bellum and in bello, he demonstrates the logical power of two conflicting theories: utilitarian and absolutist.

At the same time, however, there is an inherent and underlying similarity between ad bellum and in bello. Though it would seem that conflicting concepts such as justice of war, and justice in war would lead to a different evaluation of each, such is not the case. Walzer's position on each aspect of warfare is similar. In evaluating Jus ad, and Jus in, one is guaranteed to encounter the almost inescapable tension which is generated between utilitarianism and absolutism. Walzer resolves a great deal of the dilemma by advocating a third alternative: the qualified absolutist position.

Jus ad Bellum

In his initial evaluation of a just war, Walzer is not conservative. His legalistic paradigm proposes a strict and regimented code from which the young Prince can decide whether he is justified in going to war. These six enumerated conditions reflect an absolutist philosophy. Though the entire legalistic paradigm bears great relevance to the absolutist argument, rule 5 deserves close consideration:

5. Nothing but aggression can justify war. (Walzer pg. 62) Rule 5 best summarizes the Walzerian proclivity towards absolutism. Aggression is a crime; when perpetrated against another country it "is a crime because, in all its forms, it challenges rights that are worth dying for." (Walzer pg. 53)

A state acquires the right to resist the aggressor only after the victim state has been "put to it." In this respect rule 3 poses some potential complications:

3. Any use of force or imminent threat of force by one state against the political sovereignty or territorial integrity of another constitutes aggression and is a criminal act. (Walzer pg. 62)

The phrase "immenent threat" alludes to a grey, ambiguous area. In the legalistic paradigm, however, true to absolutist form, Walzer articulates that rule 3 "focuses narrowly on actual or imminent boundary crossings..." (Walzer pg. 62) The key requirement for Walzer, in his identification of aggression, is that the "necessity is both obvious and urgent." (Walzer pg. 62)

For Walzer the only just war is one fought in self-defense. As further analysis will demonstrate, however, the legalistic paradigm does not account for the exceptions; "our judgements about the justice and injustice of particular wars are not entirely determined by the paradigm." (pg. 61) Walzer feels compelled to revise the legalistic paradigm regarding anticipation and intervention. It is here, at this point of revisal, where Walzer steps across the threshold, departing from the absolutist realm and entering the realm of qualification.

Walzer defends his revision on the basis that the concepts which underlie the paradigm are, at times, more important than the principle the paradigm evokes. The concepts on which the legalistic paradigm is constructed are rights to life and liberty. (Walzer pg. 86) One of many principles included within the paradigm is that "states should never intervene in the domestic affaris of the other states..." (Walzer pg. 86) There are situations, Walzer argues, in which the concepts of life and liberty come into direct conflict with the principle of non-intervention. Walzer contends that in such situations the underlying concepts outweigh the principles.

The first revision to the legalistic paradigm is a case of legitimate anticipation. Though legitimate anticipation has little to do with foreign intervention in a civil strife, a pre-emptive strike is an example of when the concepts of life and liberty supercede the principle of non-aggression. Walzer's justification of Israel's pre-emptive strike against Egypt neatly fits the formula which accompanies the revision: "states may use military force in the face of threats of war, whenever failure to do so would seriously risk their territorial integrity or political independence." (Walzer pg. 85) Agressive actions demand a people to take this risk.

The second, third, and fourth revisions justify wars outside of the legalistic paradigm's principle of self-defense. States can invade and just wars initiated in order to aid secessionist movements, to restore a balance of power within a state, once a foreign power has intervened, and to prevent the massacre of people by their own state. (Walzer pg. 108) Clearly one can see how revisions of this nature make Walzer a qualified absolutist in his assessment of Jus ad Bellum.

Walzer presents to the reader a codified guide; a guide which helps to discern when it is justifiable to go to war, and more implicitly when it is unjustifiable. This is an absolutist position: a justified realm, a threshold and an unjustified realm. With the adoption of certain, and definitive revisions, Walzer stipulates when that absolute code can be pushed aside. In advocating a third alternative Walzer creates a new realm. One can envision an absolutist territory in the near distance, a threshold which spills into an area of qualifations and further still, off on the horizon, stands a threshold which welcomes the utilitarian.

Someone may ask why Walzer's position is not simply utilitarian? Surely, one will note that revisions and qualifications of this nature leave the theory open to individual interpretation and subsequent concessions. While this is true to some degree, Walzer's revisions are far too organized and substantive to place his argument in the utilitarian, end-justifies-the-means category. Walzer, fortunately, intentionally includes restraints in his revisions. His defense of the position is stated in words no better than his own:

"Since the constraints are often ignored, it is some times argued that it would be best to insist on an absolute rule of nonintervention (as it would be best to insist on an absolute rule of anticipation). But the absolute rule will be ignored and we will have no standards by which to judge what happens next" (Walzer p. 108).

Jus in Bello

Central to the struggle in determining justice in war is the tension between winning and fighting well. This poses an undeniable dilemma for Walzer; while he abundance of goods from the colony. During the journey, the other ship was captured by the Turks. Because of the capture, Standish's efforts resulted in nothing and those merchants, who were already involved, only became more discouraged and halted trading. While Standish was away, Plymouth was forced to trade with other settlements, in one case, they traded for some French goods acquired by another colony. At this point, Plymouth could no longer rely upon England for trade instead it would be forced to negotiate and trade with other North American settlements.

See Ori, page 8

Liesching, from page 1

As the Pilgrims' financial problems grew, its involvement in trade increased. Seven years had passed since the agreement with Weston was made and Plymouth was still in debt eighteen hundred pounds. The settlers were forced to borrow money at a rate of 200 pounds a year for 9 years. Although they avoided the interest, the Pilgrims had to produce enough in trade to make a profit, which would be hard considering they had no English aid. They accomplished this by spreading out and establishing trading posts. Thus, the settlement spread out and inevitably the sturdy community began to weaken.

As the settlement spread out, it needed to fill and strengthen. During the seven year contract with the merchants, Pilgrims from Leyden were gradually being taken over to Plymouth. At the end of the contract, the Pilgrims in Leyden had no means of transport to Plymouth. In order to continue the transport, Plymouth sent a messenger, Isaac Allerton, to England to regain interest among the merchants hoping that some would be willing to bring passengers and goods to trade for commodities such as beaver skins and fish. He was successful and drew up a six year contract with James Sherley and other merchants. Unlike their previous contract, the new contract was between Sherley and the merchants and only eight of the members of the Plymouth colony. Thus, the Pilgrims were bonded to other merchants for another six years. More importantly, because only eight Pilgrims were involved, an unequal distribution of wealth was shown. These eight must have had more wealth than others in order to take the risk and would stand to gain even more if a profit was made. Furthermore, Plymouth must have had some disagreements over this issue demonstrating that its unity was weakening.

As the years continued, Plymouth spread out further in order to enhance its opportunity to trade. Through their expanding trade they dealt with the Dutch and numerous New England settlements. At the same time New England was growing in population with many new settlements which carried a variety of ideas. Outside influence on Plymouth was inevitable. It proceeded to weaken the unity the Pilgrims had cherished. They had feared a loss of unity in Leyden so they fled to North America. But it only delayed, at most, this loss. Because of their obligations to the merchants and the necessity to trade, they were forced to spread out and become weaker while new ideas moved in.

Ori, from page 7

acknowledges both the absolutist and utilitarian positions, Walzer labors to reconcile the utilitarian and absolutist positions. An analysis of Jus in Bello will demonstrate that Walzer is consistent in his advocation of a third alternative: qualified absolutism.

One premise in Walzer's argument is that soldiers on the battlefield are moral equivalents. It makes little difference if one soldier is fighting for the aggressor state; "'we must treat both combatants,' as Henry Sidgwick has written, 'on the assumption that each believes himself in the right.'" (Walzer pg. 128) Given the premise, Walzer suggests that rules of war are possible and do exist.

"Belligerent armies are entitled to try to win their wars, but they are not entitled to do anything that is or seems to them necessary to win." (Walzer pg. 131) Walzer views belligerents as autonomous groups, restricted, however, by certain agreements among states and independent moral principles. At once, Walzer seems to embrace utilitarianism — that states are permitted to do whatever is useful in achieving their victory — and accepting a type of absolutism — that there are restrictions rooted in moral principle.

Then again, in a different passage in his discussion, Walzer gazes upon the utilitarian position with a cynical eye: "...utilitarianism provides only a general endorsement of the war convention; after that it is unlikely to specify rules at all but only particular courses of action." (Walzer pg. 132)

The ensuing question is this: when does it become appropriate to lift those constraints? In answering the question Walzer employs the positive aspects of the utilitarian position, in order to identify the special cases "where victory is so important or defeat so frightening that it is morally necessary to override the rules of war." (Walzer pg. 132)

Before delving into this multifaceted question there is one rule of war which deserves elucidation. One principle of the war convention is that due care be taken in avoiding the killing of noncombatants. This principle serves as a prime example because it traces the first steps taken towards forging a third alternative. Walzer begins to bring both utilitarianism and absolutism into focus when he considers the nature and problem of double effect.

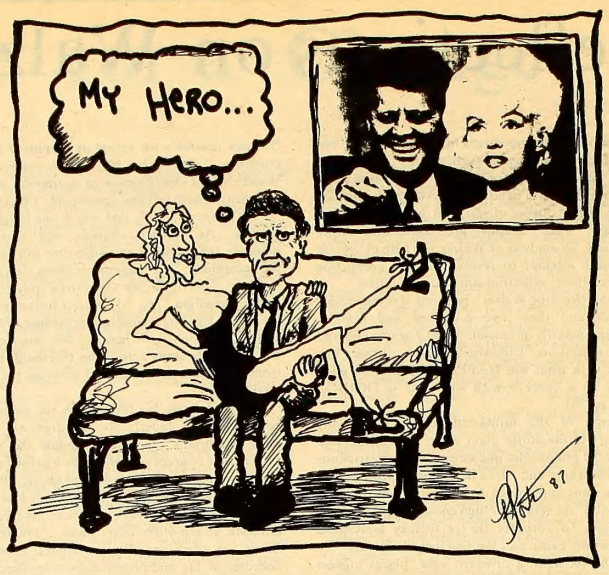
"Double effect is a way of reconciling the absolute prohibition against attacking noncombatants with the legitimate conduct of military activity." (Walzer pg. 153) The double effect theory defends the death of noncombatants only when their deaths are a byproduct of a military operation intended specifically to kill soldiers. Though Walzer admires the effort for a resolution, the substance remains incongruent with his position of qualified absolutism. The concept of double effect justifies the killing of noncombatants provided four conditions are met.

The specifics need not be expounded here; suffice it to state that Walzer perceives the concept of double effect as "overly utilitarian." The justification for killing noncombatants comes too easily. "The argument suggests the great importance of taking aim in wartime, and it correctly restricts the targets at which one can aim." (Walzer pg. 153) What disturbs Walzer is thinking about the unintended deaths. Where is a threshold between right and wrong to be constructed in this case? To answer this question a look to Walzer's "Dilemma's of War" is required.

It is best to say that Walzer 'understands' both sides of the ideological fence. As belligerents experience an escalation in the sentiment for the war effort, the more prone the two sides become to violating the rules of the war convention. The fascinating insight in Walzer's discussion is the justification given by states for violating the rules. He suggests that the rules are not broken for military necessity alone; "the rules are broken for the sake of the cause," for which the war is being fought. (Walzer pg. 227) The reader should note that at this stage of the analysis Walzer has come full circle. The tension between Jus ad Bello and Jus in Bello is most ostensibly displayed.

The utilitarian goal to achieve the most desirable outcome by implementing whatever possible means is understood by Walzer as a pejorative system of justification. Simply because a person is convinced his cause is more just than his adversary's does not give the individual the license to violate the basic human rights of life and liberty. Walzer defends an absolutist theory: "For the rights of innocent people have the same moral effectiveness in the face of just as in the face of unjust soldiers." (Walzer pg. 228)

Again, Walzer deserves credit for citing the utilitarian side: an entire community or race may be at stake. In such cases the urgency to win becomes the paramount concern, even if that entails overriding the rules of war. One is left with virtually no alternatives but to balance the possible outcome against the means and manners of fighting. How is one to resolve this polarized issue?



Enter the qualified absolutist. Walzer feels that all people have an inalienable right to life and liberty. This right is inviolate until a definitive point: the state of Supreme Emergency. Walzer has anticipated that many will criticize his supreme emergency doctrine on the grounds that each state will have its own perception of emergency.

Supreme emergency, as a qualification to the absolutist philosophy, must satisfy two criteria. The first criterion is the imminence of the danger. Just how close are we to this cataclys? The second criterion has to do with the emergency's danger. On a relative scale, the question of how serious the danger becomes crucial. "If we are to accept or defend the adoption of extreme measures, the danger must be of an unusual and horrifying kind" (Walzer pg. 253) For Walzer the one historical event which does fit into the qualification of supreme emergency were the actions the allies adopted to repel Hitler and his Third Reich.

Now we are better equipped to address the question of when it is justifiable to kill innocent noncombatants. Walzer sets the scenario: the Nazi's have rolled over Europe at a devastating pace and threatened Great Britain, all conventional means of warfare had been exhausted with no success, the allies figuratively had their backs against the wall. It is important for Walzer to recognize that a victory for Nazi Germany appeared more certain without the inauguration of an allied bomber offensive. Walzer notes that the situation fit the two criteria, "It is not just that such a victory was frightening; but also that it seemed in those years very close...Here was a supreme emergency where one might well be required to override the rights of innocent people and shatter the war convention." (Walzer pg. 259)

Absolutism gives way, partially, to a codified qualification. In other words when one passes through the threshold, departing absolutism and entering a qualified territory, one is not left to the capricious whims of utilitarianism; in the qualified realm there exists a set of somewhat flexible guidelines. Though this codification does not make crystal clear all the ambiguous terms, nor does it make Walzer's position fool proof, the middle ground does succeed in providing the student of morality and war with a way to think about a third alternative.

Walzer also wants to emphasize that even when a statesman decides to lift the constraints of the war convention, the individual should realize that he/she still violates viable human rights. To argue that one's state of supreme emergency eradicates the rights of innocent noncombatants to life and liberty is ludicrous. Such a step would be tantamount to passing through the second threshold: in essence moving from qualification to utilitarianism. Walzer wants to make the point explicit, "if one is forced to bomb cities, it seems to me, it is best to acknowledge that one has also been forced to kill the innocent." (Walzer pg. 261)

Earlier in the same section, Walzer states something to the same effect, "we cannot forget that the rights violated for the sake of victory are genuine rights, deeply founded in principle and inviolable." (Walzer pg. 228) If leaders were to think in these terms, confronting both the dilemma and their prerogative to resolve it, perhaps these great men of character and honor would resort to their means of measureless destruction only "at the last minute."

CONCLUSION

Walzer feels comforted in the regimented structure of the pure absolutist philosophy. Virtually every situation included in the cause and conduct of war can be either justified of indicated within the absolutist paradigm. Yet, Walzer acknowledges that there are some unique exceptions which are not covered by the absolutist theory. Walzer, therefore, qualifies his absolutism and carefully embraces the specific exceptions into his theory of war.

Breaking the highly regarded, absolute rules is always a possibility and always a difficult decision to confront; "the very lives of men and women are at state." (Walzer pg. 228) Every leader must resolve the impinging dilemma as best he/she can. "And no resolution is serious unless it recognizes the force of both jus ad bellum and jus in bello." (Walzer pg. 228)

You've Waited this Long...

Go Ahead!

Before We Go

Fourteen issues ago, an inexperienced staff began e seemingly endless challenge of producing an formative and provocative newspaper. Now ishing this semester's final issue, we leave exhausted t seasoned by the weekly Catalyst battle. We finitely have provoked some readers and hope to ve informed the rest. The paper comes out each iday because a lot of CC students participate in the ocess. Given the constraints of the block plan, we ppreciate the students who have contributed time and ergy toward the weekly endeavor. This semester's fort is coming to a close. We welcome next semester's itor Katie Kerwin and her staff who will produce a atalyst offering a fresh perspective. Enjoy those ggy pizzas and low-cal mocha shakes...

Before we leave it is only right and proper to thank ose stalwart staff members: News Editors, Peter oach and Katie Kerwin for their consistent coverage campus events and their constant battle to avert the utches of subjectivity; they almost made it; Business anager, Jean "the Mad Frog" Boyer, for keeping the atalyst machine well slicked; Feature Editor, Dave vans, for his tall stance on yellow journalism; pinions Editor, Munir Meghjee, for his underpaid d hazy support; Arts Editor, Eric Breitbard, for free er and for reviving our love for "Ol' Blue Eyes"; raphics and Layout Editor, Pete "The Dragon" cott, for the sensitive and gentle nature of his art; orts Editors, Kathy Mahoney and Dean Campbell,— r their "free association" headlines and photo ptions; Copy Editor, Mary Butcher, for her agile ading ability while chasing soccer balls and wielding acto-knives; Photography Editors, Jane Bierman d Jerry Wang for their dedication to photographic cellence and their ability to put up with our less than rganized nature; typesetters Linda and Linda for all ose late nights at the keyboard, even with a neurotic pe-setting machine; we can't forget last semester's aff whom we have to thank for setting high andards, siphoning funds from the Hub account, d taking off with all the office supplies. Just kidding, lair and Dave.

And the Editors-in-Chief, Alexander Fraterelli and ikael Rekkov—what can we say? We appreciate eir unrelenting mocha shake delivery service and late ght soccer tips. Alec claims he's better at making a od pass. He's always there when you need someone do a little investigative reporting on the latest mpus celebrity. Frat's the man who can churn out y article after midnight, but never before. You can unt on him to risk his life to get the paper to the inter on time.

We'll miss the hearty, happy and not so healthy am!!!

Beam us up Scotty.

Affectionately,
The Catalyst Crew

CATALYST

ALEC REKOW & MIKE FRATERELLI, Editors
KATIE KERWIN & PETER LOACH, News Editor
DAVID EVANS, Features Editor
MUNIR MEGHJEE, Opinions Editor
ERIC BREITBARD, Arts Editor
DEAN CAMPBELL & KATHY MAHONEY, Sports Editors
JERRY WANG & JANE BIERMAN, Photo Editors
PETER SCOTT, Layout & Graphics Editor
MARY BUTCHER, Copy Editor
JEAN BOYER, Business Manager
LINDA SHIREMAN, Typesetter
LINDA IMHOFF, Typesetter

The Catalyst is published by Castle Publications, Inc., Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado 80903. Phone (303) 473-2233 (extension 6). The Catalyst is printed on its weekly team September to May, except during holiday periods.

Castle Publications, Inc. does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, age, religion, sex, handicap, creed or physical handicap in its educational programs, activities or employment policies in accordance with federal, state and local laws.

Editorials appearing in the Catalyst are the opinions of the designated author and not necessarily those of any other Catalyst staff member.

The Catalyst encourages the letters to the editor. Letters should be no more than 400 words in length and be typed or neatly printed. Address letters to the Catalyst, Russell Lenzer, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, 80903. Unsigned letters will not be printed.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Our Political Pedigree

To the Editor:

The political collapse of Gary Hart brought forth numerous stories of the sexual activities of many of our most distinguished presidents. The affairs of Kennedy, Eisenhower, and Roosevelt were again served up for public inspection, and to this catalog of vice was added the suspicions (not too well documented) of Mr. Jefferson's escapades with Sally Hemmings. In the interests of historical completeness, I favor the reader with the following tale from Paul Johnson's Oxford Book of British Political Anecdotes (Oxford, 1986).

> The Earl of Lytton, Viceroy of India during the years 1876-1880, was host at dinner to the ex-President of the United States, General Ulysses S. Grant, during his world tour. In a letter to John Morley, Lytton related what happened: "On this occasion, 'our distinguished guest,' the double ex-President of the 'Great Western Republic,' who got as drunk as a fiddle, showed that he could be as profligate as a lord. He fumbled Mrs. A., kissed the shrieking Miss B., pinched the plump Mrs. C. black and blue, and ran at Miss D. with intent to ravish her. Finally, after throwing all the...female guests into hysterics by generally behaving like a must elephant, the noble beast was captured by main force and carried (quatre pattes dans l'air) by six sailors, which relieved India of his distinguished presence. The marine office...reports that, when deposited in the public saloon cabin, where Mrs. G was awaiting him...this remarkable man satiated there and then baffled his lust on the unresisting body of his legitimate spouse, and copiously vomited during the operation. If you have seen Mrs. Grant you will not think this incredible."

Cordially,
David Hendrickson

Womens Leadership Conference

To The Editor

This past weekend Mary McClatchey, a 1983 CC graduate and present co-director of the Denver-based Women's Leadership Training Institute, conducted an all women's leadership conference for twenty CC women. The purpose of this conference was to expose CC women leaders both to their own untapped resources and to the myriad of female approaches to leadership which are seldom acknowledged by the still male dominated definitions of leadership and power.

Why is there a need for special trainings for women? Leadership trainings for women begin the process through which women become empowered by their own special leadership abilities. Male dominated leadership has excluded the more personal/individual based values and skills of women. Women leaders have adopted the male ethos rather than cultivating their own particular perspectives in order to be respected by society. We have been taught as women to devalue the majority of our strengths.

The male ethos (not necessarily subscribed to by all males) has created the specialization and division of labor, a value system where the end is more important than the means, and leadership techniques which tend to alienate the individual. In comparison, the female ethos (inherent in both men and women but rarely implemented) advocates a leadership practice which assesses the needs of the individual, realizes the equal importance of the means and the end, and divides labor non-hierarchically. It is interesting to note that the re-vamping of corporate practice in the '80s has included many of the more female approaches. The latest craze of "quality circles," input from assembly line workers, and including workers in policy decisions is the beginning of widescale implementation of the female ethos of leadership.

The outcome of the one day event is that there are at least twenty women loudly asking for more exposure to women role models, support groups for women to explore their own resources as leaders, and a greater emphasis on women in leadership roles through lectures and public events. Part of this will come next year with a larger women's studies program and a re-organized and re-defined "Feminist Collective." Most important will be the continued training of women to assume their own leadership abilities.

—Raina Brubaker

An Alumna Responds

To the Editor:

Hats off to David Hendrickson! It takes a bold-spirited individual to stand alone on the "wrong" side of a moral issue such as whether or not to divest CC's holdings in South Africa (South Africa and Divestment, 1987). While I admire Dr. Hendrickson's intestinal fortitude, I also question his proposition that CC's divestment would serve "no constructive political object."

Dr. Hendrickson claims that the CC faculty devoted their February 23 meeting to demonstrating their moral repugnance to the apartheid system in South Africa, without discussing the concrete political merit of CC's divestment.

The question of moralism aside, however, I feel that we have much to gain politically by divesting our holdings in South Africa, on a governmental, business and collegiate level. It is high time that we apply the lessons learned in countries such as Iran (1953), Guatemala (1954), and Chile (1973). By associating itself with the repressive regimes in these countries, the U.S. tacitly endorsed the widespread human rights violations committed by those regimes and thus alienated itself from the citizens actually suffering those violations on a daily basis. In doing so, the U.S. set itself up for a series of "anti-American" backlashes as these repressive governments fell.

If Dr. Hendrickson wants to achieve a "constructive political object" in South Africa, he should consider the merits of avoiding our past mistakes and instead laying the foundation for a mutually beneficial relationship with the post-apartheid government. As the Black majority will likely be appropriately represented in such a government, and as the current leaders of that majority believe that foreign investment in South Africa represents a tacit support of the present apartheid system, perhaps we should respect the wishes of those leaders. The fact that Dr. Hendrickson does not endorse their theory is insignificant and even moot. Rather than deciding what is in the best economic interest of South Africa in the long run, the U.S. government, U.S. corporations and U.S. colleges and universities should perhaps avoid their perennial imperialistic tendencies and instead respect the Black majority's belief of what is best for itself.

Dr. Hendrickson feels it justifiable to act against the wishes of the Black majority in order to prevent the creation of an "economic basket case" in post-revolutionary South Africa. In the words of Steve Biko, a prominent leader in the Black Consciousness movement who was killed in detention by security forces in 1976,

> ...The argument is often made that the loss of foreign investment would hurt Blacks the most. It would undoubtedly hurt Blacks in the short run, because many of them would stand to lose their jobs. But it should be understood in Europe and in North America that foreign investment supports the present economic system of political injustice...If Washington is really interested in contributing to the development of a just society in South Africa, it would discourage investment in South Africa. We Blacks are perfectly willing to suffer the consequences. We are accustomed to suffering...

Indeed, while Dr. Hendrickson and the rest of us sit safely on our side of the Atlantic and ponder what is in the best interest of South Africans, the Blacks in South Africa risk their lives on a daily basis in their struggle to end apartheid. If they are willing to accept the negative consequences of divestment in order to put an end to the daily suffering and dehumanization caused by the current system, then who are we to decide what is best for them?

Whether or not we feel that divestment will have positive consequences, negative consequences, negligible consequences or no consequences at all on the economic situation in post-apartheid South Africa, perhaps we should focus our attention instead on laying the basis for positive U.S.-South African relations in the future by disassociating ourselves completely from the repressive Afrikaner government and leaving ourselves open for healthy relations with the majority-ruled South African government of the future.

Sincerely,
Elizabeth A. Peterson
Class of '84

OPINIONS

"Segregation Today, Segregation Tomorrow, and Segregation Forever"

To The Editor

A couple of decades ago George Wallace, the then and recently retired governor of Alabama, pronounced these words. He really meant it and lord knows he was right.

Dear editor, it is now 2:00 a.m. Saturday, May 16th and in this moment all I can do is write this letter to give out my feelings. I can't go to sleep because I won't be able to, with all kinds of thoughts going through my head. I was walking by from the PAAC house across the Armstrong quad with a bunch of friends when all of a sudden one of them said: "The shanties have been knocked down again." My reaction was: "No, it is not true!" But my eyes proved the contrary when I walked over. For the fourth time this year, the shanties have been destroyed! They have been destroyed because racism at Colorado College is alive today, will be tomorrow and probably forever. Sympathizers of the South African white racist regime are all behind it. This is not just one person, and tonight's evil act is a proof to that: a whole group took their time and efforts to throw over, crush, and destroy completely the shanties. This time they spared their cars. I stood there for a while and couldn't help but cry. I cried because I have been so hopeful that this college just might be moving in the right direction, although I didn't have any reason to believe that. But this is going too far. We are living in the mid-1980s and Apartheid still exists at an institution such as this, that proclaims itself to be liberal. Liberal in what sense? Just a couple of months ago three fraternity guys harassed, terrorised, and threatened a black administrator of CC. Using such language as: "Go to where you belong nigger." Now, I don't care whether they recognized who he was or not, the fact is that they did it and got away with it. It is anybody's guess what would have happened (how severe it would have been) if it was the reverse situation. Now, this is not to say that it was the first time that it happened. God knows how many members of the black, the hispanic, ...(all minorities) community around here have been threatened by such Colorado College students, among others, and it never came out. You don't have to go that far because I am sure any "minority" student here at CC can say that he or she has suffered in some way or another, racism, prejudice and discrimination. I can imagine that these 3 frats could have hurt the black CC administrator physically (if not kill him) if they had the means and secrutiny to do it, and maybe get away with it too, who knows?

Quite frankly, I've never been so pessimistic before in my life. There are millions and millions of blacks in S.A. that are forced to live in shanties such as the ones that get destroyed at CC all the time. The actions of destroying them is not only a reflection of ignorance and stupidity but also a very strong racist statement. It is a disrespect and spitting in the faces of those millions of blacks who spend their whole lives in such shanties. And don't tell me that getting drunk on fly-day has got anything to do with this whole thing. There is a saying in my language that goes: "A drunk person says and does what has been on his or her mind for a long time." And that says a lot.

But CCCAA is committed to exposing all this racism, it is against Apartheid not only in S.A. but also at CC, and to bringing about a solution. It is a tough job and we believe it will be accomplished. You can destroy the shanties a million times and feel good about it, but you can't destroy what we believe in. Our beliefs, that a better world for everyone of us will be found one day, are a lot stronger than your wicked and racist reaction. Why don't you come out of your hide and KKK membership cards since you are so committal to your cause. Why do you try to hide behind that mask instead of confronting me since I am so dumb (because I'm black). [My good friend Bob Marley always said that "you can run but you can't hide."] You can expect to see the shanties back up soon and we will never give up because we, in the CCCAA, believe in Dr. Martin Luther King's dream, and that is stronger than your actions of wickedness and cowardice. For one day...

Sincerely,
An angry, disappointed, frustrated...and determined than ever.
Pascal Gasirabo

P.S. Our struggle has yet begun.

An Alumnus Responds

To the Editor:

As an alumnus, I am writing to urge the Colorado College to divest itself of the corporations doing business in South Africa. In that nation, a monstrous evil has been placed upon the black population by a minority of racist white men. The black man in South Africa has no hope to improve his own life, nor that of his children under the present political system in that country. Imagine yourself, a talented, caring man, being forced to live in a shack, with one water tap for your neighborhood, and at best menial labor awaiting your children—simply because of the color of your skin. In America, we do not stand for this, and we vow to fight such injustice imposed upon us with our lives, if need be. Our nation is rooted in the sacrifice our ancestors made for the basic rights denied to black South Africans. I find it reprehensible that the Colorado College cannot disassociate itself from the corporations which continue to support behavior in South Africa which is absolutely illegal in the United States.

At the very least, the Colorado College should, as a stockholder, insist that the companies with holdings in South Africa either sell those holdings, or fire all of the whites they employ in that nation and replace them with blacks. Perhaps it is time to give the white minority a taste of the medicine they so freely dish out to people unlike themselves. As this is impractical, I see that divestment is the best way that the Colorado College community can send a message to the illegitimate regime in South Africa.

Sincerely,
Rowan F. Sage
Class of '80

What The Block Plan Really Is

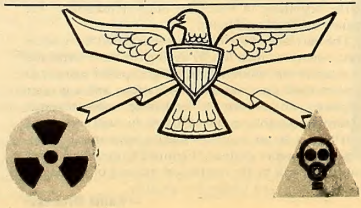
To the Editor:

The academic year at Colorado College is broken up into nine, three and a half week blocks. The catalog explains that the Block Plan provides students with, intensive course study, smaller classes with flexible meeting times and professors with only one class to teach. What the catalog doesn't mention is how the Block Plan, and living by three and a half week intervals will completely affect your economic and social life as well as academics. It does not mention the slow and subtle transformation that will occur within your studying by an alternative academic calender.

People at CC think by the block. Most people make resolutions once a year, New Years. On the Block plan you can make resolutions every three and a half weeks. How many people resolve to exercise more or develop better study habits, block after block? Most people get their hair trimmed once in a while, people at CC get get their hair trimmed once a block. Most people remember the date they met their girl or boyfriend. Here, people remember that it was third block break in Steamboat. Most people continue relationships regardless of course load, some CC students break up for three and a half weeks because one person is in Organic Chemistry 7th block. Most people budget money monthly, at CC its done by the block. Everybody experiences Spring Fever, at CC you can schedule your class 9th block around Springtime. Finally there are those questions that only the Block Plan generates. What are you taking this block? What are you doing Block Break? What did you do Block Break? These are the type of questions usually asked by those people in your class who curiously become friends for three and a half weeks. Most people have friendships for more than three and a half weeks.

It's obvious that Colorado College and its Block Plan are different and this is no criticism or new observation about it: just a thought, and a note that there are three months ahead that are a big, much needed, long awaited break, from the Block Plan.

Julia Fay



What is CC For

To the Editor

...Really. What is it for? And more importantly, what is it actually doing? Perhaps it is just giving us a well paying career? Or four years off from the "Real World?" An excuse to hang out in the Rockies? I'm tempted to look in the Pathfinder or the Catalog for an answer, but I'd prefer to not get bogged down in the liberal arts lip-service and instead use what I've experienced and seen here to extrapolate what it is currently doing, and then propose what it should be doing.

Colorado College is propagating a middle-to-upper class white population which generally cares little for the problems of other peoples and cultures and holds few feelings of responsibility towards the problems of the world other than their own. That may sound outrageous, but if you read between the lines and look around campus and into Armstrong Hall, that's what you'll see.

In between the lines is where you'll find that a student can roam through four years of a "liberal arts" education without having their attitudes and values challenged by the environment nor the curriculum. There are currently 4 "Hispanic," 3 Black, and no Asian or native American full-time professors here. About 22% of the faculty are women and 16 of them are tenured. Out of a student body of 1,850, 25 are Black, 17 are Native American, 52 are "Hispanic," 61 are Asian, and about 55 are International (including Canadian hockey players). This lack of diversity on campus creates a context which reinforces society's racism by sending a message that only whites are capable of attending a "prestigious" institution like CC. Students of color, conversely, must once again deal with and combat feelings of alienation and isolation that continually pervade their lives in white America. Our "Alternative Perspectives" requirement, as we all know, is not difficult to get through without being seriously encouraged to reevaluate our ethnocentrism. (If you are reaching for a dictionary right now, you know what I mean).

In between the lines you'll see an incestuous Board of Trustees who hold all the power and do not respect the majority of voices of the campus they "manage, control, and govern." All student initiatives towards placing a student on the Board have been rejected.

In between the lines you'll see fraternities breeding white male arrogance and legitimizing their existence through an occasional charity dance. And you'll see that same white male arrogance presuming to know better than Black South Africans what is best for them as CC's investments continue to support apartheid. In between the lines you'll see a college oblivious to its surrounding community. In between the lines you'll see business majors and other students on their way to corporate America with a nose for profit and an eye on themselves. In short, in between the lines is where one will find status-quo America.

Yet there is hope, and there is a struggle going on to create a college in Colorado Springs that lives up to its propaganda and truly is the leader in the effort to make a better world. If we can lift our heads out of four years of the Block plan, and allow ourselves to imagine a little bit, we can see a college spending money not on expanding its facilities, but rather on creating an environment where people of all races and cultures can excel. We'll see a college instilling in students an awareness and concern for people who are not only wealthy and white through a truly diverse faculty and student body who do not let racism go unchallenged.

We'll be able to see a college setting a positive example for social responsibility by installing solar panels on all the main campus buildings; maintaining an ethical investment portfolio; actively engaging in the community through internships and research; and banning the sale of socially irresponsible products such as Coors and Nestle's on campus.

We can see a democratic college which respects the input of students and shows that respect through empowered votes on the Board of Trustees. We'll see an administration that actively seeks out and challenges homophobia, racism, sexism and any other kind of intolerance on campus and in the community. We'll see a college committed not only to the study of world problems, but also to the empowered participation by the college itself in the practical solutions to those problems.

We must imagine a college actually working for a better world, and not just promoting the status quo. We must imagine it, and then work for it. Because we no longer have time to simply debate, and exchange ideas in this wishy-washy liberal arts sort of way. The bombs are on their way...

—Matt Case

Terrorism:

The Stakes are Getting Higher

What have the U.S. and allies done on a common basis to stop terrorism? All have proclaimed that terrorism is repugnant and must be stopped. The major industrial nations declared at the Tokyo economic summit a common policy against terrorism and terrorist supporting states. This has not, however, resulted in any broad common policy against terrorism. The closest resemblance to such a system has been the cooperation of intelligence agencies in tracking down terrorists who have already attacked. The deterrence of such action is limited without a near 100% success rate, which is of course an impossible achievement. Meanwhile the French and German governments have refused any type of conference on the entirety of the Middle East situation. Each feels that such a platform would deteriorate the condition of hostages from their respective nations. Germany has also refused to turn over to the U.S. a suspect associated with the bombing of the West German night club which killed several American soldiers and led to the Lybian air raid. The U.S. has already directly violated, with arms sales to Iran, the international initiative which it originally created. The Western governments have turned effective unity needed to stop terrorism by declining opportunities which have been opened at an international level.

The need for the Western nations to negotiate with terrorist supporting nations and/or impede international activities against terrorists stems from domestic political efforts and a flawed analysis of how to prevent further terrorist activities.

On the domestic front all negotiations with and concessions to terrorists seem to have been made in view of important national elections. Such was the effort made by the Reagan administration during Iranscam to secure freedom of hostages before the 1986 Congressional elections. The German's decision not to release the imprisoned terrorist to the U.S. was made out of fear of disturbing a pleasant political situation before elections in early 1987. And in France, negotiations with Iran were started by the socialist government previous to national elections (also in 1986) only to be reinforced by P.M. Jacques Chirac as a means to gain support for a victorious conservative coalition which has since run into political trouble.

The philosophy behind these negotiations is that hostages will either be liberated if negotiations are successful or at least kept alive while politicians make an "honest" or maybe "constructive" effort to free them. Although these politics can be benificial in the immediate future, long term results have been much worse. One would think that a country such as France, who is negotiating over hostages with Iran, would learn from failed policies of others. The U.S. arms sales to Iran revealed several fundamental untruths about negotiations.

France has, however, kept negotiations going. According to Ali Ahani, director for Europe and America policy in the Iranian Foreign Ministry, negotiations have been progressing quite nicely. What seems more dangerous is how the Iranians have managed to influence the French government's public policy. In January the French government had refused to meet Mr. Ahani, declaring him a non-policy. Yet when the Iranian envoy refused to submit through official diplomatic channels a letter from the Iranian Prime Minister, Mr. Ahani was accorded a meeting with French P.M. Jacques Chirac in person. The Iranians seem to have open access to French leadership. More recently, the French government refused to take diplomatic reprisals against Iran when terrorists linked to Islamic Tehad were arrested in connection with the 1986 bombing spree in Paris. Islamic Jihad is one of the radical Islamic Fundamentalist movements Iran supports abroad.

The Western nation, especially France and the U.S., have directly given Iran a beneficial policy from which it has no reason to back down. The Iranians know they are in control of western politics. Thus hostages will continue to be taken while arms can be obtained in exchange. Terrorism originating from Lebanon risks to continue after radicals adopt to Syrian intervention in Beirut (the radical Hizbullah controls strongholds in southern Beirut is free of Syrian intervention). Morale will increase or at least remain steady following apparent "victories" against Western nations (in Iran, "Iranscam" was portrayed as such). Worst of all the Iranians seem to have no fear of Western intervention, direct or indirect, in the Gulf [illegible] and will continue on their offensive maneuvers. Western observers are predicting a new major offensive.

BY HUGH MORRISON

Victor Greto

Broken Mirror

We are all broken images of one another; in every person we see each day, talk to, glance at, we grasp at them as though at mirror images of ourselves. When I say I "know you", I simply think I know my idea of you, and you can only be so much of what I am — I reflect out upon you, and you doggedly reflect back. This seems to be the stuff we are made of.

This article's about communication because this is my last article (please, no sighs of relief), and I wanted to tell you how frustrating it often is to communicate to another what I'm thinking and feeling, and, the other way around, how frustrating it is to understand another. If it is true that we may only know one another through ourselves, it seems that the result would be a bit troublesome. Yet need I speculate so much? Haven't we troubles?

It often seems that the lack of ambiguity in most people's relationships (and this most definitely applies to political nations as well) resides in the fact that we have already made up our minds about them. This is what I mean by the broken image or mirror: each day, if we take the effort to unearth the other person's ambiguity, a level of his or her personality we cannot relate to at a given time, that mirror of ourselves we see in our friend or acquaintance becomes cracked, broken. Language, as the means of communication (such as these articles), is a sore means of "fixing" the broken image of our neighbor; words as signs for a multitude of other meanings, often unique to each class or strata or family of people, often become as useless as moot gazing. Often through language we either crack the mirror or image more, or if we believe we have repaired it, it's usually via a bad and flimsy patch job, one where you can still see the glue, the frayed tape.

The answer? There really isn't any. As a person on the "other side" of an acquaintance, I'm often glad there isn't. Who wants to be "figured out?" Who wants to plauded as predictable, mundane, boring? Yet who wants to be misunderstood, misinterpreted, have arrogant assumptions made about the way you think, feel? That is one of the major problems I have felt in writing these articles: am I being misunderstood? Are assumptions carried into these articles by people who have some acquaintance with me and who now will not take the extra time to unearth a little ambiguity, will not give me the benefit of the doubt?

Most communication is a failure, usually on both parts, giver and receiver. We (the communicants) both assume, are busy putting up our pitiful self-defense in case we are attacked, humiliated, cornered. And why not, we must insist: who else is there to protect us?

Well, there's the other guy. Without going as far to say that I advise we raise up our arms and surrender to the other in some desperate bid for understanding or love, I say we must at least give him the benefit of the doubt. We will never be able to communicate fully with one another; perhaps we feel there is too much at stake. And we may be right. Yet, hand in hand with the realization that all forms of communication are in some important way inadequate, we must never forget it is our only tool for getting along. It exists as a means to an end. But to what end?

Love? Happiness? It is perhaps too simple to wrap all our problems and relationships into a package called "love" or "happiness" and expect all things to work out. Yet, it seems to me, that there exists no greater act of communication than two hands touching. But, again, this is only an act of communication, a means. I find no meaning in my life, in my individual being, secluded in an intellectually sterile, "objective" vacuum. It is me conjoined with others which gives a meaning more than what I am or ever could be. Love, in many ways (not implying there are not others), is that connection which runs from me to you like those fiber-optic strands we have attached to our telephones, instantaneously putting us in touch with others.

Yet if that is my end, that joining which gives my life any kind of meaning, if consistent with my premises, it is merely a mirror image of myself. So be it. If there exists out there, as they used to say, "a world to win," I hope it's a world which shatters all my clearfaced mirrored realities, that is able to cut through the surface two dimensions of my own bitter reflection an touch a third dimension, the actual other that is out there. Picture us all, as individuals, our naked bodies pressed against the mirror — here is my image of communication. It's time to break the mirror, reach through and beyond its stifling two dimensions into something greater, perhaps more than ourselves. Like the profoundly misunderstood fourth dimension, mind-boggling in its mysterious complexity, so our neighbor's three dimensions wait to be discovered, to open a seemingly limitless door to newer relationships, loves and realities.

David Makarechian

The Failure of Liberal Arts

The Colorado College. It's all that's open, all that's new. Step outside your mind at CC. This is the liberal arts.

I've always had some trouble with that.

Any my frustration culminated at a recent lecture in the Gates Room. The lecture was well attended by both faculty and students (of course, the same faculty and students that always attend these things). And I noticed a pattern. The professors, and the students obediently following their lead, seemed to be absolutely programmed. They nodded on cue, blindly accepting all of the speaker's major points. They laughed when they were supposed to laugh, and looked thoughtful when they were supposed to look thoughtful. Were these Colorado College's liberal thinkers? Were these Colorado College's patrons of the liberal arts? It dawned on me that this scenario is what the liberal arts could become at Colorado College. Lip Service—nothing more. In fact, we might already be dangerously close to this most dangerous stage.

The failure of the liberal arts. It sounds like a dramatic, grave situation—and it is. Because after all, the liberal arts represents an ideal. A man who knows what he does not know is a man with a clearly prescribed code of living and ethics. From this perspective, liberal arts becomes a foundation on which all of one's other actions stem. In other words, it's worth a hell of a lot more than $12,000 a year.

But not if it doesn't work.

And I don't think it's working. Enter apathy.

What went wrong with the Socratic vision? It's really anyone's guess. What can you say to somebody who really just doesn't care? The topic requires much more than the cursory examination allowed in this space. But one thing is clear: We may be holding the liberal arts out as something it is not. Rather than being a code of living and the springboard of one's actions, apathy can cause the liberal arts to remain as an idea and just that—an unreachable idea fooling everybody.

So in the years of a de facto presidency languishing in conservative principles and beating its head against a wall, in the days of a nation more concerned about the PTL Club than poverty, it has to be time to reassess the purpose of the liberal arts—to reassess how we fit in and should fit in to a time period that will be remembered for its apathy. In other words, it's time to find out what happened to the "liberal arts experience" that Gresham promised us as freshmen.

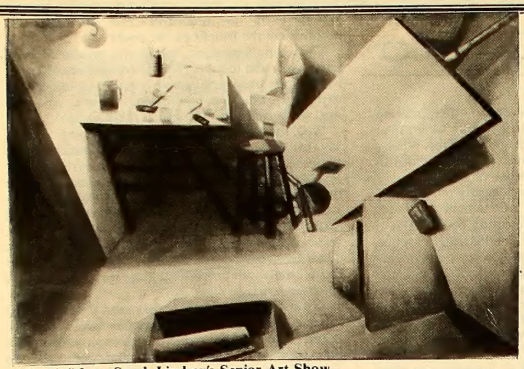
Apathy propels the faculty in the direction of illibrality. A student without the intellectual fortitude to question his professors (and who does have that fortitude as an underclassman, anyway) only encourages the change in the liberal arts to the Liberal arts. If it is right (i.e. of center) then it is wrong. Faculty members become less concerned with the question of truty, and more concerned with applying the same old principles acceptable in their hip-with-it type professorial circles. The search for the truth becomes the search for sounding good. And I think that's the direction we're heading in.

Apathy precludes liberal learning on the part of the students. A number of different things could happen to them upon indoctrination in the classroom. One can develop a principle with which to invoke argument in a search for the truth—and then face the liberal arts stigma of being branded, "closed minded." Or one can permit himself to be indoctrined—and never really know what liberal learning is. It is not supporting a cause here and a cause there to reveal oneself as a concientious patron of the liberal arts. Do we dare look for absolutes? Can we have principles?

What about apathy and the attitude of the college. It's just another cog in the viscious circle. Of course, the philosophy of an institution will reflect its makeup. And the campus may no longer be a place for thoughtful reflection, but instead the sight of a multimillion dollar "capital campaign." And there is always the question of dollars and divestment.

So the liberal arts may be fallible. The code of living and the center around which revolves all of one's actions falls woefully short when apathy is added to the equation.

And it has to change. Or everyone will want their $12,000 back.



"Studio" from Sarah Lindsey's Senior Art Show.

Katie Talks Pop

One thing that bothers me is the term "New Age Music." I think it's an unfair generalization concerning a lot of music that just happens to be mellow and instrumental. And contrary to popular belief, people other than sprout sucking yuppies listen to Andreas Vollenweider and George Winston.

Perhaps tying in with this is another trend in music: the psychedelic sixties sound that some newer bands have latched on to. It might be an attempt to recapture the spirit of the time or maybe just a way to escape all the techno garbage found in a lot of today's music.

Yes, I think that some of the musical technology is getting a little out of hand. I mean, just how much computer generated notes and rhythms can we handle? Some of the personal touch is also lost when all the sounds on a song come from one person and keyboards not a band.

Another form of music that has seen a steady rise in popularity is Heavy Metal. And if this didn't boggle my mind enough, I can't help wondering where the term Heavy Metal came from in the first place. Is it because some of the songs have all the appeal of heavy metal scraping together or does it have something to do with the fact that some of those involved in the field wear industrial strength amounts of hair mousse?

That's another feature of pop music: appearances. Who cares what Madonna's music sounds like as long as we know that she no longer wears tons of bracelets or has hair that looks like a mop. I frankly think she's fooling herself if she seriously believes she is the next Marilyn Monroe. Sorry, but all the peroxide in the world wouldn't help.

True, the popularity of some people in the music profession is astounding enough, but what's really amazing is some of the veteran rockers. The likes of David Bowie, Iggy Pop and Peter Gabriel are still cranking out the tunes. Incidentally, I'd say it was about time that Gabriel finally got some of the recognition he deserves.

KATIE DALSEMER

What's On Your Turntable?

Adrienne Seward Professor Folklore
Mahalia Jackson's Greatest Hits

Judy Genova Professor Philosophy
Paul Simon, "Graceland"

Jason Flinn Junior Art Studio
REM, "Murmer"

Ralph Hartman Junior Poli Sci
Circle Jerks, "Group Sex"

Harold Hicks Transportation - Physical Plant
Exile, "Hang on to Your Heart"

Kathy Mahoney Senior English
The Band, Anthology

Dancing to Distant Drums

The world premiere of the nation's first national company of American Indian dancers will be held this month at Colorado College, prior to the troupe's embarking on a world tour.

The American Indian Dance Theatre will present "Distant Drums," an original production, at 8:15 p.m. Thursday-Saturday, May 28-30, in Armstrong Theatre. Tickets are $10 for each of the three shows and may be purchased at the Student Center, 931 N. Nevada Ave., or at the door if not sold out. (The cost is $5 for those with Colorado College i.d. cards.)

This will be the first public performance for the company, which comprises 25 Native American dancers and musicians, drawn from 13 tribes — including Cree, Blackfoot, Zuni, Sioux, Commanche and Apache. The troupe will next perform at the Beverly Theatre in Los Angeles, June 4-7, at a fundraising gala for the American Indian Registry, a Los Angeles-based organization which represents American Indian performers and artists.

In the fall, the company will make a 10-week European tour and may also go to the Soviet Union. Planned, too, are tours of Canada, Japan and Australia, says Barbara Schwei, the New York-based concert producer and promoter who founded the company.

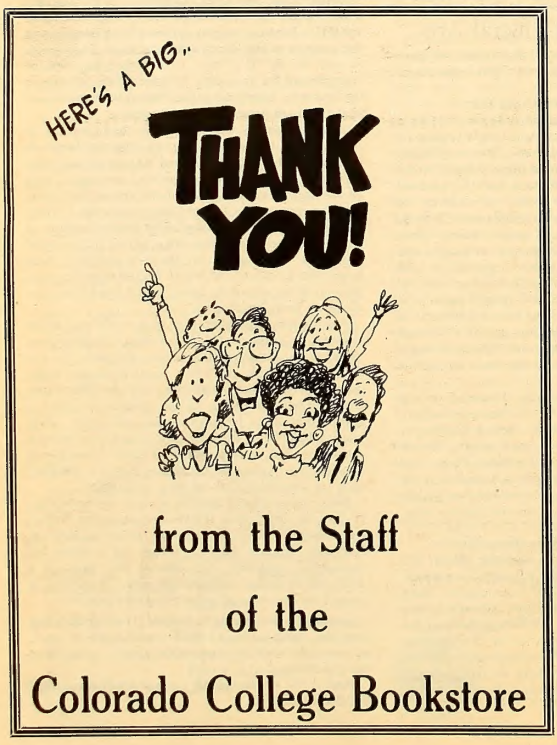
"Distant Drums" will be directed by playwright Hanay Geiogamah (GIG-o-mah), a member of the Kiowa/Delaware tribes and an adjunct professor at UCLA. Choreographer is dancer Raoul Trujillo, a native American from New Mexico.

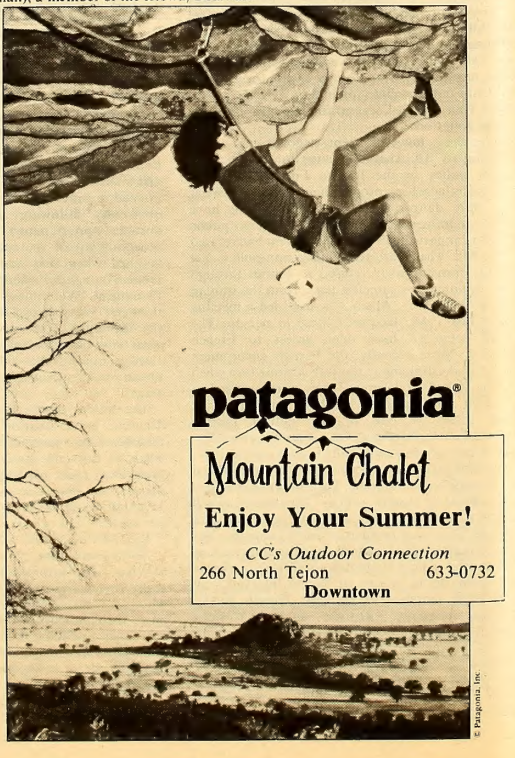
The all-Indian theatrical production employs a set and lighting designed "to capture the beauty and culture of the American Indian past and present," says Schwei (rhymes with "tie").

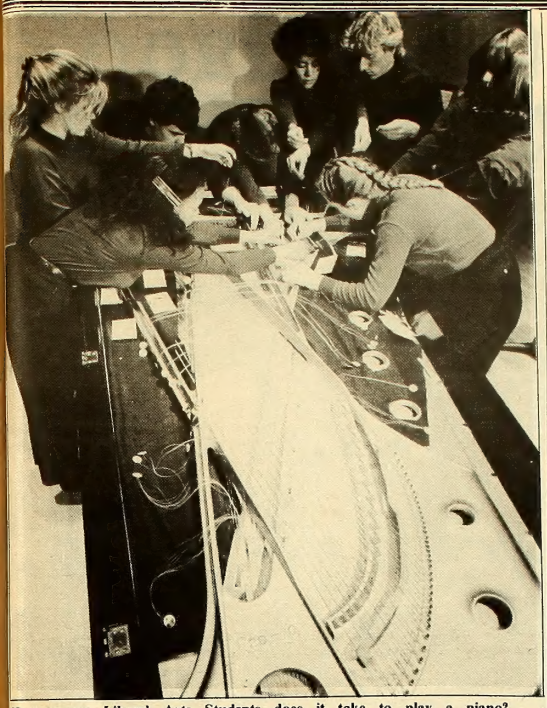
The company fills a void in American dance, she says, noting that almost every other country "has its own dance companies which represent the diverse segments of that country's culture."

The dances in "Distant Drums" are all traditional and authentic, adds director Geiogamah. They include: The Eagle Dance, a celebration of that revered wild bird; The Fire Dance, an Apache ritual; The Fancy Dance, one of the most colorful and theatrical, originally performed as a Victory or War Dance; Women's Fancy Dance, in which northern tribeswomen compete and express themselves; and Dances of the Earth, in which the tribes present variations of dances suggesting harmony with nature.

The company's performances in Colorado Springs are expected to attract representatives from several dance-related organizations and concert halls throughout the country, to preview and plan bookings for the company, according to Professor James Malcolm, who chairs the college's department of drama and dance.







How many Liberal Arts Students does it take to play a piano?

Put Another Shrimp on the Barbee for NME

The Colorado College New Music Ensemble will present a concert, free and open to the public, at 3 p.m. Sunday, May 24, in the Packard Performance Hall.

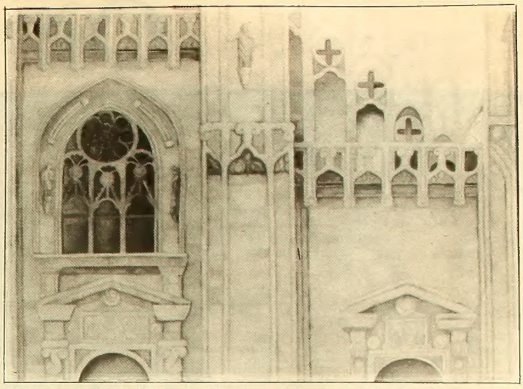
The program will feature music that the ensemble will perform this summer while on tour in Australia. That will include Stephen Scott's newest works for bowed piano — "Minerva's Web" and "The Tears of Niobe" — which were composed under grants from the National Endowment for the Arts and from Colorado College's Benezet Award.

The New Music Ensemble has toured since 1972 in the U.S. and Europe. It was founded by Scott, composer and associate professor of music at the college, and currently comprises eight students and two faculty members.

The ensemble has been featured in several national publications, including Life and Keyboard. In recent years the group has specialized in Scott's music for bowed piano, played by plucking and by drawing flexible and rigid bows across the strings, of the open-top piano.

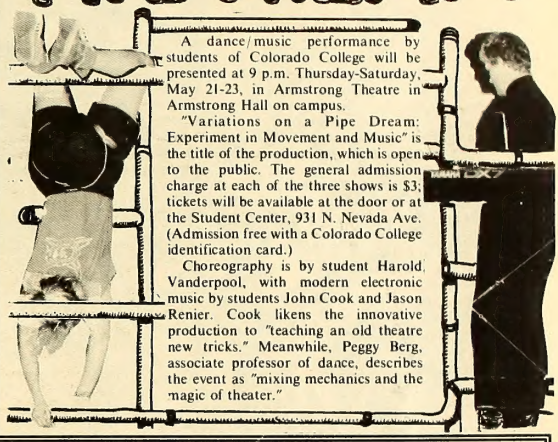
The group's recording of Scott's music for bowed piano is available on New Albion records, cassettes and compact discs.

Packard Hall is located at the southwest corner of the intersection of Cascade Avenue and Cache La Poudre Street.



"Il Duomo in Milan," from Jane Patterson's Senior Art Show.

PIPE DREAM



A dance/music performance by students of Colorado College will be presented at 9 p.m. Thursday-Saturday, May 21-23, in Armstrong Theatre in Armstrong Hall on campus.

"Variations on a Pipe Dream: Experiment in Movement and Music" is the title of the production, which is open to the public. The general admission charge at each of the three shows is $3; tickets will be available at the door or at the Student Center, 931 N. Nevada Ave. (Admission free with a Colorado College identification card.)

Choreography is by student Harold Vanderpool, with modern electronic music by students John Cook and Jason Renier. Cook likens the innovative production to "teaching an old theatre new tricks." Meanwhile, Peggy Berg, associate professor of dance, describes the event as "mixing mechanics and the magic of theater."

Josh & John's

We hope that all your summer dreams are filled with memories of Josh & John's...

"A CC Tradition Since 1986"

632-0299

75¢ delivery fee • delivery on the hour • 1 qt minimum

11 am - MIDNIGHT

SUMMER STORAGE

The Choice Is Yours!

We Suggest:

Interstate Secure Storage

- Call for a quote you'll be happily surprised
- 1st Months Rent ½ Price & Referral Discount
- Electronic Security System on Every Door
- Lighted & Fenced
- On Site Resident Manager

633-0222

On the Edge —

Photos by Jerry Wang

Sagal Named to U.S. Soccer Team

CC sophomore Chip Sagal has been named to the United States soccer team roster that will compete in the 5th Pan Am Maccabi games in Caracas, Venezuela July 16-27. The all Jewish team will use this tournament in preparation for the 1989 Jewish Olympic Games to be held in Israel.

Len Roitman, U.S. Assistant National Team Coach and Coach of Brooklyn College has selected the 16 man roster.

"The team is a combination of experienced and college age players," stated Roitman who four years ago guided the U.S. Pan Am Maccabi Soccer Team to a silver medal in Sao Paulo, Brazil.

Sagal tried out for the team about a month ago in New York over a three day period. The Las Cruces, New Mexico native is a talented attacker who has played a variety of positions while at CC. He expects to play halfback under Roitman.

K. Mahoney

Napalm Takes Ultimate Title

Tuesday, May 19 saw undefeated Division B champs "Napalm" met Division A champs "The Eds" on a mud covered field in Armstrong quad. The Eds had pulled out an unexpected victory over the powerhouse Beta team "Senior Send-off" in the semi's to advance to the championship. In the final, the Eds took a quick lead behind the precision passing of Mike Scaer and Jeff "Cherry Picker" Strain's soaring catches. Napalm player/coach Craig Heacock had prepared his team well, however. Fred Abel and Curt Johnsen soon shut down The Eds' deep attack, and John "Evil" Crawford was able to lead the team on to a 13-8 victory. At one point, as Napalm was taking a commanding lead, one of The Eds accused the referee of being a Fiji, and thus favoring Napalm. The referee, a proud Beta, answered, "I ought to disqualify you guys for that comment." In any case, both teams had a memorable game diving and sliding in the mud, and they should be up for a rematch next year.

YOSUF ISLAM

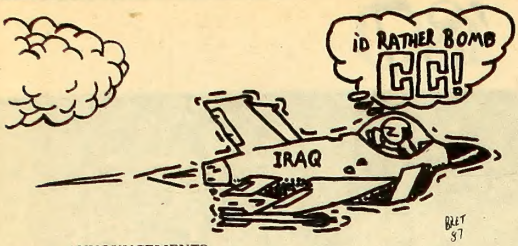
Sports '86 - '87

Photos by Jerry Wang

Dean's Cup Challenge Results

Top 10 Male		Top 10 Female
1)	34:15 Scott Kang	1)	44:41 Paula Trator
2)	34:52 Mark Koch	2)	47:59 Carol Shaffer
3)	35:23 Paul Koch	3)	49:12 Laurie Stone
4)	36:01 Ben Harrison	4)	51:41 Kitzie Petterson
5)	36:36 Ryan Shaffer	5)	52:31 Lisa Howland
6)	36:51 Frank Booth	6)	55:16 Abby Maxman
7)	36:55 Peter Courogen	7)	55:48 Allison Scott
8)	37:44 Bob Pelley	8)	58:51 Melissa Forbes
9)	38:27 Alec Rekow	9)	59:22 Karen Ruehl
10)	38:27 Gary Geist	10)	59:45 Kimberly Kepner

ANNOUNCEMENTS



ANNOUNCEMENTS

Roundtrip ticket to San Diego via Phoenix for sale. Leaves 5/28, returns 6/21. For info call Jorge at 635-2318.

Found Mountain Bike — Call Tom 685-9534 (anytime after 4 pm).

Square Dancin' - Under the Stars. Grab your partner and get ready to docey-do.

Traditional square dancing will be featured every Thursday night, June 11 to September 3, in front of the bandshell in Bancroft park, located at 2400 W. Colorado Ave. in old Colorado City.

There will be early bird instruction at 7:30 p.m. and regular dancing from 8 to 9:30 p.m.

Hosted by: Dean & Peg Edwards, the "Fun Finders" Traditional Square, Round, and Contra dance groups, and the Colorado Springs Park & Rec. Dept.

Toe tappin' hoedown music will be provided by the "Hoedown-Aires" orchestra, featuring local musicians, Lou Liles, piano; Don Schaarschmidt, fiddle-mandolin; Don Cain, guitar; Don Cain Jr., accordian; Dick Hall, guitar; Tom Adams, 5-string banjo; and Dean Edwards, tenor banjo.

Featured Callers will be Jim Sharp, and Phil Foddrell.

These free and open to the public, fun-filled programs, are brought to the park through the sponsors, the Colorado City Creamery - Phil Long Ford - KKCS-am, fm, and KOAA-TV.

For further information, call Peg Edwards at 597-8888 or Mary Jane Rust at 578-6640.

Wanted: Apple II computer, call Dick Story x406.

Female Roommate wanted to share furnished, 4 br. Victorian home 5 blocks west of campus. $200.00 per mo. includes utilities. Call 634-4733 or 471-0786. Ask for Rick.

Freshmen, Sophomores, Juniors if you plan to be here May 31 and June 1st, you can join in the Seniors big weekend. Students are needed to help usher and serve at Bacalaureate and/or Commencement. Sign up at the Legal Office AH 204 or x703. You can sign up for one or both days. Thanks.

NUDE TRIKE RACES! SENIOR WOMEN'S BOXING! DALY'S THESIS PROJECT! FREE CIGARETTES and BLOOD SIMPLE!

Come to the hub this Sunday, May 23rd at 7:00 PM for the world premiere of Kevin "Stack" Daly's "The Best of the Rest."

Kevin is CC's first and only Arts Management major who put this program together for his Senior thesis. The show features videos and interviews of the hottest non-funk bands in Minneapolis. It is currently being aired on Channel 10 (Continental Cablevision) Tuesday nights at 9:00 and on the Christian Broadcast Network at 3:45 Saturday mornings.

There might be free beer. But then again it might cost 75 cents. Immediately following the show will be stupid cow tricks, recreational wombat bludgeoning and a showing of the award-winning film Blood Simple (by the same people who brought you Raising Arizona).

All students and faculty welcome!

Furniture, Etc. Cheap 634-0553.

JOAN RIVERS
Comedienne

$1,000 Poetry Prize Deadline June 30.

A $1,000 Grand Prize will be awarded to the poet who sends the best entry to the American Poetry Association's poetry contest. The deadline for entry is June 30, 1987. The contest judges will select a total of 141 winners and award them over $5,000 in cash and prizes. Entry is free.

Interested poets should send up to three poems of no more than 20 lines each. Any theme and any style are eligible to win. Poems should be typed if possible, and the poet's name and address should be on the top of each page. The poem should be mailed by June 30th to the American Poetry Association, Department CN-22, 250-A Potrero Street, P.O. Box 1803, Santa Cruz, CA 95061-1803.

Typing Service — Accurate, fast typing service at reasonable rates. Located three blocks south of Armstrong Hall. Telephone: 632-1226. Mildred Frasier.

For Sale: Fuji Track Bike 5/cm $300. Dasso Road Bike 5/cm $500. Call 630-1017.

ACROSS

1 Swiss river
4 Get up
9 Moccasin
12 Falsehood
13 Cast a ballot
14 Mohammedan title
15 Talks idly
17 Seesaw
19 Challenged
21 Neither
22 Pronoun
24 Declare
26 Memorandum
29 Rabbits
31 Encountered
33 Negative
34 Teutonic deity
35 Soak up
37 Cover
39 Greek letter
40 Stitch
42 Bow
44 Hauled
46 Arabian chieftain
48 Fruit seed
50 Sagacious
51 Lamprey
53 Communion plate
55 Unite securely
58 Margin
61 Possessed
62 Passageway
64 World War II agency: init.
65 Bitter vetch
66 Secret agents
67 Marry

DOWN

1 High mountain
2 Ventilate
3 Schoolbook
4 Declare
5 Flowers
6 Kind of type: abbr.
7 Deposit
8 Paradise
9 Sponsor
10 Mature
11 Vehicle
16 Domesticates
18 Vast age
20 Obstruct
22 The ones here
23 Seraglio
25 Still
27 Heavy volumes
28 Musical study
30 Offspring
32 Small child
36 Burst
38 Strength
41 Handles
43 Plunge
45 Opening in wall
47 Crimson
49 Article of furniture
52 Meadows
54 Pedal digits
55 That woman
56 Paddle
57 Rend
50 Female sheep
60 Free of
63 Spanish for "yes"

A	A	R		A	R	I	S	E		P	A	C
L	I	E		V	O	T	E	D		A	G	A
P	R	A	T	E	S		T	E	E	T	E	R
		D	A	R	E	D		N	O	R
T	H	E	M		S	A	Y		N	O	T	E
H	A	R	E	S		M	E	T		N	O	T
E	R		S	O	P		T	O	P		M	U
S	E	W		N	O	D		T	O	W	E	D
E	M	I	R		P	I	T		W	I	S	E
		E	E	L		P	A	T	E	N
S	O	L	D	E	R		B	O	R	D	E	R
H	A	D		A	I	S	L	E		O	W	I
E	R	S		S	P	I	E	S		W	E	D

1	2	3		4	5	6	7	8		9	10	11
12				13						14
15			16				17		18
		19				20		21
22	23				24		25		26		27	28
29				30		31		32		33
34			35		36		37		38		39
40		41		42		43		44		45
46			47		48		49		50
		51		52		53		54
55	56				57		58				59	60
61				62		63				64
65				66						67

© 1984 United Feature Syndicate

COLLEGE PRESS SERVICE

Research Assistant — Summer, 1987, library and editing work, research assistance, June—August 1987. Work with Professor Tom Cronin, Department of Political Science. Requisites: high academic achievement, writing and editing experience. Interested persons should submit letter of interest, resume and list of three references to Box 6, Armstrong Post Office, CC. Flexible hours, good pay.

Worldwide Entrepreneur Media Personality

WAYNE D. RUDNER

The Voice of the Future

Arizona • Colorado
The Earth

&

ANDREW W. COZINE

Creative Genius

• THE VOICE OF THE FUTURE CAMPAIGN •

Vice President
Press Secretary - Legal Consultant

(602) 299-1428 Tucson, AZ 85718
(303) 473-2233 x 338 Colorado Springs, CO 80903

Wish you a Good Summer

HOUGHEN
BINDERY LTD
UTICA/OMAHA
NE.